Emile and Tita Cammaerts have written for E. P. Dutton's "Schoolmate Series" a story of Belgian child-life called "A Boy of Bruges" ($1.00). The authors tell how Pieter and Matthieu, two peasant boys, visit the great cities of Belgium, go to school, journey to the country and the mountains, help resist the German invader, etc. But neither lad seems to go to church or to be at all concerned about his religion, which seems passing strange in a Belgian boy. Florence Converse well says in her preface: "Belgium is feeding our souls, and we shall live in the strength of that spiritual food so long as memory lasts. Because Belgium has laid down her life rather than break her word, no other nation will ever again be able lightly to break faith with its fellows."——"Pieces of Eight" (Doubleday, $1.40), by Richard Le Gallienne, is a good old-fashioned treasure-trove story in a modern setting and with a "heart-interest" in the person of the beauteous "Calypso" added. The familiar properties of this kind of tale, the dead pirate's chart, the "rakish" enemy craft, the chest of Spanish dubloons, the grinning skeletons, etc., are cleverly used and the suspense is well-sustained.——Guy Fleming's "Over the Hills and Far Away" (Longmans, $1.50) is a very interesting and admirably told story of a Scotch laddie of about the year 1776 who has thrilling adventures with smugglers, duelists, partisans of the Pretender, gamblers, highwaymen and fair ladies. He seeks and finds the lost heir of Glencairn, witnesses Paul Jones' victory over the Serapis, lives the turbulent life of the Edinburgh law-students, and comes triumphantly into his own at last.

In "Georgian Poetry, 1916-1917" ($2.00), are these lines by James Stephens on the fair colleens of "Westland Row":

Every Sunday there's a throng
Of pretty girls, who trot along
In a pious, breathless state
(They are nearly always late)
To the chapel, where they pray
For the sins of Saturday.
They have frocks of white and blue,
Yellow sashes they have too.
And red ribbons show each head
Tenderly is ringleted;
And the bell rings loud, and the Railway whistles urgently.
After chapel they will go,
Walking delicately slow,
Telling still how Father John
Is so good to look upon,
And such other grave affairs
As they thought of during prayers.

EDUCATION

Education and the Poor House

HAMILTON SEARS, my young friend behind the footlights, was obviously nearing a conclusion. With an interest that was not wholly put on for the glad occasion, to wit, the thirty-eighth annual commencement of St. Anselm's High School, I listened to this young gentleman as he outlined a national social policy, based upon the soundest principles of Christian ethics. If followed by all good Christian men and suffragettes, this program would assuredly make our happy earth dance with corn and wine and oil, and all good things for mind and body and soul. But as I have been waiting on school and college commencements for more years than I am now willing to acknowledge, I had heard these sentiments before, and I confess that I began to breathe more contentedly, when I perceived that my young friend was preparing to draw by sure and easy stages into the terminal. For he was to be followed by a clergyman, a veteran educator, in an address to the "graduates."

Putting Him at Work

NOW I know that many things were said by him, which will not be soon forgotten either by the youthful graduates, or by their friends who had gathered to grace the scene. But as for myself, what stirred me most was his appeal, that every father and mother there before him be prepared to assume the further burden of "sending the boy to college." He reminded them, that, while a boy who had finished the high-school course was better fitted, other things being equal, to make his way in the world, than the boy whose schooling terminated with the eighth grade, yet, after all, the high school was only the necessary preparation for the acquisition of something higher, a college training, without which the Catholic young man of the future will be under a heavy handicap. Education, only a few years ago the privilege of the favored class in this country, was now being made the possession of the many outside the Church, and if the prizes of life were numerous, the educated always bear away the lion's share. Like wisdom which, in some measure it confers, it is a pearl of great price, and Catholic parents ought to be willing to pay a great price for it. "To put the boy to work" is a temptation to which many yield, and in these days of high prices, perhaps we ought not to bear too heavily upon those hard-pressed parents who succumb. Nevertheless, it is a short-sighted policy.

Our Jewish Brethren

THE speaker added an example, drawn from his years of experience in directing large educational establishments. "I have known many parents, parents of all nationalities," he said, "who came to my office to give notice of a boy's withdrawal, because 'he can get work at eight dollars a week.' But I have never had that experience with a Jewish father or mother. For it is the Jew who recognizes that in whatever way education may 'pay,' it almost always pays in financial returns." The example reminded me of a paragraph which I clipped some years ago from the pages of a Jewish weekly magazine. "Will an education pay?" asked the writer. "Pay in what? In money? In nine cases out of ten it does that. Statistics show that the vast majority of men who stand high in business have been educated men." This may be considered expert testimony, and the gist of it forms a text from which, in my humble way, I have preached many a sermon. For I fear that it does not loom large in the consciousness of Catholic parents, and in these days of inflated wages for unskilled labor, it is likely to fade away altogether.

The young orator himself, who is the peg from which these remarks are suspended, likewise serves me as a horrible example. It is plain that he has a good mind, and is altogether a youth who could profit by collegiate and professional training. Yet I am given to understand that the boy, aided and abetted by his parents who, if not wealthy are by no means in an abject state, is to take some clerical position in a department store that will pay about ten dollars a week. My young friend may develop into a merchant prince some of these days, and be able to endow his Alma Mater, but, on the other hand, he may not so develop. The chances are at least equal that some fifteen years hence he will be one of Manhattan's thousands who have filled an inferior position most of their lives, and have long since ceased to hope for anything brighter or more remunerative.

Does It Pay?

MY good friend, Mr. Patrick Mallon, of Brooklyn, an authority on the boy and young man problem, has stated publicly that, unless a boy has at least a high school education, "it is becoming more and more difficult to get a position above the rank of office boy or messenger." Last year, a Chicago newspaper, after a fairly searching investigation, concluded that, generally speaking, a man's earning capacity is in direct proportion to his education. The Rev. Fitzgeorge Dinneen, S.J., who has given many years to the study of problems in education and sociology, believes that, as a rule, the most successful men are college men. I know that many are the exceptions to this rule, for, as President Wilson once said, "You can't pin a $5,000 education on a fifty-cent boy." But if the boy is worth anything, four years in a good college will teach him how to make the best of himself. Father Dinneen, who has carefully marshaled his facts, writes:

> College graduates make up about one per cent of the total male population of the United States. Yet this one per cent furnishes sixty per cent of the successful and influential men of this country, thus leaving only forty per cent of the best places for the other ninety-nine per cent of the population.

Far be it from me to exaggerate the value of an education, computed in terms of dollars and cents. I do not wish to be counted among those who hold that all human happiness is conditioned by the pay-envelope. I have seen too many joyous poor and miserable rich, to be caught by that sophistry. Yet I would not subscribe without reserves, to the "love in a cottage" theory. For her content and well-being, Angelina needs bread as well as busses, and if Clarence toils for less than a minimum wage, the cottage will soon be sold over their heads, roses and all. A decent income does not constitute human felicity, but it surely does smoothe away many a rough passage on the road to its attainment.

SOCIOLOGY

Sluicing Our Forces

CANON SHEEHAN once wrote: "The Catholic priesthood knows not its power. If it did all forms of error would go down before it. The consecrated force of so many thousand intellects, the pick and choice of each nation under heaven, the very flower of civilization, emancipated too from all domestic cares, and free to pursue in the domains of thought that subject for which each has the greatest aptitude, should bear down with its energy and impetuosity the tottering fabrics of human ingenuity or folly." With the same respect with which the good pastor of Doneraile spoke thus of his brethren of the cloth, might we not say the same with some degree of truth, not only of the clergy of our own land, but of our laity as well?

Our Eminent Leaders

IT is true, we do appreciate in large measure our abilities and strength. A fever is abroad among our people. It is not the exceptional conviction today, but a fairly universal one that has made us conscious of our power. Else why the mooting of a Catholic daily, a Young Men's Catholic Association; why the stirrings afoot for organization? But how far is this impression crystallizing in practice? Are the golden seconds of opportunity slipping through our fingers? Are we failing to thrust ourselves through the opening made by present-day conditions or are we waiting watchfully for a hundred things that may never come to pass, or if at all, too late? Despite some indications to the contrary it does appear that we are hanging fire too long.

. Surely no diffidence need hold us back. What united Catholic effort can do is evidenced, for instance, by the failure of the Kulturkampf in Germany, by the literary achievements of such men as Barrès, Bazin, Brunetière and others, in France. Or to come nearer home, could we ask for greater success than that of the recent War Fund drive of the Knights of Columbus? Again: events such as the newly instituted C. Y. M. A. in the Bronx, assure us of a potency which, if united into one stream, must sweep all before it. We have, moreover, the spirit of the Church, the magnanimous spirit of Christ, to animate and guide such societies, to suppress any petty jealousies and narrowness that end only in disruption and scandal. Glance finally, if you are looking for Catholic genius, at the great figures now guiding the future destinies of nations. At once many Catholics stand forth pre-eminent. The Holy Father, Cardinal Mercier, Albert, the Lion of Belgium, Foch, Petain, Cadorna, Kerr, Benson; these are names conjured up without an effort. They are an earnest of Catholic ability. Were we to regard other fields of activity, here in America we should see Catholics equally as capable in their own line.

The Results of Union

WHAT a splendid thing it would be then, if in every large city of the United States, the brains, the energy, the talent of our Catholic men were welded into common effort! Certainly Catholic business men's associations, Catholic library circles, science clubs, workingmen's organizations, could be formed in many cities and, in some lines, national Catholic associations would be possible. Suppose, for example, prominent men like Father Rigge, Father Ricard, Drs. Walsh and O'Malley and Father Zahm, were banded into a scientific association. If they are powers now, a fortiori their strength and influence would be trebled by union. Darwinian organizations and evolutionary propaganda, would find an even greater foe in such amalgamation. Or again, would not a Catholic business men's club in this or that city, bring modern magazines to their senses, if, for instance, when the latter made attacks on the Church, their advertisements were withdrawn?

The moment too, is at hand, now if ever, for us to unite. Never was the time more propitious. Despite the persecutions we hear and read of daily, there is an enlightened and liberal attitude among a host of our separated brethren. And the Zeitgeist is thrilling through our people. A thousand wait only for a leader. Catholic associations exist—are being formed. But what we want, is to spread this spirit, these efforts; to fuse, and not to dissipate them; to make them big, prominent, influential; not to have small knots and gatherings, struggling for existence, feeble, almost unknown, impotent.

Signs of the Times

To this end can there be any stronger motive than the reaction which is sure to come after the war? The end of the present world-struggle will usher in a new era. Already we have heard rumblings of the mountain in travail. Revolution has gnawed its way to the thrones of Portugal, Turkey, China, Greece and Russia, has laid Mexico prostrate; Socialism, birth-control and Spiritism stalk abroad; modern philosophy markets all sorts of unstable notions, and feminism is spreading. Education tends to abandon discipline for information; science has culminated in an instrument of destruction, and prohibition and "democracy" are the catch-words of the day. But in all the chaos, two facts are clear. The nation, whatever its faults, is learning conservation, generosity, self-sacrifice. As a result, greater consideration for others will abound. Moreover, the day will soon dawn when the trench will give way to the classroom, the battlefield to the forum, the alembic to the laurel. The lucum ligna type will retire before the high priests of nature. War has taught the present and the coming generations, a value even in hardship, discipline and training, taught them that money and indiscriminate pleasure are not the "be-all and the end all" in a mortal's career. The influence of the Church, historic Catholic scenes and edifices, the sterling example of Catholic soldiers and sailors, the heroism of Sisters, and the devotion of priests must have their effects. Out of this latter influence then will emanate a love, not for sordid material things, but for those of the mind and spirit. There will be a general trend toward spirituality in both a literary and a religious sense, and out of the two influences will arise a sterner, hardier, less worldly manhood.

Such a reflux then, as well as the returning tide of vice, must be met by a united Catholic clergy and a united Catholic laity. Let our papers and magazines up and down the land, take up the cry for organization, let the plea for united effort be heralded forth from the pulpit. Out of this mighty swell must come the action and the leaders of an organization so necessary, so advantageous and so opportune.

R. J. McWilliams, S. J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Catholic Schools' Record in Thrift Stamp Campaign

THE school children of Toledo, says the Toledo Blade, have sold more than half the savings stamps disposed of in that city. In calling attention to this activity the Catholic schools alone are singled out by the Blade, both for their general average and their "magnificent" individual records. The Immaculate Conception school, with 400 pupils, sold $17,000 worth of stamps. The per capita purchases of the children in this school amounted to forty-two dollars and their sales outside to nineteen dollars. The six-dollar quota of purchases or sales, set for each of the school children of Toledo, was thus multiplied many times over. Cathedral chapel exceeded its quota four times and the Ursuline Academy three times. The parochial schools of the city are furthermore mentioned as having exceeded their quota in the general average. Experience has shown that in every test of patriotic devotion the Catholic Church and the Catholic school have always stood foremost.

Catholic Priest Appointed Fleet Chaplain

CATHOLICS will be pleased to note the recognition given them in the appointment of the Catholic navy chaplain, Father Matthew C. Gleeson, as Fleet Chaplain by Secretary Daniels. Chaplain Gleeson has been in the service fourteen years and was stationed at the Newport Naval Training Station, R. I. He will serve under Admiral Mayo, who is commander of the fleet, and will have active oversight and direction of the work of all chaplains in Atlantic waters on the American side. He has been highly recommended, says the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, by both Protestant and Catholic chaplains. "Chaplains high in the service say that his appointment as Fleet Chaplain is the best thing that has been done for the naval chaplaincy for some time." His duties, we are told, will be to inspect all chaplains of the fleet and their work, to advise them of whatever may be for the good of the service and to call them together for consultation when necessity arises. He is to arrange for services on board the ships that do not carry chaplains and for the interchange of chaplains of different denominations so that all the men may, as far as possible, attend their own religious services. He is also to arrange for the attendance of parties of sailors at church when in port on Sundays. The appointment of a large number of new navy chaplains was believed to make the advice and assistance of an experienced fleet officer particularly desirable. His work is thus supplementary to that of Chaplain J. B. Frazier, who is stationed at Washington in charge of the selection of new chaplains and who appoints them to their stations. With this information comes the news that another Catholic priest has been honored in France. Chaplain William J. Farrell, of the Field Artillery, has been decorated with the French War Cross. He is mentioned in a recent dispatch containing also the names of a Protestant Episcopal and a Congregational chaplain, similarly honored.

Sunday Baseball in the Camps

ACCORDING to the New York World, "several well-meaning but not mentally strong associations" have asked Congress to abolish baseball on Sunday in all army camps. "There are all sorts of people in this world," as the editor remarks, even individuals who favor Sunday baseball, but in matters of this kind, Congress sometimes follows the urging of those who can talk loudest and longest. In the ensuing uproar, the real merits of the case are usually overlooked, for the canny Congressman will vote with at least one eye upon the results of the next election. It should hardly be necessary to point out that, if a certain amount not merely of physical exercise, but of enjoyable physical exercise, is a necessity in normal life, much more is required in the case of young men accustoming themselves to the new restrictions of army life. Even under the most favorable circumstances, the relaxations which can be allowed in camp life, are meager enough, and only ignorance of the most deplorable type can urge that these opportunities be further retrenched.

> After six days of grinding military work in the midst of the monotony of pine board barracks, dusty or muddy streets, with no shade trees and no green grass to be seen, the boys in the camps need a little recreation. The only recreation available is some branch of sport. It would be little less than criminal to deprive them of this relaxation. They are not free to go somewhere else. And there's not much entertainment in sitting around doing nothing.

It is one of many eccentricities inherent in the puritan mind that it cannot see the profit to body and soul in innocent recreation. Cakes and ale will soon be a thing of the past if the puritan mind is allowed to have its way, but as long as human nature is human nature, there will be a substitute for the cakes and ale. Nor will that substitute be as innocent as the proscribed vanity.

Succor or Perish!

IT is the conviction of the United States Food Commission that more people have perished through hunger in the present war than have been killed by gunpowder, gas or steel. The estimated deaths by starvation are 4,750,000, while only about 4,250,000 have been actually killed in the fighting. Hunger gnawed at the vitals of Russia and weakened her power of resistance, and now the same cry comes to us from England, France, Italy and Belgium. Wheat must be supplied these nations, we are told, or no assurance can be given us that the heroism which now sustains suffering, sacrificing millions can be maintained behind the battle lines. Americans are therefore asked to abstain wholly, so far as circumstances permit, from wheat and all wheat products until the next wheat harvest. It is understood that all cannot equally endure this total sacrifice. Those engaged in physical labor need larger bread rations, the Food Commission explains, than those engaged in sedentary occupations. So, too, the special requirements of children and invalids must be carefully consulted. But the serious warning should be taken to heart by all that "As a nation we must save or sink, succor those overseas or perish with them. To grasp our opportunity and abstain from wheat is a privilege and not a sacrifice."

The Mystery of the Silent Khaki Line

PREACHING at a military Mass before thousands of officers and men and in the presence of the Governor of the State at Newport Camp, the Rev. Joseph N. Dinand, S.J., president of Holy Cross College, paid a worthy tribute to the exceptional heroism and humanity of the American navy. Looking out then over the cantonments and navy yards of the nation, each a "crucible of sacrifice," he asked the pertinent question:

> To me as I visited Camp Bartlett and Camp Devens, Newport and Charlestown, and saw the fusing process in action, the overwhelming, crushing thought that seemed to baffle and benumb me was: Why this annihilation of the individual? Personal ambitions, past experiences, individual talents—all, all were swallowed up in the military routine of the present.
> At the call of duty every man had laid aside his tools, his pen, his books, life's bright hopes, future success, the affection of dear ones, the very center of his heart's love, home, all were foresworn as each boy contributed his best and his all to the crucible of sacrifice. As he stood in that silent, strong, khaki line, each man, no matter what his qualities, his studies, his influence, his race, his creed, was "one," "two," "three," or "four" when the order "Count off" was given. This was the mystery of Bartlett and Devens to me, and what is the mystery of Bartlett and Devens is the mystery of Upton, Dix and of every camp clear across to Lewis on the Pacific.
> Is it not a crime against reason? Is it not folly and madness of national pride to demand such sacrifice, so utterly to crush and seemingly annihilate the individual? Every man in that line is a living breathing witness of sacrifice. Was it for this service uniform and hat that the college man exchanged his academic cap and gown? Was it for this service rifle he exchanged the parchment of his degree? Was it to fit him for a commission in a camp that his Alma Mater gave of her life, her talents, her years of toil?
> Shall the mystery of Bartlett, Devens, Upton, Dix and Lewis be solved, when before the bow of the transport the mist-clouds of ocean shall lift and, revealed in clear vision, shall be seen the outline of the shores of France? The man who stands beneath that emblem of our liberties, the man who takes that sacred standard in his hands can never, according to our American mind, be too worthy of it, whatever be his education, his environment, his character. When his country's honor is at stake, when her safety is to be guarded, her preservation maintained, no sacrifice is too heroic, no obedience too irksome, no labor too difficult, no annihilation too profound. "Sacrifice" is the call from the soul of America: "Service," is the reply from the heart of the people.
> Clearer than the light of the noonday sun comes the truth for the mind of the nation in khaki; stronger than all the forces of earth, stronger even than death, comes the message of courage for the soul of the nation in khaki: That the authority behind all temporal sovereignty is from God. Thus alone can we rightly solve the mystery of that silent khaki line. The voice of the legitimate ruler of these United States is the voice of God. When he commands, God commands, and man in obeying him is obeying God.

So in every century and under every rightful form of government the Catholic Church has upheld by her doctrine the arms of authority, bidding her children: "Be obedient unto your temporal lords as to Christ Himself." But neither has she feared, by the sole might of that same doctrine and in the name of the same Christ, to check the abuse of power and declare: "Thus far shalt thou go and no farther."

Chronicle

The War.—The great event of the week was the final and complete check of the Austrian offensive from Montello to the sea along the Piave. As last week's review closed the Italians had wrested the initiative from the enemy and were pushing the fighting along the entire front, but particularly along the Piave. The river was in flood. The pontoon bridges on which large bodies of Austrian troops had crossed to the west bank of the stream were nearly all swept away, leaving these forces completely isolated and out of touch with their supply trains. After a fruitless attempt to provide them with food and ammunition by airplane, they had to retire. The line of retreat lay along the points indicated in our last chronicle, Montello, Nervesa, Fagare, Musile and Capo Sile to the sea. At Montello the Austrians were grouped in large masses and the capture of this dominant position allowed the Italian artillery full play. The enemy losses were particularly severe at this point.

Bulletin, June 24, p.m.-July 1, a.m.

From Montello southward, the Italian pressure continued. On the Montello-Capo Sile line where the enemy had not crossed so far west as they had been able to do at Montello itself and below Capo Sile, the Austrians were in a dangerous position with the river close to their backs. Their position was made still more hazardous by the capture of Montello itself. This high plateau commands the lowlands to the south and the moment its eastern extremity was occupied by the Italians the Austrian right flank was endangered. On this front, with only a few bridgeheads for the passage of the retreating Austrians and a consequent congestion still greater than that east of Montello, the losses to the enemy were heavy. After this section had been cleared, the Italians began to operate on the region below Capo Sile. They first struck at the defenses of San Dona di Piave where the river leaves its old bed for the new. The Austrians had pushed their lines westward several miles beyond San Dona, crossing the Fossetta Canal at Meolo and running along the canal to Fossalta. This section was cleared of enemy troops after hard fighting at Musile, and the Italian positions were restored to their original lines behind the river bed. At Capo Sile the Italians established a bridgehead on the eastern bank of the river, and sent some cavalry in pursuit of the fleeing Austrians but they do not seem to have followed up the movement in force, and the enemy, at one time in imminent danger of capture, made good their retreat. On the Asiago Plateau the Italians supported by French and British troops captured Austrian positions on Monte de Val Bella, taking 800 prisoners. Amidst the conflicting rumors with regard to the extent of the losses on both sides in the Piave offensive, it is almost impossible to come to a definite conclusion. Rome claims that the losses to the enemy amounted in all to 270,000, among these being 20,000 prisoners. Dr. Wekerle, the Hungarian Premier, admits Austrian losses up to 100,000 in all, among these 8,000 prisoners, while he affirms that the Austro-Hungarians took 50,000 prisoners. While the Italian victory is not a decisive one and still leaves the Austro-Hungarian troops in a position to renew the offensive, it has been a severe and unexpected blow to the enemy.

In spite of local successes in the territories occupied by the British, French and American troops the situation in France remains practically unchanged. The French successfully carried out a vigorous attack south of the Aisne in the loop formed by the Laversine Ravine. Here the ravine twists between the villages of Laversine and Dommiers, its southern part skirting Compiègne Forest. At this point the French straightened out their lines. Attacking south of Amblény they swept up to the high ground north of Cutry, almost entirely cleared the Forest of the enemy and occupied Hill 150, a small circular elevation on the edge of the Forest. They took over 1,000 prisoners and in some places advanced their lines over a mile in depth. The ground gained is considered of great strategic value. South of the Ourcq they captured at Antoc the crests situated between Mosloy and Passy-en-Valois, advancing 800 yards on a two-mile front.

On the French Front

The British attack was launched in French Flanders along the Hazebrouck salient, whose apex rests on the La Bassée Canal, south of Merville. The British attacked north of Merville and drove nearly a mile into the German lines. The British advance, which pushed as far as the Plate Becque River, past L'Epinette and Verte Rue, is of great importance as it threatens the German positions south of Merville.

Continuing their operations of last week northwest of Château-Thierry on the Marne, the Americans cleared the enemy from Belleau which dominates the village of Torcy. In their advance they captured several hundred prisoners. At Cantigny also they reached the enemy's lines and gained important ground.

Canada.—The disgraceful night raid on the Jesuit novitiate in Guelph is still the subject of much discussion on the part of the Protestant ministers whose false statements were the occasion of the proceedings. After the Jesuits of St. Stanislaus novitiate, had retired for the night, Assistant Provost Marshal Macauley threw an armed cordon around the building and thus fortified entered the house with his fellow-inquisitors. The rector of the invaded institution wrote to General Mewburn, the Minister of Militia, a letter in which are found these passages:

The Midnight Raid

> Captain Macauley assured the A. G. that there had been no friction of any kind. This is true in the sense that on our part he met throughout with unfailing courtesy; that the delay caused in the beginning, due to his failure to show proper written authorization, was qualified by the assurance of our readiness to comply under proper procedure; that we even gave refreshments to all his party, most of whom had spent several hours in the cold. But it is not true in the sense that we did not most deeply feel and resent the opprobrious treatment to which we were so unjustly and unjustifiably subjected.
> It is not for me to say who is to blame for such an unprecedented manner of acting, but this I will say, that it would be hard to devise a clumsier or more exasperating manner of extorting information which a polite letter or visit would have readily elicited, than that of bringing a posse of armed men from London to Guelph to a peaceable religious house.
> This morning, when Captain Macauley called, he seemed at pains to minimize the events of last night. He excused himself for the number of men he had brought with him from London on the plea that he did not know what violence he might have to contend with. This is almost on a par with the disappointed credulity of those searchers who poked into the alcoves of the dormitories, and even into the latrines, and were amazed to find only bareness and simplicity where they hoped to raise startling mysteries.
> It is thanks to the Hon. Minister of Justice and to the prompt and courteous intervention of Major-General Ashton that a very painful situation was somewhat softened and a much more critical situation averted. A repetition of such an indignity would be bad for the country at large. Is it too much to hope that those who have such large discretionary powers as those enjoyed by the provost marshals should be possessed of at least ordinary consideration and tact, and not permit themselves to become in any way the instruments of bigotry?
> It is not intended that this letter should see publication. The same motives that prompted us to endure with patience what we considered unjust and high-handed treatment, rather than to create a scene, prompt us now to withhold from the press anything of a nature to excite public opinion. If, however, untrue and defamatory accounts of the events complained of should be circulated it may become necessary to publish this letter, adding, if need be, some further details.
> Incidents of this nature become known very rapidly, and so strange a proceeding could soon be reported not only in Canada, but also in the United States and elsewhere, causing a great deal of ill-feeling and possibly religious strife, which at all times is most deplorable, but especially when the exigencies of war demand a closely united people.
> I am, sir, yours very respectfully,
> H. Bourque, S.J.

The General's reply reads:

> Am just in receipt of your letter of the 8th inst. on my return to Ottawa, and words can't express to you my deep regret of the action taken by the deputy provost-marshal, Captain Macauley, on the evening of the 7th. My attention was called to this matter on my arrival in Ottawa this a. m., and I find that my A.G. has taken immediate action for a most thorough investigation, and if the facts are as stated in your letter, which, of course, I do not doubt, I can assure you that the error in judgment committed by this officer will be dealt with in a proper way, as I will not tolerate any such action on the part of any military officer as far as the operation of the Military Service Act is concerned. As I have already stated, I deeply regret this occurrence, and I thank you for your frank letter.
> The question of liability for military service of any of your students is a matter that is now being considered by the Department of Justice.
> Believe me, yours faithfully,
> (Signed) Mewburn,
> The Rev. H. Bourque, Rector of St. Stanislaus Novitiate.

Shortly after this Macauley was transferred from London to Winnipeg, and according to the Toronto Evening Telegram a high official in speaking of the transfer said:

> It was perfectly proper to make investigation to ascertain if the institution contained any men eligible for military service. It is a different thing to "raid" the place, at night, surround it and make a demonstration in force when there was no need for it. We wish to stand by our men, but do not wish to encourage dragooning.

The three novices arrested by the raiders were found not liable for service and were, as a consequence, released. In the Government's opinion two at most of the men at St. Stanislaus fell under the M. S. A. Their rector answers this contention as follows:

> I have wired to Major-General Ashton at Ottawa the particulars in each case, and I have no hesitation in stating the contents of the message. John O'Holloran is an American citizen born in 1897. He came to our institution from St. Paul, and brought papers showing that he had properly registered with the U. S. Government, and also carried an exemption card for religious reasons.
> John Holland was a clergyman before entering the novitiate, and was tonsured by the Rt. Rev. Bishop Dowling in St. Mary's Cathedral, Hamilton, on September 9, 1917. There is no doubt that he is exempted under clause five of the M. S. A.

The preachers who had put on their list of fugitive Jesuits a discharged soldier, who was at one time a laborer about the place, continue in their unblushing effrontery despite Macauley's minute search. Brother Palmer thinks that the Government has not all the facts and the papers. After announcing that Messrs. Gordon of the Baptist Church, Palmer of the Presbyterian Church, Christie of the Dublin Street Methodist Church, Pearson of the Norfolk Street Methodist Church, Wyle of the Disciples and Spence of the Congregational Church, would treat of the matter on Sunday, make the significant statement that "A large number of people are expected to attend Sabbath services tomorrow." The Rev. Mr. Spence is indignant at General Mewburn's apology. "It would be a long time before an official of the Government would apologize to us, if a military policeman stopped any one of us and asked to see our papers," he declared. Bro. Palmer has a curse for the Hierarchy. Naturally the Montreal Star finds a tinge of creedal prejudice back of the agitation.

The Montreal Gazette pays its compliments to the "ultra-Protestant" press and declares that the nasty affair is a base attack on the Minister of Justice who has done valiant service for the Dominion. Fanatics, it would appear, are trying to oust him from office. The most valuable testimony of all comes from Lt.-Col. Machin, D.S.O., an Anglican in religion, English by birth, Director of the Military Service Branch of the Department of Justice. After praising the spirit of the Province of Quebec and the impartiality of the Minister of Justice he says:

> Further, as an Anglican, I desire to protest as emphatically as I know how against the brutal treatment meted out to the Jesuit College at Guelph, and to say that the men who were responsible for that action ought to be made to realize that when they are indulging in personal spite they are risking at this time, possibly the most critical time in the Empire's history, strife between religious denominations. If they are prepared to accept the responsibility of such a grave condition to indulge personal vanity then I say they are worse than traitors—they are worse than the Huns.
> Speaking off hand, I would say that the greatest number of recruits according to religious denomination that have left Canada for overseas service are, first, the Anglicans; second, the Presbyterians; third, the Roman Catholics, and, fourth, the Methodists. But according to the shouting, one would think that the Methodists of Ontario had done more than any other religious denomination.
> I say it advisedly, knowing full well my responsibility in my official capacity, and as a member of the Ontario Legislature for Kenora, that the greatest menace in the Province of Ontario today is the Methodist Church, which seeks to make us the most hypocritical people in the Dominion of Canada.
> . . . I told you at the start that I expected to be "fired," and was prepared for that, but I feel that it is time for somebody to make this break. I do not pretend to be more than an ordinary citizen, but I do say that after eight months of strenuous work it breaks one's heart to see the fool things done to start racial and religious strife in Canada rather than to smooth things out.

In conclusion Lt.-Col. Machin remarked that he realized fully the significance and consequence of his statement but as a citizen of the Empire, who had served six years in Africa and had won both medals in this war he felt he had a right to state the truth.

Ireland.—To the discerning reader the week's news accentuated the strange position in which England finds herself. The Irish papers continued to challenge Lloyd George to produce evidence of the Sinn Fein-German plot. Wimborne still insisted there was no plot; Shortt, Chief Secretary of Ireland, laid bare alleged treasonable facts only to be put in a supremely ridiculous position by the Premier who, the instant after Shortt had sat down, made the amazing and ridiculous admission, in the House of Commons, that the evidence was the same as that adduced in 1916; it was lost for a time, he declared, and then recovered. The Irish Bishops are standing firm under attacks. Their attitude is illustrated by this portion of a letter from Archbishop Harty to the Tipperary Guardians:

The Plot and Conscription

> We care very little for these attacks so long as we are conscious that we have acted rightly towards our country. For us the love of our own people far outweighs the abuse lavished on us by people whose names have long been linked with injustice to Ireland. We trust that the world's verdict will justly appraise the action of the Bishops, priests, and people of Ireland in this new chapter which has been added to the story of our race. We are confident that history will see in our united efforts the true interpretation of the rights of nations, small and great, to determine their own destinies.

Several other Bishops spoke in the same strain, including Cardinal Logue. The Hierarchy has been at pains to deny once again that its action was prompted by the Holy See and Cardinal Gasparri sent this note to the Catholic Union of Great Britain in answer to its protest against the Bishops:

> In acknowledging the receipt of the resolutions passed by the Catholic Union of Great Britain, at the meeting of April 30, which have been forwarded to me with your letter of May 2, I beg to observe that the Holy See, as his Eminence, Cardinal Logue, has already stated publicly, had no part whatever in the action taken by the Irish Bishops concerning the law of conscription, and received the first intimation of the manifesto of the Bishops on April 27, eight days after its publication.

Meantime opposition to conscription is growing stronger each day. On June 15 the defense fund amounted to £230,000, and what is more remarkable still the agitation has reached unexpected quarters. For instance, at the Presbyterian General Assembly Dr. Osborne declared that the application of conscription would bring hideous results and Dr. Armour said, "It was not sure that there are not more people in the [Presbyterian] Church against conscription than for it." An extraordinary pilgrimage of Protestant women, led by Mrs. Stopford Green, the wife of the historian, approached Christ Church Cathedral, Dublin, to pray against the enactment of the draft. Finding the church locked, the ladies knelt on the ground, in a downpour of rain. Throughout the whole county the women are taking an active part in the agitation, even the Sisters having signed pledges of protest. A few figures quoted at random from the Dublin Weekly Freeman and the Irish Weekly Independent will show how widespread the movement is. In Dublin, up to June 15, 40,000 women had signed the pledge not to replace the drafted men, in Bray 800, in Drogheda 2,000, in Limerick 700, in Tipperary 3,000, in Derry 5,000, in Clondalkin 700, in Maynooth 200, in Arklow 1,200, in Kilkenny 1,500, in Castlebridge 200, in Columcille 400, in Ballymahon 1,000, in Ballinasloe 800, in Boyle 300 and so on throughout the entire country. Add to this the fact that rural councils and associations of all kinds are putting out resolutions of protest and some idea of present conditions can be had. Our own country has not been altogether free from the agitation. The Irish Fellowship Club of Chicago has petitioned Mr. Wilson to point out to Great Britain that its attitude towards Ireland is injuring the cause of the Allies and on June 28, 2,500 Irish of New York passed these resolutions:

WHEREAS, The English Government has deported the present leaders of the Irish people out of their own country and has imprisoned them in England, where they are held incommunicado, on alleged charges for which there is not a shadow of foundation; and

WHEREAS, This action of the English Government is but part of the persistent policy that England has always pursued to crush the Irish people and deny them their independence, and is aimed at this time in particular to misrepresent them in the eyes of the world, and if possible alienate the sympathy that all liberty-loving people have on their behalf; be it

Resolved, That we, Irish citizens of New York, in mass meeting assembled, condemn this wanton act of cruelty and injustice against a people who are rightly struggling to be free, and that we call upon the United States Government, not alone in the interests of Ireland, but for its own interests as well, to demand of England that these Irish men and women be at once restored to their liberty, and that the Irish people, in accordance with the principles for which President Wilson says we are carrying on the war, be permitted at once to determine by a plebiscite of the whole adult population of Ireland what form of government they shall live under; and be it further

Resolved, That we congratulate the united Irish people on the splendid fight they are making against conscription, and we pledge them in their struggle for independence our utmost sympathy and support.

Russia.—Telegraphing under date of June 14, the Petrograd correspondent of the London Times announced that the capital is suffering severely from the lack of food. For two or three days at a time no bread is distributed, dried pot-herbs being the staple of life. He describes conditions thus:

Petrograd Starving

The all-important business here at present is to get enough to eat. The exiguous morsels doled out by the Provision Commissariat or otherwise obtained with great difficulty at ruinous prices barely suffice to keep body and soul together. Men and women frequently succumb and sink down in the street from sheer exhaustion. The Novya Viedomosti, putting it strongly, says that "hungry citizens seek ravenously among offal and rubbish heaps and lick the paste off street posters and placards." Everything of any value that has not been stolen or requisitioned is pawned in order to provide food. The waning shop trade is gradually going over to street hawkers, many of whom sell sweet trifles at unconscionable prices, such as small lumps of sugar sufficient for one cup of tea at the Russian equivalent of 50 cents each or more. Among these street venders are former officers, officials, and ladies from the bourgeois class now undergoing the punishment of impoverishment. Almost everything political and military pales into the shade in comparison with this famine, which, it must be remembered, connects also with extreme scarcity of all raw materials and manufactured articles. The consequence is that the economic situation is far more pressing than the political troubles. Hundreds of armed workmen dispatched by the Petrograd Commune are prowling around the countryside to detect and seize grain and bring it into the famishing town. More conflict and bloodshed is expected from encounters between these licensed foragers and the unwilling peasants, who are not altogether weaponless.

Finland is also reported to be menaced with famine, some 1,700,000 persons now being fed there by the State.

President Wilson has been formulating the details of a plan to relieve Russia. At a Cabinet meeting held June 25 it transpired that his project does not call for military intervention, but aims at the commercial, industrial and agricultural upbuilding of the country through a policy of mutual helpfulness. The plan contemplates sending to Russia a commission of distinguished civilians empowered to discuss and arrange with Russian representatives measures of cooperation which will restore the fallen country. Troops may be sent to give the commissioners protection and to police territory where local governments are set up, but the aid offered is to be chiefly economic. The Russians will be helped to restore their agriculture and commerce. The commission would undertake to furnish farming machinery and implements, and to exchange the produce of the land for American goods. Business and industrial leaders, rather than diplomats and soldiers, it is understood, are to have charge of these relief measures.

American Aid for Russia

Alexander F. Kerensky, formerly Premier of Russia, surprised the world by suddenly appearing in England on June 27, on his way to America, and addressing the Labor Conference in London. He is strongly in favor of Allied intervention, but not by any one Allied Power, and is convinced that the Russian military forces will eventually take a leading part in driving out the Germans. At present he sees large elements in the "reactionary parties" turning to Germany as their only salvation from the Bolsheviki. Kerensky is also reported to have said:

Kerensky's Coming

All classes of Russians strongly protest now against the tyranny that again reigns in Russia. To my astonishment some very serious European political men consider Bolshevism as democratic, although it has abolished freedom of speech, made human life the easy prey of every red guardsman and has made an end of all institutions of self-government.

Every Russian who refuses to recognize this method of government is declared a counter-revolutionary. Bolshevism, the strength of which mainly lies in the disorganization of the worn-out masses of soldiers, was merely the vanguard of triumphing German imperialism. To reach its aim Germany must paralyze Russia.

Various rumors that came last week about the assassination of the ex-Czar and about the overthrow of the Bolshevist Government at Moscow lack confirmation.

Prohibition and Alcoholism

MICHAEL KENNY, S. J.

THREE years ago Father Julian Johnston wrote in the Ecclesiastical Review: "I make this prediction, that at no very distant date Protestant bigotry will recognize in Prohibition a means of prohibiting the Mass." We have seen his prediction verified. Heathen, Moslem and heretic everywhere converged on the Mass the multiple ingenuities of their war on Catholicism and our Colonies followed their example. But at the birth of the United States, the Mass came forth as by miracle from its hiding places to be offered continuously to His Name, from the rising to the setting of our sun, under the labarum of liberty. Bigots, impelled by fanatic ignorance or Masonic "enlightenment" attacked it at times as by demoniac instinct, but the free spirit of our laws and people rendered open assault hopeless of success. Then commenced a flanking movement which would seem to be the cleverest maneuver ever engineered by the enemies of Christ. Hosts were enrolled for Prohibition who would never have rallied for persecution; Methodist and Baptist bigotry soon voiced their recognition of its potent aid; Masonry, which was cradled in a tavern and prescribed spirits for its meetings, often notoriously exceeding the prescription, suddenly discovered the new "light" that "alcohol is the Outlaw" (New Age, February, 1918); and so the movement waxed towards the climax, when lo! it would eliminate the Mass automatically by the insidious implication of a phrase.

This implication lurks also in the National Amendment. Catholics know by faith that what the priest consumes in the sacrificial act of the Mass is no longer wine; but to the vast majority who have not this faith it is a "beverage." Surely the devil is not stupid if, despairing of destroying God, he would destroy God's image in man's soul, and in aid thereto cut off His greatest economy of grace, the life of the soul, by preventing God's physical presence in the Eucharist. It is not likely that the Supreme Court will hold valid a law prohibitive of a worship coeval with Christianity and practised freely in this land from our birth as a nation, a law that over a sixth of our population and a third of our armed defenders should in conscience repudiate; and the likelihood is lessened by the influence of the Oklahoma decision on State and Federal interpretation.

But even when sacramental wine is declared exempt of Prohibition laws, an insidious influence remains. Christ constituted wine a necessary element to continue His Atonement and perpetuate His physical presence among men. To many, if not most, absolute Prohibition carries the implication that this alcoholic element is an odious and evil thing, stamped as such by national reprobation. But such an element, banned and accursed of the nation, is precisely that which Catholics select for their most sacred rite of adoration. The further reaches of this logic may spell wrath and hate and persecution. Hence, were sacramental wine made safe, the fight would not be over. It were wise to forestall it now by preventive measures that is, by combating Prohibition in itself and in its causes. Not only as a menace to the Mass, but as an easy avenue to the tyranny of governmental interference in whatsoever private and personal activity, Prohibition is itself far more dangerous than the multiple evils it aims to eradicate. But these are real evils. As Catholics and citizens we should be the first to give them battle; and we have been remiss. If, at the time and in the spirit of the Third Baltimore Council, we had established a constructive citizen movement to eliminate, by legal enactment and enlightened public opinion, those abuses of alcohol which make Prohibition's program plausible, it would not now be threatening to undermine the fabric of our religious and civil liberties. Even now such action should prove a healthy and helpful influence.

Prohibition is no preventive. It has already multiplied the making and distribution of bad whiskies, and of drugs, as alcoholic and more poisonous, and therewith the immorality and contempt of authority that such practices are wont to beget. "Throw nature out through the door, 'twill come back through the window"; and always worse than it went. But even were Prohibition a preventive it would have to be rejected on the triple ground, that it is a religious, a scientific, and a constitutional heresy. Prohibition's fundamental doctrines are: (1) That alcohol is necessarily evil, in itself, or in its effect, or in both; (2) That it is always physically injurious, or, at least, never beneficial; (3) That the State has the right to invade hearth and home and every avenue of liberty to prevent the making and taking of alcoholic beverages. These doctrines are false.

The use of wine is frequently commended, and is sacrificially commanded, in the Old Testament, and its abuse only, as St. Epiphanius wrote against the Encratites, is condemned. The New Testament enlarges the commendation. Christ our Lord not only made wine essential to His perpetual Sacrifice, not only miraculously provided "good wine" for a wedding feast, but He drank Himself of the wine presented Him, and He condemned equally both pharasaical extremes on the liquor question: "John the Baptist came neither eating bread nor drinking wine, and you say: he hath a devil. The Son of Man is come eating and drinking, and you say: behold a man who is a glutton and a drinker of wine, a friend of publicans and sinners." Hence, the Church, which condemns intemperance as a vice, has branded the teaching of the Encratites and Manicheans, that wine is inherently evil, as a heresy. St. John Chrysostom, as is his wont, speaks as pertinently to the twentieth century as to the fourth:

> I hear many cry when these deplorable excesses happen: "Would there were no wine!" Folly and madness! When other men sin you find fault with the gifts of God. What an insanity is this! Is it the wine that causes this abuse? No, it is not the wine, but the intemperance of those who take an evil delight in it. Cry rather, "Would to God there were no drunkenness, no luxury"; but if you shout, "Would there were no wine," you should add, "Would there were no iron," because of the murderers; "Would there were no night," because of the thieves; "Would there were no light," because of the informers; "Would there were no women," because of adulteries. In this way you might destroy everything. . . . This, he continues, is a satanical mode of reasoning.

and having shown that wine is given to produce joy and health and to remedy disease, he adds: "God honors you with the gift; why do you dishonor yourself with the excess thereof?"

From the teachings of the Scriptures and the Church on the use and abuse of alcoholic beverages, it follows that Prohibition is also a scientific heresy, for truths of religion and science, emanating from the same source, cannot be contradictory. The last word of medical science is quite in harmony with St. John Chrysostom. Prohibitionists in Great Britain, as with us, were first in the field with their favorite prescription "to win the war"; but the expert Committee appointed to examine the question, reported that the moderate use of alcoholic beverages should be permitted and provided to workers and fighters, precisely in order "to win the war." So it was ordered. This policy was strengthened by the great medical authority of Sir James Crichton-Browne, who, in a monograph remarkable for literary charm as well as scientific value, reviews with admirable poise the good and evil, moral and physiological, resulting from the past and present use and abuse of alcohol. He shows that the chemists who denied Liebig's assertion of the food value of alcohol were deceived by faulty experiments, that modern research has proved that alcohol "is undoubtedly a genuine food," that there are good physiological grounds "for the universal employment of fermented beverages," and that these have important alimentary and medicinal value. Used moderately and proportionately to needs, alcoholic beverages, he insists, promote digestion and assimilation, supplement defective dietaries, quicken recuperation of the sick and physically exhausted, and are "so eminently useful" in combating disease and for general therapeutic purposes that "almost every practitioner finds it to be of value in his particular department" and "most sober-minded medical men today . . . admit they would feel lost, lamed and impotent if deprived of its use." Noting that all progressive races have been consumers of alcohol and the only races that abandoned it, the Moslems, fell into intellectual stagnation; that nature which provides the appetite has been most liberal in diverse means of supplying it; that alcohol has proved a liberator of energy, a stimulant to individuality, a lubricant for the friction and an anodyne for the miseries of life, he concludes that its judicious use has been beneficial intellectually in stimulating the brain, and morally in developing the will-power requisite to select and reject judiciously. While keenly alive to the dangerous evils of its abuse, he is at one with Lord Lister, Gautier, Sir James Paget and other eminent medical scientists, that,

> Alcohol has . . . an enormous balance of good to its credit. It has thrown down; but it has built up on a far larger scale. It is somehow bound up with human destiny. It has been abused and subjected to abuse as if it were possessed by a devil; but it still holds its own, and in a multiplicity of ways ministers to the well-being and happiness of mankind. Our aim should be to avail ourselves of the gracious services it offers and to prevent its prostitution.

The British authority has this to say of Prohibition's constitutional aspect:

> The acquirement of self-control is one of the main objects of education, the exercise of it a chief part in the discipline of life; and to substitute for it grandmotherly legislation is to debilitate human nature and court disaster. There is no danger to a lawful government greater than for a well-behaved subject to feel himself deprived of his natural rights.

This danger is aggravated when the good citizen is deprived also of his constitutional rights, and threatened with further usurpation. Our Government has specially emphasized the principle that men should be free to go their own way so long as they trespass not on others' rights. This freedom has been constitutionally secured to each State in the control of its domestic affairs, and custom has extended it in degree to county, city and township. Prohibition would wrest this control in purely domestic concerns, not only from the local bodies in the State, but from the State itself, adding to the national Government's supremacy in interstate relations, supremacy also in the State's own internal affairs; and not in liquor questions only, but in all. Give to a government of centralizing tendencies and multiplying bureaucratic facilities, the power to regulate one of the matters within State jurisdiction, and you give it a foothold for regulating all. You are abdicating democracy for absolutism. Moreover, the State is, in effect, usurping the rights of other States while relinquishing its own. Mississippi and Florida or some sectional group may dictate habits and conduct to Illinois and New York, and vice-versa. "Majority rule" may alienate inalienable rights, and there is no knowing what conduct its unreasoning advocates will next assail. In fact, that section, which once with its blood championed State rights to prevent the freedom of many, is now foremost in renouncing State rights to diminish the freedom of all. Central control of the States' domestic affairs is a far-reaching constitutional heresy, the most perilous to the nation's destiny of the three heresies which Prohibition embodies.

But the State has the right and duty to eliminate those elements which are directly promotive of public disorder, in so far as they so promote it. Drunkenness, with its concomitant and resultant evils, is notoriously such a disorder; but not all alcoholic beverages tend of their nature to produce it. The main cause of drunkenness, as the British experts reported, is not beers nor pure wines, but the abuse of strong drink or distilled spirits. The natural distinction between the two classes should be noted. Beers and natural wines have a positive food value, and their use constitutes no proximate menace to public order; spirits do constitute such a menace, and their food value is indirect and mainly medicinal. These Government should rigidly control in manufacture and distribution, and entrust their direction to medical and scientific experts.

The manufacture should be regulated even more carefully than the distribution. Most of the bourbons, ryes, etc., advertised as "pure" are dangerously impure, containing much fusel-oil and other poisonous by-products of fermentation. It is these, and not pure ethyl alcohol, which usually create the alcoholic appetite that makes inebriates. Government should see that these toxic poisons be absolutely eliminated in distillation and rectification. It should also suppress the general practice of manipulating wines with alcohol and injurious chemicals, which make the product not wine but an alcoholic stimulant; and it should extend its watchfulness to the patent medicines, scores of which contain more alcohol than spirits and strong wines, are more poisonous than the common whiskies, and through drug store and mail order are more extensively distributed than either.

The distribution of pure wines and beers should be in proportion to population and entrusted to reputable men, who should be under bond to provide no liquors to minors or inebriates, to permit no indecencies of act or word, to close on Sundays and observe the hours and other reasonable restrictions prescribed. Under such conditions the liquor traffic would bring no disgrace on those engaged in it.

A sound public opinion is a prerequisite for such a reformation, and in forming it Catholics must take a leading part. Protestantism in swaying from one extreme to another has lost the sense of proportion, of comparative moral values, of the distinction between use and abuse. Catholics, who know, with the philosophy of Catholic truth, that temperance and abstinence are begotten of the will, not of external compulsion; that the will should follow the findings of the intellect and be trained in home and school and church to find and follow wisely; and that the command to pluck out your own scandalizing eye never warrants your plucking out the eye of your scandalizing neighbor, should seize on every avenue of intelligence to instruct their less-favored fellow-citizens on the true moral basis of civic rights, duties and forbearances. We should teach them that alcohol if thrown out through the door of Prohibition will return in a more vicious form through the windows of illicit stills and drinking dens and drugs. We would do well to circulate such balanced studies as Father Johnston's "An Aspect of Prohibition," Crichton-Browne's "What We Owe to Alcohol," Martin's "Fallacy of Prohibition," De Focatiis' "Main Source of Alcoholism," Rev. Dr. Wasson's "Religion and Drink," and Hon. Royal Cabell and ex-Senator Bailey's addresses; which cover the religious, scientific and constitutional phases of the question.

But our best propaganda will be our own example. If as Catholics we practise ourselves, and form in our children and dependents that self-control which begets temperance and abstinence in liquors as in other subjects of indulgence; and if as citizens we bring an enlightened conscience into politics and business, and thereby enact good laws and see that they are kept, such emotional extravagances as Prohibition will soon settle into sense. In the United States Constitution we are heirs to the wisest instrument of government that obtains in any great nation of our day. It devolves most on Catholics to preserve it in the sense and spirit of its founders. If we maintain this heritage, it will of itself preserve all our liberties.

The Decline in the Birth-Rate

James J. Walsh, M.D., Ph.D.

A RECENT reprint from the Congressional Record contains a very frank and straightforward discussion of one of the most important problems facing the world at the present time. It is an authoritative presentation of "The Significance of the Declining Birth-Rate" which has been such a marked phenomenon of our civilization during the past generation. The discussion in question comes from a high authority in the field of statistical research. It is the address delivered by Mr. Louis I. Dublin, the retiring Vice-President of Section I of the "American Association for the Advancement of Science," at its last annual meeting. Section I is that of "Social and Economic Science" and the Vice-President of the "Section" is the elect representative of the body of men whom he addressed for the year. He confesses quite freely that while the declining birth-rate has been the subject of very careful investigation in Europe it has received but little scientific attention in the United States. Owing to conditions in France, that country particularly has been the subject of special study.

Even before the war the question of depopulation had become acute there, and with reason, for the birth-rate had become lower than the death-rate and the population of France was actually decreasing.

The whole story is interesting. At the beginning of the nineteenth century France was the most populous country in Europe, having some 29,000,000 inhabitants. Next came the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, with about 18,000,000 inhabitants. The States which now comprise the German Empire were all separate entities, but taken together they had a population of about 23,000,000, or over a fourth less than France. At the beginning of the twentieth century, however, the situation was changed so completely that the German Empire headed the list of European countries with a population officially estimated at nearly 65,000,000, the United Kingdom was second with a population of 45,000,000, while France was third with a population of only 39,000,000. As late as 1860 France was still in the lead and had already reached a population of 37,000,000, but after that date, for more than a generation, it gained only 2,000,000 while Germany in the same period almost doubled her population. The percentages of populations in Europe are still more interesting. In 1811 France constituted sixteen per cent, that is to say, Frenchmen were about one in six of all Europeans. A hundred years later the French population was scarcely more than one in ten of Europeans.

A careful classification of French births showed very clearly that the decrease in the birth-rate occurred mainly in the better-educated or, let us say, better-to-do classes. The poor had the largest number and the rich the smallest number of children. The order of size of the family is invariably the reverse of the order of economic conditions. It is sometimes said that the reason why the birth-rate has declined everywhere is that people have discovered that they are unable to afford children. Children are now expensive luxuries which only the poor can afford. As a matter of fact the people who could well bear the expense refuse to assume the burden, not because of economic reasons, but through personal selfish excuses. They do not care to devote the time required for the rearing of children, they do not wish their leisure to be interfered with, they do not care to assume obligations that may compel them to make any sacrifice of their inclinations or alter their individual plan of life.

It is a popular impression that we ourselves have no need for alarm in America. As a matter of fact, however, the birth-rate in our country before the war was lower than the death-rate and depopulation had already set in, wherever there was not a large foreign-born element. This was not true throughout the South, but it was true throughout the North and even in the West, but especially throughout the New England States. The Vice-President of the Section on Social and Economic Science of the American Association, for instance, quotes the figures which show that in the New England States the proportion of the native white stock decreased from over fifty-two per cent in 1890 to about forty per cent in 1910. In the Middle Atlantic States the same decrease is noted in the twenty years, though not to quite the same extent. It is easily understood, therefore, why he says that "A very definite tendency toward depopulation has already fastened itself upon a large part of the native stock of the country."

Professor Willcox, an authority on the subject, has shown in a recent paper that the number of children under five years of age, per thousand women of the child-bearing age in this country, has decreased from nearly 1,000 to only slightly above 500. In the early part of the nineteenth century every woman between fifteen and forty-five was on the average represented by one child in the next generation. Today she has scarcely more than half a child to replace her. The rate of decline in the recent decades has been so rapid that Professor Willcox suggests that "If it were continued over a period of a century and a half, which is after all a comparatively short time in the life of a nation, there would be no children at all at the end of that time." We may think that the problem of depopulation is confined to the older European countries, and especially to highly sophisticated nations like France, but it looms directly ahead of us as well. Before the war, when birth-control was freely discussed and advocated in America, it seemed impossible to understand how selfish tendencies in this direction could ever be restrained. But now a new value has been given to the child and opposition to birth-restriction has been made a patriotic issue.

The Vice-President of the American Association has especially dwelt on the fact that the families of college graduates, both men and women, have the smallest number of children. It is well known that the birth-rate among graduates of our two oldest universities is so low that were they to receive as students only the sons of former graduates they would have a very small and a rapidly vanishing number. He emphasizes particularly the statistics from the women's colleges. Less than fifty per cent of the graduates of these institutions marry. I suppose they are not to be blamed for that. But what is more interesting from an ethical standpoint is the number of children the graduates of women's colleges have when they do marry. The number of children per married graduate of Smith College was a little less than one and one-third, of Vassar slightly more than one and one-half, of Bryn Mawr one and seven-tenths, and of Holyoke one and four-fifths. The ratio of children per graduate altogether is less than one, so that the educated woman is not replacing herself.

Another extremely serious feature is that the native-born mother does not succeed in raising so many of her children as the foreign-born mother. When the statistics demonstrating this were first announced from Boston there was some doubt with regard to their genuineness, but careful investigation in New York confirmed this conclusion drawn from them: that the foreign-born mother saves one more out of every seven children than does the native-born mother. When one considers how ignorant the former often is, and how frequently in the past her family has lived upon less than a decent living wage, in the midst of the infectious, crowded tenements, deprived of pure air and skilled care, the conclusion indeed seems almost incredible. Yet the facts remain, and they suggest the conclusion that since the prime condition in the rearing of children is maternal devotion, the native-born woman has failed to perform her duty to her offspring. The unnursed child dies rather readily and has but a very slight chance for life, considering the ills that crowd around the first year of its existence. It is many times more dangerous for a baby to pass through these than it is for soldiers to pass through the wire entanglements "over there."

Reform must come in this important matter or our generation will prove to be even more foolish and short-sighted than any of its worst defamers has dared to proclaim it. What is the use of fighting for a country wherein men do not expect their children to live?

The Vice-President of the American Association suggests that the trouble is with our education. There has been no teaching of unselfishness, no inculcation of national ideals. The one thing that has been insisted on is personal success. Naturally I prefer to quote his own words, especially at this time when graduates are ready to take up life for themselves:

> Our young people have grown up without a broad outlook on life. They have been taught to think in terms of personal convenience and advancement, and not in terms of the common good. Democratic education is a failure, if it neglects to make provisions for the character of its future citizenship. Our young men and women must be taught to realize early that we do not live for ourselves; that our intellectual, economic, and social advancement must be carried forward, not only as tradition, but more especially in terms of new, vigorous and worthy personalities. Our educational system must make our various racial groups conscious of their best traditions and instil desires to see their better strains strengthened and increased as a foundation of the greater democracy of the future.

He does not hesitate to trace the evil to its true source: the individualism which has been such a marked characteristic of our recent civilization and which has even been proclaimed as an important factor in the evolution of the race. Mr. Dublin rightly sees in it the source of racial degeneration:

> Individual selfishness is, at bottom, the source of the evil I have described. An increasing number of men and women do not assume the marital state or, when married, do not raise a family of children because they prefer to live better than their forbears and to spend more on themselves than would be possible if they had children to raise and educate. Under present conditions children are not an economic asset. Restrictive compulsory education and child-labor laws make children an expensive luxury which only the poor can afford. In fact, there is no very good reason, on the score of personal comfort alone, why individuals should assume the obligations and sacrifices which large families entail. Such, indeed, is the logical conclusion of our growing materialism. Yet the shallowness of this attitude must be obvious. Men and women who today are rallying to the defense of the country in war time need not be reminded that we live not for ourselves, but rather for the fuller life of the community. If only the same spirit would animate us in times of peace, more would then meet their obligation to the State through parenthood.

The war is illuminating many problems which in the selfish times of peace were settled entirely in terms of individual comfort and ease. It is indeed possible for an all-wise and all-powerful God to bring good out of what at first seemed to be an almost unmixed evil. The revolution in social-thinking alone is sufficient to show how much profit can come for humanity out of physical suffering and conflict. Birth-control now stands revealed in its moral and physical degeneracy, as an evil for the nation and the race. France today is profoundly regretting her unborn millions. The moral regeneration she has experienced will create new conditions within her when the war is past. America, too, must search her soul if she would keep this glorious country for the descendants of the men who now are fighting so bravely to make the world safe for democracy, and not leave it as an inheritance to future immigrants.

Army Statistics of the Civil War

THOMAS F. MEEHAN

A NUMBER of AMERICA's subscribers recently received the following document through the mails:

WHO DID THE DESERTING DURING THE CIVIL WAR?

In reply to the boasts so freely made by Roman Catholic editors and orators that the Irish fought the battles of the civil war and saved the Nation, the following document, received from Washington, is here given:

Whole number of troops engaged in the Northern Army, 2,128,200; natives of the United States, 1,625,267; Germans, 180,-817; Irishmen, 144,221; British (other than Irish), 90,040; other foreigners, 87,855.

The desertions were as follows: Natives of the United States, 5 per cent; Germans, 10 per cent; Irish Catholics, 72 per cent; British (other than Irish), 7 per cent.; other foreigners, 6 per cent.

In other words, of the 144,000 Irishmen that enlisted 104,000 deserted, and it is reliably stated that most of these desertions occurred after the recognition of the Confederacy by the Pope.

It is also a fact that of the 5 per cent of the native Americans rated as deserters, 45 per cent of the 5 per cent were Roman Catholics.

When a copy of these "statistics" was presented last week for verification at the Adjutant General's office in Washington a weary chief-clerk sadly remarked: "What! Is that old thing up again? Why I know enough Irishmen right here in Washington who have been through the Civil War to give the lie to that assertion." Then he went to a nearby drawer and from it produced a printed copy of an official memorandum, prepared by the Record and Pension Office of the War Department, to answer this question about "statistics," which keeps bobbing up persistently. This printed answer has been performing service in the cause of historical truth since July 15, 1898. It reads as follows:

MEMORANDUM

RELATIVE TO THE NUMBER AND NATIVITY OF DESERTERS FROM THE UNITED STATES ARMY DURING THE WAR OF THE REBELLION

The actual number of desertions from the United States Army during the late civil war is unknown, but it has been estimated by this office, from the best data obtainable, that the number of actual deserters at large at the close of the war (making due allowance for those incorrectly reported as deserters) was 117,247.

Many charges of desertion have been removed by the War Department on the ground of manifest error in the record, and under the acts of July 5, 1884, May 17, 1886, and March 2, 1889, and the acts amendatory thereof. No record has been kept showing the number of cases in which the charge of desertion has been removed by the War Department, and it would be impossible to determine that number, even approximately, without examining the records of the Department from the war period to the present time, and this, of course, is impracticable with the limited clerical force available.

The whole number of soldiers of any given nativity in the service during the War of the Rebellion is not known, and it is impossible from any data yet prepared to make even an approximately correct statement of the number or percentage of deserters of any given nativity.

When it is understood that the War Department is the sole custodian of the records of the armies in service during the late war, and that it has never made a statement or estimate of the number of deserters of any particular nativity during the war, it will be seen that published statements showing the number or per cent of deserters by nativity are entitled to no credence whatever.

From the same official sources of the Record and Pension Office another memorandum has been issued in regard to the nativity of soldiers in the United States army during the War of the Rebellion. This document declares: "No compilation has ever been made by this Department showing the nativity of the whole number of men accepted for military service during the late Civil War."

It notes, however, that the Provost Marshal General's Bureau and the Chief Medical Purveyor have some tables of this character in their respective reports, and of these tables the Record and Pension Office memorandum observes:

"It is proper to add that no satisfactory or reliable deductions can be made by applying the ratios obtained from either of these compilations to the total number of men serving in the army, as the examinations referred to were only made during the last two years of the war, and include both those accepted and those rejected.

Dr. Benjamin A. Gould, who was the Actuary to the United States Sanitary Commission from July, 1864, to the end of the war in 1865, published a bulky volume, the "Statistical" compilation of the "Sanitary Memoirs of the War of the Rebellion, Collected and Published by the U. S. Sanitary Commission." (The Cambridge Press, 1869.) In this he devotes Chapter XI to the topic of the nativities and nationalities of the soldiers, and from the figures he gives writers of a certain class draw most of their assertions. Those who write in good faith give Dr. Gould's own opinion about his statistics. Other writers merely use the figures to bolster the lies they have so industriously invented.

When Dr. Gould came to compile his book he found, as the War Department's official memorandum printed above states, that there were no records made of the race, nativity or religion of the soldiers. In order to overcome, as far as possible, this deficit, he says he sent out a series of questions to about 1,000 commanders of regiments and received some 350 answers. From these he makes his "apparent estimates," figures, which in the absence of actual records, receive scant recognition in these days of exact historical science. Dr. Gould's own words, supplementing the statements of the War Department, best fix the historical authority of his book, and incidentally the quality of all the bogus statistics regarding the Union troops in circulation now, and since this peculiar Know-nothing and A. P. A. industry began its libels on the loyalty of one of the most important sections of the citizens of the Republic. Here is what is set forth in Dr. Gould's book:

At almost every stage of our inquiries it becomes desirable to obtain tolerably close information concerning the general statistics of the volunteer army. . . . For obvious reasons no accurate knowledge can be obtained. . . . The materials available for forming a trustworthy estimate of the nativities and even the nationality of our soldiers have been very meagre and estimated by different persons at different times have varied to an almost incredible extent (p. 15).

Then, after explaining how he had used the results of his questionnaire-method in working out the "approximate judgment" and "reasonable inference" he arrived at, Dr. Gould is honest enough to declare (p. 26):

As it is clearly out of the question to form any trustworthy numerical estimate of this mode of estimation, it seems the better course to give the resultant figures after calling attention to this source of inaccuracy in the inference.

With all the resources of the War Department placed at his disposal Dr. Gould could make no better showing than this. Moreover the statistics he actually gives, inaccurate and even ridiculous as they are, give absolutely no color to the accusations made against the Irish of the Civil War. Finally there is no better proof of the ignorance or bad faith exhibited by the accusation than the statement that "most of these desertions occurred after the recognition of the Confederacy by the Pope," for even school children know that the Pope did not recognize the Confederacy. It is one of the consolations of these attempts to impeach the loyalty of the Catholics of the United States that a most prominent feature in them is always a self-starting accelerator for the nearest entrance to the domain of Ananias.

New Light on the Early Persecutions

A. Hilliard Atteridge

THE stress of the war is putting a temporary stop to much useful work, and every scholar will regret to learn that Dr. Flinders Petrie, to whose labor as an excavator and explorer of the ancient sites of Egypt we owe so much, has found it necessary to announce that for the next twelve months there will be a suspension of the issue of Ancient Egypt, the quarterly bulletin of Egyptian research which he has so ably edited for some years. The issue which contains this announcement gives us among other interesting matter an account of recent discoveries that throw a vivid light on the story of the Decian persecution.

The exceptionally dry climate of Egypt has led to the preservation of an enormous mass of documents written on sheets and rolls of papyrus. Every museum in the world that contains an Egyptian department has its papyrus manuscripts of the "Ritual of the Dead," and many other documents survive written on the same material in the days of the Pharaohs. But besides these essentially native Egyptian documents we have, thanks to more recent research, manuscripts of various kinds dating from the time of the Greek Ptolemies and the early Christian centuries. About the middle of the last century the first discoveries were made of fragments of the texts of Greek authors written on papyrus leaves. Thus more than one work has been recovered that, until this new mine of literary treasures was opened, was known only by name.

It was interesting to find fragments of the Iliad or of well-known historians and orators copied by Greco-Egyptian scribes in the three latest of the pre-Christian centuries, but it was beyond all expectation to be able to add complete, or nearly complete, works to our classical libraries from manuscripts buried for nearly 2,000 years in the Egyptian sands. We have thus recovered five orations, nearly complete, of Hyperides, a contemporary of Demosthenes, and reputed to be only second to him as an orator. He was known only by allusions in other writers until in 1847 one of his orations, written on papyrus, was found at Thebes. In 1889 Dr. Petrie discovered amongst other documents in a subterranean passage at Deir-el-Bahari, near Thebes, part of the lost tragedy of "Antiope," by Euripides. This find included several "boxes crammed with papyri." In the same year, at the British Museum in London, there was found among a number of papyrus rolls sent from Egypt an almost complete copy of the lost work of Aristotle on the "Athenian Constitution," the manuscript dating from the first century, A. D. Besides these literary treasures there have been uncovered letters, accounts, official documents, etc., throwing new light on the life of a far-off past. And as the period during which papyrus was the ordinary material for writings of all kinds covers the Roman and early Christian period of Egypt, these discoveries have given us some documents that have an important bearing on the Church's history.

Amongst non-Catholics an exaggerated importance was attached to the discovery a few years ago of the fragment of manuscript known as the "Sayings of Jesus," a few lines of Greek text, purporting to be sayings of Our Lord. With that loose appreciation of theological and evidential values that is only too common outside the Church, they were hailed by not a few writers as if they were part of a fifth Gospel. They really rank, of course, with the literature of the Apocryphal Gospels, which may contain some traditional facts, but have no authoritative value.

Far more important was the unexpected discovery of a number of census papers, that placed in a new light the Gospel story of the census that brought the Holy Family to Bethlehem. These for the first time revealed the methods of the census established by Augustus, and afforded the means of fixing the intervals between successive "enrolments" and the dates of the census years. Ramsay's notable apologetic work, "Was Christ Born in Bethlehem?" gives a full account of the discovery and of its bearing on the Gospel narrative. A mere recent discovery, described in the current number of Ancient Egypt, throws new light on the days of the persecutions.

The persecution of the brief reign of Decius (A. D. 249-251) is always spoken of by historians as one of exceptional severity. It was carried out with methodical thoroughness. Amongst its martyr-victims were the Pope, Fabian, the Patriarch of Antioch, Babylas, and the Bishop of Jerusalem, Alexander. Dionysius, the Patriarch of Alexandria, Gregory of Neo-Cesarea and Cyprian of Carthage were among the Bishops who escaped death by hiding from the persecutors. There were hundreds of martyrdoms. But many saved their lives by yielding to the demands of the persecutors. These who thus fell away were spoken of as "thurificati" (offerers of incense before the idols), "acta facientes" (those who had performed the required test acts), and "libellati" (those who had taken out the certificate "libellus," that they had obeyed the law).

It was the introduction of this universally obligatory certificate of compliance that made the persecution exceptionally severe. Hitherto Christians in times of persecution had to run the risk of being denounced, or of being called upon to perform a pagan action that would force them to choose between apostasy and martyrdom. But Decius introduced a method by which few could escape the trial. The local authorities were directed not merely to search for Christians and put them to the test, but to call upon every resident in their district to prove his fidelity to the religion of the Empire by appearing before the local tribunal and securing a libellus or certificate. Until lately none of these documents was known to exist But Egyptian research has now led to the discovery of no less than twenty-six of them. They are mostly fragmentary, but as there was obviously a general formula, it is possible to put together the whole document by the collation of the manuscript, the gaps in one being supplied by the text of another. This comparison of texts shows that there was an accepted form with minor local variations.

Here is the text of a libellus, taken out by a villager of Middle Egypt. It will be seen that the applicant makes his statement of facts and the official verifies them:

To the commissioners of the village of Alexandrou-Nesos, elected to superintend the sacrifices. From Aurelius Diogenes, son of Satabos, of the village of Alexandrou-Nesos, aged seventy-two years, with a scar on his right eyebrow. I have at all times offered sacrifices to the gods, and now again in accordance with the edict in your presence I have made sacrifice and libations, and partaken of the sacred offerings, and I request you to certify this statement. May you prosper. I, Aurelius Diogenes, have presented this application. I, Aurelius Syros, have witnessed your sacrifice. The first year of the Emperor Cæsar Gaius Messius Quintus Trajanus Decius, pious and prosperous, Augustus, on the second of the month Epiphi.

This is not a case of apostasy. The old villager comes to the commissioners to obtain his certificate of protection, as all had to come. He throws a few grains of incense into the fire before the idol, takes a proffered wine cup, pours out a few drops as a libation, drinks the rest of the wine thus offered to the gods. It is a triple test. The commissioners make out his libellus, noting the scar of his face as a precaution against the paper being used by someone else.

That the libellus was taken out by pagans who were beyond suspicion is proved by another document given to a woman, who is described as "Aurelia Ammonous, priestess of Petesouchos and the gods of the Moeris quarter." She was daily taking part in pagan sacrifices, but even so was called upon to sacrifice before the commission. These libelli come from the neighborhood of Arsinoe, about sixty miles south of Cairo. It will be noticed that the name Aurelius is common to all concerned in these papers, the explanation of the fact being that the people of the country had received forty years before a grant of Roman citizenship from Aurelius Caracalla and assumed his name with their new privilege.

Religious Spirit of Catholic Soldiers

CHAPLAIN THOMAS F. COAKLEY, U. S. A.

SWEEPING generalizations are dangerous. No less an authority than St. Thomas Aquinas tells us that all extremes are wrong, for he defines goodness as the plain high middle of the road. In medio stat virtus. This is the writer's warrant for refusing to declare in categorical fashion that all Catholic American soldiers in France are saints. Neither can he for a moment entertain the thought that a soldier's life in this distant land has served to break down the lofty moral standards observed at home.

I cannot speak for any one but myself, and I am not authorized to voice the opinions of other chaplains. I can only testify to things heard and seen at first hand, after a brief experience of but four months with the American troops in France, in widely scattered places, and in all branches of the service. It is possible that the conclusion as a result of these experiences may be altered in after months, although I do not think it at all probable. But at the present moment it is my settled conviction that our Catholic soldiers in France are just as virtuous as they were at home; if there is a change at all, it is a change for the better.

There are still many nominal Catholics in the army who have not been to Mass nor to the Sacraments for years. But we must remember that they did not go to Mass nor to the Sacraments before a declaration of war drafted them into military service. There are still some careless Catholics in the army who will not go to Mass on Sunday, nor to the Sacraments frequently, if they are compelled to ask the permission of their commanding officers to do so, a permission, by the way, that to the writer's certain knowledge, has never been refused by any officer he has met. Investigation usually discloses the fact that such lukewarm Catholics have been in a state of lessening warmth for some years, and army conditions are not responsible for their religious frigidity.

Taking it by and large, a man is the same spiritually in the army in France as he was before he entered it. If he never deliberately missed Mass on Sundays at home, neither will he do so in France, even though this often subjects him to great inconvenience. If he went to the Sacraments frequently at home, he will do the same overseas. "Where there's a will, there's a way."

This leads to the second observation, that if any difference is observed, it is that the curve plots upward. There are hundreds, yea, thousands of consoling instances, some of which I may, perhaps, deal with in a subsequent letter, to corroborate my belief that army life in France has not weakened the faith or morality of our Catholic soldiers, but rather has enlarged, deepened, strengthened and quickened both.

First of all, the men are nearer to death over here, edging up closer and closer to the front line day after day. The next station for them may be eternity, and they wish to be prepared, absolved and solaced for that last great journey. Then they are in a country that in ages past was saturated through and through with the very essence of Catholicism, and the enduring perfume, diminished, alas, but still fragrant, of that overwhelming, ubiquitous presence of the great Church, One, Holy, Catholic, Apostolic and Roman, fires their imagination, captivates their senses, and in far-off lovely France, even though the eldest daughter of the Church be now a widow, and far advanced in years, they find the Cross of Christ the peak of every landscape, and the church the principal edifice in every hamlet. They are awakened every morning by the ringing Angelus from countless slender spires, darting their delicate outlines into the clear blue sky. They meet the aged curé, in cassock and surplice and humeral veil, flanked by his tiny acolytes bearing lighted torches, and tinkling a silver bell as he carries the Bon Dieu processionally to some dying parishioner. They march along the truly magnificent highways of France, and at every intersection there is the crucifix, a "cross" road indeed, with its pile of votive crosses placed there by the devout villagers. There is the familiar evening call to prayer, to obtain God's benediction after the close of the day's weary toil. They follow the assembling multitude into the dim great church, so old, so cool, so beautiful, the heritage of ages of Catholic faith, and they say the same well-known and well-worn rosary, and sing the same accustomed hymns, and hear the same holy Latin tongue, and there is the same odor of cloudy incense that bring back unforgotten childhood days, and the recollections, fresh and sweet, of maturer years. With "taps" at night there is the farewell De Profundis bell, a warning summons, solemn, imperious, heart-compelling, to pray for the dead soldiers of France, fallen on the field of honor.

It is impossible for a Catholic soldier in the American Expeditionary Force in France to keep from thinking about God all day long. Like Francis Thompson's "Hound of Heaven" God follows him down the nights and down the days in myriad outward forms, the symbols of the inner life that ought to be led by every soldier of Jesus Christ. Is it any wonder that the Catholic soldiers in the American army feel that this war is in very fact a war against Christianity, and that the enemy is doing the work of anti-Christ, when they witness hundreds of Catholic churches in Belgium and northern France in ruins, the deliberate targets of German shells; when they see the sublimest thought ever expressed in stone a mass of smouldering débris, "its glass, rivaled only by that of Chartres, shattered in starry fragments on its bloodstained pavement, and its fragments made the settings of soldiers' rings"?

But of all the appeals to the Catholic soldier in France, there is one that has a force and a directness that are well-nigh overpowering. It is the antiquity of the Church. The buildings in which he says his prayers are old, centuries old, and they stand erect today, despite generations of war and persecution, firm as the eternal hills, a type of that rock on which Christ has built his imperishable Church, with their fortress-like walls, and massive flying buttresses, and forest of giant columns, and soaring arches and twinkling glass, flashing out into the gathering darkness with an indescribable burst of color. As he prays he calls to mind that Jeanne d'Arc, too, said her prayers in that very church some five hundred years ago. Long before the warrior Maid of Domrémy, another old time Crusader, Richard the Lion Hearted, "hung up his arms, his bannered spoils displayed" and at that very shrine of the Madonna, besought Heaven for victory. Centuries before that, St. Martin trod the ground where our modern American Crusader now sweeps the plains with his machine gun, and St. Louis, King of the Franks, and his famous successors, were crowned in the grand old Cathedral that is "daily suffering its martyrdom at the hands of German gunners." But now these great shadowy names of the vanished past are dead and gone, the world is up-side-down, all things are changed—all save one, God's Church. Ecclesia autem in aeternum stat. Immediately our soldier's thoughts run off into rich new fields, his surging emotions pulse with a strange new joy, he is carried back by leaps and bounds into the dim distance of the earliest antiquity, and as he opens his eyes he sees that as far as there is any monumental evidence at all in France, it is Catholic evidence, and he rejoices in possessing the Faith of his fathers, his mind is expanded, his vision has become enlarged, and he thrills with pride at being a member of that great world-wide communion, Catholic in time, Catholic in place, Catholic in doctrine.

If a sufficient number of American-born Catholic chaplains is sent overseas there is no reason why Catholic American soldiers in France should not lead lives as saintly as that of the Centurion of the Gospel, who received such high praise from Christ Himself, nor is it too much to expect them to rival St. Sebastian in holiness, in courage and in patriotism, and give to America a modern military patron as a synonym for all that a soldier ought to be.

A Raid on the Prize Table

To the Editor of AMERICA:

At the commencement of the University of Pennsylvania, in Philadelphia, on June 19, Mr. Louis F. McCabe was graduated with a remarkable basketful of prizes. In 1914 he ended the courses at the Philadelphia Catholic High School, and he then took the highest prize for mathematics and won a scholarship in the University of Pennsylvania.

While at the University he received the Phi Beta Kappa prize, which is awarded by a committee of the Faculty to a student who has the highest rating in all his courses. At the commencement he gathered in the first prize in mathematics with the interest for three years on a foundation; a fellowship in the Graduate School; the senior honors in English with the interest for three years on another foundation; the senior honors in Latin; and the alumni prize for the best Latin essay, which carries with it the interest for a year on another foundation. The reason he did not take other honors is that there aren't any others.

McCabe works at his religion, too. He probably would have done well even if he had not had the exceptionally solid training given at the Catholic High School here, but it is strange that the Catholic High boys of Philadelphia have a general habit of appropriating much more than a reasonable share of scholastic honors. We are proud of our Catholic High School in Philadelphia and lads like McCabe prove that we have good right to be proud.

A Catholic Daily

A subscriber and a constant reader of your valuable publication since its very first issue was published, I am taking great interest in the discussion that has been going on in AMERICA for the last two or three years about the advisability of organizing a Catholic daily in this country. I was particularly struck by the articles, "Leadership and Publicity" by Richard A. Muttkowski and "Catholic Publicity" by Michael Williams. Both writers seem bold enough to shake off at last that old, I was going to say that perpetual, fear of a financial failure which seems to have taken such a hold upon the minds of so many American Catholics. Is it indeed possible that in archdioceses like New York, Boston and Chicago, there would not be a sufficient number of subscribers to support such a venture?

I have had the privilege of living in both the United States and Canada, and could not help being struck by two outstanding facts: the steady and encouraging progress of the Catholic daily press among the French Catholics in Canada and the absence of any Catholic daily in the United States. The Province of Quebec, with its 1,500,000 Catholics, supports many Catholic dailies, besides a good number of excellent Catholic weeklies. Take, for instance, l'Action Catholique, that strong militant Catholic daily of Quebec, founded in 1907 by Cardinal Bégin, Archbishop of Quebec. It started with the recommendation of the Archbishop and the good-will of the clergy and laity of the diocese, though there was some opposition on the part of some laymen and a few priests. Under the inspiration of the Cardinal and the able leadership of his auxiliary, Archbishop Roy, the clergy as a whole showed their generosity in responding to their leaders' appeal; and the laity soon followed. After a few months of propaganda the daily came into existence and ever since has been steadily progressing.

Now, what seems to me particularly interesting in the controversy which has been going on in the columns of AMERICA about organizing a Catholic daily in this country, is the fact that all the objections made against the idea were made, time and again, in Quebec, by the group of opponents who did not want to hear of such a "daring," a "hazardous" and a "dangerous" enterprise. "Calamity-howlers" would announce, now and then, a tremendous failure and nothing less than the end of all Catholic progress in the Province with the establishment of a Catholic daily. In the meantime, Freemasonry was finding the means to organize in Montreal a paper of its own to help the propaganda through the Province of its cherished sophisms on education and all connected matters. But the venerable Archbishop of Quebec would not be denied and, with the special blessing and encouragement of Pope Pius X, he started, on December 21, 1907, the daily publication of l'Action Catholique. The paper is therefore in its eleventh year and as yet shows no signs of approaching death. In safeguarding Catholic interests, the paper did excellent work, especially in the matters of education, social work and public legislation. I heard Archbishop Roy make the public statement, two years ago, that without the Catholic daily, not one organization of Catholic defense in the diocese of Quebec could live today.

To any ordinary observer it appears that l'Action Catholique owes the best of its success to one main cause, a united clergy in the support of the Archbishop's daily paper. I was often told by those in charge of the Quebec Catholic daily that whenever the parish priest recommends the paper in his pulpit, he carries with him practically his whole parish. Has not the Sunday Visitor had the same experience in this country?

As with the Sunday Visitor, so with the much desired American Catholic daily. It will meet with success the day it is started with a united diocesan clergy behind it. Let us pray to see that day.

Pass Christian, Miss. ANTONIO HUOT.

Sisters and Nuns

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Will you please tell me the difference between Sisters and Nuns? I have been using these terms indiscriminately but a kind, and I suppose wiser, friend has corrected me. Like a great departed statesman I would sooner be right than President, so I ask a formal interpretation of the terms at your hands.

Albany, N. Y. B. K.

[Father Hector Papi, S.J., in his "Religious Profession," page 6, answers the question as follows: "In accordance with Canon 488 of the Code, the term religion applies to every institute in which the three vows of poverty, chastity and obedience are taken. A religion is called an Order or a religious Congregation, according as its members are admitted to solemn vows or only to simple vows. Likewise the term religious applies to all the members of every institute in which the three above mentioned vows are taken, while the members of a religion in which the solemn vows are taken are called also regulars, and when there is question of women, nuns." This is the technical, accurate, canonical use. In this strict terminology there are but few nuns in the United States, for generally speaking religious women in our country have only the simple vows. By a broader use, however, the term, nuns, is applied to all religious women who are cloistered.—ED. AMERICA.]

A Catholic Press Bureau

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Mr. Michael Williams suggests that the Catholic editors of the country take up the matter of the Catholic press bureau for which he is pleading so eloquently. Fortunately an excellent opportunity for action on their part presents itself now. For within a month or two the annual convention of the Catholic Press Association will be held in Chicago and what better chance to broach this subject could be desired? It only remains for some alert editor who realizes the imperative necessity of some action along similar lines, if not the adoption of the precise project of Mr. Williams, to take upon himself the task of bringing the matter to the attention of his fellows. And, for fear that everybody's business will once again prove nobody's business, who could more fittingly present the subject than the editor of AMERICA?

Meanwhile, important work of preparation must be done. Some effort should be made to ascertain more definitely the practicability of the thing, the operation expenses, the support to be counted on from diocesan papers and just exactly what work the bureau should do. In this connection, it seems to me, some consideration should be given the fact that there already exists a press bureau that performs some of the functions of Mr. Williams's ideal. This is the Central Bureau of the Central Verein, not the least important of the many activities of that great organization. Those of us who have read the timely articles furnished the diocesan papers by this bureau on Mexico, bigotry in Georgia and other matters of Catholic interest, have only regretted that they were not longer and more frequent. Why not look into the workings of the Central Bureau and thus get some notion of how the thing works out in practice? Surely the men who operate it have had experience enough to give some valuable suggestions and to point out the difficulties and trials to be encountered.

Again, though Mr. Williams expressly disclaims any expert knowledge of the cost of this enterprise, his wide acquaintance in the newspaper world, or at the very least, the fact that he is a member of the craft, should put him in a position to know the men who could furnish the desired information. Why not make an effort to assemble some data now, and forearmed with this, bring the matter to the consideration of the Catholic editors of the whole nation? Certainly, the charities "investigation" in this city which was horribly misrepresented by a Catholic newspaper in the Middle West, the recent, if not current, drive on the Pope, and the suspicious readiness with which the Associated Press seizes upon any item that might possibly be the handle of an anti-Catholic attack—all emphasize the need now of an effective counter-active agency.

New York. WILLIAM A. CLARKE.

A Primitive Stage of Reflection

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Your Catholic synthesis of estimates of Poe's verse and prose contained a dictum attributed to Henry James, that a relish for Poe's verse, in sum, argues a primitive stage of reflection. In these war times I cannot stop to reflect on poetry; but instantly I reacted at the notion of "primitive reflection" as indicative of a primary grade on Mount Parnassus. It was precisely the pure primitive cycle of reflection that begot Homer, and quite the best lines in the usually sophisticated and "high-school" reflective Matthew Arnold; for example, his "Sohrab and Rustum," and "Balder Dead," and De Quincey's prose-rhapsody, "Flight of a Tartar Tribe," and the red Indian's genius for volatile poetry of names, metaphors and similes. For primeval poetry, like the Catholic theology of inspiration, is born full-fledged, not reflected on the plan of Henry James's ruminations to the limit of arid evaporation. This is not arguing up or down as regards the topic, Poe; only pleading that a "primitive stage of reflection" has been sponsor for much of the sublime poetry on record since first the "spirit of God moved over the waters."

All honor, nevertheless, to Henry James for discerning between that primeval order of the world and its contrary chaos, when he solemnly cast his lot in the balance with England, France and freedom, denouncing the "mailed fist."

New Orleans. WILLIAM PRICE.

Spiritism and Spiritistic Phenomena

To the Editor of AMERICA:

My own opinion about Spiritism may not be worth very much, but at least it is founded on an extensive reading of the literature and interviews with a dozen or more mediums. Modern Spiritism began in fraud with the Fox sisters, continued in iniquity with thousands of mediums who have been exposed, and has always had as its ally credulity. How the scientists have been duped over and over again! What a fool Slade made of Zöllner, thought at that time to be the greatest of living psychologists! Your correspondent has quoted Richet, Flammarion, Lodge, Crookes, Barrett, Wallace and James. Professor Richet was a teacher of mine for a time in Paris. That makes me know what to think of his opinion on subjects outside of his immediate domain. Flammarion is a romancer, always ready to attract attention. Poor Lodge's last book would be ridiculous only that it is so pitiable. Professor Barrett believes as firmly in finding water or metal with a forked stick as he does in Spiritism or Spiritualism. Alfred Russell Wallace declared that the greatest mistake that physicians ever made was to accept vaccination as a protective against small-pox, that the most serious error of students of neurology was in refusing to accept phrenology. That combination is interesting: an "anti-vac," a phrenologist and a believer in Spiritism.

All of these scientists serve to illustrate very well the good old rule, "Shoemaker, stick to your last." Set a conjurer to catch a medium and the medium gets caught. No medium that has been before the public for any considerable period is without an exposure to his or her credit—or discredit. There are now many hundreds of distinguished men who were very much interested in spiritism here on earth who are in the beyond. Many of them promised that, if they could, they would send communications to us. Nobody thinks seriously that we ever have had a communication.

Personally, I see no reason to believe that any spirit, either good or bad, has ever communicated through a medium. There are phenomena in the literature of the subject that I cannot explain, but as objective proof of spirit communication they are too paltry for consideration. Madame Palladino's exposure is only typical of the history of all mediums. If the pitcher only goes to the well often enough it is broken. I have no faith in any communications that come through people who have been caught cheating.

There is not near so much evidence for spiritistic phenomena as there was for the wonderful curative power of hypnotism at one time, or of magnets, or of the cures that are worked in Eddyism, or, for that matter, for the cures worked by that arch-imposter, Dowie. Yet those who want to believe in these cures not only believe in them, but got cured by them.

An Official War Prophecy

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Scarcely had the great world war begun when prophecies were published in various papers, showing at least variety in detail and in the amount of truth scattered therein. Some of these recalled a statement made in my school days by our scholarly pastor in illustration of the fact that even Lucifer does not know the future, which is really known to God alone. "But Lucifer still has all his original intelligence," he added, "and by knowing a great many circumstances of which we are ignorant he may be able to make a close hit in guessing. Similarly, sharp politicians in Washington may be able to foretell pretty closely the result of a coming election, for they are in possession of facts which have a telling effect upon the vote in the various sections of the country."

Amusing tests of the sharpness of the Washington politician have frequently come my way during my dozen years in the capital, and one of my "indoor sports" has been to horde the daily newspapers of November 1 to November 5 each election year, to read them all the day after election. It is impossible to imagine the effect of such a course on one without a saving sense of humor, but the prescription is free to the ordinary fun-loving American.

The underlying principle of the remark of my pastor is well seen in the following letter, which I carefully copied from the compilation of diplomatic papers issued by the Department of State, known as "Foreign Affairs, 1867." The extract is taken from page 490 and can be read in any public library. This extract is far-sighted enough to reveal the Franco-Prussian War, of which it is now said the present war is but the sequel, and is also prophetic of the peace conditions before the present outbreak, which had surely become "the habit of peace."

LEGATION OF U. S.,
THE HAGUE, Dec. 29, 1867.

SIR: . . . The fear is general that the coming year will witness the breaking out of a European War. Governments are ready, or in active preparation for the threatened event, and the populations nervous and irritated. It will require moderation on the part of those who conduct foreign affairs to avert it.

One of the best guarantees for the maintenance of peace lies in the disinclination evinced to strike the first blow, and to be held responsible for the incalculable results.

Though the habit of peace is the more difficult to throw off by reason of its long continuance, yet the fact that it has lasted longer than usual is almost of itself sufficient notice that a period will soon be put to it. That the continent will be convulsed during this, or early in the aproaching decade, may be asserted with confidence. It may occur in 1868 from careless handling of existing differences, but no cause is now ripe, or apparently nearing maturity, that will probably produce the outbreak. . . .

HUGH EWING.

[To] Hon. Wm. H. Seward, Sec'y of State.

If this forecast was not a prophecy, it was to say the least a very shrewd guess.

Washington. M. PELLEN.

Preacher or Politicians

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Thirty-nine clergymen have sent out an appeal to all the Churches of this State, urging them to use their influence to secure the renomination of Governor Whitman. Their reason for taking this extraordinary action is said to be a desire to aid the Governor in return for the assistance given by him to the cause of prohibition.

The traditional principle of the American Governments, State and national, has been that the Government should not interfere with the religious opinions and observances of the people. No State religion, and no State church, has been the policy of this country since it became a free nation. The first amendment to the Federal Constitution provided that: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." Along with the principle that the State should not meddle with religious beliefs, there has gone the implied duty of the Churches not to interfere in political affairs. If the State must not control religion, the church must not control the state.

The movement for prohibitory laws forbidding the manufacture and use of alcoholic beverages is purely political. It has no warrant in any religion except the Mohammedan, which has practically no adherents in this country. There is not a line, not a word, in the Bible that justifies a resort to law as a means of promoting temperance. The policeman's club and the threat of jail have no place in either the Christian or Jewish religion.

Whether the State or National Governments should prohibit the sale of beverages used by many millions of sober temperate men and women, is a question that the people must decide for themselves. They should not be coerced by their religious teachers, nor should their representatives in the State legislatures and Congress be forced to vote against their convictions by the threat of the churches to defeat them at the polls. If the clergy are allowed to dictate the election of legislators and public officials we shall have, instead of a republic of free men and women, a religious oligarchy that will be able to impose its narrow views upon the people without regard to their wisdom or justice.

The Pope's Approval of "America"

To the Reverend Richard H. Tierney, priest of the Society of Jesus, editor of the weekly review, AMERICA, now in its tenth year.

Beloved Son, Health and Apostolic Benediction:

AMERICA, the weekly review, of which you are editor, is now in its tenth year. From the outset it has united its forces to those agencies which tend to make the Divine efficacy of the Church felt throughout the length and breadth of North America. We have, as you know, always held the spread of newspapers and periodicals to be a most effective means of forming public opinion; and since the unprincipled, wrongly, but with great cleverness, adopt this way of disseminating what perverts men's minds and hearts, it is surely incumbent on the good to be no less strenuous in making use of this selfsame means of propagating all that makes for sanctity, uprightness and nobility of life. It was with this object that you undertook the work of giving a clear and accurate exposition of Catholic principles and activities, and, when occasion offered, of defending them against every attack. You have adhered steadily to your original purpose, and in consequence have done much to further the interests of your countrymen and especially those of your own Faith. We congratulate you; and We desire that in the future, as in the past, you should continue to render signal service to the cause of Catholicism. It is extremely important to have at hand a norm of thought and action, which shall keep before men's minds the precepts of the eternal law and not let them be lost sight of in the mad rush after the goods of this life. And so, it is Our wish that all who are conscious of this fact should give you every assistance in their power to extend still more widely the beneficial influence of your work.

As an earnest of the Divine favor, which in Our paternal affection We invoke on you in all its fulness, We bestow on you, beloved son, on your associate editors, and on all who help you, Our Apostolic Benediction.

Given at Rome, at St. Peter's, the fifth day of May, in the fourth year of Our Pontificate.

BENEDICT XV, POPE.

Fourth of July Musings

"FOURSCORE and seven years ago, our fathers brought forth on this continent, a new nation, conceived in liberty." Fifty-five years have been added to this fourscore and seven since with prophetic eyes Lincoln looked across the bloody field at Gettysburg, on which Americans had died in fratricidal strife, to see a new nation rejoicing "under God," in a new liberty. Even more truly than on that fateful day in July, 1863, is the nation now engaged in a great conflict that "government of the people, by the people and for the people, shall not perish from the earth."

More than a year ago, after Congress had spoken, the President issued his directions as Commander-in-chief of the army and navy, and the flag of the United States was once more raised in the battle for human liberty against godless oppression. At the command of legitimate authority, our young men left their homes for the training-camps, and the nation at large girded itself for war. What will be the end of it all? Are our young men, the flower of our people, to fight and suffer, perhaps to lay down their lives on foreign fields, in vain? Shall we who remain at home, live through weeks and months, if not through dragging years of anxiety and grief, to behold as the outcome of this high and heroic endeavor, the defeat of justice and the exaltation of tyranny? We cannot believe that this is the sentence held for us in the inscrutable decrees of Providence. God who searches the hearts of men and the counsel of nations, knows that our cause is just. We entered into this conflict, with no thought of aggression or any manner of injustice, but solely to put forever beyond jeopardy, the social and political liberty without which man cannot live in a manner befitting human dignity, nor nations maintain their rightful authority.

These are the days that should see the nation on its knees before God. It was this thought that prompted the venerable Cardinal, the Archbishop of New York, to draw his people into the churches on Independence Day, to assist at the Holy Sacrifice, "for the welfare of our country, and the victory of the American arms." As the people, so the nation, and the rectitude of our personal lives will make a nation acceptable in the sight of the King of kings. Not alone by vast armaments does a nation advance to victory. Unless the Lord of Hosts keep the city, our efforts shall be put forth in vain and our strength poured out like water.

Coal Oil and Theology

HE was indeed an obscure clergyman who did not receive during the last three months at least one copy of a pamphlet, "The Christian Church, What of Its Future?" by that eminent prince of theology, Mr. John D. Rockefeller, Jr. This exposition of unreasoning and unblushing dogmatism was first submitted to the laity in the pages of a weekly magazine. Received in silence by the crowd, it was then passed on to the clergy. This inclusion of the clerical element of the population produced at least one result which Mr. Rockefeller probably did not anticipate. In one of the cleverest brochures of the year, "Religion—with a Minus Sign," published by Loyola University, Chicago, the Reverend Joseph P. Conroy proceeded to show that even a man able to peddle coal oil with rare success may cut a very poor figure when he undertakes to dabble in logic or theology.

There is a quaint and somewhat amusing tendency in this country to allow the successful man the privilege of dogmatizing on any and all subjects that may chance to swim into his ken. The venerable electrician, for instance, seeking to disprove the immortality of the soul, gravely discourses on biology, thereby assuming authority in at least two disconnected fields which lie entirely outside his province. The manufacturer whose mechanical genius is attested by establishments producing 1,000 motor-cars a day, poses as an expert in history and international law, and wonders why his pronouncements are not accepted as ultimate by the chancelleries of Europe. The owner of a chain of department stores leaves off his stock-taking and his labor problem to dogmatize on exegesis, maintaining that Christ never meant what He said when He pronounced an eternal hell for those who wilfully reject Him. The physician in his declining years sets himself to attack the reality of certain miracles at Lourdes, and in blissful ignorance of the fact that it is the merest of burlesques, quotes Huxley's account of the first apparition to Bernadette. Huxley spoke, and although Huxley was neither an historian nor a theologian, the matter was at an end.

All this was before the war, but even yet we have not fully learned that the cobbler does his best work at his last, and that Mr. Rockefeller preaches most wisely when he discourses on matters of the trade. We rigidly restrict the construction of U-boats to naval experts, but no expert is needed to build a better Church that that which was planned by Jesus Christ. An oil man can do that.

Is Destitution Desirable?

NOT many months ago a ragged, dirty old man was picked out of a gutter and hurried to the city hospital. He died before he could be assigned to his proper ward in that institution. While the physicians in charge had a learned name to designate the cause of his taking off, the illiterate would say that the old man had starved to death. Only a day or two before this not uncommon occurrence, the metropolitan press told the story of a woman, who, sick after a hard day in the sweat-shop, staggered "home" to her top-floor East Side tenement, locked the door, and fell asleep. Her sleep was the sleep of the dead, but the neighbors, hard-pressed by their own fight for a living, knew nothing of this until the incessant crying of the woman's little children suggested an investigation.

This does not seem to be the poverty of which St. Francis sang when he indited his panegyrics of my Lady Poverty, and it is not. It is destitution. Poverty, in the correct social sense, is the lot of those whose possessions, gathered by industry and frugality, enable them to live within a recognized standard of decency. In the Christian sense, they are poor who voluntarily give up the ownership of temporal goods for Christ's sake, so that, free from even the desire of the things of this world, they may practise more perfectly the two great commandments of the law. But the lot of the old man picked out of the gutter and of the woman who died in the tenement is not poverty. It is plain, every-day destitution, and between the two is a vast gulf. One is desirable, a virtue. The other is hateful, a calamity, and if not a vice, most frequently a source of social and moral disorder. Even St. Francis himself, the great apostle of poverty, did not live in a state of destitution, nor did he propose destitution as a virtue. Hunger and cold, when they came, he bore with joy, but as a rule he and his closest followers had enough to eat and wherewith to be clothed. Man does not live by bread alone, but without some bread he cannot live at all, as He well knew who had compassion on the crowd and multiplied the loaves, lest His people faint in the way. So, too, His faithful imitator, St. Francis, filled with the spirit of His Master, understood that to preach the deprivation of man's necessities is not to counsel virtue, but to promote fanaticism. And the usual result of fanaticism is violence and vicious living.

It is high time that our social leaders and our expositors of asceticism drew the clear and common-sense line of demarcation between poverty and destitution. If we are to propose the first as a virtue, most profitable to the State and to the soul, to reduce the second, as far as may be possible, is one of the duties of all who would follow Christ. As Leo XIII has told us, the Church has never been "so preoccupied with the spiritual concerns of her children as to neglect their temporal and earthly interests," and it was St. Thomas, quoted by the great Pontiff, who laid down the principle that "It is in no wise a matter of small moment to provide those bodily and external commodities, the use of which is necessary to virtuous action." Riches have their dangers, but it may be questioned whether the dangers arising from destitution are not equally great. The idea that destitution is an actual, never-failing help in the acquisition of virtue smacks of the Manichean rather than of the Christian. Certainly it has no fellowship with the teaching of the Church or with the spirit of the Angelic Doctor, who wrote that not only the possession of the bare necessities of life, but "a certain amount of comfort," was necessary for the practice of virtue.

Bone Dry Prohibition, Patriotism or Blasphemy?

ALL Amercia is divided into two classes—Prohibitionists and anti-Prohibitionists, and the former are patriots, while the latter are traitors bent on handing the country over to the Kaiser by drinking a glass of light beer instead of gulping down a bottle of grape-juice or a dozen cups of tea at a sitting. Everybody knows this, from the "Great Commoner" to the village deaconess, but it is to be feared that citizens do not realize how much the country owes to the insight, courage and courtesy of these dry-as-a-chip people. Their parched tongues have been ceaseless in orations worth anything from ten to fifty dollars apiece, and their nimble pens have thrown across the country a river of ink free from any vestige of alcohol. The effect has of course been marvelous: they have accused the brewers of Kaiserism and, as a great earnest of victory over the Teutons they have succeeded in banning ginger ale from the lordly city of Nashua on the Merrimac, because forsooth the wretched stuff contained a trace of alcohol. No doubt the wind blew brewery-way one fateful morning and entered the place where the ginger ale was in the making.

But great as are these contributions to victory, they are as nothing to the fact that the angels of small beer and Ceylon tea, spiced with lemon, have succeeded in blocking the passage of a most important agricultural bill by attempting to stick to it an amendment which would drive people to coca-cola or the mad-house. Further—and this is really a notable contribution to our war-strength—they have insulted and angered millions of citizens by their fanatical and blasphemous attitude towards the Mass. Just how far their patriotism or blasphemy can reach in this direction is well illustrated by these letters:

AMERICA,
New York, N. Y.

DEAR SIR:

As a part of, and in connection with, the program of the National Dry Federation, we are preparing an article which will cover one page, showing the necessity of War Prohibition to save fuel, transportation, labor and food, and requesting everybody to wire or write Congress to this effect. We hope to get this into every religious paper and many others. We will furnish this in plate form. We are writing to ask you if you will run this free of cost, and if not what is the least amount you will do it for? We believe this is the most patriotic thing that can be done at this time.

Yours for Winning the War,
VIRGIL G. HINSHAW.

P. S.—Please state exact size of page.

The following note was sent in reply to this:

Campion House,
39 West 86th St.,
New York, June 14, 1918.

Mr. Virgil G. Hinshaw,
326 W. Madison St.,
Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR:

I am in receipt of a form letter from you concerning a specially prepared article on Prohibition. The letter prompts me to ask you the following questions:—1. Does the National Committee favor the use of fermented wine for sacramental purposes? 2. Has the Committee ever taken any action to prevent the use of fermented wine for sacramental purposes? 3. Has the Committee prepared to take any such action in the near future? 4. Does the Committee contemplate taking any such action at any time in the future? I am, Sir,

Very respectfully,
R. H. TIERNEY.

An answer to these questions was never returned; instead, this interesting letter was received:

Chicago, June 17, 1918.

Mr. R. H. Tierney,
39 West 86th St.,
New York, N. Y.

DEAR MR. TIERNEY:

Your letter received. I will say that since I have been here (six years) I have never mentioned Communion wine, one way or the other. It has never entered my mind, inasmuch as I belong to the Quaker Church, which does not indulge (sic) in Communion service. I have no objection to a Church using fermented wine if it wants to use it, providing the use will be confined to a sacred purpose and not to (sic) the satisfaction of an appetite for strong drink. If I were to give a personal opinion upon the subject, I would say that to me it sounds ridiculous that the Lord ever wanted any one to use "booze" for Communion. Briefly speaking, I see no connection between the indwelling of the Divine Spirit and the using of a drink that would make one drunken (sic). However, will say that if any person does not see any such connection, I am perfectly willing, as long as he suffers from the delusion, that he shall (sic) be satisfied. With best regards, I am

Yours sincerely,
V. G. HINSHAW.

There it is, in its naked ungrammatical effrontery, too profoundly theological to bear minute analysis by a mere editor, but altogether illustrative of the bone-dry soul. Is this letter patriotic or merely blasphemous? The question is not of importance to the latest-day saints of the lime-dust halo. They and they alone are going to win the war, by sensational charges against those who differ from them, by setting the fanaticism of the minority above the rights of the majority, by political chicanery, by crude, brutal attacks on the religion of 18,000,000 Americans.

Literature

THE PROSE OF ALICE MEYNELL

IT is a relief to turn aside from the loud and jostling streets of cities to a quiet meadow, gleaming under the summer sun, where into the silence rises the clear voice of one singing bird. There are also such refreshing spaces in literature, where, after empty debate and trafficking, the heart is consoled with loveliness. The professional entertainer, the vulgarian, the "booster," the record-seller, the man—or worse still, the woman—with a purpose, fill the market with their clamor; but the flowers are hid in shy places, and are easily to be missed by the inattentive eye. From modern wastefulness we may keep a precious treasury of small books. They are always few in number and unobtrusive. The lily has neither need for gilding nor for the blowing of her own trumpet.

Alice Meynell has during the last year published a slender sheaf of verse and a volume of her essays. In an age when every author is expected to publish at least one book in every twelve months, one writer of unassailable distinction can only point to half-a-dozen volumes after a long literary life. Something better than bulk and quantity are given us, to those of us at least who weary of the pretentious and the trivial, to those who are content to wait patiently for excellence.

In these pages—brooded over and lived into, before written—there is a delicate rhythm not to be caught by other than a delicate ear. "If life," she says, "is not always poetical, it is at least metrical." Mrs. Meynell is at her best and most characteristic in her commentaries, slight essays on such subjects as "Rain," "The Color of Life," "Composure," and "Solitude." In these how keenly intuitive is her power of observation, how sweet her detachment! She has noted the exact note and modulation of the thrush and its variation; the woodland blooms and the shadows upon the grassy downs are known and known exactly. Nothing escapes her; even carelessness must be carefully guarded.

Other hands have often turned the exquisite into the finicky, but in Mrs. Meynell austerity is wedded to a great and gracious spirit, a spirit of humor and of pathos and of laughter. Mysticism is here, but a mysticism that is gay. To the poet may be applied her own "Wind of Clear Weather in England":

> How keen his choice, how swift his feet!
> Narrow the way and hard to find!
> This delicate stepper and discreet
> Walked not like any worldly mind.
> Most like a man in man's own day,
> One of the few, a perfect one:
> His open earth—the single way;
> His narrow road—the open sun.

One other "delicate stepper and discreet" has for "narrow road, the open sun." She is not finicky but spacious. Hear the first paragraph of "The Horizon":

> To mount a hill is to lift with you something higher and brighter than yourself or than any meaner burden. You lift the world; you raise the horizon; you give a signal for the distance to stand up. It is like the scene in the Vatican when a Cardinal, with his dramatic Italian hands, bids the kneeling groups to arise. He does more than bid them. He lifts them; he gathers them up, far and near, with the upward gesture of both arms; he takes them to their feet with the compulsion of his expressive force. Or it is as when a conductor takes his players to successive heights of music. You summon the sea, you bring the mountains, the distances unfold unlooked for wings and take an even flight. You are but a man lifting his weight upon the upward road, but as you climb the circle of the world goes up to face you.

In "Hearts of Controversy," as in the earlier book, lives the same finished art, but with the exception of its last two short essays, "Charmion" and "The Century of Moderation," its pieces are more considerable in matter than her previous work. She becomes very definitely a controversial critic. Before, criticism was obiter dicta, casual, suggestive; now, vexed questions are asked and answered. Here, too, is the flashing thrust of an epigram. Many of the wisest and wittiest passages are spoken in a stage "aside." How much humorous good-sense is in her comment upon Matthew Arnold's classification of the French as the people of "ideas" and of the "English" as the people of "practicality." "Practicality," she cries, "ascribed to the nation that has the fifty religions! Ideas to the nation that has the fifty sauces."

Again, speaking of Charlotte Brontë, Mrs. Meynell marvels at the way her freedom was gained from the bonds of Gibbon-English. "It is less wonderful that she should have appeared out of such a parsonage than that she should have arisen out of such a language." What shrewdness is in this delightful antithesis:

> It is not to the wild light hearts of the seventeenth century that we must look for extreme conceits and for extravagance, but to the later age, to the faultless, to the frigid, dissatisfied with their own propriety. There were straws, I confess, in the hair of the older poets; the eighteenth-century men stuck straws in their periwigs."

In the four main essays in "Hearts of Controversy," Alice Meynell sits as a judge upon, in turn, Tennyson, Dickens, Swinburne and the Brontës. In each case she does indeed get to the heart of the controversy. Discriminating between the loose admiration Tennyson received during his life and the looser reaction of neglect that has befallen him in our day, she strikes a just balance. "He . . . had both a style and a manner: a masterly style, a magical style, a too dainty manner, nearly a trick; a noble landscape and in it figures something ready-made." Again brushing aside all mean criticism of Dickens' style and grammar, of his wild, and to my mind, divine power of caricature, she reaches to the essential soul of the great Victorian. "Nothing places him so entirely out of date as his trust in human sanctity, his love of it, his hope for it, his leap at it. He saw it in a woman's face, first met, and drew it to himself in a man's hand first grasped."

To Swinburne, however, the writer feels that Mrs. Meynell is not so just. Reading her indictment, even a great admirer of the poet might find no word of reply. The case seems complete and unanswerable. Swinburne did only too often give us a jingle rather than poetry; his thoughts did have "their source, their home, their origin, their authority and mission in . . . his own vocabulary and the passion of other men"; too much of his verse did come from "a perfervid fancy rather than an imagination." All this we must grant. But his great genius must not be judged by "Dolores" or even by the choruses from "Atalanta." These are of his most amazing but not of his best work. Moreover it is cheap to charge him with an absurd couplet (hackneyed beyond endurance) written in youth, or to pour contempt upon him because "foam" and "flame"—words like these—are too frequently used to deck out his verse. Swinburne as well as Tennyson is suffering from a reaction, but the writer ventures to think that his place in English song will ultimately be reckoned higher than that of Tennyson or of many more of the lordliest companies of the poets.

Mrs. Meynell's love of simple and spacious effects; her art which, like her religion, gives the freedom of a law; her aloof-ness—all these mark her off from her contemporaries. Many of them write exceedingly well, but they are implicated in barren affairs. They sit at their desks with an eye on the clock, which must not move more quickly than their scribbling, post-haste pens. They serve their causes, and often wage noble battle, but the ephemeral happening which called forth this poem, or the crank or politician who was confuted by that article is unsubstantial. When forgetfulness takes them away, the journalism of their period—though it be literature also—must go with them. This Mrs. Meynell knows. But "Who of the wise would hesitate? To be honorable for one day—one named and dated day, separated from all other days of the ages—or to be for an unlimited time tedious?" She herself has made her choice honorably. The contemplative of letters, she lets the world go by. The swords of soldiers receive only the aid of her dedicated cloistration, for her eyes are fixed upon the reality they struggle for.

THEODORE MAYNARD.

THE DEAD AVIATOR

(RESNATI. Buried May 21, 1918.)

He moves how slowly through the silent street,
  He that the dullard earth was wont to scorn,
For pace with him on slow and leaden feet
  His fellows walk, and bow their heads and mourn.

The wings are clipt at last that used to soar,
  And dark the eyes that would confront the sun.
He leaps to greet the dayspring never more,
  And with the lark his last glad race is run.

He fared amid the continents of space,
  Air's denizen, familiar, unafraid,
He knew the clouds as girls their garden place,
  And with the vagrant winds his tryst was made.

Earth was his death and not the fields of air;
  Let earth receive and hold his body fast,
But his swift soul that made his body dare
  Slips from her grasp and has its will at last.

Free of the body's shard he flies, he flies,
  Fleeter than thought and subtler than a breath,
Unhindered now he seeks his native skies,
  Beyond the little tyranny of death.

REVIEWS

Drums of Defeat and Other Poems. By THEODORE MAYNARD. London: Erskine Macdonald.

The title of this musical and thoughtful little book of lyrics is admirably chosen, for the best of the poems in the collection have as their theme the triumph of failure. "The Fool," "Don Quijote," "Ireland," which is a poem that appeared originally in AMERICA, "In Memoriam, Patrick Henry Pearse," and the following "Ballade of Failure," are all beautiful poems in which Mr. Maynard proclaims melodiously the victorious folly of the Cross:

With boom and benison and blight,
  With cunning and with smooth accord
You smote us. In the stark sunlight
  We melted as the snows are thawed.
  Yet these can show a broken sword,
Because their sword was not for sale,
  Where you can show a shining hoard—
But were you strong enough to fail?

In pride and panoply and might
  Your great triumphant legions poured
Upon us, swift to slay and smite
  Us few on the embattled sward.
  Oh, as a bull gores so you gored,
For you were many and could prevail.
  Your wings of victory are unflawed—
But were you strong enough to fail?

Now we ride homeward through the night,
  And bearing as our sole reward
A banner trampled in the fight,
  A tattered rag to show for gaud.
  We must admit that you have scored;
Yet honor is an ancient tale.
  Take all the glory we afford—
But were you strong enough to fail?

L'Envoi

True, Prince, your champions ride abroad
  Superbly in their silver mail,
And all the wide earth owns you lord—
But were you strong enough to fail?

The sonnet entitled "Silence" and the "Birthday Sonnet" too are admirably conceived and expressed, while "Sight and Insight" and "Gratitude" are beautiful poems of thanksgiving. "To the Dead" puts old thoughts well, and "In Domo Johannis" paints a charming picture of Our Lady in the evening of her days. Mr. Maynard reprints in this volume a number of poems which were first published in "Laughs and Whifts of Song," a slender book of verse which was warmly praised in our issue of June 24, 1916. The author is a Chestertonian, with much of the manner of his master about him. The "Tail-piece" had best been omitted.

Essai sur la Philosophie de Gratry. 7 fr. 50. Par B. POINTUD-GUILLEMOT, Docteur ès Lettres. La Doctrine Sociale de Gratry. 3 fr. 25. Paris: Gabriel Beauchesne.

The author whose thought is reviewed in these two excellent volumes has often been called the greatest French Catholic philosopher of the nineteenth century. His works possess a lively interest as they are energized by the tireless struggle of a brilliant and sincere mind with intellectual and social problems that are still paramount. Among other vital problems they treat of the proofs of the existence of God, the dialectic process, the "Divine sense," the relation between reason and faith, the soul and its laws of development, the cognoscitive faculties, the will and liberty, death and immortality Their author was intimate with such widely different minds as Aristotle, Plato, St. Thomas, Leibnitz, Descartes and Malebranche. M. Pointud-Guillemot has given us the essentials of his thought separated from the bold, sometimes reckless, imaginative and intellectual flights of the author, and subjected them to a sure criticism.

The book on social science is perhaps the more interesting of the two. It gives us Gratry's remarkable nineteenth-century prophecy of present-day social conditions and an exposition of the Christian basis for a true democracy. It treats, too, of war with its origins and uses, the prospect and means of obtaining permanent peace, the economic character of the coming era, the dangers of secret societies and of diplomatic lying, capitalist control of the press, labor unions, modern pauperism and its medieval remedy, Socialism, the duties of the rich. Here again the able criticism of M. Pointud-Guillemot has separated truth from error. Those who were impressed by Mr. Hilaire Belloc's "Servile State" should read Gratry's chapters on "Financial Feudalism." The variety of subjects covered in the books under review is an indication of their suggestive character.

La Question sociale et nos Devoirs de catholiques. Le Clergé et l'Action sociale. Par JOSEPH-PAPIN ARCHAMBAULT,

Popular action, says M. de Lamarzelle, quoted in the first of these volumes, is work done, not for those who have already succumbed in the struggle of life, but for such as are actually engaged in the very heat of the combat. To attract to the Church the great masses of our labor population is to win for her the true power of modern society. Catholics have not sufficiently manifested a realization of this great fact. Father Archambault is one of the few energetic Catholic leaders whose clearness of vision has pointed out to him the nature of the coming struggle and the need of preparing ourselves for it, if we would not leave the field to Socialists, radicals of every type and the enemies of the Church. The volume in question is directed mainly to his own fellow-Canadians of the Catholic province of Quebec, which, he says, should be an example to the rest of Canada, as Belgium has been for all of Europe. Yet here, as elsewhere, there is much to be amended. Taking the most important industry of Quebec, he finds that three typical classes of laborers in the local shoe factories are deplorably underpaid. Giving the budget of wages and of the normal expenditure of the average Catholic Canadian family, consisting of a father, mother and five young children, he shows that there is an annual deficit, respectively, of $150.30, $249.37, and $228.96. The family must, therefore, live far beneath normal Christian conditions, or mother and children will be driven into the factory to the ruin of morality and the home. Yet even this could offer no remedy, but would only increase the evil, which is largely attributable to want of steady employment. The first chapters of the book deal with fundamental social principles of universal interest.

The second volume is of the utmost importance for the Catholic Hierarchy, the directors of seminaries and for the clergy in general. It is to be hoped that it will be widely studied and lead to practical applications. The author shows what has actually been accomplished in many of our Catholic seminaries, and indicates the nature of the social courses given in them or the methods followed in preparing our clergy for their serious duties in relation to the great labor problems of our day. Carelessness in this important matter would evidently be the utmost folly and fully justify the accusations made against us by our enemies.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

"Her Irish Heritage" (Kenedy, $1.35), by Annie M. P. Smithson, while "Dedicated to the Memory of the Men who Died, Easter, 1916," is not a story of strife in Ireland, but of the bitter conflict which sometimes fills the soul of the convert to the Faith. The "plot" of the story is somewhat forced, but this genuinely Catholic book is well worth reading, if only for Mrs. Smithson's sympathetic presentation of all that the Church means to Irish Catholics.——"The Amazing Interlude" (Doran, $1.40), by Mary Roberts Rinehart, is a good illustration of Mrs. Rinehart's skill in expanding a short story into a novel of 317 pages. Sara Lee behind the lines, administering cheer and chocolate to the Belgian troops, is a gallant little figure, but her companions frequently form a rather uninteresting company. ——In "Salt, the Education of Griffith Adams" (Dutton, $1.50), Charles G. Norris has a keen eye for many of the defects of American schools and colleges which, he claims, not only do not impart "culture" but are calculated to destroy what little the average freshman brings with him. The publishers announce that "the author speaks plainly on vital factors in a young man's life," but this plain speaking is one reason why Mr. Norris, for all his undoubted ability, has failed to write a great novel. There is art, even in the disposition of sewage.—— As is usual with books of the advanced economic type, "Gertie Swartz, Fanatic or Christian" (Doubleday, Page, $1.40), by Helen R. Martin, ends where it should begin. The story is founded on the foolish question, "Is it Christian to treat workmen well, or is it mere fanaticism?" and is developed along extreme lines, with extreme characters. Gertie Swartz, who quotes Shaw and Tolstoy quite nonchalantly, wars on all existing economic conditions and the Church's (presumably Protestant) treatment of the workman. Her sister, Stella, a very Machiavelli in intrigue and selfish duplicity, wishes to deprive the workman of even his freely conceded rights.

The author of "Shellproof Mack" (Small, Maynard, $1.35) is Arthur James McKay, who earned the name of "Shellproof" by undergoing a shocking experience with German shells without suffering anything resembling shell-shock. He offers the reader an interesting narrative of twenty-eight months in the British army and of seventeen months in the trenches, a narrative at once humorous and thrilling, and which cannot but throw great light on what our boys are doing "over there," battling for liberty.——In "Winged Warfare" (Doran, $1.50) Major W. A. Bishop, V. C., D. S. O., M. C., a Canadian aviator who has some fifty victories to his credit, tells of all his hairbreadth escapes. Killing German airmen and destroying their machines, so ruthless has this war become, is a cold, calculating business to be described without enthusiasm or emotion. "My Boy in Khaki" (Harper, $1.00) by Della Thompson Lutes is the title of a book describing a widowed American mother's feelings and reflections when her only child goes off to the war. An unwavering faith and a stanch patriotism enable her to make the sacrifice bravely.

Though Mr. William Rose Benét is not a Catholic, what he saw during "The Graduation" at Georgetown University last month made him write the following stanzas, which Don Marquis of the New York Evening Sun recently set on the top of his "Sun Dial":

The gray walls of Georgetown
Where priests have ever trod
Are voiceless in stone,
But they hold the voice of God.
I saw a boy in khaki
The burning censer swing,
And other lads in khaki
Raptly listening.

I bent the knee beside them,
I prayed for once their prayer,
In the cool June sunlight,
In the sacred air.
The high cross went by me,
The trumpets blew beside,
With sorrow and thanksgiving
My heart was crucified.

There's a flag over Georgetown,
A flag full of stars,
And her priests tread slowly
And her boys go to the wars.
But they bear in each breast
Such a sacrament of sun—
That, as my heart can well attest,
I seemed the lonely one.

A tiny boy was leaning
By the choir-master's knee,
A face full of meaning,
A seraph's face had he.
And I shall recall
His face for years to come,
The gravest of them all
With a grace that struck me dumb.

On a sunlit June morning
Like a bird's clear call,
With the flag of my country
Over us all,
I knelt with them at Georgetown
And heard the ivy say,
"God is with us, God is with us, Forever and a day!"

EDUCATION

Stephen Girard's "Charity"

ON May 21, 1750, Stephen Girard, the second child of Pierre Girard and Odette Lafargue, was baptized at St. Seurin's Church, Bordeaux, the day after his birth. That French Catholic boy subsequently became the richest man in America, for when he died in Philadelphia in 1831, he left a fortune of $7,600,000 the bulk of which he bequeathed to that city for building and maintaining a school "to provide for such a number of poor male white children. . . . a better education as well as a more comfortable maintenance than they usually receive from the application of the public funds." After naming the various branches of sound education which the orphans were to follow, the testator added:

> I do not forbid, but I do not recommend the Greek and Latin languages. I would have them taught facts and things, rather than words or signs; and especially I desire that by every proper means a pure attachment to our republican institutions, and to the sacred rights of conscience as guaranteed by our happy constitutions shall be formed and fostered in the minds of the scholars.

Accordingly the Girard College curriculum emphasizes English, history and general sciences, and the boys are taught trades or prepared for commercial life.

"The Sacred Rights of Conscience"

THE scholars in question, it is worthy of note, were to be admitted to Mr. Girard's institution "between the ages of six and ten years" and might remain until "between fourteen and eighteen years of age." But in order, presumably, that the little orphans' "sacred rights of conscience" might be effectively safeguarded, their "benefactor" made the well-known provision:

> No ecclesiastic, missionary, or minister of any sect whatsoever, shall ever hold or exercise any station or duty whatsoever in the said College, nor shall any such person ever be admitted for any purpose, or as a visitor, within the premises appropriated to the purposes of the said College: In making this restriction I do not mean to cast any reflection upon any sect or person whatever; but, as there is such a multitude of sects, and such diversity of opinion among them, I desire to keep the tender minds of the orphans, who are to derive advantage from this bequest, free from the excitements, which clashing doctrines and sectarian controversy are apt to produce; my desire is, that all the instructors and teachers in the College shall take pains to instil into the minds of the scholars the purest principles of morality, so that on their entrance into active life, they may, from inclination and habit, evince benevolence toward their fellow-creatures, and a love of truth, sobriety and industry, adopting at the same time such religious tenets as their matured reason may enable them to prefer.

How came it to pass, the thoughtful reader of the foregoing extraordinary provision will naturally inquire, that this child of Catholic parents committed in his old age so cruel an act of injustice toward the thousands of orphans who would enter Girard College as to deprive them, during the most impressionable period of their lives, of all religious training whatever? A little light is thrown on the problem by a perusal of the recently published two-volume work, "The Life and Times of Stephen Girard, Mariner and Merchant" (Lippincott), written by John Bach McMaster, Professor of American History, University of Pennsylvania. Though the voluminous and, for the most part uninteresting, letters that chiefly make up the biography do not reward the patient reader with nearly as much information as could be desired regarding the intellectual and moral character of Girard College's founder, still among the dry details of his transactions in cotton or real estate and the prosy instructions to his European agents, a few lines occasionally appear which indicate what sort of man Stephen Girard was.

He Lacked the Natural Touch

THE biography has little to tell about his early life. We find him at the age of fourteen making his first voyage with his father who was a sea-captain, and he was in command of his own ship by 1773. Three years later Girard became a citizen of Pennsylvania, and soon began to lay the foundation of his large fortune. In 1814 he was so rich that he subscribed for almost the entire amount of the Government war loan of $5,000,000, and his ships were on every sea. His cruel treatment of a servant who ran away from him, and the heartless way he refused to help his brother's indigent family would seem to indicate that he lacked the natural touch. Unlike most Frenchmen, he was "perfectly indifferent" to the land of his birth. It must be said, however, that when yellow fever scourges visited Philadelphia we find Girard devoting himself courageously to relief work. He died in 1831 and was buried first in the Catholic cemetery of Holy Trinity Church, but twenty years later his remains were placed, with elaborate Masonic ceremonies, in the college he founded.

Infidel Influences

THE fact that he was fond of naming his ships after prominent French atheists appears to show that Rousseau, Voltaire, Helvetius, etc., were his favorite authors. It would be interesting to learn how far they were responsible for the clause in Girard's will which excludes clergymen from his orphanage. Daniel Webster was of the opinion that the influence of "Tom" Paine and Constantin Volney, whom Girard must have known personally, also had considerable to do with the insertion of the clause in question, which Webster characterized as a mark of "sheer, ribald, low, vulgar, deism and infidelity." In the famous speech he made, beginning February 10, 1844, before the Supreme Court of the United States, in behalf of Girard's heirs, who tried to break the will, Mr. Webster called the excluding provision the "most opprobrious, the most insulting and unmerited stigma that ever was cast or attempted to be cast upon the preachers of Christianity . . . in the history of the country." The orator based his argument chiefly on the contention that Girard's gift to Philadelphia was not really a "charity" at all, because "a school for the instruction of the young which sedulously and reproachfully excludes Christian knowledge is no charity either in principle or authority." Webster concluded his plea with the words:

> In my opinion, if Mr. Girard had given years to the study of a mode by which he could dispose of his vast fortune so that no good could arise to the general cause of charity—no good to the general cause of learning—no good to human society—and that which would be most productive of protracted struggles, troubles and difficulties in the popular councils of a great city, he could not so effectually have attained this result as he has by this device.

All of Webster's eloquence and arguments, however, failed to win the case, for Chief Justice Story decided that the clause in question is quite constitutional and that Girard's heirs could not break his will. Consequently up to this day no clergyman has ever set foot within the walls of Girard College.

The Provision's Practical Results

FROM the excluding clause quoted above it is quite clear that Stephen Girard did not want the orphans he sheltered brought up Christians. The directors of the institution took care, however, that from the beginning the laymen on the faculty of the College should conduct "unsectarian" religious services for the boys. According to the "Rules for the Government of the College" adopted by its board, February 15, 1848: "The prayers and hymns or psalms to be used in these [religious] services . . . shall be so framed as to form a full and appropriate service without sectarianism but calculated to arouse and preserve true devotion and piety in the mind," and subsequently a book of hymns and prayers was printed for the use of the orphans. A booklet entitled "Girard College and its Founder," dated Philadelphia, 1917, and presented to applicants by the Board of Directors of City Trusts, remarks under the caption, "Religious Teaching": "No conception of the work of the College is more false than that the institution is irreligious or non-religious." For > the first book brought to Girard College was the Bible, and the Bible has always had a foremost place in the teachings of the institution. The difference between Girard College and most other institutions is that religious instruction at Girard College has been given by laymen, and not by ecclesiastics. No meal is eaten in the institution without the invoking of the Divine blessing. The assembling of the College for chapel service, of which a part invariably is Scripture reading and prayer, is a daily practice. On Sunday two chapel services are held, and at these services addresses are delivered either by some member of the official staff of the College or by a visiting layman.

So Stephen Girard's "philosophical morality," colored and modified a little by a vague, undogmatic sort of Protestantism would seem to be the only spiritual food the orphans of the institution are accustomed to receive from the age of six to eighteen, the most impressionable period of their lives. The founder of Girard College was willing indeed that the boys on graduating would "adopt such religious tenets as their matured reason may enable them to prefer." But it would be interesting to learn how many of the orphans who leave the institution have remaining any faith whatever in revealed religion.

What Becomes of a Catholic's Faith?

THERE are now about 1,540 boys in Girard College and since the institution was founded in 1848 some 9,000 orphans, it is computed, have been educated there. How many of them were the baptized children of Catholic parents? It is hard to say. In the "Report and Catalogue of Girard College" for the year 1891 there are a number of boys bearing such suspiciously Catholic names as Corcoran, Devlin, Gaffney, Dolan, Kelly, etc. During the seventy years of the institution's existence several hundred Catholic orphans were doubtless committed to the institution by their lukewarm relatives or by the courts, and they now swell the ranks of the "should be's" that live in Pennsylvania. A number of the Catholic boys who entered Girard College, it must also be remembered, died there before graduation without a priest and without the Last Sacraments, for according to the founder's will "No ecclesiastic . . . shall . . . ever be admitted for any purpose, or as a visitor" into the college.

One is loath to believe that there are Catholics in Pennsylvania today so blind as not to see what a menace Girard College must be to the faith of the Catholic orphans bound over to that institution's directors to be "educated." For what chance of surviving has the faith of a boy who loses one or both of his Catholic parents early in life and is then committed, until the age of eighteen, to an institution within whose walls no instruction in his religion is permitted, where Holy Mass is never celebrated and where a priest is never allowed to set his foot?

WALTER DWIGHT, S.J.

SOCIOLOGY

A Social Mission to Protestants

A TREMENDOUS opportunity for Catholic workers is pointed out by Cardinal Bourne in his remarkable pastoral on Catholics and Social Reform. "If we review," says his Eminence, "the main principles of Catholic social teaching, we shall observe how many of the utterances of 'modern unrest' are merely exaggerated or confused statements of those very principles; and since, as has been truly said, 'the Catholic Church is not afraid of enthusiasm,' we should not find it hard to put before the most ardent their own ideals, in a more coherent and satisfying form than they could do it for themselves."

No one who has been in association with the more earnest-minded of our separated brethren can doubt that what the Cardinal says is profoundly true and important. It applies to social questions, but not to them alone. It applies to international and all questions that have a moral bearing; and it applies to purely religious questions, to the fundamentals of Christianity. It used to be my fortune to attend inter-denominational conferences on social work. All except a handful of the people at those conferences were Protestants, but they were all earnest Christians. Most of the things said at the conferences were excellent and, indeed, fundamentally Catholic. But it was a most noticeable thing that these good people were sentimental, rather than intellectual. The favorite formula with which they would begin their expressions of opinion was, "I'm sure we all feel that," and so on.

IT was with them a matter of feeling, of instinct, rather than of reasoned principles. They would be enthusiastic about the living wage, but they could not themselves have based it on the bed-rock of natural law as Leo XIII did. They would have been indignant with the "profiteering" that the war has shown to be so shocking, but they would not have known the constructive doctrine of the just price that medieval thinkers stated so precisely. A score of similar examples might be given. The Catholic tradition of logic, of definiteness, of striving after clarity, of arguing from principles, gives us the power of putting these "feelings" and "instincts" of Protestants into intellectual form. We can express for Protestants their own principles better than they can do it for themselves, provided always we are ourselves not too absolute, and that we try to understand them.

Yet it is a curious fact that because Catholics hold truths intellectually rather than sentimentally, they often realize less of their force. There is a wealth of sociology in every seminarian's course of ethics, and even in the catechism, but how few are aware of it! How few can translate the technical terms of theology into the language of the newspapers! The great majority of the most successful modern Catholic writers in the English language have been converts. Some of the best lives of saints, have been written by Protestants. We Catholics learn old truths in an old way, and we do not discover their perennial newness. That is why it so often happens that converts see more in Catholic truth, when once they meet it, than "born" Catholics have ever seen, and thus the converts excel in interpretative power. If we Catholics made a greater and more sympathetic attempt to understand the difficulties of Protestants, we should get a better appreciation of our own solutions.

The Need for Social Studies

I HAVE said that Protestants are often Catholic without knowing it. It is unfortunately true, also, that they are sometimes un-Christian without knowing it. Because they lose grip of the intellectual principles fundamental to the Christian view of life, they uncomprehendingly endorse proposals that are incompatible with Christianity. For examples of this we might refer to the eugenistic proposals, involving the denial of human rights to "the unfit," which have been so widely accepted in theory, by non-Catholics, and even put into practice. It is the lack of grip on intellectual principles that betrays Protestants into these lapses into paganism. Sentiment is dominant among Protestants, especially the most earnest Protestants, and even though their sentiments be largely right, they are prone to indefiniteness, exaggeration and inconsistencies. The insistence upon precision of statement, logical reasoning, and consistency of action with principles, which distinguishes Catholic thought, is just what is needed to correct the vagaries of social movements guided chiefly by mere philanthropic impulse.

It is part of the missionary task, which Catholics should perform for Protestants, to do this work of social enlightenment. We should be anxious to advocate and defend such Catholic doctrines as the living wage, the rights and duties of property, the dignity of poverty, and the sacredness of the individual, as well as the more purely theological doctrines which divide us from Protestants. The preaching of Catholic ideals of social life is part of the teaching of Catholic truth. It is indeed a missionary task. In the words of Cardinal Bourne:

> Understanding all these [social] truths as parts of one Christian scheme of life, may we not hope that the people of this country will come to have a new conception of what Christianity means? Finding a guide whom they can trust in the complex social problems of today, will they not examine the claims of the Catholic Church to guide them in those religious perplexities which, under the pressure of war, they are begining to feel?

It is for Catholics to fit themselves by social study for the delivery of that social message which must have such great religious value in our day.

HENRY SOMERVILLE.

NOTE AND COMMENT

New College at Marymount

THERE has been a constant growth in the development of higher education for our Catholic girls. The Church in past centuries has never neglected the educational as well as the spiritual welfare of women and today we find her no less eager to provide whatever can contribute to the safety and dignity of woman. The latest accession to her educational facilities for our Catholic girls is the opening of a new college by the Religious of the Sacred Heart of Mary at Marymount, Tarrytown-on-Hudson, N. Y. A gift of twenty acres, with Italian gardens and three handsome buildings, on the Castle Ridge section of Tarrytown, recently made by Mr. James Butler, has rendered possible this latest development. The new curricula are to include a two-year finishing course for high-school graduates and a four-year course leading to degrees. Reference was made in the past year to the establishment at Marymount of new courses in social science, the recent additions will now crown the educational efforts of the Religious of the Sacred Heart of Mary in the United States.

Archbishop Messmer Legislates Against Prohibition Movement

IN a strong and timely pastoral letter, Archbishop Messmer points out the insidious dangers of the Prohibition movement and the false principles underlying it. The movement is now serving as a mask for some enemies of the Church, who have confessed, explicitly or implicitly, that they are aiming at the Mass.

> It becomes more evident from day to day that there is a strong sectarian power back of the present Prohibition movement. We may not deny that many Catholics, priests among them, are actuated by good motives and acting in good faith in this matter, but they fail to see the absolutely false principle underlying the movement and the sinister work of the enemies of the Catholic Church trying to profit by this opportunity of attacking her in the most sacred mystery intrusted to her.
> For these reasons I hereby positively forbid all pastors of parishes in this archdiocese to allow any Prohibition speeches to be given on any premises, be it the church, the school, or a hall. On the other hand, this is a most opportune time to preach on the Catholic virtue of temperance, exhorting every one to practise true moderation in eating and drinking and even total abstinence from intoxicating drinks. Prohibition is in no sense moderation, yet this is the true meaning of the cardinal virtue of temperance.

It is well that while Catholics unite to attack the bigotry and intemperance of the Prohibition movement, its false principles and its undemocratic character, they should also effectively combat the evil of intoxication both by insisting upon the virtue of temperance itself and by promoting sane and practical legislation that will prove a real remedy against the evils we all deplore.

The Case of the Texan Stockmen

A PITIFUL tale comes to us in a letter from Texas telling of the distress upon the cattle ranches. A dry spring followed upon the drought of last year and completely exhausted the resources of the "uncomplaining" stockmen of the West.

> Stockmen have had to pay for high-priced feed all the winter and in spring were forced to borrow all that the banks would lend them. If we can get general rains, financial aspects will be better. The stockmen in this dry section should be given some assistance by the Government. If this is denied them, thousands of head of cattle will die of starvation. Their owners can borrow no money to buy high-priced feed and have no means to move them to grassy pastures in States where rain has fallen. Cattle that do not die must be sold, whether marketable or not. It means the destocking of the entire western country, which would imply a serious loss in food-production. The banks and cattle-loan companies have stood nobly by the stockmen and have lent them every dollar they could risk. Should the cattle be thrown on the market in their present starved condition it is doubtful whether they would bring sufficient returns to repay the banks. If the stockmen could have their loans extended and could borrow a little money to feed their stock during the drought or to remove them to grass they could "make it through" all right.

This is a patent instance of the need of Government assistance upon the ranch as on the farm, or better still, of the need of a cooperative credit system whereby the stockman, as well as the farmer, can help himself, relying upon Government aid to whatever extent this may become necessary. The welfare of the entire country demands that both ranch and farm should be wisely protected and saved from distress.

Qualifications for Women's Parliamentary Vote

THE peculiarity of the qualification required for a Parliamentary vote in England is well illustrated in the following regulations for the new women voters as presented by Isabel Willis in the London Catholic Times:

> (1) A woman, whether married or single, can have a vote in her own right if she occupies either as owner or tenant any land or premises, or dwelling house (such as a flat). (2) If she occupies a room, or rooms, as a lodger, provided she furnishes them herself. (3) If she inhabits a dwelling-house or rooms in a dwelling-house, by reason of her employment, provided it is not inhabited by her employer. This would qualify an office caretaker, for example, but not a domestic servant. (4) If she has received a degree other than honorary at any university in the United Kingdom. In the case of Oxford and Cambridge, which at present do not grant degrees to women, she is also qualified to vote if she has passed the final examination, and resided the number of terms required of a man (nine terms).

Though a married woman have none of these qualifications, she can claim to be registered and to vote if her husband has any of the necessary qualifications. The wife of a university graduate, however, cannot vote in virtue of her husband's degree. Further regulations are made for women in naval or military service and for "joint occupation." Thus two joint occupants of a dwelling-house may qualify, but not more than two. In the case of several persons living together two can qualify as joint occupants, while the others might do so as lodgers, by paying £5 yearly to the head of the house and supplying their own furniture.

Chronicle

The War.—In the French sectors as well as on the various sectors held by the British and American troops on the western battle front stubborn fighting was kept up during the week. West and southwest of Soissons, in Champagne, the French repelled heavy German attacks directed against the Chézy-Vinly railroad between Passy-en-Valois and Vinly. Here they took 200 prisoners. They followed up this success by the capture of the village of St. Pierre Aigle. They then shifted their attacks to a point seven miles northwest of Soissons, and in a night assault north of Moulin-sous-Toutvent, on the front between the Oise and the Aisne, they captured German positions on a front of about two miles, penetrating to the depth of half a mile. Attacking again on a front of a mile and a quarter in the neighborhood of Autréches, northwest of Soissons, they pushed into the enemy's territory for another half-mile, and later on made further gains between Autréches and Moulin-sous-Toutvent.

Bulletin, July 1, p.m.-July 8, a.m.

Northwest of Château-Thierry the Americans drove forward on a two-mile front greatly strengthening their lines, taking Rochets Woods and the village of Vaux and capturing 500 prisoners. They held their gains against heavy counter-attacks. The following day in co-operation with the Australians, American detachments helped in an important local attack south of the Somme, in which the Allied troops after furious fighting, gained possession of the woods of Vaire and Hamel, as well as of the village of Hamel. In conjunction with this operation, another attack of Australian troops east of Ville-sur-Ancre was successful and the Allied line advanced 500 yards on a front of 1,200 yards. In the Ypres and Albert sectors there was heavy fighting, but the positions on that front were not materially changed.

The Italians continuing their advance on the Asiago captured the commanding heights of Col del Rosso and took 2,000 prisoners. They also won important positions on Col di Chelo, and two determined attacks of the Austrians to retake Monte di Val Bella were beaten off. At the head of the San Lorenzo Valley, in the Monte Grappa region, they further consolidated the strong positions which they had previously taken. On Sunday, July 7, Vienna admitted the loss of the west bank of the Piave; from this it is clear that the week ended without detriment to the Italians.

The British hospital ship Llandovery Castle was torpedoed and sunk seventy miles from the Irish coast. Over 200 lives were lost. The American army transport Covington, formerly the Hamburg-American liner Cincinnati, while en route from a French port to the United States without passengers or troops, was also torpedoed and sunk. The loss of life was comparatively small.

In his Independence Day address, at Mount Vernon, the home of the first President of the United States, President Wilson again outlined the ideals of the American people, the purposes for which they were at war and the conditions under which they would make peace. The address is considered by the entire press of the country one of the ablest which the President ever made. In addition to the throng of citizens present many members of the Diplomatic Corps and prominent officials listened to the address. It is as follows:

The President's Mount Vernon Address

Gentlemen of the Diplomatic Corps and My Fellow-Citizens: I am happy to draw apart with you to this quiet place of old counsel in order to speak a little of the meaning of this day of our nation's independence. The place seems very still and remote. It is as serene and untouched by the hurry of the world as it was in those great days long ago when General Washington was here and held leisurely conference with the men who were to be associated with him in the creation of a nation. From these gentle slopes they looked out upon the world and saw it whole, saw it with the light of the future upon it, saw it with modern eyes that turned away from a past which men of liberated spirit could no longer endure. It is for that reason that we cannot feel, even here, in the immediate presence of this sacred tomb, that this is a place of death. It was a place of achievement. A great promise that was meant for all mankind was here given plan and reality. The associations by which we are here surrounded are the inspiriting associations of that noble death which is only a glorious consummation. From this green hillside we also ought to be able to see with comprehending eyes the world that lies around us and conceive anew the purpose that must set men free.

It is significant—significant of their own character and purpose and of the influences they were setting afoot—that Washington and his associates, like the Barons at Runnymede, spoke and acted, not for a class, but for a people. It has been left for us to see to it that it shall be understood that they spoke and acted, not for a single people only, but for all mankind. They were thinking not of themselves and of the material interests which centered in the little group of landholders and merchants and men of affairs with whom they were accustomed to act, in Virginia and the colonies to the north and south of her, but of a people which wished to be done with classes and special interests and the authority of men whom they had not themselves chosen to rule over them. They entertained no private purpose, desired no peculiar privilege. They were consciously planning that men of every class should be free and America a place to which men out of every nation might resort who wished to share with them the rights and privileges of free men. And we take our cue from them—do we not? We intend what they intended. We here in America believe our participation in this present war to be only the fruitage of what they planted. Our case differs from theirs only in this, that it is our inestimable privilege to concert with men out of every nation who shall make not only the liberties of America secure but the liberties of every other people as well. We are happy in the thought that we are permitted to do what they would have done had they been in our place. There must now be settled, once for all, what was settled for America in the great age upon whose inspiration we draw today. This is surely a fitting place from which calmly to look out upon our task, that we may fortify our spirits for its accomplishment. And this is the appropriate place from which to avow, alike to the friends who look on and to the friends with whom we have the happiness to be associated in action, the faith and purposes with which we act.

This, then, is our conception of the great struggle in which we are engaged. The plot is written plain upon every scene and every act of the supreme tragedy. On the one hand stand the peoples of the world—not only the peoples actually engaged, but many others, also, who suffer under mastery but cannot act; peoples of many races and in every part of the world—the people of stricken Russia still, among the rest, though they are for the moment unorganized and helpless. Opposed to them, masters of many armies, stand an isolated, friendless group of Governments, who speak no common purpose, but only selfish ambitions of their own, by which none can profit but themselves, and whose peoples are fuel in their hands; Governments which fear their people, and yet are for the time being sovereign lords, making every choice for them and disposing of their lives and fortunes as they will, as well as of the lives and fortunes of every people who fall under their power—Governments clothed with the strange trappings and the primitive authority of an age that is altogether alien and hostile to our own. The past and the present are in deadly grapple, and the peoples of the world are being done to death between them.

There can be but one issue. The settlement must be final. There can be no compromise. No halfway decisions would be tolerable. No halfway decision is conceivable. These are the ends for which the associated peoples of the world are fighting and which must be conceded them before there can be peace: I.—The destruction of every arbitrary power anywhere that can separately, secretly, and of its single choice disturb the peace of the world; or, if it cannot be presently destroyed, at the least its reduction to virtual impotence. II.—The settlement of every question, whether of territory, of sovereignty, of economic arrangement, or of political relationship, upon the basis of the free acceptance of that settlement by the people immediately concerned, and not upon the basis of the material interest or advantage of any other nation or people which may desire a different settlement for the sake of its own exterior influence or mastery. III.—The consent of all nations to be governed in their conduct toward each other by the same principles of honor and of respect for the common law of civilized society that govern the individual citizens of all modern States in their relations with one another; to the end that all promises and covenants may be sacredly observed, no private plots or conspiracies hatched, no selfish injuries wrought with impunity, and a mutual trust established upon the handsome foundation of a mutual respect for right. IV.—The establishment of an organization of peace which shall make it certain that the combined power of free nations will check every invasion of right and serve to make peace and justice the more secure by affording a definite tribunal of opinion to which all must submit and by which every international readjustment that cannot be amicably agreed upon by the peoples directly concerned shall be sanctioned.

These great objects can be put into a single sentence. What we seek is the reign of law, based upon the consent of the governed and sustained by the organized opinion of mankind.

These great ends cannot be achieved by debating and seeking to reconcile and accommodate what statesmen may wish with their projects for balances of power and of national opportunity. They can be realized only by the determination of what the thinking peoples of the world desire, with their longing hope for justice and for social freedom and opportunity.

I can fancy that the air of this place carries the accents of such principles with a peculiar kindness. Here were started forces which the great nation against which they were primarily directed at first regarded as a revolt against its rightful authority, but which it has long since seen to have been a step in the liberation of its own people as well as of the people of the United States; and I stand here now to speak—speak proudly and with confident hope—of the spread of this revolt, this liberation, to the great stage of the world itself! The blinded rulers of Prussia have roused forces they knew little of—forces which, once roused, can never be crushed to earth again; for they have at their heart an inspiration and a purpose which are deathless and of the very stuff of triumph.

Independence Day in England and France

In England Independence Day was celebrated with the honors and enthusiasm of a national holiday. Speaking at a British and American fellowship meeting in London, Viscount Bryce said among other things:

For many a year today was celebrated in the United States with hostility and defiance. By us in Britain it was remembered with sorrow as marking the severance of precious ties. And now, after 142 years, it is being celebrated by both peoples with like enthusiasm—by the children of those who revolted against the British Crown, as by the children of those who sadly admitted the loss of one of that Crown's choicest jewels.

What has been a day of anger on one side and grief on the other has become for both a day of affection and rejoicing.

If some political connection had been preserved, the War of 1812, an unmixed evil for both nations, would have been avoided, and though the colonies would have become practically self-governing, like Canada, the mediation of the mother country probably would have averted the war of secession and assured the peaceable extinction of slavery.

On the other hand it may have been well for us and the world that no State so powerful as Great Britain and America united would have been should have grown up. A State so immensely strong might have been led into aggression and injustice by thirst for world dominion—a passion whose fatal consequences we see in the moral degradation of Prussianized Germany.

Englishmen, he continued, scarcely realized the new departure which America took when she entered the war. But, he said, when America saw every principle of right overridden, every sentiment of humanity cast to the winds, the country strode forth in her strength. Duty called on her to save the world and she answered the call of duty.

In Paris all official life took part in the celebration. In one of the most remarkable addresses of the day, Captain André Tardieu, the French High Commissioner to the United States, said that France was celebrating not only a Franco-American festival but one of all the Allied peoples united in the defense of liberty. He then outlined the results of America's efforts to further that cause. In doing so he gave the following interesting data:

> First of all, the German submarines have been beaten. We have destroyed nearly two-thirds of all the U-boats Germany has built during these four years. We are sinking each month more than she is able to build each month. We are building more ships than the Germans can sink. Out of the million Americans brought to France during the year fewer than 300 were victims of torpedoes.
> In thirteen months the United States has increased her army from 200,000 to 2,500,000. Her merchant fleet has been increased from 2,000,000 to 5,000,000 tons, a figure which will be doubled next year.
> America, which never before has lent money to foreign Governments, has advanced more than 35,000,000,000 francs to her Allies, and although she lived a century without a public debt, she now has contracted one of more than 60,000,000,000 francs in the defense of right. All that the war has demanded America has accepted; all that it has represented she has understood, and all that is required for victory she has given.

Finally, he stated, notwithstanding local successes, the German offensives had failed, for neither the Channel ports nor Paris, the objects of their drives, had fallen into their hands.

France.—The La Bazoche-Gouët correspondent of the Nogentais, of the department of Eure-et-Loir, states that the American Red Cross has decided to give free meals to the school children who live in hamlets at some distance from the communes and to the little refugees. To facilitate the project lists were asked from both the free schools and the public schools; but at the last moment the sous-préfet informed the mayors that "the public school children would be the only ones to partake of the meals, barring other instruction." La Croix calls this order monstrous and begs the Minister of the Interior to order an investigation of the matter; it declares that this exclusion of children who do not attend the public schools will put a complete stop to American contributions, for contributors in the United States, both Catholics and Protestants, give without distinction and will not be a party to such contemptible and barbarous measures.

The Red Cross

One of the indirect effects of the war is the scarcity of teachers for Catholic schools. In contrast with the teachers of the public schools, who are well paid by the Government, the teachers of the Catholic schools receive scarcely a living wage. Diocesan authorities have endeavored to meet the difficulty, but the absence of any assistance from the State, and the tremendous drain on their resources for the maintenance of hospitals, works of charity, religious worship, and other pressing needs combine to render their efforts to a large extent ineffective. Catholics, and especially young women, are making heroic sacrifices to carry on the apostolic work of instructing the young, but their apostolate, difficult at all times, has been made very precarious by the increased cost of living. Other occupations, which demand practically no intellectual equipment, are far more remunerative; the consequence has been that many of the teachers have found themselves obliged to give up teaching for posts which provide the means of a decent livelihood. The situation is causing serious anxiety.

Danger to Catholic Schools

Ireland.—On July 4 the Dublin Gazette published an official proclamation which declared Sinn Fein, the Irish Volunteers and the Gaelic League dangerous organizations, on that ground that the associations encourage and aid persons to commit crimes, promote, and excite to, acts of violence, and interfere with the administration of the law. The next day, July 5, the police of the counties of Galway, Roscommon and Kings raided farmhouses, in search of arms. Meantime the women of Ireland continued the street processions and signed pledges not to replace any men taken from employment by draft.

Ban on Irish Societies

Just at the time this agitation was greatest a group of prominent Irish people submitted a proposal to the Mansion House Conference with a view to having Irish claims to self-determination referred to an impartial international tribunal. The document states:

A Unique Proposal

> The cause to be submitted can be stated in a sentence: Shall the economic, social, political life of a nation, weakened by long oppression, lie, as some pawn or chattel, at the uncontrolled disposition of an alien nation militarily strong? The ultimate value to humanity of America's protestations can be definitely tested by the case of Ireland. Furthermore, England, to be consistent, should not forbid this appeal. No country which supports or connives at the delay or defeat of it can hereafter figure in history as an advocate of international morality, still less as an apostle of human liberty. The prompt recognition by America and the neutral powers of Ireland's claim to exercise a nation's right to self-determination will inspire trust in all the friends of democracy everywhere that the era of settling disputes between nations by reason and arbitration is in sight. Failure before such a tribunal as is here indicated will not preclude a reference of our claims to the decision of whatever court shall later settle the map of Europe. A decision in our favor will establish a right to participate in such a congress of Europe as a nation among the nations. By consenting to make a test case of our national claim to self-determination, we may add another glory to the record of Ireland in providing a precedent by which international reason instead of war may decide international contests. Even to submit the case thus will point a way to end the war. If this suggestion obtain your approbation, a reasoned statement of Ireland's position could be prepared by you, or under your direction, for submission abroad.

After full debate the American Federation of Labor in session in St. Paul, Minn., unanimously passed the following resolutions:

Resolutions of the A. F. L.

Whereas, Our country with the Allies is engaged in a war, the declared purpose of which is the principle of democracy, liberty, justice and equality, and the rights of the peoples of all countries and nations to determine and choose for themselves a system and method of government, which will insure to them the greatest degree of liberty and justice; and

Whereas, The labor movement of our country has loyally supported our Government in the present war for the purpose of making the world safe for democracy, self-government and justice; and

Whereas, The inhabitants of Ireland, a great liberty-loving people with distinct nationality and country, have been contending for generations against oppression and objectionable forms of government forced upon them, without their consent; therefore be it

Resolved, That this convention endorse the war principles as expressed by President Wilson, as follows: "A general association of nations must be formed under specific covenants for the purpose of affording mutual guarantees of political independence and territorial integrity to great and small States alike." And also "A league of the free peoples of the world in a common covenant for genuine and practical cooperation to secure justice and therefore peace in relations between nations," and "The recognition of the rights of smaller nations," also our declaration as follows: Recognition of the rights of small nations and of the principle, "No people must be forced under a sovereignty under which it does not wish to live," and, moreover, that we reindorse and reaffirm our oft-repeated declaration in favor of the freest kind of government for Ireland and for all liberty-loving nations; and be it further

Resolved, That the American Federation of Labor do, and hereby pledges itself to the people of Ireland and to all small nations to the support of the principles herein set forth and instructs the executive council to urge upon the President and the Congress of the United States the duty of making these declarations cardinal principles as the basis upon which we shall enter into final peace treaties which are to be signed after a triumphant victory for our cause and the cause of our Allies has been achieved.

Russia.—The questions of Allied intervention in Russia has been further complicated by the report that a Czecho-Slovak army has seized the Siberian coast-city of Vladivostok. Last year the Russian army made a drive into Austria and took more than 100,000 Czecho-Slovaks willing prisoners of war, for they were tired of fighting for the Central Powers. Subsequently an arrangement was made with the Bolsheviki which allowed the "prisoners," fully equipped, to march through Russia to a Siberian port with a view to reaching France eventually and taking a place on the Allied front. But it appears that the Bolsheviki, through the influence of German intrigues, broke their agreement and began to harass the advancing column. The latest intelligence is that a large body of Czecho-Slovaks have taken the port of Vladivostok in self-defense and now hold it against the Bolsheviki, and that they are also in possession of some 1,300 miles of the Trans-Siberian Railway. Another Czecho-Slovak force, it is reported, has defeated a Bolshevist army in the vicinity of Irkutsk. The taking of Vladivostok has caused considerable excitement in diplomatic circles, for many statesmen maintain that since what is practically an Allied army holds an important Siberian port, they should be at once reinforced and a military movement westward begun.

Czecho-Slovaks Take Vladivostok

The "Intelligentsiya," or the Liberal educated class of Russia, have been declared counter-revolutionists and monachists by the Bolsheviki and consequently must be destroyed. By being deprived of their property, the theory is, the educated middle classes will merge with the working men and thus lose their desire for counter-revolution. The propertied classes, according to the New York Evening Post, are rapidly disappearing from Russia. The Volya Naroda, a Social Revolutionary paper, says of a group of towns in the Black Earth belt:

Exterminating the "Intelligents"

Proletarianisation is proceeding in a way that seems a parody of Socialism, by equal misery for all. There is no trade; there are no manufactures, except in factories forcibly reopened by the Soviets, which close again immediately, and all professional or scholastic occupations are checked or stopped. Bourgeois houses are commandeered; what food there is is rationed on the principle equal hunger for all, and clothing is so worn out that all men and women seem in the same stage of beggary.

Saratoff and Simbirsk are full of lawyers, newspaper-writers and traders, who are starving. One sees in the streets extraordinary types; old men in tattered frock-coats and bark shoes, and ex-officers in uniform trousers and peasant sheepskin "tulups," without headgear. Many of them beg. The servant-maids stay without wages, or sometimes with wages but without food, in the houses of their old masters. They have no food, because the local Soviet authorities give them the alternative of ceasing to serve or doing without their rations. . . . The suicides in both towns and on estates have increased fivefold; and nearly all the victims are mature men of the former professional and trading classes.

Every educated person, for that very reason, now seems to be a suspect in Russia. Schools are being closed everywhere either because they teach nothing of value to "the Socialist State" or because they are without the means of support. The Novi Viek says: "If in the towns the schools are being abolished by the Bolsheviki, who treat the teachers as lackeys, the village schools are being destroyed by our 'dark' people."

Meanwhile the slaughter of the Intelligentsiya is continuing on a large scale. The murders are committed by soldiers and workmen and in some towns indiscriminate massacres take place. In Rostoff, for example, everyone who wore a student's uniform was butchered by the Red Guards. "The conquerors marched in mobs from apartment to apartment, seized suspects, stood them against walls and shot them." Even children were not spared, though their parents begged to be killed instead. The Bolshevist Government's "Commission for Combating Counter-Revolution" is responsible for all these horrors, for it allows the soldiers to arrest and execute all suspects. Six students were murdered in Petrograd, and thirty Intelligents of Moscow merely on suspicion of being "counter-revolutionaries."

Pagan Religions of the East

NEIL BOYTON, S. J.

GOD alone knows how many men there are on the continent of Asia. It is the ant-hill of the world; teeming, swarming millions. A fraction of one per cent of these know Our Lord; the ninety and nine bend the knee to graven images.

The thought strikes one in these pagan lands that near the root of all these false religions is terrorism. It is a perverse application of the Scriptural "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of all wisdom." In our churches we show Our Lord, Our Lady and the Saints as pleasant-faced, benign, at peace. The little child and the repentant sinner will trustfully approach the image of Our Lord showing His Sacred Heart. Fear is not the element He uses to attract. Our statues show the Blessed Ones of Heaven in repose and it is this attitude that draws us to follow in their footsteps.

But in the Asian lands beyond the Fold, this element is characteristically absent. The gods that are carved in Oriental temples and Oriental groves, have not faces that you would care to see suddenly after dark. It takes all the assurance of the noon-day sun to look them unflinchingly in the eye. The artist seems to have striven all too successfully to depict in the idol's countenance those baser passions we Christians try to keep in the background.

The Daibutsu, or Great Buddha, at Kamakura, near Yokohama, is the only idol on whose massive countenance—the statute is over fifty feet in height—you see something of that expression of a soul at peace. And yet even here, studying the half-closed eyes of this meditating god the thought comes irresistibly that Buddha's thoughts do not flow cleanly. On the veiled face there is the suggestion of a sinister sneer; as though he were musing: "You fools, that worship me."

But if this huge, lone Buddha may be said to appear calm, there are myriads of other idols of the East whose very looks betray the falseness of their tenets. Not homely are they, but hideous, like the faces of men who have died suddenly and in mortal agony. Today our American cartoonists seem to be engaged in a rather futile struggle to see whose pen can depict more evil passions in the face of the Kaiser. This American concept of the features of the War Lord is the composite of the faces of the idols, that stick in your memory, coming out of the East.

These thousand and one usurpers of the true God—for the names of god in the Orient are countless—unite in this common object. They strike terror into the hearts of deluded millions, who are born and grow up and die, knowing not the peace that we possess as a birthright.

What must be the last thoughts of these poor pagans, when the lights of this world grow dim, and they are preparing to make the great change? They have served in fear, trying to appease these devil deities, and they must die, alien to that death-bed peace of the expiring Christian. An Indian missioner gave this terroristic tendency as the cause of so much suicide in the Asian countries.

Another characteristic of these religions of Japan, China, and India, is the striking absence of that decorum we associate with religious observance. We stretch "hospital zones"—"All Unnecessary Noises Prohibited"—around the neighborhood of our ecclesiastical edifices. They set up street shows and discordant "jazz"-bands. So it is that an American on his first approach to a popular temple is strongly reminded of revival time among our colored brethren, plus Coney Island on a blue August afternoon.

A common plan of shrine is to place the idol's throne on the top of a graded hill. Many steps will lead up, and on either side of this "Pike" will be the stands of concessionaires. You would expect cane racks, knife boards, ball games, and "nigger dodgers," and while these, as such, are absent, you find their equivalent. Tiny stands abound, and here "spielers" offer, with all their Western brothers' persistency, toys, fortunes, knicknacks, notions, cakes, native sweets, and rings or bracelets for different parts of the human anatomy. Even open-air shows are giving a continuous performance. Cymbals and tomtoms and maddening wind instruments struggle together, till the memory of a circus band sounds sweetly Verdian.

Usually this Elks Carnival road, that is always on rented temple property, continues to within a hundred feet of the temple proper. Here it will broaden out into a park. Tables and benches will line it, where dry drinks, or wet, are served you by temple maidens. It is hot climbing that "Trail," and the liquids look cooling. And sitting there gazing down the long lane you see thousands toiling up the narrow temple road. Gay or lightly clad are these men and women and countless children "going to church." Strident is the composite note of music: shrill the pagan tongue. Kaleidoscopic the color changes: picturesque the vista. And you wonder where is the thought of God; even a substitute for Him.

Yet you turn your eyes to the squatting idol within the open temple porch. Red flags wave about him. Flowers are scattered or wreathed everywhere. And there in his immediate neighborhood only is a suspicion of Christian churchly silence. A few, compared to the mob assembled, are clapping their hands to attract the god's attention, and then salaaming before the coarse stone face. Fear, not love, compels this service. Short are their devotions, and they have turned back to the "Midway." You feel that their religion lies on their shoulders like an old man of the sea, not like the loving wings of Catholicism.

An almost tangible feeling of the evil one comes over you in certain temples. You step from God's sunshine into the temple court and, like the weight of a guilty conscience, you are enveloped and oppressed by the presence of something that is alien to the true God. By contrast you might express the feeling as the opposite of that you experience, when you enter a silent Catholic church at twilight and see the red lamp swinging ahead, and you genuflect, knowing you are in the presence of the Comforter. An instinctive sense of reverence and protection, a half-whispered, "My son, fear not; I am here," soothes the soul. You are at peace, like waters at evening.

Not so is it crossing the threshold of these pagan temples. The grinning, or scowling, or vicious face of a stone idol looks down on you, and you feel as though this solid face were a mask, and back of its thin surface some one watched. Easily you can picture, that in the shadows, the flickering lamp causes to sway above the god, there are other things; insolent, leering, brutal, essentially evil. You wish ardently that you had brought your traveling bottle of holy water, and you appreciate and hasten towards the outer sunshine.

The son of the American consul in an Indian city, after guiding a fellow-countryman through a neighboring shrine, expressed this emotion exactly, when he exclaimed: "Gee, that there pagan church always gives me the willies. Believe me, Sahib, that's no place for me to take me Guardian Angel!"

You wonder sometimes. Do not these Asian millions feel the same? Do not they realize they are getting a poor substitute for God? You ask this question of missionaries, who have to their credit loyal years of service, and they will tell you these people know Him not, for there was no one to tell them of the one and only true God.

I was in a tiny tram in Tokio with an American Jesuit and we were looking at the thousands on the Ginza, when this question came up, and I said: "I suppose not one in a thousand here knows of God." The missionary replied: "One in a thousand! One in a hundred thousand is nearer the mark. I doubt if the 99,999 have ever heard of Him."

Yet, when they have been told, when the shackles of centuries have been broken, they embrace this gift of faith and hold it as young Tarcicius held the Mysteries. There are just as glorious pages in the troubled history of Japanese, Chinese and Indian Catholicism as there are in Erin's Catholic history. Francis Xavier is their Patrick and one gets the conviction out in the East that "Father Francis' is today doing what all the world is doing, looking to open-handed America for assistance. His wants are kindred souls to carry the knowledge of life to these, his brown and yellow children, who once knowing the Gentle Master, would crowd about Him, like terror-stricken little ones.

May splendid America, having crushed the materialistic kultur that threatens Europe, lend a strong hand in humbling the spiritualistic kultur that insolently spreads a blight on God's Asia.

The French War Orphans' Schools

J. Harding Fisher, S.J.

THE fundamental reason for the anxiety experienced by Catholics concerning the French war orphans is connected with the matter of their education. Emphatically they do not wish them to attend the French public schools, which are militantly anti-Christian. It should not be difficult for Christian people to appreciate the weight of this objection.

True, according to Ambassador Jusserand, the French public schools "are of exactly the same sort as those in the United States." But, even if this statement were absolutely correct, it would furnish reason enough for Catholics to be on their guard against contributing money to send children to them. The fact is, however, that the French public schools are much more open to objection than our public schools. They are nothing less than schools of atheism, both in fact and by the deliberate intent of their founders and promoters. The words of M. Viviani, spoken on November 8, 1906, in the French Chamber of Deputies, and later placarded throughout France at the public expense and by order of Parliament, sufficiently express their purpose:

> All of us together, by our fathers, our elders, ourselves, have devoted ourselves in the past to a work of anti-clericalism, a work of irreligion. We have torn all religious belief from human consciences, we have extinguished in heaven the lights which it will never enkindle again. Such has been our work, our revolutionary work, and do you think that this work is finished? On the contrary, it is beginning, it is boiling up, it is overflowing. How are you going to respond, I ask you, to the child now grown to manhood, who has learned from your primary instruction—further completed, too, as it is, by the post-school works of the Republic—to contrast his own conscience with that of other men? How are you going to respond to the man who, thanks to us, is no longer a believer, whom we have deprived of his faith, whom we have told that Heaven is void of justice, when he seeks for justice here below?

These words were accepted as expressing his own "ideal" by M. Briand, at the time Minister of Instruction. He himself, on August 6 of the same year, had told the Ligue d'Enseignement, when addressing their Congress at Angers: "We wish for a country, and a Republic, liberated from all the lies and all the tyrannies of the creeds," and he went on to declare:

> It is the generations formed to the spirit of secularism, and the hopes of democracy, which have gone forth to the battle. The bullets fired at the reaction, which have strewn the battlefield with the bodies of its slain, were cast by the schoolmaster, and if the schoolmaster has been able to work so efficaciously for the benefit of republican institutions, it is because you [the Ligue d'Enseignement], you, the propagandists of secularism, have caused them to be free in their action and doings; it is because you, by your propagandism, by the works with which you have surrounded the schoolroom, and the moral support you have given this principle, have created for it this atmosphere of independence and liberty, without which it could not have lived, or at all events, could not have developed. . . . In this way they [the schoolmasters] will form the true man, the citizen of true democracy, the man whose brain is not obstructed by preoccupations concerning mysteries and dogmas.

It is to be borne distinctly in mind that this address was intended to inculcate an officially approved program in the schoolmasters in charge of the public schools. They were spoken boldly in the heart of a Catholic section of France, selected purposely for this impious proclamation.

Catholic parents were not slow to appreciate their meaning, and began to organize throughout France for the protection of their children. Less than two years later the Hierarchy of France thought it necessary to draw up a joint pastoral, which was read in every church in the country and which, after warning parents of the growing menace to the faith of their little ones, contained the following solemn passage:

But if, which God forbid, it [the public school] continues to be a peril for the faith of your children, it is your duty—and we shall not cease to remind you of it, and support you in the defense of your rights—it is your duty to forbid them to attend it, at the price of no matter what sacrifices may be entailed by the conscientious action which you will have performed as good Frenchmen and good Christians.

This declaration was signed by all the Cardinals, Archbishops and Bishops of France.

If the public schools have not proved so disastrous as was expected by M. Viviani and M. Briand, it has not been because they have changed their character, but only because Catholics in large numbers refused to allow their children to attend them. Since the Hierarchy put on record their unanimous opinion of the public schools, the Masonic Educational League, with M. Painlevé, the then Minister of Public Instruction, at its head, has promulgated further plans in the scheme of godless education which M. Guiraud declared to be far more terrible and critical than former schemes. The occasion was the Congress held by the League in Paris during the month of May, 1916. No one can doubt, therefore, that the public school is still a grave peril to the faith of French children.

Since this is so, Catholics would do well to ponder the following words contained in a letter written by Miss F. M. Schofield, one of the principal promoters in the United States of "The Fatherless Children of France":

Meanwhile I personally feel confident that the engagements taken by the Orphelinat in their statutes will be respected, though the children will most certainly, at any rate until they specialize, attend the public schools.

Miss Schofield goes on in her letter to say very explicitly: "I do not believe in convent training . . . and we fully realize that those who believe in convent training will subscribe to other societies than to ours." She believes that "The normal way for the child to learn the love of God is through its mother's love," and that its faith will be sufficiently protected if it remains in its own home. And, to prove her contention, the association she represents sends to anxious inquirers letters from adopted children, containing the children's personal testimony that they are under instruction from their parish priest and are preparing to receive their First Communion. To any one who remembers that M. Viviani made his First Communion, as did in all probability most of his associates, these letters are not very reassuring.

A passage taken from an article which appeared in the Revue Pratique D'Apologétique for March 1, 1918, throws light on the question as to whether the instruction received by children before their First Communion safeguards them from the baneful influence of the public schools. M. J. Verdier proposes to himself the task of accounting for the fact that out of seventy French boys who have received such instruction "10, 12, 15 at most retain a living remembrance of it." His first answer is as follows:

There is, in the first place, the public school, which every year throws into the social life, by hundreds of thousands, children who have not learned in it either to know or to love God. The great part of these children do not attend our catechism classes except during the two years which precede their First Communion. This means, if the diocesan regulations are faithfully observed, 36 hours for the first year and 44 hours for the second year; in all 80 hours. What a foundation in religion for millions of young French children, given between their ninth and eleventh years; and in many cases in what conditions of family and environment! How is it possible for much of their religious training to remain in these young souls, when they are given over, on the morning after their First Communion, to other ideas and other sentiments, and are exposed to the triple concupiscence of the world, the flesh and the devil?

This citation shows how very delusive is the assurance that the children, even while attending the public schools, are allowed to receive religious instruction on Thursdays and Sundays. The atheistic character and atmosphere of the text-books, from which every reference to God has been deliberately eliminated, of the teachers, who are the appointees of men like MM. Viviani, Briand and Painlevé, and of the schools from which every reminder of Divine things has been studiously excluded—all combine, as far as the children are concerned, to neutralize and eradicate almost every trace of religious influence from their early training, to counteract the beneficial effect of the mother's love, and to leave the children defenseless victims of the intellectual and moral virus instilled into them by the schoolmasters. In order to pave the way for this sort of education between 40,000 and 50,000 Catholic schools were closed by the Government, and more than 69,000 anti-Christian public schools have been set up to replace them. Yet Miss Schofield, who is high up in the Fatherless Children of France, says explicitly: "The children will most certainly . . . attend the public schools." Her statement is correct; she speaks authoritatively. The situation is such as to give Catholics grave subject for thought, especially since so many of them in this country not only contributed liberally to the Fatherless Children of France, but persuaded other Catholics to do the same. A third article will give examples of traps set for the souls of French children, whose heroic fathers and brothers are dying valiantly on the battlefield.

English Catholic Church Music

H. C. WATTS

NOW that the summer schools of music are on in the United States, a few words on English music will not be out of place.

I was spending Holy Week at Westminster, not at the Royal Palace of Westminster, where the Commons of England were debating those measures which call the men of fifty to take their place, side by side with the youth and flower of Britain, on the fields of France where the roar of guns wafts itself faintly even here. Nor was it at that ancient abbey where the last of the Saxons, Edward the Confessor, lies entombed beneath the heaped-up sand-bags, lest even his ancient and holy shrine be devastated by the destroyer in the skies; where the walls still stand within which the last Catholic Archbishop of Canterbury, Cardinal Pole, pronounced the absolution of England from the sin of schism.

But it was under that wonderful creation of great domes, chucked together with a massive fancy and imagination that makes the beholder think of immutable stability, of the Rock. It was in Westminster Cathedral, the newest of the great temples of London, that the most ancient and venerable thing in England asserted itself. Something that flourished long before the Crown of England; something older even than England's Parliament—England's Church. There is, after all, nothing strange in being forcibly reminded of the Catholic Church when attending worship in a Catholic cathedral. But this particular thought about the Catholic Church brought something else in its train; it brought to mind a saying that one hears much of now and again, the saying of "England for the English."

Now "England for the English" means, in its primary sense, something that has an intimate relation to the acreage of the soil between Land's End and the town of Berwick-upon-Tweed. It probably means that men who fight for their native land should enjoy that land when the fighting is over, and they return to their homes. This is a very good meaning for any phrase to have. It probably means, too, that men who live by the sweat of their brow should receive an adquate recompense, which is not only a good Christian meaning, but a good Catholic meaning also.

But it meant, something more than that; it meant something that had to do with Church music, and this I found out in Westminster Cathedral last Holy Week. For many years before the war, and certainly every day since the war, except on Good Friday, there are certain places in England where High Mass is sung solemnly every day. It is sung in the heart of Westminster right in the midst of crowded London. In the quiet fields of Downside, within sight of the British battleships at Quarr, in the heart of Scotland at Fort Augustus, within earshot of the munition factories of Birmingham, at Erdington, and in the midst of the sea at Caldey, High Mass is sung every day. And for the past three and a half years Englishmen have been dying daily on the fields of France. That is one reason why on Maundy Thursday, while the choristers of Westminster Cathedral were singing with indescribable pathos "Agnus Dei, qui tollis peccata mundi, dona nobis pacem," and the sweet fragrance from the incense offered at the Elevation yet lingered, it seemed appropriate that one should think of the stench of blood and death that Englishmen were suffering at that very moment on the front a little more than 100 miles away.

That is one reason, too, why there should have been such a tremendous significance, when the long line of priests cried out from the sanctuary "Ave, sanctum oleum!" and kneeling down, breathed upon the Holy Oil, the breath of life. For before that day had closed the Holy Oil had been rushed from the cathedral by the hands of military chaplains, and was rapidly carried to the battle line for the last anointing of dying English Catholic soldiers.

But what, after all, has this to do with England for the English? It has this to do with it. The England that Englishmen are dying for; the England that all the great English-speaking democracies throughout the world, are now lined up with, is something greater than the England one thinks of as inseparable from the British Government. It is the England travailing through the centuries; that old "Merrie Englind" that was Mary's Dowry, Catholic England. For the greatness of England is not an evolution of governments; it is the great Catholic spirit that flourished for so many centuries, and has not even yet died out.

At Westminster last Holy Week there was given us something that, however much English Government and politics may be disliked, something that all English-speaking peoples might yet share. It was English church music for the Mass. There was a wealth of church music written by English composers, that has been hidden away for centuries in the museums and libraries. The dreary Puritans did what they could to destroy the ancient office-books, and the store of church music that had accumulated through centuries. And "England for the English" may, in fact, mean this: Let the English-speaking peoples once more sing the praises of God in those same harmonies that their earlier English Catholic forefathers sang.

The work of restoring the old texts is not easy, and

Dr. Terry, the Director of Music at Westminster Cathedral, has made a beginning with some of the most authentic scores. The oldest of the composers whose work has been restored is the John Dunstable, who is claimed to be the inventor of counterpoint. He was a friend of Abbot Whethampstede of St. Albans, and is said to have died in 1453.

The Masses by Nicholas Ludford were sung in the Chapel Royal of Henry VIII, before that King took a hand in refashioning religion, and the song-books from which his Masses, "Missa Lapidaverunt" for five voices, and the "Missa de Sabbato," are copied, are stamped with the royal arms of Henry VIII and Queen Katherine. Hugh Aston, a Lancashire man whose fame rests chiefly on the music he wrote for the virginal, left a large quantity of church music in manuscript. Two of these have been re-scored, "Missa Te Deum" and "Missa Videte Manus Meas," perfect examples of contrapuntal music in the ecclesiastical style.

An indifferent sort of Catholic was John Merbecke or Marbeck, whose chief claim to renown is that he adapted the music of the Ordinary of the Mass in the Sarum Graduale to the new Book of Common Prayer. He was born in 1523, and first makes his appearance as organist at St. George's Chapel at Windsor Castle. With four companions he developed in secret a small heretical society, this under the very nose of the orthodox Henry VIII, who, with imperturbable impartiality burned Papists for their Popery and heretics for their heresy. The heresy of Mervecke and his companions was smelled out by the King, and they were condemned to the stake. Merbecke was saved by the intercession of Bishop Gardiner of Winchester, who is said to have gained no small reputation as a burner of Protestants, but his companions suffered death according to the common law, which was death by burning. But whatever may have been Merbecke's religious views when he came to write "The Book of Common Prayer Noted," he was at one time a good Catholic, and during that time he composed his "Missa per Arma Justiciae," a Mass for five voices.

These, with other English composers, were presented at Westminster during Holy Week: England for the English in its spiritual sense. He would be bold who should say that the Englishmen are dying in France for the sake of English church music; indeed, they are mostly ignorant that such a thing exists. But the land they are dying for, had its source of greatness in what that music symbolizes; its foundations were laid in a liberty deeper and more lasting than that of parliaments, they were laid in the firm and indestructible liberty of the Catholic Church.

Patriots at Large

E. L. WILLIS

WHILE men listed in the membership of the "Illustrious Order of American Patriots" may argue that they have no knowledge of the anti-Catholic tendency of the movement, the facts are at hand to prove that the Catholic Church is the object of attacks by them.

Waldron, of Baltimore, imported into the State of Maryland from New York, boasts of the fact that the "streets of Maryland would run with blood," within the short space of a year, after the "Patriots" had sufficent time to incite hatred in the hearts of the citizens of that State. This representative of the illustrious Order has outlined the plan of action now being followed in other States. Like the other organizers of the movement, Waldron denounces the use of wine for sacramental purpose. With Bishop Burt of Buffalo, former resident European Bishop of the Methodist Church, Waldron worked in New York State, to defeat Governor Glynn and to inject the question of religious intolerance into the campaign. According to Waldron the Bishop is now the New York State representative of the Patriots, and apparently this good Methodist hopes to control the legislation of not only the great State of New York, but of the entire country as well. At the time this was written he was said to be active in selecting the proper committees in each election district of his county, and in naming his partners-in-arms for the work elsewhere in the State. Literature was freely distributed, in the interest of this anti-Catholic campaign, and the political hopes of the Patriots seemed to be based on the votes of the good Methodist women of New York State. The plan of action is identical, in every State in the Union where the Patriots have lifted their heads above the cellars. For example: Jay W. Forrest appeared in Buffalo, late in March of this year, to address a meeting of the brethren. Sidney J. Catts, Governor of Florida, made his debut in Michigan, for the same purpose, and in Oregon, the work was left in the hands of W. G. Lemon, all apparently working in unison and delivering practically the same speech. Catts, speaking in Michigan, told his slim audience that they must "put none but Americans on guard," which being interpreted means that only Methodists and the Baptists should hold public office. Forrest used the same words in Buffalo, Waldron spoke them then in Maryland and Lemon revived them in Oregon. The trinity likewise told the same story of the fate of the bull that tried to stop a freight train, to show what is going to happen to the Catholic, when the "Americans" are guarding the switch. Meetings and initiations are held quietly, in Methodist and Baptist churches, where admission is obtained by a ticket of reference, guaranteeing the applicant to be all wool.

In Detroit, the chairman of the meeting regretted that the membership had not the courage to attend the public meetings, though he claimed they crowded the churches, in the secret conclaves. Similar complaint was lodged in Baltimore, in Buffalo, and in far-away Oregon. The brothers are happy in the dark, but blink under the sun. In the three States mentioned, the speakers declared that the object of the Patriots was to "preach Americanism and teach Americanism." In each State, invitations to the meetings were sent through the mails, and literature advertising the cause was sent out in the same manner. In every instance, the Methodist Church was lauded, and the success of the movement was declared to lie in the hands of the ministers of that Church who were called upon to open their churches for the meetings-in-the-dark.

Jay W. Forrest, who fired the first shot in Buffalo, opened headquarters in Buffalo, during the last gubernatorial campaign. Lately his headquarters were the Statler Hotel, which he described, justly or unjustly, as "a Protestant hotel, from cellar to attic." It is worthy of note that Governor Catts also honored the Statler Hotel with his presence, when he entered Michigan to revile Catholicism. Forrest first came into the lime-light by working in the interests of William Sulzer, later a candidate for office on an anti-Catholic ticket. During the campaign an army of professional teachers of the doctrine of hate went to Buffalo, and covered the city like a blanket with anti-Catholic literature. The Menace waxed fat, and strange rumors were abroad about the voters, who in those days were called "Units," sometimes Burt Units. Though but fifteen persons attended the first meeting held by Forrest in Buffalo, about four years ago, the Patriot boasts that he made one of them an assemblyman.

The Governor of Oregon, James Wethycombe, is claimed by the Patriots as one of their National Vice-Presidents. They instituted a vigorous campaign in that State, and attempted to put all Catholics under the ban. One of their workers, a gateman on a bridge, was dismissed from his position on the charge that he devoted a portion of his time, while employed by the county, in distributing patriotic literature to the passers-by. Mr. Lemon, secretary of the Patriots, was defeated as precinct committeeman, so it is very likely that the "Romanists" may still be permitted to live in Oregon.

The Oregon Journal, discussing the movement said:

> Thirty-five per cent of the American army are Catholic young men, and a larger per cent is in the navy. To contend that Catholics should not hold public office is to insist that Catholic young men should not be in the army and navy. Do mothers and fathers of sons over there want these Catholic fighters withdrawn from the trenches and their sons left to fight the Hun hordes alone? Is that wanted by the candidates whom the so-called "Patriots" have indorsed?
> In the grim business in which these Catholic and non-Catholic boys are engaged over there no questions are asked of each other as to whether they are Methodists, Baptists, Catholics or Congregationalists. Their thoughts are the terrible issue of facing the oncoming masses of Huns and of how to save liberty, save America, save civilization, save women, save children from the powerful attacks of the Kaiser's trained hordes and the Kaiser's malign purposes. It is no time now for politicians to stir up religious differences, to divide and distract the folks at home. Our young men over there must have an undivided America and a unified people behind them in the terrible ordeal that environs them.

The Patriots want nothing of the kind. They merely want to control America. They have attempted to stir up dissension at home and appear to give more money for anti-Catholic compaigns than for our boys abroad. This was well illustrated in the recent patriotic drive in Detroit. During this the Patriots attempted to throw dust in the eyes of the people, and while that real patriotic drive was on, they issued envelopes labeled "Patriotic Fund," asking contributions for the campaign to close the Catholic schools of the State, hoping to gather in some of the dollars needed so badly for war and for charitable purposes. Their attempt was nipped in the bud, however, and the public was warned against the trick in time.

While Detroiters poured their money into the Patriotic Fund, the slackers were found among the sturdy Patriots. One, for instance, who gave $100,000 for National Prohibition, gave but $10,000 for this great war and charitable work. Another, who gave $50,000 for National Prohibition, could afford but $6,000 for winning the war, caring for the widow and orphan, and relieving distress in his home city. Whereupon the Patriotic Fund committee printed a page advertisement in the Detroit papers, calling attention to the dereliction in the following manner:

> A retired capitalist, a millionaire, with an income estimated at $150,000 a year, subscribed $5,000.
> A well-known merchant, one of the most successful in Detroit, with an income of $80,000 per year, subscribed $2,500.
> A wealthy manufacturer, employing thousands of workmen and a great exhorter of patriotism, blessed with millions and with an income of several hundred thousand dollars a year, subscribed less than $10,000.
> One of Detroit's wealthiest citizens, reputed to be one of the largest retail merchants in the United States, known to have an income of hundreds of thousands of dollars per year, pledged less than $12,000. Could have given $50,000.
> Very wealthy retailer, coming to America in steerage and amassing large fortune in Detroit, contributes less than $7,000. Should have subscribed $25,000.
> Man who recently inherited a large fortune offered $50, but was [word deleted] to make a contribution of several thousands. Could easily give twice his subscription.
> Manufacturer who has made a fortune out of war orders, contributed the equivalent of four days' income. Subscription of month's income would have left him with an income of $70,000 for the balance of the year.

Nor is this surprising to those who know the views of such people. Last December, one of them said: "When asked for funds, remember that no work is so important as National Prohibition. Neither Red Cross work, Y. M. C. A. work, Liberty Bonds, nothing, is so important as Prohibition." This man was living up to his words.

Florida Patriots, too, are slow to part with their money for the war in answer to the country's call. Florida appealed to its winter residents to help save the name of the State. One such resident replied as follows:

When I received your letter recently regarding your Red Cross drive, I was constrained to write to you then about a matter which I refer to in this letter, and which has stirred up many of your winter residents to such a pitch that I believe they will be prone to defer any help to your State or people until such conditions are somewhat changed.

Recently, in this State, the Chief Executive of Florida, Governor Catts, made addresses in various parts of the State of a most bigoted character, in an attempt to foment discord and create antagonism of Protestant against Catholic. In this war there is no distinction of race or creed among men who are sacrificing their lives at the front. It is shown by record, and stated by the Secretary of War, Mr. Baker, that thirty-five per cent of the American army at the present time is Catholic. A much larger percentage of Catholics are in the navy. I regard the activities of Governor Catts as most un-American in character, and of such kind under all circumstances as constitute a blot on the patriotism of your State.

By a strange coincidence the Menace was sold for years outside the door of the store of another Patriot in a western city. Happily a city ordinance has put an end to this practice

The Patriots in Detroit are now busy sending out a neat little "statement concerning education." The leaflet does not carry the union label, and a Patriot operates a non-union printing plant in the basement of his building, from which boys and girls have been known to send out Prohibition literature in abundance. The leaflet in question says that the great issues coming out of the war, must be decided by the ballot, and the decision will rest with "those who now are in or should be in the public schools, developing . . . the ability to think logically, to think for themselves;" for, "in a republican form of government, the citizen is a citizen and not a subject; and it is altogether proper that he be qualified to be a citizen instead of merely being a subject."

The circular warns against the possibilities of "certain difficulties which may otherwise be encountered," and adds this choice bit of information:

That the chance of otherwise encountering difficulties is not imaginary may readily be seen by a Roman Catholic pamphlet in our possession wherein it is urged that Catholic parochial schools, with their 1,200,000 children, shall be reimbursed to the extent of $36,000,000 annually for the services they render to the State. This State, of course, means the nation. What part of the amount is to be from the State of Michigan is not indicated. * * * It is also interesting to notice in that same Catholic pamphlet the following quotations: "The division of the school money does not imply that the State is to so far interfere in the operation of our parochial schools that they will lose their Catholic tone and their Catholic character and become mere public schools." Also: "Religious instruction and a Catholic atmosphere and a Catholic tone of thought and a Catholic habit of mind must still continue to be their strong prominent features."

In another place in the same pamphlet under the caption "We Must Act Now" occurs this statement: "We are sometimes urged to wait patiently until America becomes Catholic, when the legislation of the country will be in our own hands, and the problem of the division of school funds will solve itself automatically."

Such is a sample of the propaganda of the "Illustrious Order of American Patriots." Perhaps some of the good Methodists or Baptists will rise to give the name of the author of the pamphlet quoted, that the world may know whether it is the creature of a Methodist brain, or merely part of the skilful work of the "literary bureau" of the party that will put "none but Americans on guard."

Sunny Siena

JOSEPH WICKHAM, M.A.

SOME day, when a thoughtful mood is on you, and you are reaching back into the centuries for the faces of men and women who were of real value to their time, you will let your imagination cling very fondly about the memory of a little girl of Tuscany, who loved God and grew up to live her years in one long miracle of His favor. And then, as you dwell on her work, and try to measure her achievement by the world's standard of today, mayhap quite unbidden there will flash before you a vision of a something you have seen with your own eyes in the unforgotten past: a city, strong, fair, peaceful, lonely. You will see yourself again in the evening hours looking upon that old city; the houses, pink and white and brown, climbing the hills and gathering close on the way; a church spire at the foot, another half way up, a staircase street, a palace pinnacle, a monastery wall, and crowning the summit of the rise the dome and campanile of a world-famed cathedral. You will see the green valleys falling away low from the circling city walls, and across their undulating breadth, on the gentle hills, the dull-gray olive groves and the dark heaven-pointing cypresses. And far away to the south a great mountain, and all the ways between the pitiful plain of desert wilderness. A city, strong, fair, peaceful, lonely. The little girl that grew for God was Catherine, and the vision-city is her city, Siena. And the Saint will surely forgive you if you contemplate her city's charms in the sweet blithe hours of reverie.

To come to Siena from the south is to come to the first large city of Tuscany, to a city that would fain be what Florence is, the greatest of the Tuscan towns, the queen of Tuscany. The traveler will ponder her annals well ere he comes to her castle gates, if he would find her gladdest welcome and win her rarest smile. For else Siena is a picturesque city, a painted vision, a delicate, rosy tapestry town seen in a palace of art. And Siena is more than that, infinitely more—though she is supremely that, as well.

Siena is built on a trinity of hills. Where their bases meet and dissolve into union, there is formed a level space, fair and broad and sunny, known as the Piazza del Campo. If you will open a fan wide, very wide, so that one edge will form a goodly curve and the other two sides an almost continuous line, you will have a picture of the piazza. It is girt about by tall red-brick houses, which seem to be dreaming of all the life of old that was lived on this piazza, when it was the real seat of Siena's public doings. It is very quiet now in this open space. Siena's days of great council are over; and only once a year, on the Feast of the Assumption, when horses run in the Palio, does the paved area awake and the palace walls re-echo the shouts as they gave them back in the buried long ago. But when one comes to Siena, it is well to come here first, because for all its peaceful mood today it is the heart of the city, and in many ways the loveliest of her charms.

ture of brick and travertine, one of the most magnificent palaces in Tuscany. But you will be impatient to pass on, and up the street-steps to the Piazza del Duomo. Here, resting in the still, mighty space of sunlight, on the highest hill of Siena, dominating the whole city, and presenting a vision of beauty to every street and palace and garden, rises the splendid Gothic cathedral of Santa Maria Assunta.

Surely the place for a temple of worship; one is not surprised that tradition has held this site to have been sacred to Minerva in the days before the twilight settled over the pagan world. Other Christian churches had been here, too, before the Sienese erected this cathedral. Begun in 1229, the cathedral was finished as far as the choir by 1259, and the dome placed in position in 1264. But the people of Siena were not altogether happy over their church. Perhaps they heard of other cathedrals in Tuscany that would be larger; perhaps they felt that Siena was building too meanly. At any rate in 1315 they built beneath the level of the church a new baptistry and began a choir over it. But in 1359, dissatisfied with results, they purposed to cease adding to the old church and to construct a new one, of which the old edifice was to be merely the transept. Soon they found that it would be impossible to use the old church, and decided to make a fresh beginning. Then the Black Death of 1348 came and passed like a blighting phantom, and Siena was a weak and downcast city, little able to spend wealth on her grand ambition. The new work, moreover, had been ill-planned, and would have to be done again. So, probably with many a keen regret, they abandoned their dream, and what would have been the largest and most beautiful Gothic church in Italy remained an unreality. Work now recommenced on the old cathedral. The choir was completed in 1370, and the façade in 1380; the six-storied campanile is also the work of the late fourteenth century. In dimensions the cathedral is 290 feet long, 80 feet broad, and 165 feet across the transepts.

As one stands before the duomo and looks upon the imposing façade, one is reminded of the church in Orvieto; and rightly so, as it was inspired by the front of that southern duomo. A study in red, black, and white marble, it is a bit overladen with decoration, which weakens, instead of strengthening the effect, and removes much of the beauty that a simpler design would have preserved. Still it is a striking face for the church, and it presents a fair splendor to the beholder from the piazza.

Within the edifice all is wonder. In half-bewilderment do you move down the spacious aisle toward the altar, looking upon the rows of columns of beautiful white and black marble, and beyond them at the walls, which display the same alternate banding, and gazing upward upon the series of busts of the Popes beneath the cornices over the arches. It is strange; it is unforeseen; but it is beautiful. More strange still, more unique still, and more exquisite still, is the pavement beneath your feet, that rich mosaic nave, the precious result of centuries of loving toil.

But Siena is pre-eminently the city of St. Catherine. The Piazza Mazzini calls you. Here stands the great fourteenth-century Gothic church of San Domenico, which in a special way is Catherine's, for she was a Dominican nun. It has much that will hold one's interest, but one will soon seek the Chapel of St. Catherine, where the head of the Saint is preserved in a marble shrine. Here it is that the famous frescoes of Sodoma are, the most noted being the "Swoon of St. Catherine." Through a window in the choir one may see most wondrously the fair lines of the duomo, confidently guarding the hill; yet it is not of such calm beauty that one is dreaming, but rather of the maiden who gave up the world and the fulness thereof to become the spouse of God, and, in the later judgment of the world she left, the greatest Saint of Tuscany.

You will linger many a day in Siena, if you can. You will see this church more than once before departing. Perhaps, indeed, the church of San Domenico is the last thing you will visit ere you go away. Is there anything that could give the traveler of today more courage willingly to meet the cares of life than a visit to this church, which stands like a gracious protector overlooking the house where the daughter of the dyer, Giacomo di Benincasa, lived in the tumultuous days of the Middle Ages?

So with your thoughts of the holy Catherine you leave the triple-ridged town that watches so quietly and gently over the Tuscan plain. You go northward, and the city remains—Siena, less powerful, less aggressive, than she was in the dreaming past, but still the same city of loveliness glistening on the height, and gazing yearningly and hopefully on the soft-blue delicate beauty of Mont' Amiata in the leagues and leagues away.

Ibsen and Aristotle

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In the June number of the Bookman there is an article by Mr. Hamilton entitled "Ibsen Once Again," which reminds us "once again" that Ibsen is "a very great artist of the theater." We read much these days about a great spiritual awakening that has come to all the peoples of the world as a sequel to the great war. This it is that makes so superlatively favorable a commentary on Ibsen, as surprising at this time as it is unfounded at any time, and it should not go unchallenged. The most vicious assertion in the article in question is that a dramatist's subject-matter "is, of course, the last thing to be considered by a genuine dramatic critic in analyzing any well-made play." How startling, in view of Aristotle's opinion: "Things are censured as impossible or irrational or morally hurtful!"

Nothing can properly be made the subject-matter of art, let it be music, painting, sculpture or poetry, unless that subject be "beautiful." It has been said that "an object is beautiful,—at least artistically beautiful—when the contemplation of it is calculated to awaken in us a noble emotion." Accepting this definition, and knowing that the drama is a form of art, can we concede that Ibsen's plays are the product of "the greatest modern dramatist?" Did ever an individual detect anything noble in the emotion that chilled him after witnessing one of Madame Nazimova's interpretations of Ibsen? This woman's consummate emotional ability in the living presentation of Ibsen only deepens the depression that must follow even the casual reading of his plays.

Mr. Hamilton's opinion to the contrary notwithstanding, the ethical principles of a drama must be sound before the subject-matter of that drama can be said to be beautiful, and if it be not beautiful, it can never by any perfection of dramaturgic craftsmanship be made a work of dramatic art. This is not an exclusively Catholic or even Christian postulatum, for even cultured pagans demanded as much. In the twenty-fifth chapter of his "Poetics" Aristotle tells us, "The element of the irrational, and, similarly, depravity of character, are justly censured when there is no inner necessity of introducing them." In view of his other precepts, Aristotle means by "inner necessity" the necessity that makes the portrayal of this depravity imperative, in order to fill the audience with abhorrence for it or to bring out the dominant motive of the piece by contrast.

From the time of Aristotle to our own it has been inartistic to make evil attractive and virtue repulsive. Ibsen's treatment of immorality is so profuse that often we cannot sympathize with any of the characters of his plays without sympathizing with immorality. In "Hedda Gabler," for instance, what is there either in the "message" or its "elocution" that is uplifting or healthful? It is merely the lurid portrayal of a case in criminology of a woman shorn of every virtue that we look for in her sex. Again in "Ghosts," "his [Ibsen's] whole reasoning," Professor Boyesen tells us, "as embodied in Mrs. Avling, leaves a large and importunate interrogation mark in our minds as to whether goodness, in the accepted sense, is particularly laudable, and, on the whole, to be preferred to badness."

In "Hedda Gabler," in "The Wild Duck," in "The Master Builder," in "Ghosts" and in all Ibsen's plays, without exception, upon which Mr. Hamilton bases Ibsen's claim to greatness, we are forced ad nauseam to listen to morbid details of the faithlessness of wives and husbands. One commentator has said that "A Doll's House" was not written by way of asking "Is marriage a failure?" but rather to show "Why marriage is a failure." All through Ibsen we come upon such rotteness of theme, all aimed, we might say, in the words of Hilda in "The Master Builder," at the development of "a really vigorous, radiantly healthy conscience, so that one dared to do what one would." Everywhere in Ibsen do we find the delineation of characters that "dare" to do that to which they are sensibly drawn, even if it be at the cost of violating the most sacred bonds of human society.

Let Mr. Hamilton know that while Catholics and self-respecting Christians are part of that public, "the general and normal public" will never judge the "dramatic" perpetrations of Henrik Ibsen "the best that is known and thought in the theater of the world." To the intelligent, moral and, we trust, "general" public, Ibsen will ever be a "sure-enough competitor for the plaudits of an avid audience,"—but of an audience avid for that portrayal of human nature that is salacious, violent, morbid and uninspiring.

France and the United States

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The celebration by France of the Fourth of July recalls the first occasion on which our oldest friend in Europe participated officially in the observance of our national holiday. At the earliest opportunity after she had recognized our independence and openly allied herself with America in the struggle, her Ambassador, M. Conrad Alexandre Gérard, issued an invitation to the Government officials, of which the following is a translation:

> You are invited by the Minister Plenipotentiary of France, to attend the Te Deum, which will be chanted on Sunday, the fourth of this month, at noon in the new Catholic Chapel to celebrate the Anniversary of the Independence of the United States of America.
> Philadelphia, July 2, 1779.

As will be seen, the ceremony was of an unmistakably religious character and was not confined to the Te Deum but included a sermon by the Franciscan Father Bandol, Chaplain to the Embassy, who was also the preacher two years later at the service in Philadelphia arranged by the French Ambassador to celebrate the victory at Yorktown. From his sermon at the Independence Day ceremony of 1779 I quote the following passage as peculiarly fitted for repetition today:

> Let us, in concert with each other, raise our hearts to the Eternal. Let us implore His infinite mercy to deign to inspire the chiefs of the two nations with the wisdom and the strength necessary to bring to perfection the work He his begun; let us unite our voices in supplication to Him to pour forth His blessing on the councils and the arms of the Allies, that we may soon enjoy the sweetness of a peace that will cement the union and assure the constant prosperity of the two countries.

To recall such an incident should afford American Catholics something more than a matter of pride. It should lead us to pray more fervently for France, that she may soon come back to her old traditional ways which prevailed before God was banished from her civil life.

Devotion to the Holy See

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I wonder how many Catholics of today have an affectionate loyalty to our Holy Father, the Pope? I do not mean to imply that we are disloyal or that we are apt to be disobedient, but does there not seem to be too much of a disposition among us to regard the Holy Father as a very distant personage, and as one towards whom we are called upon very seldom to show that loyalty we show our good friends? Let us then cultivate a special devotion to the Holy Father, doing each day some little act of devotion or saying some prayer for his intentions, learning more about him, inculcating in others just a bit more of living, perceptible devotion to him. It seems to the writer that in these days when the Holy See is assailed on all sides, we owe it to our Catholicism to display more affection to his Holiness than, alas, we have been wont to do in times past. I would suggest that whenever we visit the Blessed Sacrament we pray for his Holiness, saying a Hail Mary for this intention. It was by disregarding the counsels of the Holy See that this war arose, and we who abhor the causes of the war ought to do what lies in our power to help remove them. One of the ways to do this is to cultivate a spirit of loving obedience to the Holy See.

Catholic Visitors in New York

To the Editor of AMERICA:

With many other visitors I come to New York in the summer time and long ago made up my mind that it is one of the most delightful places in which to spend one's vacation. Of course there are some few incidentals that might be altered for comfort or satisfaction; but, oh, the joy of all the rest to a rural observer! Today I picked up in the hotel lobby a copy of a useful pamphlet prepared by the "Hotel Association of New York City" for the information of visitors. It tells them of the latest attractions, and where to go and how to get there. In a long list of "Places of Interest" I find there are five Protestant Episcopalian churches mentioned, with a historical note and details of location for each. Not a single Catholic Church is designated in spite of the fact that Greater New York now contains 2,000,000 Catholics and there are today I am sure several thousand Catholic visitors besides myself within its confines. Why the compilers of this hotel guide do not display some recognition of these business facts seems a mystery to me. Do they expect to receive no Catholic patronage, or are your local Catholics so indifferent to slights that they can patiently endure the continued distribution of such "information" as I have outlined here? Surely old St. Patrick's and St. Peter's have interesting historical associations, and where architecturally are there rivals for the Fifth Avenue Cathedral; the beautiful St. Ignatius' on Park Avenue, or the Gothic splendors of the recently completed Dominican Church of St. Vincent Ferrer; or that little gem "the Spanish Church," adjoining the Hispanic Museum on 156th Street? A guide who really knew his New York would scarcely omit these attractions among his places of interest. And, while I am about it, may I ask, why do not some of your local committees on Catholic welfare put a few signs in the hotel lobbies telling of the neighboring Catholic churches and the time at which Mass is said? Other churches give notice of their services. Why not ours also? It would be a great convenience to many strangers. Also I noticed at your two big railroad stations women agents of societies to look out for incoming girls and others of their sex who might need shelter, advice and help in a strange city; but there was no Catholic organization so represented. It may not be very polite for a visitor to find fault, but perhaps this is a case in which the end justifies the means.

"Except in Summer"

A SATIRICAL minister of Ritualistic leanings, on observing how many Protestant churches close their doors and hold no services during summer, amused himself by setting down a few of his favorite texts, adding to each of them the cynical clause which the sad spectacle he beheld naturally suggested: "'Preach the Gospel,' he quoted, 'to every creature'—except in summer"; "'Preach the Word. Be instant in season and out of season'—except in summer"; "'The Lord is in His holy Temple',—except in summer"; "'How amiable are Thy tabernacles'—except in summer"; "'My soul longeth, yea, even fainteth for the courts of the Lord'—except in summer." What emphasized the deplorable neglect of Divine worship by the minister's co-religionists during summer, was the striking contrast that the Sunday appearance of the Catholic churches presented. For at least a half-dozen crowded congregations filled each church, he noticed, even on the warmest Sundays of July or August. "However it is better far, no doubt," reflected the minister, trying to draw a little comfort from the rather depressing sight, "that our liberty-loving Americans should feel free to attend church or not, as they prefer, during summer, rather than be dragooned into piety as those mean-spirited Papists are by their domineering priests."

"Remember that thou keep holy the sabbath day" was Almighty God's command to each and every individual of the Chosen People, and from the detailed directions He gave regarding the manner the day was to be observed, it is perfectly plain that the Divine Legislator wished to be formally worshiped "even in summer." So at least the Church and her "domineering priests" have interpreted the Third Commandment from the earliest times till today. Consequently she obliges every Catholic, "even in summer," and even during vacation time to devote some thirty minutes each Sunday to the formal worship of God by assisting at Holy Mass. Accordingly the Church takes care to remind her children at this season of the year that in choosing a summering place, the neighborhood of a church where Mass is said every Sunday is quite as important a vacation requisite as are cool breezes, social advantages, good bathing, ample golf-links, etc., and that the very automobile that carries a party so swiftly and pleasantly to a distant mountain-top or to a sounding beach is admirably suited too for bringing the same people to Sunday Mass.

"THAT Angel of the World" is the beautiful title Shakespeare gives "reverence." For, like a celestial spirit, that fair virtue safeguards purity, recognizes authority, protects innocence, honors integrity, venerates age, defends helplessness, does homage to sanctity, and gives God the worship that is His due. Reverence is a feeling of profound respect, mingled often with one of awe and affection, for what is great in power, wisdom or holiness. The chronic praisers of the times that are gone are bewailing the fact that the pre-war world and all it stood for are in the crucible, and that the new era now being so painfully born will sweep away as fictions and falsehoods nearly all the foundations on which the virtue of reverence rests.

But these modern prophets of wo need not be so gloomy and disconsolate. For as long as Christ's Church endures,—and we have His promise that He will be with her all days even to the end of time, and that the gates of hell shall never prevail against her,—reverence will still remain the angel of the world, and will continue, as of old, to be the savior and guardian of everything that inspires and merits veneration. The innocence of children, the purity of womanhood, and the sacredness of marriage, for example, will be as much the object of the Church's concern after the war as now. She will still teach the Faithful that their bodies are inviolable temples of God; she will proclaim in the future, as she ever has in the past, that the voice of all lawfully constituted authority is the voice of Heaven and should be reverenced and obeyed accordingly; she will insist then, no less than now, that suffering is a holy thing and that the poor are the wards of God; and she will continue to prove, in season and out, that she is ready to make any sacrifice rather than let the least of her little ones lose the Faith delivered to the Saints, or ever to be wanting in that reverence for Holy Church, her teaching, her services and her ministers that is indeed the angel that is leading all Christian souls safe to Heaven at last.

Our Record Year

FOR the first time in our history the Catholics of America have earnestly girded themselves for their great mission task. It is safe to say that their contributions to this cause during the past year have considerably exceeded the million-dollar mark. It is further notable that in European countries likewise there has been a new mission impetus, despite, or rather, we should say, because of the war. The ebb in mission donations, which was so often deplored during the first two years, has come to an end and a new tide of generosity has set in during the most exhausting stage of the momentous struggle. Men, as the Annals of the Propagation of the Faith suggest, feel the necessity of appeasing the Divine justice, and what better means can they find for this purpose, aside from the Sacraments, than prayer, penance and alms—particularly alms bestowed for the divinest of all works, the rescue and conversion of souls.

The sum contributed by American Catholics to the Society for the Propagation of the Faith during the past year was $805,546.70; that contributed to the Holy Childhood, for the salvation of abandoned children in pagan lands, was $82,525.53. In each case the amount was the largest ever given in a single year. In the latter instance especially donations have trebled during the past four years. If to the sums already quoted were to be added the offerings bestowed upon various other approved missionary societies and upon individual missionaries, there can hardly be any doubt but that the total would easily exceed $1,000,000.

We have often repeated the statement that the only reason why Protestant mission donations so far surpass our own is the want of adequate and persistent education upon this important topic of Catholic interest. When the full import of the words of Christ, "Go ye into the whole world, and preach the Gospel to every creature," shall have been brought home to every individual soul among us, there will be no lack either of mission vocations or of mission contributions. Needless to say, in that day our novitiates and seminaries at home will more than ever be filled with candidates for our own domestic apostolates of every kind, and our churches will prosper materially and spiritually in proportion as they interest themselves in that cause so dear to the Heart of Christ, the conversion of the entire world to Him.

Mothers at Prayer

A MOVEMENT is on foot, launched and directed by the "National Association for Mothers of Defenders of Democracy," to organize a crusade of prayer for the guidance of our leaders in the war, the protection of those who are fighting for us, and the triumph of international justice and righteousness. It has the approval and support of our most distinguished citizens, including President Wilson and Cardinal Gibbons; it is in no sense sectarian, and asks the cooperation of all women who believe in God.

Not long ago a staff officer in France said in memorable words: "Tell the women of America, that victory depends on them." Our noble women have given, and will continue to give, their sons to the cause; it remains for them to invoke Divine assistance for that cause by earnest supplication with the God of armies. The conditions for taking part in the work are such that every woman in the United States can cooperate.

The plan is to secure "silent one-minute prayers, every minute of the day and night, hundreds of thousands praying, one group successively following another, so that there shall be no break in the continuous appeal." It is hoped that each of the 2,000,000 mothers and wives of the American men in the army and navy, and millions of others, will pledge themselves for their share in the great undertaking. Those who are willing to do this, should write to the "Mothers of the Democracy," 51 East Forty-second Street, New York City, and signify their readiness to devote one minute a day for a year to prayer for the purposes of the organization, mentioning particularly, if their habits or occupation make it possible for them to offer their prayer in the late hours of the evening or the early hours of the morning. In return they will receive a card assigning them a particular half-hour at any moment of which they may offer their prayer. This latitude renders the work practicable and does away with scruples. At the same time, the thousands who will be praying during that half-hour will ensure continuity. All are asked to interest others, especially in foreign countries, in the enterprise so that the crusade may be world-wide, and encircle the earth.

The movement cannot be too heartily recommended, for, in the words of Cardinal Gibbons, its value and force can be known in its full effectiveness only to God. If the 13,000,000 mothers in our own country and the countries of our friends whose boys are fighting to bring back freedom to a war-swept world, will enlist their services in this army of prayer, the end we all desire may come sooner than the most sanguine dares hope.

Protection for Women Workers

THE women of the United States are nobly bearing their share of the burdens of the war. Thousands of them are filling the positions left vacant by men now at war. They are ringing up fares on our street cars and running elevators in our skyscrapers. On the farm they are driving the reaper and wielding the hoe. They are bending over their tools in the factory and the machine shop. With an unselfishness and an adaptability which have won universal esteem, they are setting the example of hard work and whole-hearted devotion to duty. In doing so they are remaining true to the best traditions of American womanhood which in the hour of national crisis has never failed the country, a fact that more than any other has won admiration from all.

But this admiration will prove useless, if Americans do not add to it some practical proof that they wish to safeguard the dignity and the virtue of the army of brave women now laboring at strange and unwonted tasks.

With rare exceptions the women now forced to work have shown that they do not intend to allow themselves to become the victims of the temptations and the dangers into which they have been so suddenly thrust. But the danger is real. Employers and public alike, Catholic employers and the Catholic public especially, must see that every means be taken to protect them from physical harm and above all from moral contamination. We rebel at the thought that a woman under any circumstances should be forced to bend under burdens fit only for the brawn and the muscle of the man long trained for arduous tasks. But we shall be far more indignant if, owing to lack of supervision or through the adjuncts connected with her work, she should be exposed to moral harm. If that hurt is to come, it were better that the work she is doing be given back now to men. The noblest possession of our country is the virtue of her daughters. That tarnished, what can replace it?

Not only should the women workers be supervised so as to guard them from physical danger, but a society or union should be formed to watch over their moral interests as well. We are doing admirable work for the relief of the suffering in the war. Millions have been given to the Red Cross. Food and stores have been sent to starving Belgium with lavish generosity. But we must not forget our American women toilers. They, too, are suffering and we must do something for them. Their material well-being should be dear to us. Exhausting work, long hours, unsanitary conditions, must be absolutely prohibited them. Above all the moral atmosphere in which they labor should be kept untainted. There is room here for the activity and zeal of Catholics. No nobler cause could engage the sympathy of those Catholic women of better circumstances than their laboring sisters. It is a noble cause, for good women are the real strength of the country.

First Aid to the Melancholy

JACQUES, whose charming melancholy was one peculiarly his own, told the merry Rosalind that sorrow was "compounded of many simples, extracted from many objects, and indeed the sundry contemplation" of his travels, in which his often rumination wrapped him, was a "most humorous sadness." Melancholy he loved "better than laughing"; he could "suck melancholy out of a song, as a weasel sucks eggs"; his unshaken conviction was that "'T'is good to be sad and say nothing." Like Jacques, a large proportion of our twentieth-century poets, it would seem, think it "good to be sad" but unlike him, they too often "say nothing" very profound or beautiful, from a poetical point of view, notwithstanding all the tearful verses they write. Some of these poetasters, however, though quite crushed in spirit perhaps at the sight of the human misery that surrounds them, nevertheless deny themselves the luxury of tears and write "Pollyanna" verses instead to cheer the hearts of those who, presumably are far more depressed even than they by the sorrows and disappointments of life. In this connection Professor William Lyon Phelps observes in the current Bookman:

> As I read modern verse, I am forced to the conclusion that men and women require a vast deal of comforting. The years preceding the war seem in the retrospect happy, almost a golden age; homesickness for the England, France, Italy, America that existed before 1914 is almost a universal sentiment; yet when we read the verse composed during those days of prosperous tranquillity, when youth seemed comic rather than tragic, we find that half the poets spent their time in lamentation, and the other half in first aid. An enormous number of lyrics speak as though despondency were the normal condition of men and women; are we really all sad when alone, engaged in reading or writing? "Every man is grave alone," said Emerson. I wonder. So many poets seem to tell us that we ought not absolutely to abandon all hope. The case for living is admittedly a bad one; but the poets beseech us to stick to it. Does every man really go down to business in the morning with his jaw set? Does every woman begin the day with compressed lips, determined somehow to pull through till afternoon? Even the nature poets are always telling us to look at the birds and flowers and cheer up. Is that all botany and zoology are good for? Have we nothing to learn from nature but—buck up?

Firmly persuaded as modern minor poets seem to be that the sweetest songs are those that tell of saddest thought and that the nightingale, before she can really do herself justice, must have a thorn or two piercing her breast, how noble, nay heroic, it is of them to turn sternly away from the melancholy Muse, and devote themselves exclusively to composing lyrics of gladness for the solace of their fellow-moaners in this vale of tears. The testy commuter, for example, who has breakfasted hastily and meagerly, reads in the morning paper on his way to business a joyful triolet telling how thankfully the little birds take their simple matutinal meal, and he forgets forthwith how weak the domestic coffee was and how heavy the rolls. Or pretty Flossie who is quite disconsolate because her summer hat has not turned out the artistic success she hoped it would be, finds in a July magazine a rondelet describing how serenely the tiger lily wears the same trumpet-shaped blossoms and commonplace colors year after year, and she is promptly restored by the poem to such a Christian frame of mind that she is ready not only to forgive but even to pay the offending milliner. Every reasonable man must own that by these and similar services the Pollyanna minor poet both completely justifies his existence and even deserves the tearful gratitude of all the fellow-melancholiacs whose sadness his verses help to temper and assuage.

Literature

ST. AMBROSE AND NATURE STUDY

HABITUALLY and proverbially we so couple great men with mighty deeds that we almost exclude from their lives whatever does not fit heroics. It seems more natural to picture General Washington encouraging his men at Valley Forge than inspecting his kitchen garden or arranging details with his butler. We see Lincoln in his grandeur signing the document that abolished slavery, but it never crosses our mind that he had difficulty in getting a pair of boots to fit him. Great men appeal to us as wedded to great accomplishments, and to place them in the ordinary occupations of life, or to imagine them concerned with even the necessary trifles of normal living, strikes us as a kind of lèse majesté, and an unwarranted divorcing of genius from its proper sphere of action.

And so with the Fathers of the Church. One may except St. Augustine, perhaps, on account of his "Confessions"; but, besides him, one may safely assert that few ever think of them save as expounders of dogma and upholders of doctrine and discipline. Yet they were normal men, with a keen appreciation of the commonplaces of life. Their writings are not only exalted, but also practical, going into the minutiae of every-day conduct. They were men of deep sympathy with everything human. The beauty of land and sea appealed to them; and, after the example of Our Lord Himself, they call on all creatures for aid and illustration. This is specially true of St. Ambrose, from whom we shall offer some passages chosen almost at random from his "Hexameron," or "The Six Days of Creation." The work is divided into six books, and follows the order of Genesis. One may easily pick quarrels with the Doctor's natural history, biology and physics. Yet he had the knowledge of the educated gentleman of his time. And, as a guard against sneering, it may be well to reflect that if we had lived some fifteen-hundred years ago, our knowledge of these matters would have lagged behind modern advances, not less than that of the learned of those earlier days. Two beautiful hymns of St. Ambrose, "Splendor Paternae Gloriae," and "Somno Refectis Artubus," are found in the Roman Breviary. Like every man of eloquence, he had a true poetic instinct. Let it be added that the peculiar style of the "Hexameron" makes difficulties for the translator, and that, in spite of straggling sentences, there is a peculiar quaintness and charm about the Latin which can hardly be caught by an Englished version. Here, however, are two passages that show his power:

> The earth restores with compound interest what she borrows. Men often deceive and defraud their creditors, but the earth is faithful. If, at times, she does not repay in full, straitened, it may be, by unseasonable cold or a drought or an over-abundance of rain, she makes up another year for the deficit of the preceding one. Thus, when the crops have disappointed the hopes of the husbandman, the earth is not to blame; and when the season is right, the richness of this prolific mother pours forth such abundant progeny that, in the end, she causes no loss to her creditor. . . .
> What a beautiful sight is a well-cropped field! And the odor! What a joy to the farmer! What tongue can express the beauty of it? We have the word of Scripture, from which we learn that the scent of the fields is compared to the blessings and graces of the Saints, as the holy man Isaac saith: "The smell of my son is as the smell of a plentiful field." Why, therefore, should I describe the purple violets, the white lilies, the blushing roses; the meadows picked out here with golden blossoms, there with pied ones and again with saffron? One knows not whether it be the display of flowers or the scent of them that gives greater delight. The eyes are feasted by the beautiful panorama, and one is sated by the sweet smell.

Evidently a fair landscape had charms for St. Ambrose. In the following passage we have clearly one who had learned the sea by delightedly studying it in all its moods. The rhythm and structure of the passage enumerating the benefits and advantages afforded by the sea recall Cicero's eulogy of literature in the speech "Pro Archia"; and, by way of contrast, one thinks of Horace's dread of the "dissociabile mare," the estranging sea. If the Saint were alive now, however, he would surely modify his statements that the sea is a bar to cruelty and battling.

> Therefore God saw that the sea was good. And, indeed, this element is beautiful to behold, either when the billows surge, their crests white with foam, and the jagged rocks drip with snowy spray; or when, under favoring breezes and a lulling calm, it lies empurpling, as it often appears to one looking down from a height. When angry waves do not lash the shore and the waters eddy peacefully, and, so to speak, greet the land in friendly embrace, how sweet is the sound, how delightful the din, how musical the reverberation! . . . Good is the sea. It is, as one may say, the hospice of the rivers; it is the fountain-head of the rain, the source of overflows, the bearer of provender. By it distant peoples are united, the danger of wars made remote, barbaric cruelty restrained. It is help to the needy, a refuge in danger, it adds charms to our pleasures, it is health for the sick.

The following description of the polyp is quaint enough, and a good example of the method used for drawing a moral lesson from natural objects. Doubtless octopod is the creature referred to:

> I shall not pass without comment the deceitful nature of the polyp. For I have already spoken somewhat of that craftiness whereby some strive to beset and deceive their brethren, and to invent new ways of cheating them; so that if they cannot take their victims by force, they may catch them by fraud, and by some dark means overreach them.
> The polyp when it lights upon a rock, in the shallows along the shore, fastens on it, and by a cunning instinct undergoes a change of color, so that its body takes on the appearance of the rock. Thus by clever trickery, it entangles in its meshes, and imprisons in its enfolding body, many a fish as it glides incautiously through the familiar haunts past what it deems a mere rock. So the prey is taken an easy dupe, and is entrapped by methods such as are used by those who often change face, and set afoot devious schemes for working harm. They make trial of one's inclinations and character. With the pure they exalt purity. In a crowd of libertines they behave like those who have abandoned the path of continence, and are immersed in the slough of loose living. Their aim is that they who see them or listen to them may trust them offhand, and so slip into bad habits the more readily, because they do not perceive they are going downwards, nor are on their guard against a hurtful influence. And, indeed, wickedness is all the more pernicious when it masquerades under the mantle of friendship.
> We must be wary, therefore, of those who spread their lying toils, and reach abroad with their tentacles, and are protean in their manner of life. They are the polyps with grasping arms; they bear the imprint of an evil genius by which they are able to ensnare whosoever falls foul of the rock of their unholy craft.

Without question, the great Bishop of Milan was a close observer of nature and was skilful, too, at weaving into his ascetical writings the results of his investigations.

REVIEWS

An Elementary Handbook of Logic. By JOHN J. TOOHEY, S.J., Professor of Logic and Metaphysics in Georgetown University. New York: Schwartz, Kirwin & Fauss. $1.00.

Father Toohey's manual is an excellent text-book for the classrooms of academies, colleges and seminaries, and it would be advisable for all teachers of logic to consider its advantages before deciding on the book they will use in their courses of next year. It is brief and clear. It avoids diffuseness and jejuneness; and while covering the entire subject in a way quite sufficient for the student's needs, it leaves full freedom to the teacher for personal initiative and development. It is essentially a text-book for classroom work, written by the professor of logic in Georgetown University, with whom the science of logic, long before he began to teach it, had been a hobby. It is designed especially to meet the difficulties, requirements and turn of mind of American students. A minute outline of chapters and an exhaustive index, covering thirteen pages, of topics, facilitate reference, which is made still more easy by a judicious employment of black-faced type for definitions when they first occur, and by the use of numbers for paragraphs, to which the student is constantly sent back, as occasion requires. Throughout the volume's 241 pages extreme care has been taken with the wording of the text, and the examples, old and new, serve as excellent illustrations.

The subject-matter, which it has been the fashion to consider cut and dried and stereotyped beyond the possibility of change, has an element of novelty which is refreshing. The laws of thought are, of course, enunciated as heretofore, but on the explanation of them Father Toohey has not feared to show considerable originality. These divergencies from stock statements stimulate discussion, clear away inconsistencies and on further reflection commend themselves with growing insistence. Such, for example, are the distinction between the act and process of inference, the treatment of the predicables and categories, the chapter on eduction and the remarks on the modal proposition. The most distinctive parts of the book are the chapters which treat of the categorical syllogism. The author has found that his new theory simplifies the subject in a remarkable way for the student. The explanation of fallacies, which was written with the distinct purpose of giving a name and a description to the methods of attack made on the Church, is very valuable; and the discussion of the author's views on the distribution of the predicate, to say the least, challenges serious attention. The book has already been adopted in several higher institutions of learning.

Trade and Navigation Between Spain and the Indies in the Time of the Hapsburgs. By CLARENCE HENRY HARING, Ph.D., Assistant Professor of History in Yale University. Cambridge: Harvard University Press. $2.25.

In the words of the author of the latest volume of Harvard Economic Studies:

> The Spanish Government accepted the task of colonization [of the New World] with the most painstaking seriousness. With high ideals of order and justice, of religious and political unity, it extended to its ultramarine possessions its faith, its language, its law and its administration; built churches and monasteries, founded schools and universities; in short, endeavored to make its colonies an integral part of the Spanish monarchy. Emigration was carefully watched to keep them free from the contamination of heresy and foreigners; and trade and navigation were organized with the same infinite care for detail that characterized social and political activities. If the actual results of Spanish colonial policy fell far below these ideals, yet they were results by no means to be despised. A Spaniard [Gonzalez Davila] could write little more than a century after Columbus: "In the Indies [to the Spaniard the word "Indies" without qualification always signifies the Western Hemisphere] there have been built 70,000 churches, 500 convents of religious belonging to the Orders of St. Dominick, St. Francis, St. Augustine, Our Lady of Mercy and the Society of Jesus, containing more than 3,000 members. . . . There have been established for the instruction and good government [of the natives] many reductions, one patriarchate, six archbishoprics, thirty-two bishoprics . . . two universities. . . . There have been founded more than two hundred cities, many towns. . . ."

In a word, before English Colonies had appeared in the Western World, there was already a flourishing Spanish America reproducing all the higher features of European civilized life, a Spanish America that never lost its wonderful lead on English America in everything that makes for the higher life, save political liberty, until in the nineteenth century the advent of that liberty for which they were not prepared begot the license and revolution that have gone so far to cripple if not utterly destroy their brilliant civilization.

"It is the description of the trade and navigation between Spain and the New World, of the commerce which made possible the creation of this Spanish-American civilization" that forms the subject-matter of the book. Most, if not all, European nations had until the nineteenth century, navigation and trade laws that appear to us moderns supremely unwise and injurious. Spain was by no means an exception, if anything Spanish mercantile policy and legislation possessed elements of stupidity peculiarly its own. These as well as more favorable features are impartially unrolled before the reader's eye in an interesting narrative of some 370 pages.

The book's defects are few. It is hardly fair to say, however, as is said on page 133: "Progress in scientific knowledge was effectually blocked by the church, and American presses confined their attention mostly to the production of catechisms, martyrologies, and books of pious verse." Can Dr. Haring really be ignorant of the wonderful scientific and literary output of the Spanish-American press in the three great centuries of their glory? Gaylord Bourne, his brilliant predecessor in Yale, might have shown him otherwise. Again on page 166, Pedro de la Gasca, whose character, all historians unite in praising in the highest terms, is referred to as a "wily Jesuit." If extraordinary success in allaying difficulties by the use of the noblest means deserves the epithet, "wily," then "wily" he certainly was; but Jesuit he certainly was not, as the most elementary knowledge of the man's career would show. In fact de la Gasca had left Peru almost twenty years before the first Jesuit landed there. "Terrible activity of the Lima Inquisition . . . and that of the Mexican tribunal . . ." is somewhat strong language when we recall the rather innocuous history of the Inquisition in the Spanish Colonies, even as it appears on the pages of its great enemy, Henry Charles Lea. The accurate reader will also wish there were some guide to the value of the coins mentioned in the volume. Thus almost on the same page conflicting values are assigned to the same monetary units. But these are only minor blemishes, for Dr. Haring's scholarly book is a valuable addition to our Spanish American historical library.

Under the German Shells. By EMMANUEL BOURCIER, Member of the French Military Commission to America. Translated from the French by GEORGE NELSON HOLT and MARY R. HOLT. With Portraits. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.50.

Such words as "graphic," "vivid," "realistic" and "gripping" have already been so sadly overworked by the enthusiastic reviewers of war-books that this excellent account by Private Bourcier, of the battles and maneuvers he was in, deserves an entirely new set of adjectives to describe it. With an artistic French journalist's power of bringing memorable scenes forcibly home to his readers, the author describes in terse, living words what he actually saw or experienced when France mobilized, for example, and the first days of the German invasion with all its horrors, the battle of the Marne, the shelling of Reims, the failure of the French attack in Champagne, and the successful defense of Verdun. The value of the book especially lies in the fact that the point of view is that of a private who has already had a great deal of military experience in colonial warfare and is thoroughly capable of contrasting the fighting and maneuvering of the present conflict with that prevailing formerly. War today is such a horror, Private Bourcier attests, "that those who have lived these hours may say: 'I was there. But to tell about it is to live it over again, and that is too much.'" The heroes who survive will be unable to describe in detail their different campaigns. All will be blurred and indistinct. They can only say: "At the Marne we used rifles," "In Champagne we threw bombs," "At Verdun—such cannon!"

"On the Somme the shells flew so thick they met in midair."

To realize what a strongly written personal narrative "Under the German Shells" is, the reader need only turn to such passages as the author's description of the army's retreat to the Marne, the fine tribute to the shattered glories of Reims, or the following account of the first gas attack and its effects:

> The frightful, livid thing came on, expanded to a cloud, crept upon us, glided into the trenches. The air was quickly obscured. We were swimming in an atmosphere stained a venomous color, uncanny, indescribable. The sky appeared greenish, the earth disappeared. The men staggered about for a moment, took a gasping breath, and rolled on the ground, stifled. There were some knots of soldiers who had been asleep in their beds when overtaken by the gas. They writhed in convulsions, with vitals burning, with froth on the lips, calling for their mothers or cursing the Germans. We gathered them up as best we could; we took them to the doctors, who, thus confronted by an unknown condition, found themselves powerless. They tried the application of oxygen and ether in an effort to save the lives of the victims, only to see them die, already decomposed, in their hands.
> The masks had not yet been perfected and were a poor protection. Some ran about like madmen, shrieking in terror, the throat choked with saliva, and fell in heaps, in contortions of agony. Some filled the mouth with handfuls of grass and struggled against asphyxiation. Others, down in the shelters, sprinkled face and neck with brackish water, and awaited a death all too long in coming. . . .
> It was the very air turned accomplice of the enemy; blinded eyes, frothing mouth, rotted lungs, a breast on fire; every effort exerted redoubling the torture; the rescuer struck down above the man he attempted to save; the officer suffering like his men; the telephone-operator seized in his shelter, the courier arrested in his course, all alike smothered and struggling with death. This was a breath from the depths of hell, this diabolic invention, which that monster, the German Junker, forced men to choose; weapon of meanness and treachery, which sets at naught the valor of both defender and assailant!

The translation seems to be an excellent one, though here and there American slang, without inverted commas, is used.

Cancer: Its Nature, Causes, Diagnosis and Treatment. By ROBERT HOLMES GREENE, A.M., M.D., F. A. C. S., Emeritus Professor of Surgery, Medical Department of Fordham University. New York: James T. Dougherty, 409 West 59th Street. $1.50.

This little book is the result of the combined efforts of a surgeon and a chemist who have been working together for several years, while each studied the cancer problem from his particular standpoint. It is a difficult thing to write an account of a disease that will be scientifically accurate, yet phrased in language that can be understood by the average unprofessional reader. But this task these authors seem to have accomplished successfully, and the result is a book which, while primarily intended for students of medicine, can be read with interest and profit by physician and patient alike.

It will certainly be a surprise to those whose knowledge of cancer is derived from popular tradition, to be told that there is no evidence to justify the common theory of the parasitic origin of malignant tumors. The authors apparently favor the idea of heredity as a pre-disposing factor, though it may be questioned whether the analogy between the fixed laws of unimpeded nature and pathological processes is altogether justifiable. It is consoling to learn that so much has been done in recent years to obviate the disagreeable and distressing features of the disease, but the opinion is frankly stated that operations never cure cancer any more than the removal of a tuberculous kidney cures consumption, since both are constitutional maladies. However, the proper treatment includes surgical as well as therapeutic measures, while diet and fresh air seem to effect nearly as beneficial results as they do in the case of tuberculosis.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

The July 8 Catholic Mind contains Professor A. J. Rahilly's admirable lecture on "Ozanam's Ideal of Social Work." The author shows that the founder of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul was so far ahead of his times that the social evils now facing the world can best be remedied simply by applying the principles Ozanam laid down and by making the "Manual" practical. Bishop Tissier then gives good counsel on the importance of "Preventive Charity" and the number ends with a well-chosen list of "Books on Apologetics and Controversy" compiled by Father Reville. Everybody who is interested in the noble work done by the Conferences of St. Vincent de Paul is sure to find this pamphlet very helpful.

Wisdom comes from the East still, for a correspondent of the Bombay Examiner sends its editor the following information regarding the best authority on that most vital of questions today—When will the war end:

> "Actual evidence I have none,
> But my aunt's charwoman's sister's son
> Heard a policeman on his beat
> Say to a housemaid in Downing Street
> That he had a brother who had a friend
> Who knew when the war was going to end."

Though the author of "A Temporary Gentleman in France" (Putnam, $1.50) keeps secret his name, he cannot conceal the splendid type of hero that he is. The narrative is cast in the form of letters, the authenticity of which is vouched for by Captain A. J. Dawson, who writes the introductory chapter. The letters were not intended for publication and have scarcely been revised; for that reason, their chattiness and friendliness of tone will perhaps make a deeper appeal to the mothers and friends of other gentlemen from America, temporarily residing in France. The book outlines the adventures of a one-time clerk, now a lieutenant in the English army, from his first arrival in France, through all the routine of the trench and all the various forms of fighting, and scouting and strategy of the present war. There are many excellent features in the book, but none are more commendable than its inspiring message of hope and cheer.

Here are three books bearing on the war from E. P. Dutton & Co.: "Use Your Government" ($2.00) is the title of Alissa Franc's primer of information concerning the help that may be had from the Government in matters of agriculture, general employment and education. The publication is particularly happy at this time when so many citizens engaged in increasing our economic resourcefulness have taken up work with which they are not familiar.——"Bombs and Hand Grenades, British, French and German, a Handbook Showing Their Construction and Technicalities, Giving Full Instructions as to How to Use and How to Render Useless" ($2.00) is the complete title of Captain Bertram Smith's well-illustrated volume which our soldiers in training will no doubt find very useful.——To Major William A. Dawkins' "Police Reserve and Home Defense Guard Manual" ($1.00) Inspector Cornelius F. Cahalane has added extracts from "Police Practice and Procedure." The duties of the Police Reserve are explained and the infantry-drill regulations are given in detail.

Some recent publications from Benziger Brothers are these: In a good book, called "The Catholic Home" ($1.25), Father Alexander, O. F. M., covers much the same ground, though not in so detailed and practical a manner, as do the Fathers of the AMERICA staff in "Marriage and the Family" (America Press, $0.15). The chapters on "Reverence" and "Fatherhood" are particularly readable, and the entire book is full of discreet advice for the married or for those contemplating matrimony. The Bishop of Salford writes an excellent preface.——"Religion and Human Interests" ($0.75), by the Rev. Thomas Slater, S.J., is a little book of ten thoughtful chapters explaining the bearing of religion on the individual, the family, the conscience, business, etc., and ending with valuable information about the new Code of Canon Law.——In "Our Lord's Own Words" ($1.25), Vol. II., the Right Rev. Abbot Smith, O.S.B., continues his meditations on St. John's Gospel, from the ninth to the fourteenth chapter. The author's reflections are discerning and practical and always end with a good colloquy with Our Divine Saviour.——Father Thomas S. McGrath has now added to his other useful little prayer books "First Spiritual Aid to the Sick" ($0.60). It contains, in English and Latin, the prayers of the "Rituale Romanum," used when the last Sacraments are conferred, the sick are visited, the dying prayed for, etc.

Elizabeth Slaughter was twelve and "made to vibrate to all the winds that cross the world." Her sister Gertrude was almost four years younger, and "took impressions less easily." Their mother is an American woman who kept an interesting journal of the education and development of these "Two Children in Old Paris" (Macmillan, $1.50), and has now published it. The family are Protestants, but the girls attend an excellent Catholic school where they take poetry instead of catechism. When the other children are preparing for their First Communion, Elizabeth looks on with "something of regret as one would look into a beautiful world which one might not enter." They attend High Mass and hear a sermon at Sainte Clotilde's and little Gertrude declares on the way home: "I am so glad we went. I can't describe it, mother, but I have such a good feeling inside of me. I want to go every Sunday. I loved it." The book is a valuable record of how two bright and amiable American children reacted to the religious, historical and social charms of the French capital.

As the Church wishes us to be always mindful of those who have been called to God, Canon Rothe has done well to gather into a little book, bearing the title "Pour les Morts de la Grande Guerre" (Téqui, 1 fr. 50) a number of indulgenced prayers and meditations, with the attached indulgences noted, for the assistance of the souls in purgatory. The booklet, it seems, would especially appeal to those who have been bereaved by the present war.——In "Retraite de Dames et de Mères Chrétiennes" (Téqui), J. Millot, Vicaire Général de Versailles, exposes in detail pious exercises for the three-days recollection suitable to women of the world. The retreat is divided so that each day has a practical conference and three good instructions. ——"Anecdote-Sermonettes for Children's Mass" (Murphy, $0.75), by the Rev. Frederick A. Reuter, contains short talks for various feasts of the year developed by legends and narratives suited to the minds of children.

A life of Joan of Arc written for the needs of the present struggle would have a real mission. No better manual of heroism could be put in the hands of our fighting men. A simple and heart-felt recital of her gallantry and her martyrdom, of her career of glory and her agony of sorrow would give to our soldiers the ideals and the inspiration which they require. "Joan of Arc," by C. M. Stevens (Cupples & Leon, New York, $1.50), was evidently intended to accomplish such a purpose. The author of the work has great admiration for the Maid of Orleans and tries to do her justice. It would have been better if a simpler style and a less ambitious presentation of the matter had been adopted. Too many passages are declamatory and overwrought. There is also not a little vagueness in the expression which leaves the reader uncertain of the real meaning of the writer's thought. The Catholic Church and her dogmas and discipline are sometimes confounded with the Catholic churchmen and their beliefs and conduct. In trying to glorify the Maid of Orleans, the author claims too much for her. It is not true to say that she was "the first martyr, unmistakable, irreproachable and unsurpassable, within the Christian Church, for freedom of conscience, in the conduct of life, wherever it involves the rights of man in his responsibility to God." The thousands of martyrs of the early ages were martyrs for freedom of conscience in the noblest sense of the word. It is false also to affirm that Jeanne "perished at the stake for her loyalty to a life of 'justification by faith.'" The martyr of Rouen would have been the first to reject that doctrine. Many of the incidents in the life of the heroine are narrated with energy and spirit.

The book of "Oxford Poetry, 1917" (Longmans, $0.50), is of a higher quality than those of the past three years. Leo Ward's "The Last Communion," already quoted in these columns, is here; M. St. Clare Byrne's "Favete Linguis" is full of beauty; two poems by W. R. Childe abound in striking medieval images; Gerald H. Crow offers Our Lady a loving prayer and writes these thoughtful lines on "Humility":

"God is my Father. Christ was young and died
To comfort me. The towering archangels
With all their blue and gold and steely mail
Are my strong helpers and mine elder brothers.
The sweet white virgins gone to martyrdom
Calm-eyed and singing are my sisters." Yea,
Because of all these things keep your heart proud.
Be proud enough to serve the poor, too proud
To attend the rich: enough to love, not hate,
And give, not sell. Remember gentleness
Is the heart's pride of understanding, truth
Her greatness that will not be afraid for wrath
Nor flatter favor. This remember also,
The pure in heart shall walk like fierce white flames
Questing across the world in goodlier hope
And knightlier courtesy than they of the Graal,
For these are they in the end that shall see God.

SOCIOLOGY

Democratic Conception of History

A NEW world is being forged in the fires of the war. But it is a transformation begun long ago. The forms of autocracy that developed after the days of the Reformation have slowly been giving way, through decades of years, to more democratic ideals and popular institutions. The war is but helping to complete the work. While this great change cannot affect the past, it can and must affect our views of it. History can no longer be written as a mere recital of the deeds of kings and the prowess of leaders, the intrigues of courts and the jealousies and ambitions of nations. However much we may disapprove of the manner in which the mighty transformation has in part been brought about, we cannot but realize that the sympathy and sentiment of the world have become more profoundly Catholic with the culmination of the war than during any other period since the Reformation.

True Conception of Democracy

IN the center of all interests stands the laborer. The masses are more to us than their monarchs. Kings and presidents, rulers of empires or republics, are recognized to be the servants of the people. The world is approaching to something of that high conception of the true spirit of democracy which finds its ideal expression within the Catholic Church, whose Supreme Pontiff lays claim to no prouder title than that whereby he signs himself, "The Servant of the Servants of God." It is the concept of democracy that Christ has taught us: "He that is greater among you, let him become as the younger; and he that is the leader as he that serveth." And of Himself He said: "I am in the midst of you as he that serveth."

At the same time we cannot fail to perceive the ever-present danger, that democratic ideals may degenerate into mere forms of rationalism, radicalism and anarchy. Sad examples of this are all about us. The power which the ruler possesses is not from the people, but ultimately from God alone, as the Scripture clearly teaches: "There is no power but from God." Our obedience to lawful authority is obedience to God, and the power of rulers may be used only in subjection to Him. "He that resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God." Thus the perfection of Christian democracy under any government turns obedience into high virtue by rendering it to God alone; and power into service by using it solely in subjection to the Divine will for the good of our fellow-men, and particularly of those who stand most in need of its support, the working classes and the poor.

The Catholic Historian

THE historian who would rightly review the past must consider it in the light of this true democracy. He will be interested in the laborer and his fate more than in the conquests of armies and the change of dynasties, which often but slightly affect the condition of the toiling multitudes. The Catholic historian especially should be able to enter with deepest sympathy into this important study. He, above all others, is safely guided by the high and true ideals of democracy which the Church holds up to him.

The Church of Democracy

FOREMOST in the interest of both the Church and of democracy stands the laborer. Christ was born in a stable, and chose for the chief of His Apostles, to whom He committed the keys of His kingdom, a humble fisherman of Galilee. Through him and his successors He wished to rule His Church to the consummation of time. He did not disdain the royal House of David, but came, as the Prophet had foretold, only when the scepter had passed away from Israel, and when its two noblest representatives were Joseph, the carpenter of Nazareth and Mary, the lowly handmaid of the Lord. After His own example, the Church made her earliest converts in greatest numbers from among the slave population of the Roman Empire, from the unlettered and the disinherited. Her attitude has never changed. Through all the centuries her greatest glory has ever been that she can point, like Christ, to the fulfilment of those words in her regard: "The poor have the Gospel preached to them." The history of the Church's twenty centuries is, above all, the history of the laborer and the poor. The greatest charter of democracy that the world holds today is the Encyclical of Pope Leo XIII. on "The Condition of the Working Classes." What nobler words have ever been written in labor's cause than these?

> In the provision of material well-being, the labor of the poor—the exercise of their skill and the employment of their strength in the culture of the land and in the workshops of trade—is most efficacious and altogether indispensable. Indeed, their cooperation in this respect is so important that it may be truly said that it is only by the labor of the working man that States grow rich. Justice, therefore, demands that the interests of the poorer population be carefully watched over by the administration, so that they who contribute so largely to the advantage of the community may themselves share in the benefits they create, that being housed, clothed and enabled to support life, they may find their existence less hard and more endurable. It follows that whatever shall appear to be conducive to the well-being of those who work, should receive favorable consideration.

These lines were written, it must be remembered, when it was not so popular as now to sustain the cause of labor. At all times the Catholic Church was the sole consistent champion of labor's rights. Pauperism came only with the decline of her power.

American Historians

THOUGH America is regarded as the cradle-land of liberty and democracy, yet we find that in times past there has been almost the same disregard of the masses of the people in America as in European countries. In the work of social reform we lagged far behind many of the latter, although nature herself presented opportunities to the laborer that were not to be found elsewhere. As a conspicuous illustration we need but mention the fact that our standard American historians were practically unaware of a labor problem. A chapter here and there in McMaster, Dewey, Sparks and a very few other general historians summed up our interest in the question. Among economists, pioneer historical work was done by Dr. Richard T. Ely, but the real breaking of the entire ground did not take place until the publication in eleven volumes, of "The Documentary History of American Industrial Society" in 1910, and the first real "History of Labor in the United States," based upon these documents and upon further research, has been published only now by the Macmillan Company (two volumes, $6.50).

Labor History

THIS complete and comprehensive history of labor in the United States is the co-operative undertaking of six writers, and follows the monographic method, while unity is given to the entire work by the editorship of Professor John R. Commons. It was under his supervision likewise that the "Documentary History" had been previously published. "The chapters," says Professor Commons, describing the genesis of his work, "bring together the researches of several students in my classes and seminars during the past twelve years, a search throughout the country in libraries, cellars, and attics for original sources, and the series of university lectures by which during these years the researches and sources have been assembled and interpreted." In the final compilation of the work Professor Commons and his six associates have carefully sought to remain purely objective in their presentation of facts and in their interpretation of the various philosophies which were accountable for the ever-changing phases of the labor movement. This statement, needless to say, does not imply a full agreement with every view expressed by the authors. But a basis has now been laid for labor history.

Historic Materialism

IN general, it may here be said that Socialists were the first to appreciate the opportunity which the history of labor and of the masses afforded. It was a garbled account they presented to the laborer, misinterpreted from first to last; but there was no one to offer the antidote. The children of the world are wiser in their generation than the children of the light.

Socialism itself was based upon supposed economic history. The central dogma of Socialist philosophy is "historic materialism" or "the materialistic conception of history," as Socialists themselves have called it. History, in other words, was made by them the degraded bondslave of materialism. Even so-called Christian Socialists held that religion, including both Judaism and Christianity, depended for its doctrines and its morality upon the evolution of economic conditions, and constantly changed with them through the course of history. Thus a fanciful story of labor and of the masses, from the earliest days of an imaginary ape-man, the first tool-using animal, to the present moment of our Christian era, has been made by them the successful medium of endless Socialist propaganda.

Socialists have seized their opportunity. They have given to the world their false "materialistic conception of history," which has done untold harm in the labor world. It is time that the world should receive the true economic conception, the Catholic conception of history, telling in full the authentic story of the laboring masses as a lesson for future democracy.

The Professional Student

WE teachers meet with a strange variety of students. Perhaps in our earlier years we are tempted to regard each disciple as so thoroughly individual in his mental grasp, his attentiveness and powers of retention, that all pretense at classification would seem futile, all general canons of conduct useless. As we promote our charge to the class above, we feel we shall not meet his like again. Nor is this conclusion to be despised. Indeed, were the teacher to study diligently the individual circumstances of each boy or girl, were he to realize that Peter, James, and John have different minds as well as different features, were he to strive to suit his medicine to the present and precise need of his patient, the hours in the classroom would be far easier for the master, far more profitable for the disciple. No two classes are exactly the same in mental caliber, in exterior deportment, or in "preparedness." It is quite fatal to imagine that we can give exactly the same explanation to the class of '19 as we did to the class of '18.

Three Kinds of Students

AFTER years of service, however, we may grow to feel that for convenience the student-species can be divided into three distinct kinds. Some are born to study, some achieve the habit of study, and some have study thrust upon them. The last, as they are the more numerous and take unto themselves a full quota of our time, receive a proportionate attention in educational notes and pedagogical treatises. The middle kind embraces those who, after effort, acquire the habit of study and drill themselves into attention to all that is prescribed. Their sense of duty and propriety waxes keener, and the usefulness of it all becomes more appealing to their ambitions. Nor are they neglected by writers on teaching. The first kind is composed of students after the teacher's own heart; they always work hard and study hard, do their tasks betimes and in their oral repetitions omit never a jot or tittle. Study is as natural to them as sleeping and eating, the entire fulfilment of whatever is prescribed is almost a luxury. We might call them "professional students"; they seem to have settled down to study as their vocation in life. These professional students are a great convenience in a classroom. It is such a relief to be able to summon them to expose the intricate parts of the lesson, or when the afternoon begins to drag and the sun's rays grow slim, to call into play the shining light that will completely reflect what was done so well by the teacher the day before. Every word is rehearsed with the fidelity of a dictaphone. For show purposes they are simply invaluable, whether it be for special feats in a class specimen or for display work before the scrutinizing eye of a supervisor.

The Need of Attention

THE professional student is regarded by many as quite able to take care of himself. He is so responsive that little stimulus is needed to set him in motion. Yet is he really doing his own thinking? Or he is he but a disc that upon the press of the button will mechanically repeat mere impressions? Has he long since laid aside any aspiration to originality, and, blindly obedient, has he submitted to a certain rigidity of thought and formality of expression? Then is he least able to take care of himself. But no one receives greater attention. True, but is this attention on the part of the teacher and the class of any formative value to him? Surely, as a reward of meritorious efforts he deserves the greatest care; the laborer is worthy of his hire. A sense of justice demands that he receive his deserts. However, it is possible that with all his medals and all his premiums, he may depart from scholastic halls the most uneducated, or at least not so formed and highly cultured as is generally thought, especially by himself. It may be that he has developed to the full his powers of mimicry, and will make an excellent duplicator whose only standard of thought is a fac-simile, a parrot with a high-school diploma or an A.B. This is most certainly the result if he has fallen under the intellectual enthralment of a classroom autocrat.

Classroom Autocracy

IN many classrooms it would seem that there is no need of going to Rome for infallibility. Allocutions ex cathedra are pronounced with a finality that puts to flight even the slightest divergence of opinion. There is but one way of answering a query, and that is mine; one only way of solving a problem of translating a phrase, and that is mine. I will take nothing else; woe to him who is foolhardy enough to venture beyond the confines of the professorial Ipse dixit.

> As who should say: I am Sir Oracle,
> And when I ope my lips let no dog bark!

Blessed is he who can answer word for word the dictated precept, whose very voice will so inflect that the tone as well as the thought will re-echo the master's mind and manner. Paul must not speak, or even think, in any way other than that of Gamaliel. What is the result? Intellectual dwarfishness and the destruction of all originality. The faculty of choice, from inertia, has ceased to be an agent; never having faced alternatives, firmness in making up the mind has not been developed, and a certain weakness of character will probably ensue. Those who have learned to swim or to skate only with the aid of a supporting arm are sure to collapse when left to themselves. We are told that blindness in certain aquatic animals can be traced to the fact that their ancestors, having lived all their little lives in dark caves never penetrated by the light of the sun, gradually became blind; their organs of sight from disuse were finally robbed of all power of vision.

A Fair Chance of Self-Development

THE professional student should be made to realize that study is not the be-all and end-all of life. Repetitions by rote of the catechism do not necessarily mean deep knowledge of religion; precepts of rhetoric do not make literateurs; translations lose their force if they become mere exercises in memory. Trite and well-worn as may be the utterance, we cannot insist too strongly that study is only a means to an end. To fit each child for life, personal, social, civil and Christian, is our aim, and should be the aim of each one of our charges. The sooner the master makes himself superfluous, the greater the chance of self-development for his disciples. If our pupils are made to use their own phrasing in answers, if they are given a chance to cast a foreign author into what appears to them the best English equivalent, if even in the assignment of exercises they are allowed a choice of subjects or problems, if a certain freedom is granted to express views for and against in discussions, if, in a word, a fair chance of self-development is had, then will they be ready to go forth into their little world and play the part of protagonists on the stage of life with a sense of power and a full realization of human responsibility. "What a piece of work is man! How noble in reason! How infinite in faculty! In form and moving how express and admirable!"

NOTE AND COMMENT

The Pith of True Culture

IN her words of welcome to the visiting ladies of the Knights of Columbus convention, at Saratoga, Mrs. James D. McNulty dwelt upon the purpose of the war and the meaning of true culture, "a much-abused and misunderstood word":

> Mr. Arthur Balfour, who cannot be accused of over-affection for things Irish or Catholic, said, not so long since, that he had never in all his experience met with such charm of hospitality, such exquisite courtesy as he found among the peasants of Brittany and those of the Connemarra Mountains, in the west of Ireland. He was amazed that these poor people, many of whom could neither read nor write and had little or no contact with the outer world, should evidence such grace of breeding. But the explanation is simple. Into the lives of these peasants there had filtered through generations the influence of a great and refining religion, constantly nourishing their spiritual natures and giving them a culture, limited indeed, but a culture as real as their simple faith.

The man or woman, whose intercourse with their fellowmen is ruled by profound religious principles and sentiments will never be wanting in the highest refinement to which true culture can attain, but no amount of learning, science, literature or even the most familiar acquaintance with "the best society" can ever make a lady or a gentleman.

Wonder Points and the Pope

THE high standard of truth and charity mentioned by some evangelical papers can be gaged from these abstracts taken from the Baptist Watchman.

> The New York Outlook and other notable American periodicals have contained articles that claim to explain the causes that led to the Austro-German invasion of the Venetian provinces, but a satisfactory explanation thus far has not appeared in the American papers. . . . Almost the entire blame may be credited to the Vatican! It is a well-known fact that the Papacy is a friend, secretly, if not openly, to the Central Empires. . . . Priests, both high and low, including a prelate, have been recently condemned to death by a military tribunal in Rome for acts of conspiracy against the Government. The repeated communications of the Pope regarding "peace" have, without doubt, aimed to undermine the morale of the Italian army and people. It is reported on undoubted authority that some Roman Catholic chaplains at the front have done their best to discourage the war. For several months before the famous retreat thousands of copies of the Pope's message concerning peace were distributed by Vatican agents at the front, exhorting soldiers not to fight and promoting a speed treaty peace (sic) in the near future. The Vatican's . . . manifest displeasure at the prominent part Protestant England and America are taking in liberating the world from political and spiritual tyranny are all infallible proofs that the "infallible" head of the Church does not desire the triumph of liberty, justice and democracy.

Nothing need be said in answer to this; its naked, unabashed disregard for truth discloses a perversion of mind too great to be overcome by an ocean of evidence. Even the wonder points placed with such display after simple declarative sentences are out of place.

Catholic Sisters Nursing American Soldiers

WE know that our Catholic Sisters are playing the same heroic part in the present war as on all former occasions. They have notably signalized themselves in France and Belgium for their devotion to the wounded and dying on the battle-fields and in the camp hospitals. But it is particularly consoling to learn that some at least of our own wounded American soldiers are even now committed to their tender care. We can gather this from the passing references made to them in a description given by Charles H. Grasty, in the New York Times, of a visit paid by him to the Paris hospitals. Thus he writes:

> Three cots away was a big fellow with a German name from a Western State. He had been in the Cantigny show. "My wound is only a scratch," he said, "but it is just below the back of my neck where the nerves cross, and it gives me a bad quarter of an hour when the Sisters dress it." . . . Presently the Sisters came and took the dressing off, and the wound looked so terrible that I was obliged to turn away. The "scratch" was nearly twelve inches long and very deep.

Further on he refers to a remarkable case, told him by a Sister of a naturalized American, brought in badly gashed from the field. The Sisters had taken him in charge. When he died they found that his father was an officer in the German army. He was wrapped in the American flag and buried in Paris. We have already quoted, on a previous occasion, the letter of gratitude written by a non-Catholic American soldier whose life was saved by a Sister on the battle-field where no one else had come to rescue him. All honor to the noble nuns of France and Belgium! The sight of them will bring solace and joy to the heart of many an American soldier.

Official Robbery in Mexico

BRIGANDAGE and official robbery are still the order of the day in Mexico. Writing from Guadalajara, a Mexican lawyer says under date of June 15:

> There is a great deal of sorrow and resentment these days in Guadalajara. Many private properties have been "proclaimed" by the Government. Some state that the number exceeds 1,000. The objects of value which still remained in the churches have now been carried off.

Under date of June 16, the writer of another letter, describing conditions in the same city, says:

> I suppose that you are acquainted with the troubles of your friends. Things seem to be worse than at the beginning of the crisis. The State Congress recently passed a bill according to which there is to be but one priest for every 5,000 souls. They have inventoried, or rather, confiscated the property which, as it is expressed, had the misfortune to belong to some priest or cleric. The report is that they carried off a great deal of property from around the Carmen, San José and other churches. The official agent appointed by Carranza to carry out the plan of confiscation, is here now. We cannot tell what will happen.

The agent referred to in the last instance is one of the higher officials of the Ministry of the Interior. He held office in the days of Limantour. These outrages, it must be remembered, were going on at the very time that Carranza's newspaper men were sent to the United States to extol the Carranza rule and were receiving an official welcome. The country is in financial ruin, groups of bandits are roaming about, and every State of Mexico is plunged into indescribable calamity. Bishop Herrera of Tulancingo, who through the good offices of some friends had been permitted by Carranza to return to his diocese under promise of non-interference, was soon forced to leave again. Yet American papers of wide circulation are not wanting to praise this robber administration of tyranny and terror while we are fighting "to make the world safe for democracy."

"John L." as an Apostle?

WE are not accustomed to picture the late pugilistic champion, John L. Sullivan, in the rôle of an apostle. There is something incongruous in the association. Yet the Rev. Mr. Mulford, a former sporting editor, speaking before the Norwood Sunshine Girls at the Floral Avenue Presbyterian Sunday School, Cincinnati, had a characteristic story to tell of the "old Gladiator." At the height of his popularity Sullivan numbered among his most ardent followers, a young Bostonian, Harry Green. "To Green the sun rose and set on John L. Sullivan." But in the early days of Green's hero-worship, "Death's advance agent," the white plague, set its seal upon him. He had wandered far from the fold, and his Catholic mother even now pleaded in vain for permission to call the parish priest. It was then that someone remembered his affection for the champion. The rest of the story must be left for the Presbyterian minister to tell:

Straight to Sullivan a message speeded and to John L. the whole story was told. "Only you," came the plea, "can persuade Harry to see a priest. Won't you come?"

And John L. went. He brought joy to his dying admirer by a personal call. "The Gladiator's" casual suggestion that the Reverend Father be invited to "just drop in" met with a sturdy rebuff, but John L. parried that thrust, tried another straight jab and battered down Green's opposition. The priest was brought by John L. himself.

Some months ago I was on a train coming up from Louisville with John L. and I asked him about this story.

"It's true," said he, "and no fellow ever had a more peaceful, happier death than Harry Green!"

"And, John," said I, "you were the evangelist who led him to peace!"

It was the best victory that "John L." ever won.

"Our Mary" Acting Again

THE war has brought Mary Anderson back to the stage. To help raise funds for relief work, she has played in England, scenes from Shakespeare and other dramas. Our great American Catholic actress thus describes, in the London Universe, how she took the part of "America" in "The Pageant of Fair Women," which was presented in London just after this country entered the war:

> Never have I been so thrilled as when appearing at the top of Queen's Hall stage with a floating American flag as drapery—wearing the spiked golden crown as in the statue of Liberty. I appeared with all the Allies assembled, calling as near a war-trumpet as possible: "Hold! Into your firmament I bring my stars." Beecham's orchestra played the "Star-spangled Banner" as I swept down the steps, and the crowded house rose en masse. The enthusiasm of the audience grew boundless at the appearance of "America" on the crowded stage. After the rousing speech from the new Ally, that most wonderful of battle hymns, "Mine Eyes Have Seen the Coming of the Glory of the Lord," was sung by Agnes Nichols, accompanied by the orchestra—a full choir supplying the necessary chorus. I never loved any part as I did "America" on that occasion. The last lines of my speech: "We will win together everlasting peace by waging ceaseless war, till war shall cease," took the house by storm. It certainly took me likewise by storm.

By her efforts in acting and speaking Mary Anderson says she cleared $118,525 for those suffering from the war.

Recollections of Sister Claire

NEWS was recently received at Maryknoll of the death of a humble mission Sister in China, a member of the English nobility, who had sacrificed her life as a martyr of charity in caring for the pestilence-stricken refugees of the inundation at Chenting-fu. The Superior of Maryknoll, the Very Rev. James A. Walsh, sends the following interesting recollections of her to AMERICA:

> On a recent journey through China from Peking to Hankow, the writer stopped over at a walled city called Chenting-fu. This city is about a mile from the station and is reached either by foot or by a springless cart across trackless land. It had just emerged from the flood and inside the gate mud and water made difficult our passage through the narrow streets, lined with hovels and filled with thousands of staring Chinese. Away from the crowds, though yet within the walls, was the Catholic mission compound, stone-encircled also, and in one corner of the compound some white-cornetted Sisters of Charity were struggling successfully to meet the many needs of those whom God sent to them.
> I had expected to find at Chenting-fu, among these Sisters of Charity, a Sister Claire, with whom I had had occasional correspondence covering a period of fifteen years, but I learned that she had been recently transferred to a point much further south. Sister Claire had left behind her, however, some aching hearts and a void that every one seemed to feel. But que voulez vous?—There was a special need elsewhere and Sister Claire had to fill it whether she liked it or no and whether others liked it or no. Those, then, who were left shrugged their shoulder slightly when I spoke of Sister Claire and said, "Ah, she was so lovable—we miss her very much, but—God's will you know."
> A few weeks later I met Sister Claire on the border of the Yangtse River, at Kiu Kiang, where I was fortunate enough in passing by boat from Hankow to Shanghai, to have a chance to remain for a few hours. She was at the hospital, a large establishment for Europeans and Chinese, that would look hardly out of place in any of our American cities, and as she entered the small reception room with her aged Superior, Sister Vincent McCarthy, she gave a restrained exclamation of joy because for years she had been praying for the coming of English-speaking priests to China, and she knew that this was the purpose of my presence in that country. She was a matronly woman with a countenance that revealed intelligence, refinement, genial humor, and, best of all, the charity that is born of heroic faith.
> And who was she this Sister Claire. I knew—but I also knew how averse she had always been to any publicity, so much so that in writing of her works I had rarely disclosed her name. But now there can be no further objection because Sister Claire has gone to her reward. She was Lady Fielding of England, the Sister of Lord Denbigh, and her ministrations in China covered a period of more than twenty-five years.

The news of her death was sent by her cousin, Sister Xavier, who also has labored a quarter of a century in the Chinese mission field. The only regret which our heroic mission workers, such as these two noble English ladies, have is that "We stay-at-homes cannot realize the opportunity that lies waiting for Catholic apostles in China."

Chronicle

The War.—The most notable event of the week was the advance of the Allied forces, especially of the Italians, on the Albanian front. For many months no action of any importance had taken place in this territory. The front attacked, stretching from the Adriatic Sea to the Tomoritza Valley was held entirely by the Austrians, who had denuded it of troops summoned to help them in the Piave drive. Owing to the mountainous nature of the country there was no continuous line of Allied troops as is the case on the western French front. The forces were broken up into masses which acted in accordance with a general plan but in more or less independent columns.

Bulletin, July 8, p.m.-July 15, a.m.

The first line of advance was the Voyusa River, which after many windings, reaches the Adriatic Sea about fifteen miles north of Avlona, the Italian base. The second line followed the highway from Tepelen to Berat. The third line was along the Tomoritza Valley. The Italians advanced along the coast where they were helped by British monitors of rather low draft which were able to penetrate the bays and rivers and shell the Austrians out of their positions. Their assistance greatly helped the Italians in the capture of Fieri, an important town lying halfway between the coast and Berat. Reaching the lower stretches of the Voyusa River, the Italians with the aid of the British monitors crossed the stream and fought their way northward toward the bend in the Semeni River. The Austrian center was thus exposed to a flank attack by this movement and the entire Austrian army retreated towards Berat, the most important base which the Austrians have in the entire territory. But the Italians pressed on from the west, and quickly seized the heights south and west of Berat, and when the retreating Austrians debouched from Tepelen the Italians had already occupied the commanding crests and almost outflanked their enemy. As a consequence Berat soon fell into the hands of the Italians and the enemy had to retreat still further north. Pressing again from the west of Berat the Italians advanced to the Semeni River and north of that stream and constantly harassed the flanks of the retreating forces.

Further east the French pushed their way forward in conjunction with the Italians, so that their lines run almost directly east and west from Koritza which is held by the French to a point on the mouth of the Semeni, on Pietrit Bay. They took Hill 500 and the villages of Narta and Gramshi. The apparent objective of the Allies, for the present at least, seems to be the highway across Albania which runs along the Skumbi River, through Elbasan to Lake Ochrida, and on to Monastir. It is the main distributing line for the Austrian troops and if the Italians can seize and hold it, the Austrian positions in Albania will be in the greatest danger. But if the Allies advance up the Vardar Valley, they also will have great dangers to face. In front they will have the Austro-German troops, and the Bulgars on their right and rear, with only one railroad tying them to the Allied base at Saloniki.

On the western front the week was passed in a series of nibbling operations carried on successfully by the Allies and causing considerable losses to the enemy. In Flanders the British attacked the German positions near Merris, advancing two hundred and fifty yards on a front of three-quarters of a mile. The Australian forces astride the Somme River drove the enemy back one-third of a mile on a front of two miles, straightening out the salient in their line west of Sailly-Laurette. On the west wing of the great Champagne salient the French attacked the enemy's lines northwest of Longpont, forced the Germans back two-thirds of a mile on a front of two miles, captured Chavigny and the surrounding heights and took some prisoners. They subsequently broke down further resistance north of Chavigny Farm, captured La Grille Farm and quarries, and part of the village of Corcy. Their patrols reached the outskirts of Longpont. The Longpont region lies southwest of Soissons on the edge of the Forest of Villers-Cotterets. The entire village of Corcy, together with the château and farm of St. Paul south of it, subsequently fell into the hands of the French troops, who also occupied Longpont itself and the Javage farm, while on the same day in Picardy, after a heavy attack on a three-mile front between Castel and Mailly-Raineval, southeast of Amiens, they drove the Germans back to near the line of the Avre, capturing the village of Castel and Annchin Farm. Resuming their thrust north of Longpont despite the fiercest resistance, they drove the Germans across the Savières River.

According to the first official Bolshevik communiqué, the Bolsheviki acknowledge the existence of a Czecho-

Slovak front. The communiqué says that armies sent against the Czecho-Slovaks and the White Guards captured the cities of Syzran and Bugulma, and are approaching Stavropol, on the front east of Moscow along the Trans-Siberian Railway, and northeast of Moscow are advancing toward Yaroslav and Rybinsk. The Czecho-Slavs are reported to be hurrying in disorder across the Volga. Dispatches from Peking confirm the news of the Czecho-Slovak domination throughout Western Siberia from the Urals to the Manchurian border. A Stockholm dispatch states that following the landing of Allied troops on the Murman coast on the Arctic Sea, the Bolsheviki ordered a hurried mobilization to oppose them. British troops occupied Kem on the White Sea.

The Czecho-Slovak Front

In the debate on the general political situation opened in the Reichstag on July 11, the Imperial Chancellor von Hertling discussed the recent retirement of Dr. Richard von Kühlmann, the German Foreign Secretary; the foreign policy of the Government, and the economic problems which had arisen because of the developments in the east. The following are the most salient points of the Chancellor's speech:

The von Hertling Speech

I maintain the standpoint of the Imperial reply to the Peace note of Pope Benedict. The pacific spirit which inspired this reply has also inspired me. At the time, however, I added that this spirit must not give our enemies free conduct for an interminable continuation of the war.

What have we lived to see, however? While for years there can have been no doubt whatever of our willingness to hold out our hand toward an honorable peace, we have heard until these last few days inciting speeches delivered by enemy statesmen. President Wilson wants war until we are destroyed, and what Mr. Balfour, the British Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has said must really drive the flush of anger to the cheeks of every German.

We feel for the honor of our fatherland, and we cannot allow ourselves to be constantly and openly insulted in this manner, and behind these insults is the desire for our destruction. As long as this desire for our destruction exists we must endure together with our faithful nation.

The first wireless version of the Chancellor's speech omitted all reference to Belgium. According to another version later made public he denied that Germany intended to retain that country. He is reported to have said: "The present possession of Belgium only means that we have a pawn for future negotiations. We have no intention to keep Belgium in any form whatever." He added:

What we precisely want, as expressed by us on February 24, is that after the war restored Belgium shall as a self-dependent State not be subject to anybody as a vassal and shall live with us in good, friendly relations.

I have held this point of view from the beginning in regard to Belgium, and I still hold it today. This side of my policy is fully in conformity with the general lines, the direction of which I yesterday clearly laid before you.

We are waging the war as a war of defense, as we have done from the very beginning, and every imperialistic tendency and every tendency to world domination has been remote from our minds.

What we want is the inviolability of our territory, open air for the expansion of our people in the economic domain, and naturally, also security in regard to the future. This is completely in conformity with my point of view in regard to Belgium, but how this point of view can be established in detail depends upon future negotiations, and on this point I am unable to give binding declarations.

In reference to the Chancellor's statement that in the possession of Belgium, Germany had a "pawn for future negotiations," an official German telegram to Copenhagen said: "By the expression 'pawn' is meant that one does not intend to keep what one has in one's hand as a pawn if negotiations bring a favorable result."

Canada.—The recent sensational midnight raid on the Jesuit Novitiate at Guelph has resulted in the complete vindication of the victims of this unwarranted attempt to stir up religious bigotry. No further reference would be made to it were it not for the fact that intolerance, having been utterly discredited in Guelph, endeavored through the agency of the Rev. W. D. Spence, to transfer the seat of its operations to Toronto. The outcome has been, thanks to the spirit of fairness of the Toronto press, very gratifying to Catholics. The net result of the "No-Popery" propaganda has been an outspoken testimony to the character of the Jesuits and an indignant protest against the abuse of military power for the purpose of fomenting religious discord. One of the secular papers of Toronto, the Saturday Night, after declaring that "A more wanton or exasperating abuse of power has not been known in connection with the Military Service Act," goes on to say:

The Raid on the Novitiate

The Guelph Ministerial Association took up the matter, and through their chairman, Rev. W. D. Spence, obtained publicity in the Toronto press for what Guelph newspapers, who knew all the circumstances, were very glad to let alone. The result is that all the forces of intolerance, bigotry and ignorance have been temporarily let loose. The mere fact that the Jesuits were shown to be innocent seems to have merely enraged their enemies the more. That they should present proof of innocence has been taken as an evidence of deeper guilt, and Rev. Mr. Spence even had the effrontery to cover his defeat by stating that, with a Jesuit, to lie is the highest virtue. Pulpit utterances make it abundantly clear that the purpose of the whole agitation was not that of augmenting Canada's military forces, but of persecuting Roman Catholic priests because of their faith.

Rev. W. D. Spence was guilty of singular presumption when he said in the pulpit he spoke for all Protestants. As a matter of fact, thousands of decent, intelligent Protestants are probably more indignant than the Jesuits who have been insulted, because they feel that in this sorry affair it is not the Roman Catholic clergy who suffer by comparison.

Let us reverse the case! Suppose a Roman Catholic officer had taken a squad of men and surrounded the Wesleyan Theological Seminary of Montreal, and behaved towards the inmates as did Captain Macauley at Guelph. What an uproar there would have been throughout Canada, what Bible-pounding and tub-thumping, what raucous vituperation from pulpit and platform, what vitriolic screeds in the press! It is clear that in their dignified treatment of their very substantial grievance the Jesuit Fathers of Guelph have put a number of Protestants who call themselves Christian ministers to shame.

One other citation will suffice to show what the public in general thinks of the regrettable incident. The following passage is taken from the Protestant Toronto Weekly Sun:

The Guelph ministers do not seem to have covered themselves with glory. The impression left, at all events, by a hasty reading of the literature of the discussion, already large, is that they have not proved one of their accusations. Not one of the novices, except O'Leary, falls under the law of conscription, and he, it seems, is a dismissed soldier, who has been overseas, is illiterate, and is not one of the Religious Order. Mr. Doherty, who at one time might have been chased out of his office, secures the sympathy of the public, having lost in the service one of his two sons, and the other being, and is now known, medically unfit and legally exempt. It is painful to see that the party which has failed does not offer the apologies customary in a courteous discussion.

To offset and anticipate any endeavor on the part of the Rev. W. D. Spence to make capital out of the recent retirement of Father Borque from the rectorship of the raided Novitate, it is worth noting that he has given up his post as rector, not for any reason connected with the raid, but merely as a consquence of the prescriptions of the new Code of Canon Law. In order to have full freedom for the training and direction of the novices under his care, he has relinquished the government of the entire establishment, while retaining the office of master of novices. His case is exactly similar to that of all masters of novices throughout the world, and is paralleled, to give two instances in point, by the recent retirement from the rectorship of their respective houses by the novice-masters at Poughkeepsie, N. Y., and at Macon, Ga.

Rome.—Echoing the European newspapers, and especially those of France, a portion of the press in the United States has taken up the cry against the Pope for his share in the Cologne incident. The facts are these: At the request of Cardinal Hartmann, Archbishop of Cologne, the Holy Father used his good offices with France and Great Britain in an endeavor to persuade them to abstain from air-raids on the feast of Corpus Christi. Great Britain granted the request and kept the promise made, but on the same day Germany bombarded Paris. French newspapers, especially le Pays la Victoire and La Republique Française took occasion of this deplorable contrast to launch another attack on the Pope, la Pays going so far as to treat the Holy Father as another Pilate, and to ask if he had intervened to save Paris from being bombarded on Good Friday.

The Cologne Incident

On June 3, the Osservatore Romano published the official account of the entire course of the negotiations. Cardinal Hartmann telegraphed Cardinal Gasparri sometime before the feast of Corpus Christi, asking him to use his influence to the effect that there might be no raids on Cologne on the feast on account of the processions in honor of the Blessed Sacrament which would take place that day. The Papal Secretary of State made the following reply to Cardinal Hartmann:

The Holy Father deplores such means of making war on open cities, because they work useless havoc and strike innocent victims, without as a rule reaching military stations. The Holy Father is confident that all the belligerents will have especial regard for the feast of Corpus Christi, and he is making every effort with a view to having the ritual processions take place without disturbance.

To the Holy Father's request, which was forwarded to Great Britain through the Count de Salis, the British Government replied in such a way as to evoke the following comment from the Osservatore Romano:

That Government with most praiseworthy and noble deference, and with a sense of high humanity and religion, made known that orders had been given to refrain from air raids that day on cities not close to the battle-front.

The reply of the French Government was not so favorable. Cardinal Amette forwarded the Pope's request but informed the Holy Father that:

Unfortunately the hope that I might have had of seeing it accepted has been destroyed by the fact that the Germans have recommenced the bombardment of Paris with long-range guns, thus continually exposing the civil population to catastrophes similar to those of Good Friday. The newspapers also announce that Cardinal Hartmann has countermanded the procession.

These are the simple facts. The Pope, as has been his custom from the beginning, interested himself in this particular case to lessen the horrors of war. He made the representations to France and Great Britain at the express request of the German Cardinal. In his reply to Cardinal Hartmann the Papal Secretary took care to ask that all the belligerents, thus implicitly including Germany, should respect the feast of Corpus Christi. In Rome, and especially at the Vatican, as is clear from a dispatch of the Havas Agency, dated Rome, May 31, 1918, a profound impression was made by the news that Germany had not observed the pledge implied in the request of the German Cardinal. If the Pope did not expressly ask of Germany that Paris should not be bombarded on Corpus Christi, it was because he had not been requested to do so; to have taken such a step on his own initiative in behalf of a Government which ignores his existence would have placed him in an absurd position.

The outstanding lesson of the whole incident, as far as the Pope is concerned, is that he continues to pursue his benevolent course in behalf of humanity with absolute impartiality. Sectarian misrepresentation cannot distort this fact, and every attempt to do so serves only to bring into sharper relief the nobility of his aims and actions.

In replying to a recent address of the Bishops of Lombardy the Holy Father spoke with deep feeling of the campaign of calumny that is constantly being waged against the Holy See. Above all the horrors of the present conflict which weigh so heavily on the Father of Christendom, great grief comes to him owing to the insidious and crafty misrepresentation of every effort that he has made to mitigate war's fearful consequences. He continued:

> More than once, and especially in the Consistorial Allocution of December, 1915, and again more explicitly in the other of December 4 in the following year, We reproved as We again now reprove every kind of violation of right wherever it may be perpetrated. In addition to that, with exhortations, public prayers, expiatory functions, with proposals for a just and lasting peace, We studied to bring nearer the end of this awful slaughter. In spite of that you know well the crazy and absurd calumnies, which under many and varied forms, publicly and secretly, by word of mouth and in writing, are being spread everywhere. In the country and in the villages where sorrow is deepest, and on that account more deserving of regard and respect, it is said that We desired the war; in the cities, on the other hand, it is spread about that We desire peace, but an unjust peace which would be an advantage only to one of the belligerent groups. And Our words are so twisted, Our thoughts and intentions so suspected, Our silence with regard to this or that misdeed so scandalously misinterpreted, as if in such a state of uncertainty and when passion is so fiercely aroused it were easy or even possible to inflict single condemnations on single facts which, by a condemnation pronounced by Us, in virtue of a general all-embracing principle, have, every one of them, already been reproved, and surely with fairer judgment.

The Pope then calls attention to the fact that darts of hatred are not only directed against the Holy See, but that the policy of the enemies of the Church is to impugn the loyalty of patriotic bishops and priests. At the very moment when Italy stands in need of peace and concord among all citizens, the enemies of religion are striving to stir up the ignorant and the simple against the Pope, the Italian clergy, and the Catholic people, sowing seeds of discord among the different social classes. The Holy Father is neither surprised nor discouraged by these unwarranted attacks. Far from it. "Called by the hidden counsels of Divine Providence to govern the Church, We have a profound feeling of Our duty to defend its sanctity and safeguard its honor. And therefore against this diffusion of calumnies and hatred We . . . protest anew with the Voice of Our Divine Ministry, and We denounce it before the conscience, not only of the Faithful, but of all honest men wherever honest men may be found."

Russia.—Count von Mirbach, the German Ambassador to Russia, was assassinated at Moscow on July 6 by two unknown men who secured under false pretences admittance to his private office where they first wounded him with two revolver-shots and then killed him with a hand-grenade. An anti-Bolshevist revolt followed, the Social Revolutionists fiercely attacking the Bolsheviki in the streets, but the latter soon quelled the disturbance. Though the Social Revolutionists and the Bolsheviki do not differ much in their political principles, the former, whose strength lies in the peasantry, are angry at the terms of the Brest-Litovsk treaty and at the growth of German influence in Russia. Von Mirbach's murder resulted from this feeling. It is said that some weeks ago he sent for the leaders of the Liberal parties and promised that if they would cooperate with Germany, he would overthrow the Bolsheviki, and then secure a revision of the Brest-Litovsk treaty that would be more favorable to Russia. But von Mirbach's offer was rejected and so he turned to the Bolsheviki who then persecuted the Liberals, and the affair ended in the Ambassador's assassination.

Von Mirbach's Murder

The latest plans for intervention propose sending into Siberia with the commission a large enough military force to protect both the personnel of the commission and such local governments as are established by the Russian people. All the Allies are expected to be represented in both the commission and in the military force. The Supreme War Council at Versailles, it is reported, has laid before our Government certain recommendations regarding intervention which have not been favorably received at Washington. It is not expected that the Administration will take advantage of the fact that the Czecho-Slovak forces hold long stretches of the Trans-Siberian Railroad. John Soukine, of the Russian Embassy at Washington, urges that the Czecho-Slovaks be helped at once. He says:

Intervention Plans

> Two equally horrifying possibilities have to be anticipated. Either, without an immediate allied military support of the Czecho-Slovaks, who are only partly armed, they might be exposed to a desperate struggle with the Bolshevist-German troops; or even if through negotiations a peaceful exodus of the Czecho-Slovaks would be achieved, what would then become of the Russian newly elected local governments? Having joined in a spontaneous move with the Czecho-Slovaks, then, if abandoned to themselves, these local governments would be certainly left to a pitiless massacre and punishment for having manifested national and anti-German feelings.

It is proposed that an army composed only of Slavs should be formed to fight the Bolsheviki.

Mr. Robert Crozier Long recently contributed to the New York Evening Post an interesting explanation of the religious phase of the Bolshevist movement. Its leaders are rationalists and materialists, but the peasant soldiery who carry out the orders of its heads are taught that "Bolshevism is the only true Socialism," the aim of which is "to make Russia's people happy, to spread truth abroad, to overthrow false despotism and bourgeois government and to enforce eternal peace by extirpating the poison-brood of war-makers." These noble ends are to be attained, the simple peasants are told,

Bolshevist Fanaticism

> By the adhesion of the Russian masses in burning faith and zeal; by unshrinking measures against the enemies of the people; by unqualified obedience to those leaders who, by their victory over the bourgeoisie, so far have shown their predestined fitness for the task of rescuing Russia and humanity.

The Dielo observes that: "Bolshevik soldiers, honestly convinced of their right and justice, raid houses in search of kramola (sedition) by which they mean the holding of non-Bolshevist views.

France's Traffic in Souls

J. HARDING FISHER, S.J.

THE dominant political party in France, with its 1,076,000 functionaries, and especially its department of public instruction, as has been shown in recent issues of AMERICA, has long had, and still has, for its deliberate purpose, openly and officially expressed, to deprive French children of their Faith, and to keep the public schools, what they have been in fact for many years, nurseries of atheism. This political party, which is firmly entrenched in power, has been, and still is, the sworn enemy and persecutor of the Church; its public schools, in spite of their pretense of neutrality, are so dangerous that Catholic parents and the united French Hierarchy are prepared to suffer any consequences rather than permit Catholic children to attend them. The "Fatherless Children of France," by the admission of its own officials, is in entire agreement with this party, and declares that the orphans it proposes to assist will most certainly attend these public schools (AMERICA, June 29, 1918, July 13, 1918). By one of its statutes (Titre I. b/) the numerous Catholic orphanages and boarding schools, in which the most destitute of the orphans are enjoying a home and a refuge, are excluded from any share in its benefactions.

Americans may have no power to secure a just execution of the Loi sur les Pupilles de la Nation, to enforce an equitable and impartial distribution of the 2,000,000 francs, about to be appropriated by the French Government for the adoption of the wards of the nation, to block the working out of the new campaign to create a State monopoly of the orphans, or to minimize the permanent danger it is to the sacred rights of families and the religious conscience of the children. Over the funds contributed by Frenchmen they may have no control. But they have the duty to see to it that money contributed by Americans shall not be made to minister to a plan for depriving our beneficiaries of their Christian heritage. Our people have no intention of restricting their benefactions to the protégés of the French atheists; the object of the immense sums we are contributing, which in France are thought likely to amount eventually to not less than 200,000,000 francs, is to help all the orphans without distinction of creed, school or political affiliation. Yet there is ample evidence that American confidence is being abused, and that American money is being diverted by Frenchmen to subserve sectarian and political purposes.

An infamous traffic in children is taking place in France. No one acquainted with the facts can doubt of its existence. M. Jean Guiraud has called attention to it repeatedly in a number of issues of La Croix (December 15, 1917, March 1, 1918, May 7, 1918). In the last-named issue he says:

> The "sales of children" continue to take place in shameless fashion throughout France. The State schoolteachers display monthly stipends, sometimes with back-payments for many months, in order to induce the war widows to confide their children to them, after they have withdrawn them from the free [Catholic] schools that they have already chosen. We have a whole bag full of letters on the subject, sent to us from widely separated districts. (La Croix, May 7, 1918.)

The following are some of the letters which he has printed in the same issue. The first is from the commune of Mayenne:

> The situation of little C—— (the child of a poor dressmaker, a war-widow, with a daughter of seven years and a boy of six years) is the more worthy of interest, because her mother, a widow of more than six months, has been the object of this infamous "sale of children," so justly denounced by M. Jean Guiraud. She received a formal promise of five francs a month for her little daughter, but on the express condition that she should send her to the public school. The mother has nobly rejected such a bargain, by sending her little one to our Christian school.

Many obstacles were put in her way to prevent her from soliciting aid from Catholic sources. Another letter is from the Hautes-Pyrénées:

> The two widows, D.-M. and D. preferred to be deprived of the assistance promised them by the public school rather than withdraw their children from the free school.

Here is a letter from Vienne:

> The public school assures the children it fears will enter our classes that they shall have no assistance if they do not enter the public school.

Another letter, from the department of the Ariège:

> The families that have given us their little orphans are constantly harassed by the public school, which, for a long time, has been distributing assistance to the little orphans.

Another letter, from Finistère:

> She [a good aunt who has gathered together five children, who have lost both father and mother] has seen herself refused for some months her allowance, and she has been told that if the children were at the public school, she would obtain it more quickly. She has held firm, however, and will have nothing to do with the public teaching at any price.

The three following letters are taken from the issue of La Croix for March 1, 1918. The first was written by a schoolmistress of a free school in the South. After speaking of the foundation of the Oeuvre des Pupilles de l'Ecole laïque, she continues:

> The result of this creation was not long delayed; many war orphans have already left, and the day of their entrance into the public school, their relatives received, as back-pay, fifty francs. How can we struggle against such arguments? I still have four war orphans whom their mothers hesitate to withdraw.

Another letter speaks of the work of a State schoolteacher of Central France:

> At every moment, on one pretext or another, she is having the allowance withdrawn from mothers who have their daughters at the free school, and I have to work with her to obtain reparation for these cases of injustice.

Another letter is from a poor mother in Finistère:

> I have been a war widow for three years; I have a little daughter, eleven years old, and am without any means of livelihood except my allowance. Very often I have asked for help at the mayor's house; on every occasion they have refused me categorically, because my child is at the free school, and, as I do not wish to send her to the public school, I am deprived of all the help given to the commune.

In La Croix for March 1, 1918, M. Jean Guiraud sums up the situation as follows:

The State schoolteachers, almost always secretaries in the mayor's house, only too often make the dictates of their sectarian passions the rule for distributing the allowances granted to the wives of those at war and the assistance given to their widows; and in their case they traffic with a misery which they ought to hold sacred: either the public school with the allowance, or the free school with privation of assistance. We have a bag of letters, growing more full every day, sent from every point in France which tell us of this bargaining for the souls of the little children of our soldiers, who are either fighting or else have laid down their lives.

M. Jean Guiraud affirms that it was for the purpose of purchasing these children that the Oeuvre des Pupilles de l'Ecole laïque was founded. Its object is defined in its statutes to be the giving of assistance not only to the orphans already in the public schools, but also, and especially, those who can be induced to attend them, "that is to say," says M. Guiraud, "in less hypocritical language, all those, who, by threats or promise, they can entice away from the free schools, by speculating on the misery of their mothers, the war widows."

M. Guiraud has no hesitation in saying that the money used for this detestable bait is the money of the Fatherless Children of France:

It is the help of the Fraternité Franco-Américaine [the French title for Fatherless Children of France] of which the State schoolteachers in many places are disposing with full liberty, causing it to be distributed en masse to their own pupils and refusing it to ours. We are informed in a letter from a parish in the département of the Seine: "In almost all our communal schools the children are officially inscribed in the Fraternité Franco-Américaine by the directors and directresses." On the other hand we have received word from many départements that the schoolmasters have had the children attending the free schools deprived of the assistance of the Fraternité.

The following letters printed by M. J. Guiraud in La Croix, the first in the issue of March 1, 1918, and the second in the issue of May 7, 1918, are indications of the manner in which American money is being used. The first letter is from Vienne:

The teacher of the public school of —— said to a mother: "I am the one who obtained this American aid for your children. They tell me that you wish to send your daughters to the Catholic school. . . . If you do so, I will have the assistance stopped." The poor woman bowed before the threat.

The second letter records a similar incident with a different result:

Several weeks ago we received a letter from Maine-et-Loire. The master of the public school, abusing his functions as secretary of the mayor, said to Madame Vve. B: "Madame, if you wish to be assisted by the Fraternité Américaine, take your little girls from the Christian school and put them under the care of the public-school master." Madame B. refused to make such a bargain.

If these were isolated instances, they might be set aside as irrelevant and regarded as rare exceptions, merely incidental, perhaps inevitable, in the working out of a thoroughly benevolent purpose. Unfortunately this appears not to be the case, for M. Guiraud says, in the passage quoted above: "It is the assistance of the Fraternité Franco-Américaine [Fatherless Children of France] of which the schoolteachers in many places are disposing with full liberty, causing it to be distributed en masse to their own pupils and refusing it to ours."

M. Guiraud, therefore, presents proof to show that the public-school teachers are using American money to lure French children from Catholic schools into the public schools; he explicitly asserts that this is being done with full liberty, and throughout France, on a large scale, and he complains bitterly of the misplaced confidence of those who believe that there is no ground for worry. He is far from laying the blame for this abominable traffic on Americans. On the contrary, he says that the particularly odious feature of the affair is the fact that this corruption of a work of benevolence is in direct contradiction with the express wishes of the donors to remain outside of France's political struggles, and to give their money to all the orphans of the war without distinction of party, belief or school.

There are three forces in France which constitute a triple coalition against the Church: the State, especially through its department of public instruction, the Jews and the French Freemasons. With all three the Fatherless Children of France is on intimate terms.

It has its rooms in Paris in the offices of the French Ministry of Public Instruction, under the eye of the inspectors of education and the protection of the Vice-Rector of the University of Paris. The honorary president of the Fatherless Children of France is M. Painlevé, formerly Minister of Public Instruction, an ex-President of the Council, one of the favorites of the Masonic Ligue de l'Enseignement, and the very man whose publicly expressed jubilation over the adoption of the orphans by the nation was characterized in Paris as an imprudent unveiling of atheistic designs to make of these poor children a political prey. One of the delegates of the Fatherless Children wrote to M. Painlevé in October, 1917, when he was Minister of War: "You have had the unshaken and unfailing support of the work. Your name is linked with it from one end of America to the other."

One of those most interested in the founding of the Fatherless Children, Mlle. Dick May, a Jewess, who until recently was one of its three vice-presidents, stands high in the favor of the fine flower of French Freemasonry, and shared the counsels of M. Malvy until he was arrested for treason. M. Hovelacque and M. Georges Pagès, Inspectors General of Public Instruction, and M. Lapie, Director of Primary Instruction throughout France, have been or are members of the Administrative Committee of the Fatherless Children.

M. Lucien Poincaré is Vice-President of the Fatherless Children, but at the same time he is the Vice-Rector of the University of Paris and President of the Oeuvre des Pupilles, the association which is the most active agent in the traffic of children. The Secretary General of this same odious association, M. Xavier Léon, was, until recently, the Secretary General of the Fatherless Children, and is at present one of its Administrative Committee.

It taxes credulity to the utmost to believe that these high officials of the Fatherless Children who at the same time are officials in the Department of Public Instruction or in the odious Oeuvre des Pupilles, can play the parts of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde so well as to be in one function resolutely intent on depriving the war orphans of their Faith, and in the other seriously resolved on having them brought up in the religious convictions of their fathers.

Chicago's Censorship of Films

F. G. Dinneen, S.J.

THE most important department of Chicago's city government is its censorship of the "movies," because it has achieved a marked degree of success in dealing with one of the gravest social and moral problems of the day. It is a notable fact that Chicago was one of the first, if not the very first large city in the world to deal effectively with the new and difficult problem arising from the public exhibition of moving-pictures. Ordinances governing such exhibitions were passed by the city council in 1907 and have done excellent service in repressing objectionable pictures shown freely in other cities. We are proud of the record made by our department of censorship in spite of vicious attacks upon it. Indeed, it is honored all the more for the very enemies it has made. Of them and their tactics, more will be said after explaining the plan of censorship.

In the first place Chicago's ordinances forbid the public display of any film until it has been inspected, approved and licensed. This is a very decided advantage over the method followed in Boston, St. Louis, San Francisco, and many other cities where the pictures are released for public showing and then viewed by inspectors: or worse still no attention is paid to them unless some one complains about their character. This Pandora-box plan is impracticable and ineffective. Between ten and twenty thousand new films are produced every year. Allow the clever and all too enterprising promoters to turn them loose uncensored in the ubiquitous picture-theaters, and no group of inspectors can ever check them up. In this matter above all others a little prevention is more effective than the remedial efforts of a whole police force.

In Chicago no permit may be given for any picture that is immoral, or obscene, or portrays any riotous, disorderly or unlawful scene, or tends to disturb the public peace, or is offensive to any creed, nationality or class of citizens. These regulations are broad enough to include all objectionable features and sufficiently specific to enable the censors to understand just what must be rejected or cut out. In these days of widely diversified moral standards, the word immoral might seem to present special difficulty. So thought the moving-picture promoters when they fought the Chicago ordinances even up to the Supreme Court of Illinois. There their validity was upheld in the case of Block versus the City of Chicago, and an opinion rendered by Chief Justice Cartwright which deserves to rank as a classic in moving-picture litigation. It may be found in number 239 of the "Illinois Reports." The words of Justice Cartwright on the moral standard are well worth quoting:

> Manifestly it would be impossible to specify in an ordinance every picture or particular variety of a picture which would be considered immoral or obscene, and no definition could be formulated which could afford a better standard than the words of the ordinance. It is doubtless true, as said by counsel, that there are people who differ on the subject as to what is immoral or obscene. There are the shameless and unclean, to whom nothing is defilement and from whose point of view no picture would be considered immoral or obscene. Perhaps others would be found, with no laxity of morals, who pay homage to art and would not regard anything as indelicate or indecent which had artistic merit, and would look upon any persons entertaining different sentiments as of inferior intelligence, without proper training on the subject and blinded by bigotry. Both classes are exceptional, and the average person of healthy and wholesome mind knows well enough what the words immoral and obscene mean and can intelligently apply the test to any picture presented to him.

Censorship has been effective in Chicago because the ordinances have been strictly enforced. The authority for inspecting and licensing films is vested primarily in the superintendent of police. That is just where it belongs according to Justice Cartwright. "The purpose of the ordinance," he says, "is to secure decency and morality in the moving-picture business, and that purpose falls within the police power." The active enforcement of censorship is subdelegated to the second deputy of police with a board of twelve censors working under his supervision. An apartment in the city hall is so fitted up that three sets of films can be inspected at the same time by members of the board working in squads. In the case of a problem picture, the whole board reviews it, and often expert opinion is called in. Prolonged personal observation enables the writer to bear testimony to the conscientious effort made to secure a verdict that shall safeguard public morality according to the law, and at the same time do no injustice to the owner of the picture. An appeal to a court of justice is allowed to determine whether the censors have exceeded their discretionary power. The courts have upheld the findings of the censors with remarkable unanimity. This whole arrangement constitutes a well-balanced system that is practical, safe and effective. It combines centralized authority and responsibility with the resultant judgment of a jury which is safeguarded against undue influence and possible corruption. The charge of "one-man power" so vehemently raised against it is specious, false and hypocritical.

The vastness, difficulty, and importance of the task performed by the censors is evidenced by the fact that 10,694 films, or about 11,000,000 feet, on every conceivable subject were inspected last year. They rejected 153 films as entirely unfit for public display. "Cutouts" were made from about fifty per cent of the rest, totaling 216,556 feet. While viewing a picture, the censors take notes, then confer and agree on what parts must be eliminated. Cuts must be made by the owner of the film and deposited before a license is granted. A list of the cut-outs is marked on the permit so that an inspector visiting the theater can see whether those parts are omitted. Certain censors are detailed each day to inspect the theaters. Without this very important precaution, tricks of the trade would render censorship ineffective. It is very regrettable that the censors have no supervision or control over the suggestive and alluring posters placed outside theaters where inoffensive pictures are shown. Suppression of these suggestive and misleading advertisements and the elimination of the "pink permit" given to pictures "for adults only" are two reforms that will soon remove the only serious defects from Chicago's plan of censorship.

It is not easy to estimate or measure exactly the beneficial results of the above plan, and to express them in words is almost impossible. A long list of the subtitles and scenes eliminated could easily be given; but they are so indecent as to be utterly unfit for print. What must the pictures be! Nothing short of a visit to the boardrooms and a view of the cut-outs can convey an adequate knowledge of the disgusting sights and hideous exhibitions from which the people of Chicago have been saved by their censorship. The effect of such a visit is sure to be shocking, for many it is positively sickening; but it never fails to rouse parents, clergy, officials, and members of civic organizations to a realization of the tremendous importance of one department of our city government.

It would be too much to say that nothing objectionable ever escapes the censors; but relatively speaking the results are very gratifying. Compared with other large cities the Chicago movies are clean. I have heard promoters howl with rage and indignation when they brought their lascivious, sex-problem, and criminal exhibitions here and had them rejected or badly cut. There resentful protests were based on the fact that the same pictures were freely shown in New York and other eastern cities without the slightest objection. The approval of the National Board of Review is often flaunted and appealed to as if it were the ultimate criterion of all that is good and pure. Indeed, it is far from being such, and the Chicago censors wisely refuse to recognize a court of appeal instituted and maintained by the moving-picture interests. This National Board of Review is a purely volunteer organization without any authorization or approval except what it gets from the associated film-producers. In view of the fact that many cities accept their findings as a safe and sufficient censorship, their proceedings, standards and ideals deserve more criticism than can be given here.

Far from being enemies of the moving-picture industry as such, the Chicago censors have acted the part of the wise surgeon by cutting out the moral rot thereby contributing most effectively to the healthy development of the business with all its immense possibilities for good. The more respectable producers of films appreciate the saving value of censorship and have recorded their approbation. They know full well that their worst enemies are those of their own household. These managing spirits, who imagine that a picture must be nasty to be a financial success, have waged relentless warfare on censorship in Chicago and have done their worst to destroy it and discredit it at home and abroad. Their attacks have proved worse than futile. As the fight waxed hotter, public interest was stirred, the issue studied, its importance realized, and the moral forces of the city rallied to its defense. As a consequence strict censorship is here to stay.

The head of this department has repeatedly said that the preservation of censorship is due chiefly to the energetic support of Catholic influences. This fact is mentioned, not as a boast, but as an example, with the hope that it may stimulate the interest and activity of Catholics generally in striving for the solution of this vital problem. The very souls of our children are at stake. The movies are the most serious menace to their moral welfare. Therefore, we cannot remain passive or indifferent. It is futile merely to inveigh against the moving-picture theaters. They are an integral part of our social life, and they are here to stay. Help to make them clean and wholesome places of public entertainment. Strict censorship is the means, and it is our duty to support it. For several years this was done here in Chicago by one or two priests. Then more vigorious action became imperative, and was approved by his Grace, the Most Reverend Archbishop. The heads of Catholic organizations met and addressed a strong protest to all the city officials against the forces and influences seeking to destroy censorship. When an amending ordinance of a vicious character seemed certain to be passed by the city council, a letter was sent to all the pastors of the city urging vigorous opposition in their parishes. As a result, instead of passing, the ordinance was referred back to committee by a vote of fifty-four to sixteen. This was a decisive victory for the advocates of censorship, but it does not dispense with that vigilance which is the price of final victory in the Church militant.

Some Tactics of Prohibitionists

GEORGE E. HOADLEY

THIS paper, like its predecessors, is neither a defense of the saloon nor an attack on it. The saloon is not the topic under discussion, but only the aims and methods of certain bone-dry Prohibitionists who under the guise of exterminating the public bar are attempting by fair and foul means to interfere with the legitimate customs of citizens, especially with the use of sacramental wine.

That some of the leaders in this illegal movement are bitterly anti-Catholic, while others are imprudent in their actions and insulting in their words is not hard to prove. To begin with, the great leader of the anti-Catholic movement today, Sidney J. Catts, Governor of Florida, was elected on an anti-Catholic platform: abuse of Catholicism was his only stock in trade—his only claim for support at the polls. His candidacy had been repudiated by other political parties and the Prohibitionists put him on their ticket. He says himself that "the Methodist Church fought, like a tiger, to the last ditch," to place him in the Governor's chair, and the head of the Anti-Saloon League is a bishop of that church. Not content, however, with allowing the anti-Catholic candidate to remain in the political arms of the Methodist Church, the Anti-Saloon League threw the weight of its organization, its money, its speakers, into the campaign. Catts, as the candidate of the Methodist Church, the Prohibition party, and the Anti-Saloon League, campaigning on an issue of intolerance, was elected Governor of Florida. Today, he is wandering into other States, in an effort to spread this intolerance. But he has lost none of his prestige with the Anti-Saloon League. When it held its national convention in Washington, December 10 to 13, 1917, the Governor was one of its honored guests and speakers. The proceedings of that eighteenth national convention, published by the League, is now off the press. The speech of Governor Catts has been carefully eliminated from the report. No mention of his name appears among the list of speakers, arranged alphabetically. Why? Because the Anti-Saloon League is too wily to be hoisted by its own petard. But, alas and alack, some one in the publishing office blundered. Some proof-reader fell by the wayside. For, in "The Convention Story," printed on page fourteen, the following little paragraph tells the tale:

> The Program. The program was carried out practically as had been previously arranged. The addresses given will be found in full upon the succeeding pages of this book. On Tuesday night ex-Secretary of State, Hon. William Jennings Bryan; General Superintendent Rev. P. A. Baker, D.D.; Dr. Ira Landirth and Governor Sidney J. Catts of Florida, addressed the overflow meeting at the First Presbyterian Church.

While his address has been omitted from the convention proceedings, it will be seen by the paragraph quoted, that Catts was numbered among the chosen orators, and was arrayed with the bright particular stars of the convention. The address of Governor Catts does not appear, but one sentence of that speech rings clear, even through it is not reproduced in a report of the proceedings. Said Catts:

> Liquor may not be imported into the State of Florida (after I get through with the Prohibition measure, and after the bill has been passed by the people) for any purpose whatsoever, and the man who needs liquor for his religion had better prepare to take his religion out of Florida.

Speaking for Oklahoma, the Anti-Saloon League representative declared that "Liquor cannot now be imported into the State for any purpose whatsoever," to the wild applause of the gathered fanatics. That statement, however, has also been blue-penciled out of the official report.

The New York State edition of the American Issue, official publication of the Anti-Saloon League, in its issue of November 6, 1915, prints on its editorial page, as a leading article, a paper which is headed: "Discovered—a Church after the Saloonkeeper's Heart. And it is not a Roman Catholic Church."

The same paper, in its issue of July 10, 1915, devotes more than a page to what is said to be a reprint from the New York World. The article is headed: "Interview with Officers of Catholic Prohibition League by New York World." The article, however, deals entirely with statements made by the Rev. George Zurcher. The papers quote as "some of Fr. Zurcher's striking utterances," these and similar strictures on perfectly respectable organizations of high-minded men:

> The Catholic Club of New York pays annually over $1,000 for a license to sell intoxicants to its members, every day, Sunday included. One of its members has not yet been able to convince it that it ought not to sell intoxicants on Good Friday.
> In our large cities the brewer is the king. The Church in the United States is nearly silenced. Is he (the king) trying to hypnotize her, too?
> If the Jesuits of New York know of another effectual remedy for the plague of intemperance they ought to bring it forth instead of condemning the only effectual remedy [Prohibition] known.

The Anti-Saloon League journal continues:

> Just now the "big man" in Catholic Prohibition activities is the Rev. George Zurcher, pastor of a small parish at North Evans, in Erie County, New York. Father Zurcher has made that little-known town famous as the town of the original "Priest-Prohibitionist." * * * No anti-temperance activity in his Church escapes him. He denounces the Catholic Club of New York for having a bar in its basement and selling liquor on Sunday, and quotes the discipline of the Church to show that drinkers, to whom drinking is the occasion of mortal sin, may get "absolution" from a confessor, but he says it is of "no avail," and they are "guilty of a sacrilegious confession" if they have not a "true and firm" purpose of abstaining from intoxicants. He advocates the use of unfermented wine at Mass.
> Father Zurcher was one of several priests who signed the following petition to the Pope: By permitting us, undersigned, priests in the United States, to use unfermented wine in Mass, according to the ancient discipline of the Church, Your Holiness would wonderfully help to abate that raging pestilence which every year in these United States alone kills in soul and in body about 35,000 Catholics. The alcoholic liquor traffic controls and corrupts our civil government, bribes the clergy into silence, is most powerful and devastating where Catholics are numerous, and constitutes the greatest hindrance to the conversion of Protestants.

The American Issue concludes:

Of the C. T. A. U. he (Father Zurcher) says: The fossilized C. T. A. U. theory is a sinister and shocking reality, in so far as it serves as a rampart protecting the liquor traffic from annihilation in America. * * * The National Union, so big, so Catholic, so tolerant of the saloon, must not be shocked to learn that most brewers and liquor dealers in America today are Catholic. The great National Union and the great liquor business look like two quiet and harmonious brothers in the one Church.

Regarding the taking of money from liquor dealers, Father Zurcher says: The brewer controls the politics of large cities, and his sway will be unmolested as long as he plasters the mouth of the Church with bank checks and glucose. It is high time for the Church to reaffirm her ancient discipline in regard to contributions from liquor men.

The publication from which the above is quoted, the American Issue, surely could not lay claim to being other than anti-Catholic. The New York State edition, is the official mouth-piece of William H. Anderson, Superintendent of the New York State Anti-Saloon League. Presumably, it represents his views. The Rev. Rollin O. Everhart, its New York State editor, is also a member of the National Board of Directors of the Anti-Saloon League. Mr. Anderson is likewise a member of the same board, so it is fair to presume that they echo the views of the national organization.

The American Issue, national edition, of March 2, 1918, attempts to belittle Cardinal Gibbons in an article printed at the top of its editorial page, headed: "Cardinal Gibbons not the head of the Catholic Church in U. S." This article was written by John F. Cunneen, an employee of the Anti-Saloon League, whom the League advertises as "a Catholic layman of Chicago." The comments on the venerable Cardinal conclude with these words:

Cardinal Gibbons is with a woful minority among the clergy of the Catholic Church. Cardinal Gibbons was eighty-two years of age last July. In 1914 Cardinal Gibbons said: "I am too old now to change my attitude on a subject as important as this [Prohibition]." The people of the country are not going to be swayed by the views of a man who is in his eighty-third year, and who said when he was eighty that he was too old to change his attitude upon the question of Prohibition.

The fact that the Anti-Saloon League has reprinted this tirade in circular form and is advertising it for sale, shows conclusively, its attitude toward the beloved Cardinal who has always been so sane and considerate in his views.

The Anti-Saloon League publishes and advertises for sale, a pamphlet called "Catholic Temperance," written by a young priest of a middle western State (Indiana). A full-page picture of Pope Leo XIII would lead one to believe that the pamphlet was Catholic in tone. On page fifteen, however, a priest, wearing the vestments and standing in the pulpit, is surrounded by a figure of blind justice, the scales weighted down with bribes. A slimy hand reaches out from a barrel labeled "Saloon Octopus," and closes the mouth of the priest.

The Anti-Saloon League also issues a circular, showing a picture of Cardinal Mercier, and quoting his utterances against alcoholism, a quite different thing, by the way, from bone-dry Prohibition. The circular tells of "What came out of Belgium's cellars," and says, in part:

It is now a well-attested fact, if not, indeed, a matter of common knowledge, that the sack of Louvain and the nameless horrors visited by the German soldiery upon the Belgium women were the result of drink which the victorious Teutons found in the cellars of that hapless town. * * * But, after all, Belgium as a nation suffers only what individuals have suffered from drink for ages.

In the Texas campaign, a few years ago, a Catholic priest happened to say a good word for a Protestant candidate for Governor of that State. The Anti-Saloon League immediately issued a circular which it is still distributing with other samples of its "literature." The circular declares: "It is well known that whatever Catholic priests do is in the interest of their Church, a fundamental Catholic doctrine is that their Church ought to dominate and control civil government." The circular adds that a man endorsed by a priest would be "under obligations to the Catholic Church, as such, as well as to the liquor interests of the State. Without a word more, all Protestants ought to know what to do with any candidate having such a backing."

Lately the League has sent broadcast a document which declares that "The Oklahoma Sacramental Wine Case is not Settled." Rev. Purley A. Baker, its Methodist Superintendent vaguely says: "The Methodist church does not favor the use of fermented wine in the Sacrament. The Baptist church, like the Methodist, is radical. The W. C. T. U. has moral suasion arguments against the use of liquor for medicinal and sacramental purposes."

The W. C. T. U. prints a pamphlet, circulated likewise by the Anti-Saloon League, which says that it is "interesting to know that the Rev. Father Zurcher is one of the men who do not believe in using fermented wine at the Lord's Supper."

And so on to the end of the chapter. The Methodists are today engaged in raising a "thank offering," in order to build a temple at Washington, "a monument of gratitude for National Prohibition." The Methodists and the Anti-Saloon League are too clever to come out in the open, until they feel, as in Florida with Catts, that the ground is secure. The League may continue to employ Catholic men and women, and even, occasionally, the clergy, the better to throw dust in the eyes of the Catholic people. It is all part of the game.

The Baltimore Cathedral

RAPHAEL S. PAYNE

A LANDMARK invested with the vital and immortal associations of 113 years, the beautiful old Baltimore cathedral has been the scene of many notable functions and deliberations whose majesty and wisdom have unequivocally reflected the spirit of the Church militant and patriotic in America. John Carroll, the first Bishop of the United States, was the inspiration of the movement which created this cathedral.

Bishop Carroll was born in the Maryland colony in the year 1735, his mother being endowed with those traits and virtues which find fruition in domestic felicity. He was educated at the College of St. Omer, where Charles Carroll, his kinsman and a Signer of the Declaration of Independence, was also a pupil, and his consecration as bishop took place at Dorsetshire, England, August 15, 1790, in the private chapel of Mr. Thomas Weld, some of whose descendants in recent years settled in Baltimore. An interesting coincidence of his consecration was the fact that Bishop Madison of the Episcopal Church of Virginia, who was on a similar mission, sailed for England and returned to America on the same ship as Bishop Carroll, and on the voyage a pleasant friendship sprang up between the two prelates.

Bishop Carroll was a great patriot, and in appreciation of his exalted views of life, his nobility of character and scholarly attainments he was invited by Congress to deliver a panegyric, February 22, 1800, on the character of President Washington. This oration has been preserved in the archives of Maryland as a model of style.

His Eminence, Cardinal Gibbons, in a historical sermon at the time of the Cathedral centenary said:

> I regard the selection of Bishop Carroll as a most Providential event, which was fraught with far-reaching consequences for the welfare and development of the Catholic Church in America. For if at that time a prelate of narrow views, a man out of sympathy and harmony with the spirit and genius of the new Republic, had been chosen the progress of religion would have been seriously hampered and impeded. He was a man of sterling piety and enlightened zeal. These gifts endeared him to the people. His consummate tact, his courtly manners and unfailing charity won the respect of his fellow-townsmen, with many of whom he had intimate relations, without distinction of creed. His sturdy patriotism and the active part he bore in strengthening the cause of the new Republic commanded the confidence and esteem of the fellow-countrymen and the friendship of the father of his country.

The cathedral was built on historic ground in the most picturesque part of Baltimore, which was acquired from General John Eager Howard of Revolutionary renown. General Rochambeau, in command of the Legion of the Duc de Lanfau, on his return from Yorktown stopped in Baltimore and pitched his camp on this site. An early Maryland chronicle related that the chaplain of the French troops celebrated a grand military Mass in old St. Peter's, the cathedral church; the services being conducted with much pomp and magnificence, fine music being rendered by the various bands, and all the officers and soldiers appearing in full dress. The building was designed by Benjamin Henry Latrobe, the architect of the capitol, a friend of George Washington, and one of the most polished and versatile men of his day. He was a lawyer, engineer and artist, noted for his polite learning and elegant taste. The following interesting letter, dated August 5, 1806, was written by Mr. Latrobe to Bishop Carroll:

> The principal motives which induced me to undertake the labor of the design at a time when neither my existing engagements nor the circumstances of my family permitted me to undertake it with convenience, were not entirely selfish. To the disinterested benevolence and the pious sensibility of a clergyman of your Church I owe my existence, at all events an existence of which I have no reason to be ashamed, and I hope I have never since omitted an opportunity of honoring and serving the Church of which he was a splendid ornament.

The corner-stone of the cathedral was laid by Bishop Carroll July 7, 1806. During the three years of the war of 1812 work on the cathedral was suspended, but Bishop Carroll, who died August 3, 1815, at the venerable age of eighty-one, lived to witness the resumption of its construction. It was built of massive porphyritic granite blocks, which were hauled from Ellicott City, some twelve miles from Baltimore, by means of ox teams. Its original cost was $225,000.

As Jefferson's Monticello has been proclaimed the truest and most palatial type of the colonial order, so has this cathedral been admired by critics as the noblest specimen of purely classic ecclesiastic architecture in America. A correct idea of its architecture and interior decoration may be had from the following data: The order is Graeco-Ionic. The building is cruciform in design, 190 feet in length and 119 feet at its greatest width. The intersection of the cross supports a dome of noble and graceful proportions, with a circumference of 207 feet, lighted by an exterior dome which is a commanding feature of the city's landscape. The height from floor of nave to summit of dome is 127 feet. A smaller dome, carried by six Ionic columns, springs in beautiful proportions over the grand altar. The body of the church consists of three divisions opening from the central dome. The main division is covered by two succeeding domes, supported by majestic pillars similar to those under the central dome. From these domes arches open upon side aisles which are lighted by windows sixteen feet high and six feet broad, in which the conclave effect is carried out. In all, including the side entrances, there are about fifty arches which offer fine perspectives at any step. There are five graceful galleries, one in the sanctuary, two over the main entrance, suspended one above the other, and two facing each other and overlooking the central division of the church. One of these is the choir balcony, approached by a spiral stairway of stone which rests on an Ionic colonnade. The organ, which is one of the largest in the country, has 6,000 pipes and thirty-six stops.

The music of the cathedral, whose programs include all the great classic Masses, has been noted for generations. For over twenty-five years the music was under the direction of Professor F. K. Hale, who died in March, 1911. In the annals of the choir appears the name of John Linhard, a famous organist, who led the band that serenaded Jenny Lind upon her arrival in Baltimore fresh from her triumphs at Castle Garden. In the past local amateur talent contributed many sopranos and contraltos to this famous choir which though hushed in the flight of years still lives in the memory of old parishioners. Francis Lipp, for instance, whose superb bass was the admiration of church-goers, is still talked about by music-lovers.

An impressive feature of the cathedral's music is the annual chant of the Tenebrae during Holy Week by 300 seminarians from historic St. Mary's, the home of theology. It invariably attracts the best church-element of the city, regardless of denomination, and is said by European travelers to rival in choral beauty the same ritual as sung at the Lenten services in St. Peter's, which Byron in his beautiful apostrophe depicts as "all musical in its immensities" and where "majesty, power, glory, strength and beauty all are aisled." The communion-rail of rare marble, exquisitely wrought, and extending the full width of the church was the gift of the late Michael Jenkins, whose munificence finds expression in Baltimore's most beautiful memorial church and the Maryland Institute of Art. The grand high altar is a superb mosaic of precious marble and was imported from Marseilles, May 31, 1821. Beneath this altar are the tombs of Archbishops Carroll, Mareschal, Whitfield, Eccleston, Kenrick and Spalding. The remains of Archbishop Neale repose at Georgetown, while Archbishop Bayley was buried at Emmitsburg.

The surface of the ceiling of the cathedral is a brilliant piece of decoration, relieved with circular panels, ornamented with rosettes, while four life-size medallions of the Evangelists adorn the walls of the great dome, which bears the following inscription in bold letters of gold: "The House of God, which is the Church of the Living God. The Pillar and Ground of Truth. One Lord, One Faith, One Baptism." Blue, gold and gray are the dominant tones of the interior color scheme. The impression upon entering is that of dignity and splendor. You experience a sense of reverence which is deepened by the beautiful light effects which seem to cast a sort of charm over the imagination even of the habitué, inducing repose and contemplation. Whether at dawn or high noon when the sun streams through the lofty dome and idealizes painting, column and statue, or at twilight when the fresco is subdued and the arches, as if by magic, become magnified, or at night in the effulgence of wax candles and electricity, which imparts mystery to the shadowy recesses, this hallowed shrine of American Catholics first captivates then impresses, while all its glorious associations "in solemn troops and sweet societies," appear to take tangible form and serve to illustrate its character. The most imposing feature of the exterior is the superb Ionic portico, supported by ten stately fluted monoliths with voluted capitals, which were added over sixty years ago by Archbishop Kenrick.

The cathedral was dedicated May 31, 1821, when the leading Catholic families purchased the title to a large number of pews which yielded the sum of $40,000. On Ascension Day, May 25, 1876, it was consecrated by Archbishop Bayley, the immediate predecessor of his Eminence, Cardinal Gibbons. The sacristy was erected in 1879 and the building was enlarged and a new sanctuary added in 1888. Father Roger Baxter, who held the chair of philosophy at Georgetown College delivered the dedicatory sermon, and the first ordination held in the cathedral was that of Stephen Dubuisson, S.J.

Cardinal Fesch, uncle of Napoleon, presented the cathedral with the following collection of paintings: "Vision of St. Nicholas," "Baptism of Jesus," "Agony in the Garden," "Simeon Holding Our Lord," "Vision of St. Augustine," "The Last Supper," "The Transfiguration," "Christ Feeding the Multitude," "The Lord Appearing to St. Mary Magdalene," "Christ and the Samaritan Woman," "Jesus Bearing the Cross," "St. Veronica," and "The Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary." Among other paintings of special historic interest are "The Descent from the Cross," by Guerin, a gift from Louis XVI, and that of "St. Louis Burying His Officers and Soldiers Slain Before Tunis," from the brush of Steuben.

Of the American Hierarchy more than two-score Bishops have been consecrated in the Cathedral, about half of whom received the Holy Oils at the hands of Cardinal Gibbons. Since he became Archbishop Cardinal Gibbons has ordained about 2,000 priests. Here also three prelates have been invested with the insignia of the cardinalate. In 1886 Leo XIII made Archbishop Gibbons a Prince of the Church, a most interesting and important event in the history of the Church in America. In 1895 Leo XIII delegated Cardinal Gibbons to confer the red hat upon Mgr. Satolli, and again in 1901 on Mgr. Martinelli. Distinguished among the prelates consecrated here were Fenwick of Boston, Dubois of New York, Purcell and Elder of Cincinnati, Whelan of Wheeling, Gross of Oregon and the two Foley brothers of Baltimore.

Poe's lines on the "Angelus," "At morn—at noon, at twilight dim!" recall an interesting bit of history anent the bells of the cathedral which have noted the hour of so many Masses. Over a decade ago the Rev. Louis O'Donovan impelled by a sense of accuracy and his veneration for the traditions of the building with which he has been so intimately associated since his boyhood, determined to explore the tower. His arduous climb of ladders and through trap-doors was not only rewarded with a commanding view of the city's landscape but the following data upon which his pen dwells thus:

> Under the main bell is a heavy clapper used for all low Masses and on the outside two hammers, one for the hour, and the other for the Angelus, worked by the clock. Running around the bell are six bands of tracery, all very beautiful in delicacy of detail, but especially one of grapevine, with pendant clusters of grapes and heads of wheat. On the outside of the bell on opposite sides, are two medallions several inches high. One is the Crucifixion, the other the Madonna and Child with the words "Jesus-Maria." But most interesting of all are the inscriptions in French and Latin, nearly encircling the upper part of the bell, "La très Sainte Vierge. Ambrosius Mareschal Archiepiscopus Baltimoriensis Tertius Ponere Curavit—Pius VII, Leo XII, Pius VIII." On a lower line is the following: "Faite a Lyon par Joseph Frere-Jean MDCCC XXX."

It is thus seen that the bell was manufactured in Lyons, France, in 1830, and Archbishop Mareschal who dedicated the cathedral presented the bell and witnessed the reign of three Popes. Cardinal Gibbons in his book of reminiscences has aptly called his cathedral "the great hall of legislation of the Church in the United States." Here have assembled in convention her most learned and distinguished dignitaries for the purpose of formulating laws which became necessary to meet existing conditions. Here have been held ten provincial councils and three plenary councils. Archbishop Kenrick presided over the First Plenary Council in 1852, Archbishop Spalding over the Second in 1866 and Cardinal Gibbons over the Third in 1884 when seventy-eight Bishops and Abbots were present. His Eminence was baptized, ordained priest, consecrated Bishop and invested with the red hat all in the cathedral. It was during the period when he was Vicar Apostolic of North Carolina and Bishop of Richmond that he preached and wrote his "Faith of Our Fathers," which has been translated into about every tongue and may be found in the library of millions of homes.

Catholic Organization

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The lack of the Catholic body in using effectively publicity, leadership and organization, was very well brought out in AMERICA by Michael Williams and R. J. McWilliams, S.J. The evil is universally acknowledged, and, periodically it is resolved: "Yes! Something must be done!" But what are we doing? Ever bewailing the fact, and probably getting more ready to do something in the future. But the need is imperative for present action; zealous, not impatient; persevering, not spasmodic; systematic, not hysterical; united, not scattering, or pulling in contrary directions. See what has been accomplished during the past year through organization by the Government and the press. Catholics, rightly mobilized, might be a greater dynamic and a more permanent one.

Catholic Federation did indeed make a start, an excellent one; probably some might say a too ambitious start. And it did accomplish good, especially in stigmatizing and eliminating vicious "movies" and much foul literature. But the results were not thought commensurate with the efforts. Perhaps we are too impatient and look for too great results all at once; perhaps more was accomplished than the modesty of Federation allowed to be known in their desire to avert disappointment or to shelter themselves from blame by throwing the responsibility on the Bishops. Time will prove whether or not this was a wise move. It should not be made impossible to say whose is the blame in the event of mistakes or failure. Constructive criticism is essential to the upbuilding of human organizations; and we do not like to criticize our ecclesiastical superiors.

Either, then, we must make a fresh start or we must strengthen the hands of Catholic Federation. The latter seems to me the safer plan. A new attempt, even under the leadership of the excellent Mr. Williams, who would get my vote, would have to make its own mistakes, overcome the inherent difficulties and perhaps end in disappointment. It would appear to be wiser for Federation, which is already in the field and has learned by experience, to proclaim emphatically and minutely what it has accomplished, to give assurance that it will go on, surely if slowly, to greater strength and effectiveness; invite constructive suggestions and a "long pull and a strong pull" from us all.

This greater effectiveness might be attained on the principle of "divide and conquer," by confining the work within narrower limits and leaving some fields to other organizations. But the great weakness lies in the fact that much "resoluting" is done in conventions and little work in local branches. It is the small fibrous roots that are the feeders and strength of a tree.

Boy Scouting for Catholic Youth

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have read with considerable interest Mr. John F. Fogarty's article, "Boy Scouting for Catholic Youth," and Mr. Herbert Hart's comment upon the same. I regret that I, for one, do not agree with Mr. Hart. Mr. Hart states that "the apparently radical change in the attitude of Catholic churchmen and educators in regard to the movement is very disturbing." That the Catholic clergy were slow to recommend the Boy Scout movement, before they knew its ends and aims, to my mind is most commendable. "Be not the first by whom the new is tried." But that, after careful investigation and mature thought, finding in the movement nothing dangerous to faith or morals, they should openly commend the movement, is likewise commendable.

Mr. Hart's particular case is indeed sad. That the Boy Scouts should supplant the Junior Holy Name Society is a move in the wrong direction, and not at all in line with the teachings of the Boy Scout movement. When his Eminence, Cardinal Farley, of New York, approved the formation of Catholic troops of Boy Scouts, he did so with the proviso that all Catholic scouts should first be members of a Junior Holy Name Society or a recognized Catholic society. Moreover, all scout officials prefer to have their troops connected with some church organization. The Boy Scout movement, in itself, is wholly non-sectarian.

Since Mr. Hart quotes his experience, let me mention mine by way of contrast. I have a Junior Holy Name Society, and a troop of Boy Scouts. Every boy who wishes to join my troop of Boy Scouts must first be a member in good standing of the Junior Holy Name Society. We hold meetings every Tuesday evening. First the regular meeting of the Holy Name Society is held. This is followed by the troop meeting of Boy Scouts. The two societies are conducted separately. I might add that not all the members of the Holy Name Juniors are Scouts.

We have also a "Scout Camp," under the supervision of the Lancaster Council, Boy Scouts of America. It did not require any "maneuvering" to solve the camp question. We have our own camp, under my personal supervision. A neighboring parish, in which there is established another troop of Catholic Boy Scouts, is also conducting its own camp under the direct supervision of a seminarian. When we were affiliated with the National Boy Scouts, the local scout executive assured us that we would not be asked to attend any services in Protestant churches, and, furthermore, that we could conduct our own camps, outings, etc. In fact, the only public affairs in which we participated, as a troop, were those of a civic or national character, such as the Child Conservation campaign, the Red Cross, Liberty Loan and K. of C. drives, and War Stamp and Thrift Stamp sales. As to public meets, I can see no more danger in them than in a baseball game with a team of boys not of their faith. That "Catholic troops will languish and die," is a statement which Mr. Hart has not proved.

As to the "disgusting little dose of sex-hygiene," as Mr. Hart styles a certain paragraph in the official scout handbook, again I must disagree with Mr. Hart. I cannot see that the paragraph referred to will injure any scout. Purity is a virtue insisted upon among all scouts. "A scout stands for clean speech, clean sport, clean habits, and travels with a clean crowd" (Scout Law, No. 11). Every boy arriving at the age of puberty should have some instruction on sex-hygiene; in many cases sinful habits had been acquired before the boy knew their baneful effects.

Finally, Mr. Hart says that he "fails to see that the scout movement can be an improvement over the glorious Confraternity of the Holy Name." I do not know of any one acquainted with the Boy Scout movement making such a rash claim. The Holy Name Society is essentially a religious organization, and it has been the constant aim and endeavor of National Headquarters to keep it such. And rightly so. My contention and belief is that the Scout movement can be used to good advantage, to supplement the work of the Holy Name Society among boys. It supplies the means to keep the boy's mind and body actively and beneficially engaged during his many waking hours. The scout movement, under capable Catholic management and influence can be made a great help in character-building in boys. True, the movement as such, aims no higher than the cultivation of merely natural virtues, but the Rev. Thomas McGrath in the first part of his admirable little "Prayer Book for Boy Scouts" (Kenedy) shows how scouting may be elevated to the plane of the supernatural, and how it may be used to the end that our Catholic Boy Scouts may become the "flower and reserve force of the Church in America."

Sisters and Nuns

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I notice that you give in AMERICA for July 6 the canonical distinction between Sisters and nuns. Florence Nightingale, the patron saint of the Red Cross, in her correspondence, is perhaps not so strictly orthodox but she is no less instructive, when she says of the training of some of the nurses she had to deal with:

> The ladies who are not Sisters have not the chastened temper, the Christian grace, the accomplished loveliness and energy of the regular nun. I have seen something of different kinds of nuns, am no longer young, and do not speak from enthusiasm, but from experience. There is nothing like the training (in these days) which the Sacred Heart or the Order of St. Vincent gives to women.

It might be remarked also that, in many of the published reports that are now coming from "over there," it has become the fad to speak of all the nurses as "Sisters." Not content with appropriating the nun's garb for a uniform, they seem to covet the old distinctive name as well.

The Decline in the Birth-Rate

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In your issue of July 6, Dr. Jas. J. Walsh, in his article "Decline in the Birth-Rate," says:

> It is well known that the birth-rate among graduates of our two oldest universities is so low that were they to receive as students only the sons of former graduates, they would have a very small and rapidly vanishing number.

I wonder if the learned doctor has ever gathered statistics from Catholic Colleges. This phase of the all-important topic discussed by Dr. Walsh deserves a little thought. In the statistics of a silver jubilee class, graduates of 1893, of one of our best Catholic colleges, I find that out of twenty-eight graduates, ten entered the sacred priesthood, and out of the remaining eighteen seven married, and they have twelve children of whom five are boys.

The Nation on Its Knees

OUR three American Cardinals have issued an appeal to Catholics and to all our fellow-citizens to pray fervently for the speedy victory of the American arms, and for a lasting, righteous peace. Their Eminences point out that we have entered upon this war animated by principles as universal as they are unselfish. Not seeking conquest by force of arms, "we battle for the welfare of men of every nation, asking no special indemnities for our sacrifices other than those which all free men always seek." The Catholic people of this country have been conspicuous in sacrifice, that justice might reign. They have given their time, their scanty possessions, and what is dearest to them, their children. They have spared nothing, that the great country, under the protection of whose benign political institutions and just laws the Church of God has flourished, might be preserved in the undisputed possession of her national honor and integrity. In thousands of churches, from the stately cathedrals of our great cities to the humble little chapels of the countryside, in convent and school and in cloister, where by day and through the watches of the night the service of God continues in one uninterrupted golden round of praise and adoration, fervent prayer has gone up before the throne, begging the powerful protection of the God of nations, for our just cause.

Surely today Catholics are on their knees, and in the mind of their Eminences, to win this war, "we must invoke the nobler powers of sacrifice and faith," and while "we fight like heroes, we must pray like saints."

From every corner of America arises the cry of souls to God. The nation is on its knees before the King of kings. That is the surest sign that America will lead the nations of the earth to victory over mere might. For God is our surest help as He must be our surest hope. And the prayers of a nation fighting not for gain but for good, will certainly be answered.

If God be with us, we need not fear the hosts of the enemy. We shall evince our patriotism, not merely by outward works of service, but by lives of integrity, making ourselves and our nation less unworthy of His protection.

An Academic Drive on the Pope

THE drive on the Pope seems to be continuing still. The instance of it that has most recently come to our knowledge is a malignant little paragraph in a widely advertised "historical" work called "The Roots of the War," by Drs. William Stearns Davis, William Anderson and Mason W. Tyler of the Faculty of the University of Minnesota. The objectionable passage occurs in the chapter on "Free Italy and Its Consolidation," in which the second of the above-mentioned professors tries to justify Italy's sacrilegious spoliation of the Holy See in 1870, ending his doleful catalogue of the Vatican's crimes against liberty with these words:

During the present war, the clericals have failed to take a strong pro-Italian stand, and may, indeed, have some difficulty in clearing themselves of the charges of pro-Germanism, and assistance to the enemy, now becoming current in very responsible written books. The slow but steady movement since about 1900 toward a more conciliatory policy on both sides probably received a complete check when, at the beginning of the war, the Pope showed an entire inability to stand out against the destruction of Belgium and Poland or even to comprehend, much less to sympathize with, the national aspirations of Italy.

Those who have followed with any care the numerous articles in defense of the Holy Father's attitude toward the war which have appeared in AMERICA and the Catholic Mind will doubtless see at once how unfair and how unpatriotic is Dr. Anderson's attack on the Pope. It will be noted that at the very opening of the paragraph the invidious word "clericals" is used, a term which is meant, no doubt, to convey to the reader a picture of certain narrow, intriguing, priest-ridden, political Romanists, the sworn enemies of the enlightened Liberals in every land. The next thing to be observed is Dr. Anderson's discovery that these clericals "have failed to take a strong pro-Italian stand." But German papers, strange to say, complain that the Vatican is decidedly pro-Italian. The semi-official Kölnische Zeitung, for instance, quoted by the Anglican "Diplomaticus" in "No Small Stir," remarks: "Today in consequence of the untiring propaganda of the Allied Powers the majority of the authoritative personages at the Vatican may be described as in full agreement with the Italian war-policy," and the Vossische Zeitung is also quoted as saying: "It is hopeless to think of paralyzing the anti-Germanism of the Vatican." If the Germans find the Pope pro-Italian and Dr. Anderson thinks him pro-German, perhaps that shows that the Holy Father is really just neutral.

The third thing to be noted is the fact that the "very responsible written books" on which Dr. Anderson, as he explains in footnotes, seems to base his charges against the Holy See, are works by Bolton King, Thomas Okey, William Kay Wallace and E. J. Dillon, "anti-clericals" all. The fourth point to be called attention to is the fact that the only "assistance to the enemy" that the Pope has given consists in effecting exchanges of prisoners, benefits enjoyed no less by the Allies than by the Central Powers as was shown in AMERICA for May 25, 1918.

As for the Holy Father's "entire inability to stand out against the destruction of Belgium," his lamentable weakness seems to have fully satisfied even so vitally concerned a person as King Albert himself. For in a letter dated January 2, 1918, and sent in reply to the Holy Father's Peace note of August last, the Belgian Government wrote:

> At the outset of his message the Holy Father took pains to declare he had forced himself to maintain perfect impartiality toward all the belligerents, which renders more significant the judgment of his Holiness when he concluded in favor of the total evacuation of Belgium and the reestablishment of its full independence, and also recognized the right of Belgium for reparation for damages and the cost of the war. Already in his consistorial allocution of January 22, 1915, the Holy Father had proclaimed before the world that he reproved injustice, and he condescended to give the Belgian Government the assurance that in formulating that reprobation it was the invasion of Belgium he had directly in view.

The Polanders, too, wonderful to relate, were quite as grateful as the Belgians for the Pope's deplorable "inability to stand out" against their oppressors, for the Bishop of Gresna and Posnania wrote Cardinal Gasparri last spring that:

> We Poles, attached by all the strivings of the heart to the Holy Apostolic See, full of the deepest gratitude towards our August Pontiff can now more than ever, in these times of trouble and horror, appreciate the kindness and paternal goodness shown to us so bounteously by the common Father of all. As long as a Polish heart beats we shall not forget the sublime words in our regard contained in the exhortation to the heads of the belligerent States. The Supreme Pontiff urged them to examine in the spirit of equity and justice the questions relating to the countries forming the ancient Kingdom of Poland, whose noble historical traditions and the sufferings endured by its people, especially during the present war, ought to win for it the sympathy of all the nations.

Besides being baseless and unfair Dr. Anderson's charges are highly unpatriotic too. Now that Americans of every creed and class are devoting themselves unitedly and unreservedly to the prosecution of the war so that our country and the Allies may win an early and decisive victory over the Central Powers, is it the time for a professor in a State university which is supported in part by the taxes of Catholics, to make an unfair and malignant attack on the one whom thousands and thousands of our bravest soldiers and sailors along with their parents, children, wives, brothers and sisters venerate as the Vicar of Christ and the visible head of the Church? Dr. Anderson owes American Catholics an apology.

A Call for Catholic Nurses

HOW to meet the needs of the army and navy, and at the same time maintain a minimum of withdrawal from the forces ministering to the legitimate needs of the civilian population, is war's most serious problem. As our young men go across the sea in increasing numbers, we approach the crisis more nearly in many departments; in some, the crisis seems at hand. To secure an adequate supply of nurses at home as well as abroad is today a difficulty which the profession is endeavoring to solve. The Red Cross, the American Nurses Association, the National League of Nursing Education, the Catholic Hospital Association, and the National Organization of Public Health Nursing, are now engaged in the arrangement of programs for the present and plans for the future. Their work is good, in fact, necessary. But they fully recognize that all their activity will issue in no permanent success, if the supply is cut off at the source.

It is part of our duty as citizens and as Catholics, to do what we can to increase that supply. Many a Catholic girl today is filled with the same patriotism which has sent her brother to the camp to take up arms for his country. Some field is open to her at home, but she feels that field to be narrow. If a girl in these circumstances has the spirit of sacrifice which will carry her unflinchingly through the preliminary training, if she is strong, upright, womanly, she will do well to enroll herself at once in some standard school for nurses. Among our Catholic girls, we have valuable resources which should be utilized, and utilized immediately, for the need is pressing. Many Catholic young women of high moral character and good mental ability, are now leading lives which are more or less aimless, simply because they have no inclination for teaching, for a commercial career, or for the religious state. Such young people should be encouraged by our priests and our Sisters, who know them best, to fit themselves for nursing. For nursing is now a recognized profession, with definite standards and requirements. It holds out a position of dignity, to which is attached a fair financial recompense, and above all, it affords an ample opportunity of leading a life of usefulness and beneficence.

That great Pontiff, Pius X, was wont to look askance upon women who found womanhood's ideal in political and public life. But for at least two professions, he thought them eminently qualified. One was medicine, the other nursing. Not all medical schools have as yet let down the bars, but the field of nursing is open. May it soon be occupied by thousands of Catholic young women, filled with the spirit of sacrifice, and animated by the purest love of God and their country.

The Methodists Suggest Grape Juice

IN a recent issue of a widely read Methodist weekly there is an editorial which in courteous language conveys the impression that there is considerable controversy among Catholics as to whether the use of unfermented wine would invalidate the Holy Sacrifice. The controversy, which is taken for granted, is asserted to be unintelligible to the Protestant and to be of no more importance than a discussion as to whether hard or soft water should be used in Baptism. The only reason which the writer of the editorial can find for the insistence by Catholics on the use of fermented wine in the Mass is the Church's dislike for change, its conservative tenacity in holding to traditional, though it may be insignificant, details of ecclesiastical practice, and he gives Catholics the comfort of his assurance that "the establishment of National Prohibition will settle the debate and enable the head of that Church to decide that in the sight of God the unfermented juice of the grape will be just as acceptable as the fermented product."

The thought of a political issue in the United States settling a question of Catholic doctrine is rather amusing, hardly less so than the prospect of the Pope aligning himself with the Methodists in opposition to the century-old teaching of his predecessors. The misapprehension of the Protestants that there is any controversy among Catholics on the subject of the Mass may be dismissed at once, for there is no such controversy. No Catholic holds that the use of grape juice, not the mercantile article, but undoubted, unadulterated and unspoiled juice of the grape, would invalidate the Holy Sacrifice, for such a substance is truly called wine because the initial process of fermentation has already taken place in it, even though the complete process has been arrested.

It is not true that the Church would ever declare that such a substance is equally acceptable for the Mass, for the simple reason that it is imperfect wine, not perfect wine, the matter used by Christ when He instituted the Holy Sacrifice and commanded His Apostles and their successors to do what He had done. The insistence of the Church on the use of wine, perfect wine, is not blind adherence to rock-bound customs, but exact fulfilment of the Divine mandate.

Nor is the parallel drawn in the editorial between the use of hard and soft water in Baptism and the use of grape juice and wine in the Mass at all to the point. If Christ had commanded the use of hard water in Baptism, the Church would have insisted on it; but the fact is that He issued no such command. All He prescribed was the use of water, without qualification as to its exact quality. In the matter of the Mass, on the other hand, He did prescribe the use of wine; and grape juice, according to the common acceptation of the term, is not wine. It is true that the Church sometimes permits her priests to use the juice of the grape in which only the initial process of fermentation has taken place; but she restricts its use to certain rare, exceptional and unavoidable circumstances, when the celebration of the Divine Mysteries would otherwise be impossible. Under normal conditions she proscribes its use under pain of grievous sin. Her reason is that she demands a perfect matter for a perfect sacrifice.

Sisters at the Front

ANNOUNCING the arrival of a pioneer band of Sisters of Charity at New York, on their way to France, the New York Herald remarks in passing that there are already 15,000 members of that single Congregation in France, on active duty at the front. If little is at present said of these and of their thousands of fellow-religious from the many Catholic Sisterhoods of Europe, we nevertheless catch glimpses of them, from time to time, through the wreaths of battle-smoke and amid the noise of bursting shells. We behold them nursing the wounded, protecting the orphans and heroically offering up their lives amid scenes of carnage and destruction.

In the post of greatest danger the Catholic Sister will ever be found, for she does not fear to stand in the presence of death and she is at home amid the deprivations and the hardships of the battle-front. Even on the high seas we behold her, tossed on the white surges of the engulfing waves. It was only the other day, for instance, that the life-boat from the Canadian hospital ship, the Landovery Castle, carrying twelve nursing Sisters, was drawn down into the whirlpool of the sinking vessel.

Describing the evacuation of a French village near the battle-line after a heavy attack, an English chaplain writes in the Ushaw Magazine: "Everywhere you saw the nuns, who must have been as much afflicted as anyone, aiding, helping and giving consolation. They were guides, philosophers and friends." So when the first use of gas found the English comparatively unprepared the Sisters not merely proved themselves ministering angels in coping with the ghastly results of this dire instrument of modern warfare, but also aided materially in making the first gas-masks. "My brigadier knew this," writes the chaplain, "and he passed the word down for 'eyes left' and gave them the full military salute as the men passed the convent." So again the Sisters are pictured as the only occupants of a heavily-shelled village. "We cannot leave it," they said; for the soldiers needed their care.

> Only a few days later a shell tore its way through the kitchen of the little convent opposite our dressing station. Though the shells were coming with a steady regularity, one of our orderlies came to me with the message that one of the ladies wanted me. It was to tell me that two of the Sisters were killed and two others wounded. I found white faces but no tears and no hysterics; indeed the bearing of the Sisters lent a dignity to the tragedy that it is impossible to explain.

No honor-roll may contain the names of these Catholic heroines of the great war, but their deeds are written in the hearts of the soldiers at the front and will remain recorded, in golden letters, in the Book of Life.

Literature

BRITISH AND AMERICAN FACETIAE

THERE is a dearth of good humor in America. And this statement is not made to impugn the national character, for no nation in recorded time ever took everything else but itself as a joke to the same degree that we do, or rather did,—for the war is penciling our brows. But of really humorous literature, of the light, clever writings denominated facetiæ, we have little enough to produce when our population and the droll opportunities of our social and political life are considered.

What have we to place beside Lewis Carroll, W. S. Gilbert, Jerome K. Jerome, W. W. Jacobs and other English makers of facetiæ? Nothing to place beside their wares, although we have a plenitude of "stuff" approaching theirs in quality. Finley Peter Dunne's "Mister Dooley," George Ade's "Fables" and George Fitch's vest-pocket essays are about the best things we have to offer. The work of these authors amounts to the best that has been given to the world by modern American writers of facetiæ, although there may be fugitive pieces by other men that have not gained large attention because of the obscure media through which they were presented to the public.

But a comparison of the most delicious bits in Dooley, Ade and Fitch with the most amusing portions of Carroll and Gilbert results in emphasizing the truth that our men lack the polish, the final exquisiteness of the nonsense contrived by the Englishmen. This, of course, is due to the difference in the soil worked by each set of humorists more than to native inability.

For the purposes of this brief review the term humorist must be strictly defined as a writer whose work is done to amuse. When interviewing Barry Pain in London three years ago I remarked, rather tactlessly, as it proved, that a description of the methods of a typically British humorist would prove of marked interest to American readers. Mr. Pain smiled through his Lincoln-like beard and gravely inserted this correction: "I prefer not to be called a humorist. Please put me down as a story-writer."

In America we have entire cliques and crowds of persons who are story-writers, and so they have in England and in every other country where exists a chronic appetite for light reading. But our humorists are very few and very far between. We have shoals of comedians of the pen, men who conduct the strange structures known as "colyums," men who splurge upon good print-paper the antics of Messrs. Mutt and Jeff, the happenings in the House of Katzenjammer, the affairs of one Hooligan, and a multitude of lesser harlequins. They have humor, sometimes of the most pungent flavor, but it is never better than coarse, and never far evolved from the first principle of vulgar laugh-production—the prompt and precise delivery of kicks.

The English have their comic classics, too. Weary Willie and Tired Tim have been the first Harmsworth fictions with which millions of sturdy British boys have become acquainted, Portland Percy and Homeless Hector following close in width of clientele. But the English, either through stinginess or a sense of the proprieties, issue their comic papers as such and do not, in their daily press, project such salads of melodrama, propaganda and burlesque as constitute the staple of American journalism. The English press, with all its faults, is much more worth loving than our own, the common run of British newspaper being more veracious, if less versatile, in its news and far more sturdy in its untruths than the average American journal.

Even the comic papers of London, and they are legion—Comic Cuts, Puck, Merry and Bright, etc., etc., contain a more refined, although crude enough, grade of humor than our own multicolored sections. There is a tribe of "jokesmiths" in and about Fleet Street who write ridiculous adventures for the comic artists, and write them well. They have instituted what might be called a gild, the headquarters being a rather raffish "pub." Certainly they are an unformed craft, for it is no uncommon thing for an apprentice to continue the serial adventures of a careless character like Homeless Hector after the originator has succumbed to delirium tremens. This department of journalistic burlesque—not the most ridiculous division of that uncertain profession—is not to be lightly disregarded, for it is national facetiæ, and anything with the label national attached to it is worth weighing in these days of internationalism.

Assuming that we rise a step higher in considering the confessedly satirical publications, we find the American and the British on about the same plane of excellence at certain times and of mediocrity at other times. Although, again, the British have an advantage, inasmuch as the salacious finds no hospitality on the pages of, say, Punch, while American humorous weeklies are frequent sinners, one of them being quite brazenly aphrodisiacal.

If we search the files of the London and New York humorous journals—and such a search would be an ideal, if tedious, lesson in national psychology—the general superiority of English to American facetiæ would be conceded in the verdict. Let us dispense with analysis and submit samples. Gelett Burgess, who was acclaimed a genius when he discovered a chemical synonym for "bore," viz., "bromide," wrote a series of nonsense rhymes, a largely quoted one running about like this:

I've never seen a purple cow,
  I never want to see one;
But still, I rather think, somehow
  I'd rather see than be one.

A great fuss was made over this unbrilliant gem and its companion rhymes because so little innocent merriment is placed upon the American market. It tastes flat after a piece like this, selected at random from a book of "Reckless Rhymes" by English humorists:

Eating more than he was able,
  Tommy died at breakfast table.
"Please," said little sister Meg,
  "May I have his other egg?"

That is typical of British facetiæ. It is "meaty."

Yet a thoroughly American humorist like George Fitch would shine in the English firmament, and, as for "Mr. Dooley," he was wont, in the days of his prime, to occupy the front page of one of the pillars of staid London journalism, the Pall Mall Gazette. George Ade's style has tempted many imitators, both here and in England, and if the domestic imitations are mere parodies, the foreign are sheer plagiarisms. Rough-edged at times are Ade's conceits, but his merciless pillorying of our silken and soulless bands of uplifters deserves immortality. His descriptions, quaintly capitalized and spontaneously flung, stick like truth. Who can forget his vaudeville team that created a riot in Paducah and secured an evangelical theological student to furnish it with a "catchy" name—Zoroaster and Zendavesta? Or the bored Pittsburgh millionaire who, at great expense, joined the Royal Alcoholical Society in London and earned the prerogative of wearing his nasal veins on the outside? Or his advice to ambitious and untalented youth to "obtain a substantial piece of gas-pipe and go out into the highways and collect"?

Ade is still with us, although poor George Fitch is dead, and "Mr. Dooley's" creator is now engaged in writing notoriously serious editorials for a well-known weekly. Our poverty in facetiæ is as apparent as rags when there is no name to write immediately beside George Ade's. Montague Glass, with his "Potash and Perlmutter," and H. C. Witwer, with his stories of overfed pugilists, as well as Ring W. Lardner, with his baseball eccentrics, skilfully "cover" some of the outstanding humorous aspects of our national life. George Randolph Chester's "Get-Rich-Quick Wallingford" series can also be submitted as an item in our program of facetiæ, together with Julian Street's "Abroad at Home," although the latter is as much photographic as funny, and Chester often forsakes burlesque to employ purely fictional technique.

Joel Chandler Harris, as the most prominent of our negro portrayers, might be bracketed with Ade and Fitch and Dunne; and Irvin S. Cobb has certain claims which would be clearer were his record not so plainly journalistic. Reaching back to the pioneers, we have something to show in Bret Harte and Artemus Ward—but their humor is not eminently appreciated by the present generation, although Harte's language from "Truthful James" is about the richest comic verse written by an American. There are, too, a florist's half-dozen of bright young men, like Franklin P. Adams, Don Marquis, B. L. Taylor, Tom Daly, Oliver Herford and Tom Masson—the latter being a particularly fertile source of satirical by-products—who have written many good things.

To stress again, however, the condition of proportion, the English can name us man for man, and they bear the palm for quality. Yet the laurels for facetiæ cannot be surrendered without a genial threat, for the American humorists possess an illimitable fund of originality, and with the coming modification of commercialism, after it has raged beyond its crisis, and the growth of that national spiritual stability which is a condition of all national humor, we shall, if the war does not last altogether too long, some day excel the British wags.

JOHN B. KENNEDY.

A WOMAN COMMENDS HER LITTLE SON

To the aid of my little son
  I call all the magnalities
Archangel, Dominion,
  Powers and Principalities.

Mary without a stain,
  Joseph that was her spouse,
All God's women and men
  Out of His glorious House.

The Twelve Apostles by him:
  Matthew and Mark and John,
Luke, the Evangelists, nigh him
  So he fight not alone!

Patrick, Columcellie, Bride
  The Saints of the Irish nation,
Keiran, Kevin, beside
  In the death and the desolation.

Listen, ye Soldier-Saints,
  Sebastian, Ignatius, Joan,
Be by his side; if he faints
  Strengthen my little son.

In the Side of Christ I lay him
  In the Wound that the spear made
In the pierced Hands I stay him
  So I am not afraid.

On the knees of the Blessed Mary,
  And in the fold of her arm,
Refuge and sanctuary
  Where he shall take no harm.

To the Wound in the Heart of Christ,
  To the Trinity Three in One;
To the Blood spilled out, unpriced,
  For love of my little son.

The Wonders of Instinct. By JEAN HENRI FABRE. Translated by ALEXANDER TEIXEIRA DE MATTOS and BERNARD MIALL. With 16 illustrations. New York: The Century Co. $3.00.

A description of "The Harmos," "an abandoned, barren, sun-scorched bit of land," a "laboratory in the open field" prefaces the chapters of this new book by the late M. Fabre, the renowned French Catholic entomologist. Within the confines of that little plot of ground which he had obtained possession of only after forty years of battling with poverty, he made all the experiments and observations of which he now gives the public the results in this delightful volume. Replying to the criticisms of the dry-as-dust scientists who justly charge him with the crime of actually making insect-life interesting to the general reader, M. Fabre writes:

> You rip up the animal and I study it alive; you turn it into an object of horror and pity, whereas I cause it to be loved; you labor in a dissecting chamber and torture-room, I make my observations under the blue sky, to the song of the cicadæ; you subject cell and protoplasm to chemical tests, I study instinct in its loftiest manifestations; you pry into death, I pry into life. The boars have muddied the clear stream; natural history, youth's glorious study, has by dint of cellular improvements become a hateful and repulsive thing. Well, if I write for men of learning, for philosophers who one day will try to some extent to unravel the tough problem of instinct, I write also, I write above all things, for the young. I want to make them love the natural history which you make them hate. That is why, while keeping strictly to the domain of truth, I avoid your idiomatic prose, which too often seems borrowed from some Iroquois dialect!

The author then tells his attentive readers how the green grasshopper wages war on the cicadæ, how the empusa transforms itself, how the great capricorn builds its home, how the bluebottle-fly selects the best places for depositing its eggs; how the female eumanes determine beforehand the sex of the eggs they lay; how the glow-worm—which, by the way, is no worm at all—manages its marvelous lighting apparatus; how the microgaster keeps down the cabbage-caterpillar—and a thousand other wonderful facts about the insect world. Perhaps the most interesting chapters in the volume, however, are those describing the habits of burying-beetles, spiders and pine processionaries. By the experiments he made M. Fabre proves conclusively that the "indications of the intervention of reason" which unbelieving "scientists" think they observe in the actions of those insects are due to instinct and nothing else. "Like the rest, in spite of his legendary renown," says M. Fabre, "he [the burying-beetle] has no guide but the unconscious promptings of instinct." For a bug with a modicum of brains could solve without difficulty the simple problems set for it by the experimenter. The author's study of the spider leads him to the same conclusion. The lycosa, for instance, will take the same care of a ball of cork, made to resemble her egg-pill, as she takes of a real bag of eggs, and an endless line of processionary caterpillers which the author started crawling around a vase walked for eighty-four hours on their ribboned track and never had sense enough to break the circle and make for the nearby food which they sorely needed.

The pages telling how the banded epeira weaves its web, learns by telephone of the approach of its prey, and then makes short work of the helpless moth or fly that comes too close, are also of absorbing interest. Indeed "The Wonders of Instinct" is an excellent book for vacation reading, especially if pains are taken to verify by actual observation everything the author says about the insect world. Those who enjoy this book will be glad to know that a number of other volumes by M. Fabre have been excellently translated by Mr. De Mattos: "Social Life in the Insect World," for example, which is published by the Century Co., and "The Life of the Fly," "The Hunting Wasps," "The Mason Bees," "The Life of the Caterpillar," etc., which Dodd, Mead & Co. publish.

The Eucharistic Epiclesis. By J. W. TYRER. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $0.75.

The Epiklesis is an invocation of the Holy Spirit, which in Oriental liturgies immediately follows the words of consecration during the Sacrifice of the Mass. Early Western liturgies had such an invocation, but now evidence only a faint echo thereof in the prayer "Supplices te rogamus." The disappearance of the Epiklesis from the liturgy of the West was probably due to the error of the East—the opinion that the Epiklesis was either partially or entirely the sacramental form of the Eucharist. The Council of Florence, A. D. 1439, condemned this opinion; and defined that "the words of the Saviour have all the power of transsubstantiation." Since then the controversy between East and West in regard to the moment of consecration is at an end. Of late this controversy has been revived among Anglicans. In the light of the thirty-first of the Articles of Religion, whereby Anglicans hold that "the sacrifices of masses . . . were blasphemous fables and dangerous deceits," the importance of the issue is not very clear. However, Mr. Tyrer has done good work in gathering together the evidence of the use of the Epiklesis during the first four centuries of the Church. Catholics admit this evidence, but deny the conclusion drawn therefrom by the scholarly Anglican. In the early Church the exact moment of consecration was not discussed. The Canon was taken as a whole. The tremendous mystery was known to be enacted during that part of the Mass, and the liturgy reflected this large view of the Canon. Not until the largeness of view led to a misunderstanding, did the authority of the Church intervene. Thereafter, the Western Epiklesis was in such form as clearly to indicate that the consecration had already been effected.

The Odyssey of a Torpedoed Transport. By Y. Translated from the French by GRACE FALLOW NORTON. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co. $1.25.

The French write the best books on the war. The volumes bearing on the present conflict that have deserved the highest praises in these columns during the past six months have been written, for the most part, by the men and women of Catholic France, and include works as varied in character as Colonel Azan's "The Warfare of Today," René Boylesve's "You No Longer Count," M. Reynes Monlaur's "Sister Clare," Lieutenant Redier's "Comrades in Courage" and Mlle. Tinayre's "To Arms!" To the list must now be added "Y's" collection of letters which have been admirably translated by Grace Fallow Norton under the title "The Odyssey of a Torpedoed Transport." The anonymous author was first mate of the Pamir, a French merchant ship of 3,000 tons burden, which was commandeered by the Government when the war broke out and then traveled some 125,000 miles through the war zones, ranging from New York to Archangel and the Mediterranean ports.

The book consists of a series of letters, written apparently to a young naval officer, and with no thought of publication, beginning August 22, 1914, and ending February 13, 1917, the month the Pamir, with all on board, was torpedoed and sunk by the Germans. "Y" was a warm admirer of his captain, Fourgues, whose striking character dominates the book, and to whom Villiers, the chief engineer, offers an excellent foil. Fourgues strove for three years to have his ship provided with guns and wireless so that he could evade or fight the German U-boats, but the Government paid no attention to his appeals, preferred to consider the submarine peril as non-existent, and to keep the merchant marine following "secret routes" that every German knew. The letters describing how Captain Fourgues made room on his already over-loaded ship for a cargo of mules is delicious reading, the one telling how an ensign's wife succeeded in joining her husband is even better, and throughout the volume the skipper's comments on the way the war was being fought are no less shrewd than fearless. When the Pamir went down carrying with her the writer of these letters, French naval literature sustained a grievous loss. It is easy to understand how "The Odyssey of a Torpedoed Transport" received the Prix Femina—Vie Heureuse for being the most important war-book of 1917.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

The Rev. John B. Kokenge, S.J., has done well to translate from the German into good English "Sketches for the Exercises of an Eight Days' Retreat" (Herder, $1.25), by the late Father Hugo Hurter, S.J., Ph.D., D.D., Professor Emeritus of Theology in the Catholic University of Innsbruck. The retreat seems to be one which he was accustomed to give the secular clergy and each day's exercises consist of three meditations, a consideration and matter for spiritual reading. The development of the points is so clear, practical and soul-filling that all those who give or make the Exercises of St. Ignatius will no doubt find the book of great assistance.——"The New Testament and Catholic Prayer Book Combined" (Benziger, $0.75 and $0.35) bears the imprimatur of Cardinal Farley and is designed for the use of our Catholic soldiers and sailors. Thirty-six pages of the most necessary prayers precede the Reims version of the New Testament.

Archibald Marshall's latest novel, "The Graftons" (Dodd, Mead, $1.50) is a charming study of a delightful English family. His touch is as sure, rapid and powerful as in his former work, and his characters have the same vivid, lifelike reality. In the preface there is an apology for the peaceful atmosphere which surrounds the story, but most readers will probably find in this very quality an added recommendation to his beautiful idealization of family affection.——"Something That Begins with 'T'" (Small, Maynard, $1.35) is William A. Kirkpatrick's chronicle of the romance of a modernized Peter Pan. It has a quaintness about it, which together with the old-fashioned maturity of the perhaps over-precocious boy, make it a very pleasant change from the stereotyped story so much in present fashion.——"The Promise of Air" (Dutton, $1.50), coming as it does from the pen of Algernon Blackwood, was bound to be somewhat mysterious. It is not altogether a success. It is clean, but so vague as to be far from satisfying. One wonders if even the author knows what it is all about.——"Nocturne" (Doran, $1.40), by Frank Swinnerton, covers the space of but a few hours and describes an episode in the love-affairs of each of two sisters. Mr. Wells, who writes the introduction, finds it very powerful, but no doubt most people will find it rather repulsive. ——Harold Titus's "Bruce of the Circle A" (Small, Maynard, $1.35) is called a "thrilling story of the Southwest," but it is only the record of a woman's "emancipation" from her "old-fashioned and conventional ideas" regarding womanly purity. ——"Bertha Garlan" (Boni & Liveright, $0.60), by Arthur Schnitzler, is "Madame Bovary" transposed to a German key. The result is not pleasant.

Mlle. Henriette Cuvru-Magot, the descendant of a line of valiant soldiers, did not flee when the Germans drew near Paris, but, like Miss Mildred Aldrich, stayed in her cottage just "Beyond the Marne" (Small, Maynard), while the great battle was raging a few miles away. And she jotted down in her diary everything she saw happening. The little book, which has been translated by Katharine Babbitt, is well illustrated with photographs.——"An American Soldier: Letters of Edwin Austin Abbey, 2d" (Houghton, Mifflin, $1.35), is the title of a volume containing a young lieutenant's war-letters to his father and mother. The writer, a graduate of St. Mark's School and of the University of Pennsylvania, hearing the call while on bridge-construction work in Canada, enlisted in the engineer corps of a Canadian regiment and sailed for France during an early stage of the war. His rather ordinary letters are personal records from day to day of the little incidents of routine life, with here and there a thought showing the culture and high ideals of the writer. After being wounded, he was made a lieutenant and sent to London on leave. Returning to the front, he was killed at Vimy Ridge in April, 1917. The author is a non-Catholic, who is sincere in his religious opinions with that turn of devotion which is peculiarly Episcopalian.

"The Silver Trumpet" (Doran, $1.00), the title of Amelia Josephine Burr's volume of stirring war "poems of inspiration and challenge to those who remain at home," sounds a special call to the women of the country and bids our girls give the soldiers "a womanhood worth dying for." The poems breathe a fine spirit of faith and courage and proclaim that "The King of Heaven Sits upon His Throne" and that "Love is Lord" still. Moreover, the trumpets of God's sovereignty "Are not hard to hear," for

> There are those who hear them
> Between the sea and sky,
> Where listless on the littered waves
> The dead drift by.
> There are those who hear them
> In a wasted land,
> And believe a promise
> They cannot understand.
> There are those who hear them
> In the burning place
> Of deadly battle, hidden > Behind a quiet face.
> Blow, silver trumpets,
> To us untiring call—
> The King of Heaven is on His throne
> And Love is Lord of all!

Among recently published books of piety are "Jesus in the Holy Eucharist" (Herder, $1.00), by the Rev. Ferreol Girardey, C.Ss.R., who clearly expounds in fifteen chapters the main arguments from Holy Writ, the Fathers, sacred theology and tradition for the Real Presence.——"Our Lady's Month" (Herder, $1.30), by Sister M. Philip, of the Bar Convent, is a book containing thirty-one short papers on the Litany of Loretto, including a timely one on "Our Lady of Peace."——A nun of the Monastery of St. Teresa and St. John of the Cross of the Discalced Carmelites, Wheeling, W. Va., has compiled an attractive little book of "Instructions and Precautions of St. John of the Cross" ($0.50), and has added a short sketch of his life, some of his spiritual letters, and a novena in the Saint's honor.——"The Religious Teacher and the Work of Vocations" (St. Augustine's Novitiate, West Hartford, Conn., $0.10), contains the excellent subject-matter of a series of conferences given by the Rev. John B. Delaunay, C.S.C., at the Sisters' College of the Catholic University. In four chapters the author tells what a "vocation" is, its two essential signs and what the teacher's share is in fostering a vocation.——"What Shall I Be?" (America Press, $0.10), Father Cassilly's well-known "chat with young people" on the priestly and the religious life, has recently seen its sixth American edition, and forty-fourth thousand, which indicates the popularity of this valuable booklet.——Father Joseph F. McGlinchey, of 25 Granby Street, Boston, Diocesan Director of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith, has out a "Catechism on Catholic Foreign Missions, Number Two" ($0.05), which supplies a wealth of stimulating information about the missionary's life, the fields of his labors, the motives animating him, etc.—"Prayers During War-Time" (St. Mary's Pamphlet Rack, West 30th Street and Carroll Avenue, Cleveland, O., $0.05; $3.50 a hundred), contains well-chosen prayers for the safe return of our soldiers and sailors and for the victory of our cause. They are suitable for use at the weekly "war-hour" before the Blessed Sacrament, a devotion which is growing in popularity at St. Mary's, Cleveland.

The following text-books are published by the American Book Co.: "An Introduction to Science" ($1.20), by Bertha M. Clark, Ph.D., is a book of a practical nature. Chemistry, physics, biology, geology, etc., find representation in its pages. All theories are omitted, and in place of which practical problems of home-life, selection of food, lighting, ventilation, etc., are introduced. It is an interesting book from a domestic standpoint, but hardly scientific in the real sense of the word.——"Clark's Laboratory Manual for Introduction to Science" ($0.44), to be used in connection with the above, contains about 200 experiments. They are practical in nature, like the text-book, well-varied and clearly outlined. However, most of them seem to aim at effect alone, leaving the cause out completely. In this respect the book fails as a scientific one.——"Chemistry in the Home" ($1.20), by Henry T. Weed, B. S., is an excellent text-book for those who elect chemistry in their high-school course. It is well illustrated, the language and style simple, and, while sufficient theory is given to make the matter clear, the more complex and elaborate theories, suitable only for college chemistry, are omitted. Its practical nature also is to be commended.——"The Laboratory Manual" ($0.44), by Henry T. Weed, B. S., to accompany "Chemistry in the Home," is above the average of the ordinary high-school manual. The large number of experiments, clearly outlined, give the instructor a wide range. In order to stimulate an interest in industrial chemistry, there are given, at the end of the manual, several receipts for making household and toilet articles. Its chief commendation, however, rests in the set of definite questions asked in each experiment, which greatly emphasize the results sought for.——"A Community Arithmetic" ($0.60), by Brenelle Hunt, is a book of practical domestic applications of the processes taught in arithmetic. Construction problems, grocery and meat-market problems, taxes, household accounts, etc., are included in its pages. It emphasizes throughout that the success of an individual depends largely on his expenditures and wise investment of his savings.——"Le Premier Livre" ($0.64), by Albert R. Méras, Ph.D., and B. Méras, A.M., is a combined elementary French reader and grammar. Its aim is to give practical lessons in composition and conversations, based on Malot's "Sans Famille." It seems a defect in a book of this nature that many words needed in a reading lesson have not appeared in previous word-lists. The book, however, is calculated to teach one to think in French.——"Ear Training" ($0.40) contains a definite and sufficiently comprehensive course for elementary classes. Each exercise is a melody, complete in itself; even the written tone exercises, which appear in whole notes, are so constructed that the melodic idea is always in evidence. Prospective teachers of the grades will find the method stimulating.——One of the greatest helps in teaching elementary Spanish is a reader that is easy of translation and at the same time interesting enough to hold the attention of the class. This is had in "The First Spanish Reader" ($0.68), by E. W. Roessler and Alfred Remy. Simple stories, pleasing fables, folk songs and instructive lessons on the mineral and agricultural products of Mexico, Brazil, Cuba and Argentina are arranged in well-graded order.——Rose Lucia's "Peter and Polly in Autumn" ($0.48), contains the dialogues and adventures of two lovable children. The book is prettily illustrated in color, and is designed for supplementary reading in the second and third grades.

An Answer to Dr. Ryan

THERE are replies and replies, and some are replies in reality, and others only in seeming. But often the replies which fall under the later category, are full of interest and practical value. They do not, it is true, bear directly upon the point in question; their chief worth is found in the fact that they show how wide may be the boundaries of an apparently simple subject. Mr. Neacy's letter, printed herewith, is, I think, of the second variety. I cannot see very clearly that his remarks constitute a rejoinder to Dr. Ryan's letter of some months ago; nevertheless, Mr. Neacy is not of my opinion, and his words, coming from one actively engaged in manufacturing, will have a peculiar interest in these days of industrial unrest and uncertainty.

Confuted by His Own Words

"I AM fearful that if I attempted to cover all the subjects touched upon by Dr. Ryan in America for May 11," writes Mr. Neacy, "the Editor could find no room for my paper. Hence I will spare space as much as possible. Dr. Ryan is quite unable to recall the time or place of his saying that the secondary boycott had his approval. Yet if he will consult his letter-file, he ought to find two letters from myself, dated December 10 and 17, 1909, and carbon copies of his replies, dated December 12 and 19, of the same year. It will clear the atmosphere, as far as secondary boycotting is concerned, if after refreshing his memory by reading the communications referred to, Dr. Ryan will take the readers of America into his confidence, and show where there is any difference between his stand on this question in 1909, and that of "Gene" Debs, four-time candidate for president on the Socialist ticket. From a layman's point of view, the last paragraph of Dr. Ryan's communication, published in America, is most extraordinary, and for that reason I beg to insert it here:

> The attitude of opposition to labor unions and to collective bargaining, to which Mr. Neacy still clings, has become almost antiquated among respectable employers. In this connection I would invite his calm and prayerful attention to the principles and recommendations adopted a few weeks ago by President Wilson's Labor Program Board. The six employer members united with the six labor members and with Messrs. Taft and Walsh in unanimous approval of the right of labor to organize and to bargain collectively. The world moves.

"Dr. Ryan to the contrary notwithstanding, no employer engaged in competitive interstate commerce, can run a closed shop, under the domination of the Labor Trust, and hope to survive. I tried that scheme for eight years, from 1898 to 1906. I am absolutely 'through' with taking orders from union headquarters, or from other sources not financially interested in the enterprise.

The Closed and Open Shops

"ANOTHER 'antiquated' employer is the L. S. Starrett Company of Athol, Massachusetts, makers of fine tools for machinists. From a small beginning, this establishment grew, under 'open-shop' conditions, to immense proportions. For years this company was pestered by agents of the union with the argument, that, as the products were used exclusively by machinists, the 'closed-shop' plan, if installed, would make 'boosters' for these products out of all union men. After the union had guaranteed that there would be no curtailment of production, the company agreed to make the experiment. But at the close of the first month of operation, under union domination, the records showed that production had fallen off fully ten per cent. The union was informed of this fact, but each succeeding month production steadily declined. The union kept promising to get the plant back to normal production, a promise it never intended to fulfil. Finally, the Starrett Company, because of the clamor from customers that unfilled orders be shipped without further delay, notified the union officials that the closed-shop agreement would be terminated on a certain date, which was done. As to the progressive employers, who by their own volition, attempt under union restrictions to carry on a competitive interstate business, it is a safe wager that the first man of this type of employer is yet to be born.

The "Crimes of Capital"

"DR. RYAN also called attention to the 'crimes of sweating and extortion that lie at the door of capital.' My only acquaintance with extortion is that combination which has existed for perhaps thirty years, between the Stove Plate Moulders' Union and the National Stove Defense Association, through which the annual increase given the moulders, is passed on to the purchasers of stoves, on a basis of a four-dollars increase in the price of stoves, for every dollar of increase given the moulders. In regard to sweating, Dr. Ryan has dubbed me an 'almost antiquated' employer. I can return the compliment by reminding him that since the formation of State Industrial Commissions, sweating has practically ceased, except between parents and their minor children. Among native-born parents, it is an almost universal custom to allow the child, from its first school-days, a few pennies weekly for spending money, and to increase the amount with the growth of the youngster. When the child becomes a wage-earner, it is usual to make an agreement whereby a certain portion of the income is set aside for some project that the earner is to enjoy, education, for instance, in the future. On the other hand, a large group of parents of the younger workers in the ready-made clothing and textile industries, have come from foreign countries in which, it would appear, the child has no rights that the parent is bound to respect. It is these children who are humiliated at school for the want of a few pennies which would put them on an equality with the other pupils, and who are discouraged when they go out to work, by having their parents claim and seize the whole of their income. With neither encouragement nor a share in their earnings, whether the weekly pay-envelope contains five dollars or fifteen, the young worker often proceeds to get his due by hook or crook. Pay-envelopes tell no tales. Every operative signs a ticket on receiving his pay-envelope, certifying that the amount within is correct; the ticket goes back to the cashier, and there is no mark on the envelope itself to show the original contents. This system was adopted to do away with the difficulty of dealing with parents who would come to complain that the full amount had not been paid, and also, I think, out of sympathy with the despoiled children.

"On my own experience, I would say that there is no school of crime, in my opinion, that can compare with that of the home where the children are deprived of all their earnings, and thereby humiliated before their associates. Never in the history of the country was petty thieving so prevalent as it is today. I candidly believe that for most of it, parents are responsible."

Who's to Blame?

AFTER this pleasant fashion, drawing upon his years of experience, does Mr. Neacy discourse upon a variety of topics, essentially connected neither with the original offending editorial in America, nor with Dr. Ryan's letter in America for May 11. Yet his discourse is not without profit. However far our Milwaukee critic may have strayed from the first field of combat, it is clear that in citing the bad or indifferent home, he has touched upon one of the greatest, if not the greatest, causes of juvenile delinquency. But does he not overlook, or at least minimize, the fact that, in many instances, the bad or indifferent home is the outcome of conditions, for which some "bad" manufacturer, one, for instance, who will not pay his operatives a living wage, is ultimately responsible?

EDUCATION

The Classics and The War

THE place of the classics in war-modified education was the title of the Classical Conference held in Pittsburgh, July 2 and 3, in connection with the convention of the National Educational Association. "We have come," said the Chairman of the Conference, Dean Andrew F. West, of Princeton University, "to a critical time for classical studies. Now, too, is our chance; discipline and duty is the watchword of the hour, and discipline and duty is the strong claim to preferment advanced by the classics. The pleasant theory of education is going to the wall; we must intern it and inter it. This is our opportunity to advance, and make good our claim for classical education. If we neglect it, it will be gone perhaps forever. There will probably be no second chance."

Their "Practical" Quality

THE faith of the members of the Conference being plighted beforehand to the educative value of Latin and Greek, it will be interesting to notice the further consensus that developed in the course of the meetings. It was that after the war there will be a greater and more insistent demand, "What is the use of Latin and Greek?" It is a question that is being asked more and more insistently even now. We must be prepared to answer it, not in vague terms of "culture," "humanism," "training" and "tradition," but by showing that Latin and Greek are "practical," that is to say, that they do prepare a man best, and immediately, for the actual life that is before him. However well they may be calculated to achieve this end, they have not always been taught with this end in view. Too much nicety of erudition, for instance, argues a study of Latin and Greek for its own sake. This must be discarded; the war has made us too serious for it, and life is too short and too real for it. We must leave, too, or at least relegate to second place, the argument of the refinement of literary recreation. It is our task to show that Latin and Greek set a man up for life, his own life, not, however, a life by himself, but for his life in the world, his life socially. This we must do "practically," or be silent.

Are Latin and Greek "practical" in this sense? And what must be done better to define and better to achieve this end of the "practical" teaching of Latin and Greek? This practical quality of Latin and Greek training is best stated in the words of Dean West which were, in substance, these: "I have been a teacher for forty-five years. I have had experience in all kinds of teaching, in grammar schools, secondary schools, and college. I have traveled all over the country. I have seen education in all the States, and in Europe, and I have come to just one conclusion about it all. It is this, that the best thing about education, the culmination of all true education is the power of expression. By expression I mean, not talking or writing in symbols, as in mathematics, or by stenographic sign-language, but subtle expression of thought, as subtle as thought itself can be subtle. Without such expression there can be no communication of thought and ultimately thought itself and our ideals, and civilization itself must perish. This power of expression, how can we gain it? Only through the classics. Throw them away and your standards of expression are gone, your living language will change and decay. Ultimately you may have Esperanto but no true expression."

Training for Expression

MR. EDWARD P. MITCHELL, Editor-in-chief of the New York Sun, stated the case for Latin and Greek as "the ancient guardians of good modern English," still more strongly. He said:

> Our language is continually changing, and the process is one of decay. Witness the following example of modern head-line English, "The contaminatious influence of propaganding appears to be spreading," taken from one of the leading dailies of the country. It can only be kept safe by reference to the sources; it can be safeguarded only by the old tongues. Precisely because they are dead languages they constitute a pure standard that is fixed and will never change. It did indeed puzzle me for a long time to understand how it was that young men, coming from the farm and the shop and the printing office, not from the colleges, could and did develop extraordinary power in newspaper work. I was inclined to think it was pure genius. But I know better now. It was due to the fact that the standard was set and the style kept pure by somebody else; it was due to the dominant influence of the Latin and Greek training. Remove this influence and, as in the case of a radiator, you may still feel its heat for a while, but it must inevitably cool. The result will be perversion, the language of the Bolsheviki, or head-line English, poor syntax, disorganized thought and a pauper brain.

Such was the special claim for the practical value of the ancient classics stressed at this conference; their value, namely, as a training in correct expression of thought. Their value as a mental discipline is partly implied in the other, and was also insisted upon, but the main stress was laid upon this development of the power of expression. There can be no doubt of this being a practical value, as it immediately concerns a man's relations with his fellowmen, and the perpetuation of ideals as apart from a purely material existence. "The ancient languages," say Dean West and Mr. Mitchell, "are necessary to safeguard our modern English." Is it true? The argument certainly goes deep, and is supported by the historical argument drawn from the decay of the Roman tongue itself, and its revival from the dead to set a standard for Romance languages in the time of the Renaissance. The fear of the desolating consequences should daunt from their purpose the advocates of easy language, or too practical and material scientific, substitutes for the ancient classics.

Some Difficulties

THE classical following is to be congratulated on having for its leader so able a scholar, and so whole-hearted a devotee of the classics, as Dean West. His splendid faith in his cause must be a second inspiration to them. "Politics, business and the rest, mean nothing to me," he said. "The only thing I care for is education; that is what means most to me after religion." And no one who heard him speak, could doubt that he was just such an earnest apostle in the cause of education.

But what changes are called for in the present way of teaching Latin and Greek to make it thus "practical?" First of all, an earlier start in the study of these two languages, or the formation of a junior high school in the seventh and eighth grades of the present grammar school. Such provision has been made in the new educational law of England. It is furthermore provided in the same law that there shall be no early specializing, that is to say, before the age of sixteen, and the study of humanities is recommended as an offset to the threatening materialism. Then eliminate the unnecessary things, as suggested by Miss Frances E. Sabin, of the University of Wisconsin, in her excellent paper on "Justified Latin: Some Constructive Suggestions." Such unnecessary things are, for instance, the overcrowded curriculum, the overworked teacher, the untrained teacher, instruction above the pupil's capacity, the mystery in children's minds about why they are studying Latin and Greek and the lack of suitable text-books. Doubtless others will suggest themselves to the teacher. Miss Sabin mentioned another drawback in the present teaching of Latin and Greek, namely, the fewness of the high school students who are preparing for college. Might it not be possible while lowering the age for beginning Greek and Latin, to lower also the age of graduation from college? If it could be reduced to eighteen, or at any rate to twenty, the difficulty of the "few who go to college" would vanish. If we want to be "practical" we must face the consideration that the average boy or young man wishes to make a start in life at eighteen or certainly at twenty.

The "Classical League"

THE last action of the Conference, and the most far-reaching in its possibilities, was the inauguration of a Classical League, the following resolutions being drawn up by the Conference:

(1) Resolved, That the Conference favors the establishment of an American Classical League to supplement and reinforce existing classical agencies and for the extension and improvement of classical education;

(2) Resolved, That the chairman of this Conference be requested to appoint two other members to act with him in selecting a committee, of not less than five nor more than nine members, to act as a temporary executive committee until the permanent organization of the League be effected and to draft a constitution, to be submitted at a meeting to be held next year in connection with the National Education Association;

(3) Resolved, That this temporary executive committee be empowered to prepare the program for a classical conference to be held next year in connection with the National Education Association, and to do whatever else shall seem best to them for the promotion of the cause of classical education;

(4) Resolved, That the general advisory committee for 1918 be continued for the coming year and that the temporary executive committee be authorized to augment its membership.

By the unanimous vote of the Conference, Dean Andrew F. West, of Princeton University was appointed Chairman of this Committee. May this league and this leadership be the much needed bond of union between the scattered forces of the classicists.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Prohibition Above Victory

JUDGED by their actions the winning of the war is a slight matter to many of the National Prohibition fanatics, compared with the infliction of their arbitrary tyranny upon fellow-citizens and the abolition of the Holy Sacrifice as instituted by Our Divine Lord. Their attitude is well described in the Baltimore Evening Star:

> The great war with its tremendous consequences, with its strain on every American resource, moral as well as material, is relegated by them to the background. What does the danger of Teutonic domination of the world mean to them? or what do they care if Belgium lies prostrate and France is bleeding, and the greatest civilizing powers of the world are sending the flower of their manhood to fight the enemies of peace and justice, beside the question whether a saloon shall be allowed to keep open or whether we shall be permitted to drink a glass of beer?

If the patriotism of any body of men is to be suspected in these days of national trial, the first to be mistrusted are the fanatics who are so little affected by the great interests of their country, that now hang in the balance, as to make their zeal for war-time Prohibition the cloak of religious bigotry.

Tests for War Honors Defined

ACCORDING to the instructions issued as a guide to officers by General Pershing, the Medal of Honor can be conferred upon those men only who have performed "in action" deeds of most distinguished personal bravery and self-sacrifice above and beyond the call of duty. These acts must be so conspicuous as clearly to distinguish the recipient for gallantry and intrepidity above his comrades, involving risk of life or the performance of more than ordinarily hazardous service, the omission of which would not justly subject him to censure for shortcoming or failure in the performance of duty. Gallantry in action under circumstances which do not justify the award of the medal of honor, but where nevertheless extraordinary heroism is displayed in connection with military operations against an armed enemy will be rewarded with the Distinguished-Service Cross. Finally a Distinguished-Service Medal is bestowed for exceptionally meritorious service rendered the Government in connection with operations against an armed enemy. The latter distinction, therefore, differs from the other two, in that it can be gained by deeds not performed "in action."

K. of C. Plans and Accomplishments

WE are told by the Knights of Columbus War News Service that the plans of the Order, as at present outlined, will call for a budget of $50,000,000, or approximately $1,000,000 a week. This may, indeed, seem a large sum, but we may be certain that the money will be expended in the most economic way. From various unprejudiced sources the same report has come to us that the results achieved by the Knights of Columbus far exceed those accomplished by the Y. M. C. A., where an equal amount of money is placed at the disposal of both organizations. A dollar in the hands of the K. of C. has many times the value of the same sum in the hands of the Y. M. C. A. There are many reasons to account for this, aside from the administrative ability of the Knights themselves to which the editor of the Columbiad refers:

> By the prompt signing of contracts for materials and labor at the same prices accorded the Government, the Knights saved many thousands of dollars to the fund, and the administrative organization of the Order, trained in the handling of large affairs, being placed at the disposal of the war work, was another great economical factor. It is no exaggeration to state that administrative preparedness, due chiefly to the Order's experience in similar work during the long-standing crisis at the Mexican border, resulted in large savings to the Fund.

It is interesting to note that the war-fund campaign was launched with a million-dollar goal. This was tripled at the Chicago convention last August. Five times this amount was actually given by the city of New York alone, and fifty times as much will be required for the coming year. We need not add that it will be contributed to the last cent, for the excellent work of the Knights deserves it all. Their latest call is for 2,000 additional secretaries.

Are College Students Slackers?

IT is good advice that the Epworth Herald gives, and Catholics, too, should earnestly take it to heart: "Are you a college student and under draft age? Then do not enlist in the army or navy." These words are dictated by the truest patriotism, and express the wish of the War Secretary and the War Department. The latter has established military units in all colleges in which at least one hundred men enlist for military instruction. These men are regarded as members of the United States army, but are not called out until they are twenty-one years old, unless the country is in immediate danger:

> The surest, most practical, and most far-sighted way for college men to give the largest possible national service is to get into these college units. And, by consequence, the boys just finishing high school should know that the straight road to army service and a commission is through college. President Wilson is fully alive to this situation. He asks all who deal with young men and women to urge upon those of them who are leaving high school that they avail themselves this year of the opportunities offered by the colleges and technical schools. Do not think you will be called a slacker if you go to college instead of enlisting. A college student is regarded by the Administration as preparing himself for war service. Whatever your chosen study, the country can use you when you are ready. And all through the college course you will be getting a preliminary Plattsburg-idea training, and so will be qualifying for leadership.

Young women are not excluded from these considerations. As nurses, dietitians, and leaders in reconstruction, their college work will make them more efficient and so more valuable to the country. The balance, judgment and capacity for action that college training can give will be particularly needed for the great work ahead. Therefore, if you are a college student, or by a little effort can be, that is your place of national duty and service. So you will be keeping the colleges alive and vigorous, and you will be fitting yourself better than in any other way for your place in the war and the world after the war.

Under all circumstances, even though college units be not established, let Catholics remember that real patriotism demands that they give their children the fullest measure of education possible before the draft age. He, too, is a slacker who gives his country only the lesser service.

Year's Work of the Chaplains' Aid

THE splendid work of the Chaplains' Aid Association can be gathered from the summary of the year's work published in the Chaplains' Aid Bulletin for June:

Besides the 416 Mass outfits supplied to the chaplains, the year's work includes the publication of a special "Army and Navy Prayer Book" in English and Italian, of an army and navy edition of the Reims version of the New Testament, of which 70,000 copies have been distributed, a War Missal, "Chaplain's Catechism," "Confession in English and French," "The Honor Legion," "Catholic Loyalty," "The Armed Guard," "A Soldier Saint of Italy," "A Saint for Soldiers." "The Buccaneer of Christ," and a story called "The Cape Point Crew."

Books and religious articles distributed were as follows: Prayer books (including those in Polish, Slovak and Italian), 320,000; rosaries, 121,000; scapulars, 196,000; scapular medals, 67,000; catechisms (including Italian), 22;000; hymn books and hymn cards, 17,000; Sacred Heart badges, 17,000; pamphlets and tracts, 176,000; crucifixes, 7,000; religious books, 4,000.

The number of linens supplied to chaplains, including many sets other than those placed in the kits, makes a total of 10,500. About 500 sets of vestments have been supplied; also ciboria, monstrances, copes, Missals and Missal-stands, chalices, and other odd supplies to chaplains, including altar wines, sanctuary oil, palms, incense and charcoal, portable organs, etc., etc. A department of the Association is devoted to the furnishing of altar-breads, weekly or bi-monthly, to chaplains in the army and navy. To date, 175,000 breads have been sent out.

The Chaplains' Aid has furnished camps and base hospitals with reading matter, knitted afghans, games and puzzles. Catholic chaplains at home and overseas have found the Chaplains' Aid Association an invaluable ally, and no Catholic anxious to do real war work should fail to get in touch with the office of the Chaplains' Aid, at 605 Fifth Avenue, New York.

American Kultur in Bisbee

IN his message to the State legislature Governor Hunt of Arizona draws a vivid picture of the spectacle afforded by the Bisbee deportations of July 12, 1917. The shame of this outrage, he says, has been rehearsed in public and private gatherings throughout the world, even in darkest Russia:

A mob—I use the word advisedly—a mob of nearly 2,000 men, directed by county authorities whose sworn duty it was to suppress such lawlessness, organized, not as mobs are wont to do, under the spur of justifiable indignation or self-righteous anger, but with Indian-like stealth, under the cover of darkness, calmly, premeditatedly, deliberately, and swooped down at dawn upon the homes of unsuspecting, unoffending miners who had committed no violence, nay more, who had threatened no violence, but who had every lawful reason to feel secure as citizens under the guarantees vouchsafed by the Constitution of the United States and the State of Arizona. By sheer force of arms this conscienceless mob of copper company thugs violated, at one and the same time, the sacred tenets of our republic and the sanctity of the American home.

With all of the brutal abandon of the unconscionable Hun, they dragged husbands out of their wives' embrace, ruthlessly disengaged the arms of little, terrified children from about their father's necks, thrust mothers and sons apart, and offered coarse insults to the wives and daughters of honest workingmen. In this execrable manner, without a vestige of justification or legality, nearly 1,200 unarmed workingmen were driven at the point of a gun from their homes to the public square, later to be herded, like so many beasts of the field, into freight cars and transported into the deserts of an adjoining state.

During that enforced journey, the hapless victims of copper company vengeance were virtually without food or drink, notwithstanding the heat of an Arizona summer, and stood so long in one position on the floor of jolting cars that their feet were sore and bleeding from the ordeal. And, as can be readily imagined, the realization that their mothers, wives and daughters were left in Bisbee at the mercy of their ruffian captors did not serve to assuage their anguish.

If there is no exaggeration in this picture, it would be difficult indeed to find any point of difference between this specimen of American kultur and the worst phases of the German deportations of Belgian workingmen.

Six Recent Events of Catholic Interest

MANY events of peculiar interest to American Catholics have been crowded together within the last two weeks. The first to be noted is the death, on July 5, of Cardinal Sebastian Martinelli, formerly Apostolic Delegate to the United States, who succeeded Cardinal Satolli to that important position. He was proclaimed Cardinal at the Consistory of April 15, 1901, while still in this country, and returned to Rome in 1902 after a service of six years in the United States. Another death that even more nearly affects us is that of Archbishop Keane of Dubuque, June 22. He was intimately connected with the founding of the Catholic University at Washington, and was appointed its rector in 1889. After resigning his position, in 1896, he was made titular Archbishop of Damascus at Rome, and acted as Consultor of the Propaganda and Canon of St. John Lateran. He was raised to the Metropolitan See of Dubuque in 1900. There now remain but two of that earlier hierachy, of which he was a brilliant member: Cardinal Gibbons and Archbishop Ireland. Of deepest concern to all who knew and valued him was the death, on July 12, of Bishop Cusack of Albany. "To labor among the poor, some day, and among non-Catholics," says the New York Sun in the long and enthusiastic tribute it accords him, "was his earliest ambition, and from that he would never be turned aside." His ambition was to be satisfied: "It was conceded," the same paper writes, "that he had done more to overcome anti-Catholic prejudice than any other individual." To thousands of readers he has become familiar as "Father Cruise," in F. Hopkinson Smith's novel, "Felix O'Day," but to the Catholic of New York and Albany few memories will remain so dear as his. Another death that must not be left unrecorded is that of the famous Paulist Father, the Very Rev. George Mary Searle, a convert, a noted astronomer and a former professor of the United States Naval Academy. He entered the Paulist Community in 1871 and was elected Superior General in 1904. His last years were spent in writing his memoirs, "Fifty Years in the Catholic Church." He died in his eightieth year. Amid these sad and solemn happenings is to be mentioned likewise the bright and auspicious event of the recent enthronement of Bishop Dougherty of Buffalo, as Archbishop of Philadelphia, July 10, with his Eminence Cardinal Gibbons officiating. At the same time the announcement is made of the consecration, at St. Joseph's Cathedral, Buffalo, July 25, of the Reverend Thomas J. Walsh, D.D., as Bishop of Trenton, N. J. The ceremony will be performed by the Apostolic Delegate and his solemn installation at Trenton will be conducted by Cardinal Farley.

The War.—The long expected renewal of the German offensive began on July 15. It was launched on a fifty-five mile front on both sides of Reims, from Chateau-Thierry to Massige, and in it were used, according to credible estimates, not less than 500,000 men. East of Reims, in the Champagne district, it met such stubborn resistance that it made no progress whatever and soon came to a halt. North of Reims no serious fighting took place.

Bulletin, July 15, p.m.-July 22, a.m.

West of Reims the principal effort was made and gained considerable success. Between Chateau-Thierry and Jaulgonne the Germans crossed the Marne and advanced three miles, but the Americans immediately started a counter-attack and drove the Germans back across the river, recapturing all the lost territory and taking 1,100 prisoners. This achievement has attracted wide comment, because it is the first instance in which a counter-attack has been successfully made on a large scale during the first day of a great drive.

Between Jaulgonne and Reims the French slowly but steadily retired before the German attack, yielding ground but making the advance very costly for the enemy. As a consequence, the Germans crossed the Marne at a number of points and occupied territory south of the river from Jaulgonne to Oeuilly, advancing on a front of about fifteen miles at some points as much as four miles. Before the offensive the battle line turned north at Chatillon-sur-Marne and ran to Vrigny, southwest of Reims. On this sector also the French gave way, abandoning from one to five miles on a front of about twelve miles. On both sectors the French resistance stiffened and on July 17 the drive came to a complete halt.

Early in the morning of July 18 the Allied forces, consisting of Americans, of whom 200,000 are officially reported to have been in action, and a large body of French, launched a counter-offensive, which began west of Soissons, from Fontenoy to Belleu Woods, and gradually extended from the Aisne to the Marne. An average advance of more than seven miles, with a penetration reaching ten miles at a number of points, had been made on this twenty-two mile front, before the German resistance had stiffened sufficiently to offer any serious obstacle. At the same time the Allied forces counter-attacked on the fifteen mile front south of the Marne, from Chateau-Thierry to Oeuilly, recaptured all the territory they had lost earlier in the week and drove the Germans north of the Marne. Between the Marne and Reims the French and Italians have regained the territory lost in the vicinity of Marfaux, including the town itself.

Second Battle of the Marne

The Germans are now in a dangerous situation. They are being forced back at every point on both sides of the salient which had its apex at Chateau-Thierry. They have lost this town and been driven three miles north of it. The initiative has passed completely from them to General Foch, and unless they can check the advance of the Allied troops in the sectors south of Soissons and Reims and along the Marne, they will be forced to make a costly and difficult and perhaps disastrous retreat. American troops have taken 17,000 prisoners and 560 cannon.

In Palestine, on July 13, the Turks attacked and penetrated the British positions at the crossings of the Jordan and along the Abu Tellul ridges north of Jericho. They were repulsed and in the British counter-attack the lost positions were regained. The Italians have extended their gains in Albania, having captured Point Iosi. In Italy and Macedonia the Allies have had some local successes.

Other War Fronts

Acting in accordance with powers conferred by the new constitution, the Council of State in Haiti has voted unanimously for a declaration of war on Germany. This action was taken at the request of the President of the republic, and is the sequel, long delayed, of that Government's protest against Germany's unrestricted submarine warfare and of Germany's refusal to grant compensation for the loss of life by eight Haitians who were on board the French steamship Montreal when that vessel was torpedoed by a German submarine. Twenty-two nations have declared war on Germany.

Haiti Declares War

Belgium.—Belgium celebrated on July 21 the eighty-seventh anniversary of her independence. Throughout the world, and particularly in the allied countries, her national holiday received recognition. Many American cities did homage to Belgium's undaunted love of liberty by keeping her Independence day. President Wilson once again voiced the sentiments of the American people in the following message which he sent on the occasion to King Albert and his subjects:

Independence Day

> On this day, sacred in the annals of Belgium, the hearts of my countrymen beat in sympathy with the Belgian people, with whom we are linked in the resolute struggle to conserve the rights and liberties of free communities. Your country has been torn asunder before by alien oppression and by attempted domination, and beneath the searing blasts of oppression has learned to prize and develop the qualities that stimulate a true-hearted people to assume among the powers that high place that rightly belongs to free and independent nations.
> I join with my countrymen in extending to your Majesty and to the people of Belgium, who have so nobly given their lives and treasure for the safeguarding of national freedom and equal justice, heartfelt greetings on this auspicious day in the confidence that it presages for re-enfranchised Belgium a still greater and more glorious place in the proud annals of human achievement in the paths of liberty.

So confident is Belgium in the restoration that will mark the successful completion of the work to which twenty-two nations are pledged, that plans have already been formulated and are being perfected for the rebuilding of her dismantled and ruined cities. The day peace is won the rehabilitation will begin.

France.—On July 17 M. Duval, director of the newspaper Bonnet Rouge, was executed for treasonable actions against the Government. He was accused of taking money from German bankers, said to have been obtained by him in Switzerland, where he had gone with passports given him by the Minister of the Interior, M. Malvy. "That's the little affair, is it?" he said, as he was about to face the firing squad. His execution is the second growing out of the propaganda known as "Bolo-ism" or "defeatism." Almereyda, the editor of the Bonnet Rouge, as it may be recalled, died mysteriously in prison under circumstances pointing to suicide. Soon after the execution of Bolo Pasha the trial of Duval and six other defendants began. The latter received prison terms ranging from two to ten years.

Sequels to Bonnet Rouge Case

In connection with the same charges of active pro-Germanism and of complicity in the Bonnet Rouge case, M. Malvy, the former Minister of the Interior, was on July 16 placed under trial before the French Senate, sitting as a High Court. Malvy had for years been the Caillaux nominee in the French Government, and through the occult power of his masonic master was able continuously to hold his office amid all the changes of Government that took place about him. The suppression of the Bonnet Rouge at last led to his resignation. The charge of direct treason in connection with the Bonnet Rouge case and of inciting mutinies in the army was finally dropped on July 18 and in place of it was substituted the accusation of "culpable negligence and criminal disregard of the duties of the Minister of the Interior." The greatest punishment that now can be inflicted upon him, if found guilty, will be life imprisonment. The prosecuting attorney charges Malvy with being merely the clerk of a former public man. The former Premier himself, Joseph Caillaux, who is in prison, has written to the President of the Chamber of Deputies renewing his request that the trial which he is awaiting on charges of communicating with the enemy may take place speedily. He complains of police machinations which he says are being set on foot to "reach" him. During the exhaustive review of Malvy's activities by the prosecuting attorney Caillaux's name was frequently mentioned.

Ireland.—Senator Lewis of Illinois recently presented to the Senate a petition said to have been signed by 600,000 people, calling upon President Wilson and Congress to demand of Great Britain Ireland's immediate independence. The petition had been circulated by The Friends of Irish Freedom, and it was the Senator's wish that it should be inserted in the Congressional Record. The petition reads as follows:

Petition to Congress

> We, as American citizens, respectfully state to the Government of the United States that Ireland is a distinct nation, deprived of her liberty and held in submission by England by military power alone. As America has entered the war for the preservation of democracy and the freedom of small nationalities, this Government is in honor bound to apply this principle impartially in all cases of people held in subjection, whether they be under the jurisdiction of Germany, like Belgium, or of England, like Ireland. As America cannot be a party to any scheme of world peace which withholds from any nation the God-given right of freedom, the only final settlement must be the complete independence of Ireland. America has the right by her entry into the war to demand it from England, not in the peace conference at the close of the war but now.
> We therefore respectfully urge upon the President and Congress the necessity and good policy of giving a great example to the world by insisting that England shall grant Ireland complete independence. We earnestly hope, like Cuba, Ireland will be made free by the action of America.

Senator King of Utah declared his opposition to the reading of the petition. It was an attempt, he said, by a number of people to assault one of our allies, Great Britain. There were a number of traitors, so-called Irishmen, in this country, and this petition was in line with the propaganda carried on by that element, the Sinn Feiners, against our allies. In reply Senator Lewis declared that the signers were not traitors. "My city does not have any traitors," said the Senator, "and these Irish people are as loyal to the United States as any people within our borders." On the suggestion of Senator Smoot the document was handed over to the Committee on Printing for investigation.

According to a statement of Mr. Beck, on behalf of the British Government, given to the press at the end of June, no change is to be made regarding liability to military service of Irishmen temporarily resident in Great Britain. Regarding those, however, who should cross the Channel in the future it is proposed that they shall be called for military service unless they come to England for agricultural work and have in their possession a certificate to that effect issued by an employment exchange. As to other workmen who are in Great Britain on temporary work of national importance, they will not be recruited for military service until they have been given a chance of returning to Ireland. Any Irishman of military age who in future goes to England for other than agricultural work will be liable to conscription.

Conscription and Home Rule

In Dublin, on July 17, an official statement was issued by the anti-conscriptionists, announcing that they have succeeded in saving the nation from > Measures which would inevitably have led to terrible and incalculable consequences. For the moment the danger is averted but not finally disposed of, and all preparations made for dealing with the conscription menace should be carefully kept in existence.

In Belfast on July 12, Sir Edward Carson addressing a meeting of Orangemen declared that the position of the Ulster leaders was one of grave anxiety. The leader of the Unionists maintained that the Government was constantly torturing the Ulsterites, and in the midst of the world-war the indignity was put upon them of being threatened with subjection to those who had not the faintest conception of what the words freedom and liberty meant:

> Many brave Ulster Orangemen were now sleeping their last sleep in Flanders and France, and before they left their homes the Government promised them that as long as the war lasted there would be no question raised of Home Rule. We will keep that promise to our dead brethren, come what will.

After this remarkable statement the speaker concluded by urging all to lay aside political animosities, and bear the burden of battle in winning the cause of freedom.

Rome.—It is interesting to note that China has established diplomatic relations with the Vatican. The request, which was presented some time ago, was graciously accepted, with the consequence that China appointed Tai Tcheng-Lin as Minister to the Holy See. He had previously served as Minister to Portugal. His appointment has received the official approval of Pope Benedict XV.

Diplomatic Relations

The question of the resumption of diplomatic relations between France and the Vatican, which is of more or less constant recurrence, has been given a new impulse by the publication in Paris of a book called "Rome sans Canossa," in which the author urges many reasons for reestablishing official relations between the Holy See and the French Government, insisting on his country's vital interests in the Orient and the necessity of taking into account the religious implications involved in the reorganization of Alsace. The writer, however, is careful to note that there must be no change in the laws which violate the rights of Catholics, he attempts to justify the rupture which took place at the beginning of the present century, and he points out that he desires neither an ambassador nor a nuncio but merely a representative. Such a scheme is impracticable, but the fact that it has been broached at all, even in such a way as to satisfy anticlericalism, is instructive to say the least, especially in the light of the statement made by the author that the appointment by Great Britain of Sir Henry Howard as Minister Plenipotentiary to the Holy See took place with the consent, if not at the suggestion, of the French Government.

The appointment, since the war began, of ministers to the Vatican by these two non-Catholic countries, China and Great Britain, and the recent visit of the Prince of Wales to Pope Benedict XV, for which the British Government, as Mr. Bonar Law affirmed in Parliament in answer to a member from Ulster, assumes full responsibility, place France in an invidious position.

The Apostolic Nuncio to Spain, on the occasion of his recent visit to Lisbon, called on the President of the Portuguese Republic, a courtesy rendered possible by the overthrow of the Masonic party. The President manifested his gratitude for the good-will shown by the Holy See towards Portugal, and the Nuncio, in turn, expressed his desire that diplomatic relations between Portugal and the Holy See should be reestablished. The Pope himself had written to the Cardinal of Lisbon and the Portuguese bishops about the same time, praising them for their constancy in the midst of the trials of recent years and congratulating them on the prospect of improved conditions in the very near future.

Russia.—In interesting articles recently contributed to the New York Evening Post, Robert Crozier Long describes the breaking up of Russia and the spread of fanaticism there. Anatole Lamanoff, the "boy dictator" of Kronstadt, proclaimed the principle last year that "No State containing more than, say, 100,000 inhabitants could possibly be freely ruled." Accepting the suggestion, a large number of local Soviets are now in revolt against the so-called central government in Moscow. In questions regarding money, justice, soldiers and "counter-revolutionary movements" the Soviets do as they like. They issue "Government" and "municipal" paper money which is reluctantly accepted, "goods-notes," which are a sort of deferred barter, being preferred. The local Soviets also organize their own armies. Says the Rabotchee Dielo:

Disintegration and Fanaticism

> In practice this means that each Soviet jealously keeps attached to itself all the disbanded but still armed soldiers which it can attract. These soldiers are sometimes willing to fight for the Bolshevist idea on the spot, but they are seldom willing to go to remote provinces to fight anti-Bolshevists there; and they object to enrolment in the Moscow Bolshevist army.

The Social Revolutionary villages in many provinces where the Bolshevist Red Guards are weak have also their own "armies." These villages first repudiated the local Soviets; next they repudiated the Moscow Government. With arms and munitions they are badly supplied, as the soldiers, the only men with arms, are Bolsheviki; but sometimes four or five villages have formed military leagues for mutual support should the Bolsheviki attempt to enforce authority.

As for the administration of justice, in the country there are no courts at all. "The people execute their own 'justice,'" seizing and torturing suspects, half of whom are entirely innocent. Yuri Kovroff, a Soviet politician, reports that within fifty miles of Moscow "There are single villages which not only reject all political combinations with outside units of government, but do their best to prevent penetration from the outside world of communication with it. These villages will admit no outsider, pay no taxes, and take no measures of government except prohibiting trade with other centres. About the only indication that the community instinct survives is an occasional savage rush of men and women to kill some unlucky intruder as a suspected thief." The disintegration of Russia has almost reached its ultimate stage.

In the remote provinces of Russia, says the Rabotchaya Gazeta, the "Red Messiah" excitement produces "frenzy and orgiastic revivalism." Describing the forcible conversion of a Perm village to Bolshevism, the Gazeta says:

The soldiers burned down the church as a temple of heresy, but the house of the priest, who got away, was taken possession of and there was held a small Bolshevist meeting, including the village headman, at which there was a quasi-religious ceremony. The soldiers chanted: "Who are the enemies of the people? Who are the enemies of the people? Who are the enemies of the people?" three times in succession; and then repeated this several times, each time quicker than the last, until only the word "people" could be distinguished. Meantime the converts danced, and the women went into hysterics and screamed. Then the village was proclaimed "converted to Bolshevism."

Bolshevist fanatics calling themselves "God's Beggars" have been terrorizing the central and south-central provinces of Russia. They kill non-Bolsheviki on the ground that the latter are unclean, seize big farms on the plea that they have a right to rob the impure and they murder little children for being the brood of Antichrist. Out of a religious belief in the omnipotence of the Soviets, the peasants oppose local organizations, saying "Comrade Lenine will not let us starve." The result is the ruin of schools, roads, hospitals, etc., and the rapid spread of anarchy.

M. Terestchenko, formerly Kerensky's Foreign Minister, has sent from Stockholm to the Allies a warning against negotiating with the Bolsheviki. He said that Whom Has Bolshevism Benefited?

"Brute force is the Bolshevist god, Russia and the whole world have only two enemies—Bolshevism and the Germans." Continuing he asked:

Sixteen months of revolution have passed, including seven months of Bolshevism, and who has been benefited by Bolshevism? The Russian army? No. It has been disorganized. The working classes? No. All labor is dormant or is plunged into a severe economic struggle. The peasants? No. For the worthless money causes a frightful situation for the peasant, who is thereby induced to fight for a strong government.

Has Socialism in general been benefited? No. For Socialism's turncoating has weakened the Socialist cause in Entente countries. In the countries fighting the Entente schism has arisen. The voices of the Independent Socialists are less heeded than ever. The Socialists are losing their strength in the German Parliament, while in France reactionary tendencies arise. Bolshevism has dealt Socialism a fatal blow everywhere.

Germany alone has benefited by Bolshevism. Lenine and Trotzky reign in Moscow, solely through Germany, which knows it is easy to overthrow them but does not do so because she realizes, thanks to Bolshevism, that she does not need an army in Russia. The Bolsheviki have served her purpose far better than she herself could do. Germany will never permit Russia to be organized until a general peace is enforced.

Therefore, I trust my warnings may be heeded by all who believe that Russia will be saved by Bolshevism. Every telegram from Wilson to the usurpers, who are Russian neither in origin nor spirit, and every effort to cooperate with them is a mistake. They betrayed the Finnish Reds, whom they urged to revolt. In the Ukraine they betrayed all who were assisting them. They are ready to betray everybody. Every assistance that Russia gives them will ultimately be taken into account by Russia's real friends, and will weaken the Allies' sympathy and confidence.

Terestchenko favors the formation of a national league uniting Monarchists and Republicans against the extreme Socialists.

Execution of Ex-Czar

According to a dispatch received at London on July 20 by Russian wireless, which, unlike previous reports, seems to be authentic, the ex-Czar of Russia, Nicholas Romanoff, was shot on July 16. The message is in part as follows:

At the first session of the Central Executive Committee, elected by the fifth Congress of the Council, a message was made public that had been received by direct wire from the Ural Regional Council concerning the shooting of the ex-Czar Nicholas Romanoff.

Recently Yekaterinburg, the capital of the Red Urals, was seriously threatened by the approach of Czecho-Slovak bands and a counter-revolutionary conspiracy was discovered which had as its object the wresting of the ex-Czar from the hands of the Council's authority. In view of this fact, the President of the Ural Regional Council decided to shoot the ex-Czar, and the decision was carried out on July 16.

Steps were in progress at the time of the execution to bring the ex-Czar to trial "for his crimes against the people," but circumstances led to a postponement of the process. The action of the Ural Regional Council in ordering the shooting has been upheld by the Central Executive Committee as being regular and the announcement is made by the same body that extremely important documents concerning the affairs of Nicholas Romanoff, now in its possession, will soon be published. The former Empress and the young heir, Alexis Romanoff "have been sent to a place of security."

The Robbers and the Robbed in Mexico

FRANCISCO FERNANDEZ

A WITTY diplomat once said to Napoleon III at the Tuileries, "In Mexico, Sire, there are only two parties, les voleurs et les volés" (the robbers and the robbed). The same holds good today and "les volés" are not the party in power at present. The New York Times, in a recent editorial commenting on the President's speech, says, "The United States are not warring on robbery to become robbers ourselves." Yet at its very doors the robbers from across the sea are plotting with the party in power there to do all the harm they can to the United States and its allies and that party is in power owing to the support it received and is receiving from the United States. It is not easy to understand how aid and comfort can be freely dispensed to Carranza's would-be Government without his friends the Germans reaping some benefit from it.

That Carranza is under the thumb of the Germans in Mexico admits of no doubt. It is only in Washington that the existence of the powerful wireless station of Calpulalpam appears to be unknown, that no word has come of the $10,000,000 worth of bullion which the Südamerikanische Bank gave Carranza to use in the mint, of his receiving from the Germans the missing parts of the munition factory he got from Japan, of his plotting with Argentina and Venezuela to call the citizens of the United States "Anglo-Americans" and not "Americans," tout court—not a very vicious blow, but one showing how the wind blows. If not known already, it certainly should be that Carranza has a private telephone-wire between his house and Von Eckart's, the German Minister, and has frequent private conferences with him. These facts alone ought to be sufficient to make the Government of the United States pause in its support and recognition of Carranza as a ruler de facto or de jure—for he is neither. Besides he fulfils none of the requisites so often set forth as indispensable for recognition by the President himself: he does not represent the nation in any sense, he came into power by revolution and it cannot be insisted upon too much, he heads the party of loot and rapine. He owes what success he has attained to the fact that he has robbed and looted more systematically and profitably than others.

The American press does a great injustice to the Mexican people in saying they are all addicted to banditry and are all pro-German. The robbers, however, are a very small, though turbulent and active minority; they are pro-German because the Germans actually give them money and deceive them with promises of the wildest nature, even that of some day going on a looting expedition into the United States. As a matter of fact the true situation is precisely the reverse for the mass of the Mexican people are intensely law-abiding and peaceful. The educated, intelligent Mexicans are devoted to the cause of the Allies. Their admiration for France and England are well known to all Americans ("Anglo-Americans"!) who have lived for any time in Mexico. These educated Mexicans, together with the peaceful, less-educated classes, form the party of Les Volés. They are obviously irreconcilable with the other party and all the rhetoric the so-called editors of Mexico, who were touring the United States, or that of the mistaken people who entertained them, will not succeed in bridging over the abyss which separates the two parties in Mexico.

It is equally futile to attempt, as the Carranza propaganda and the journalists are attempting, to make it appear, that Mexico is rapidly settling down to peace and order. Mexico today is in a worse condition of strife and unrest than ever; but the press is so effectively gagged in the hands of Carranza's German friends, that nothing unfavorable to him is allowed to appear. It is therefore impossible to learn the truth about Mexico from papers printed in Mexico. It would in fact be interesting to learn where the funds for the trip of the editors came from! The truth is that out of the twenty-seven States of the Union, not one is without its band of fighters who are determined never to allow the Carranza or predatory element to consolidate itself. These men are now called "bandits" by the robbers who looted Mexico City, appropriated the deposits of the banks, and robbed and desecrated the churches. Far from settling down, the devastated country is bare of crops and none are being planted, industries are shut down and famine is enthroned; epidemics prevail and everywhere the low birth-rate and the mortality amongst the children are appalling.

The rural populations have sought refuge in the chief towns and the jungle has invaded the villages and farmlands, particularly in the tropical districts where such crops as sugar-cane are entirely eradicated and wild beasts make their lairs in the deserted buildings of the great haciendas. Mexico City, whose population according to the census of 1910 was under half a million, is now said to have over a million and a quarter inhabitants, the increase being due to the influx of refugees from the country and small towns where life has become intolerable. This increase is a menace to the public health and the food-supply; but the unfortunate refugees find safety in numbers and the unhappy women at least are less exposed to the outrages which have been so characteristic of the revolution. Does any sane man believe that such conditions are those of a people "settling down"? The Germans, as long as they have a free hand there, have no intention of letting Mexico "settle down." The disorder which persists there is of itself a menace, but above all it is a favorable medium in which to breed hatred and mistrust of the Allies, and even for the development of active hostilities, like the U-boat offensive in American waters, the wireless information-base, and the manufacture of munitions.

To point out a danger without suggesting a remedy would be a lame policy. Is there any way of helping Mexico really to settle down, to cease being a lurking-place for the enemy of the great cause for which the United States is fighting, and become instead a potent factor in winning the war? Certainly there is. The way is to cease interfering in Mexico's internal affairs. The doctrine has been preached ad nauseam, but the very opposite has been practiced. The interference has taken the very shape which has been declared as one of the great aims of the war: "not to impose any distasteful form of government upon a nation." For Carranza's Government, is the most hated, as well as the most unrepresentative of any faction in arms. It came into power through the extraneous assistance it received from the Government which enunciated those very aims which it now goes out of its way to repudiate in its nearest neighbor. Not content with lending moral support to Carranza our Government threatens his opponents with its wrath and in fact warns them and their many friends in this country to keep hands off its favorite. Without such interference Carranza and his German friends would not last long. Les Volés only ask for a fair field and no favor. "Don't help us, but don't help the other fellow either."

The Mexicans whom the New York Times described as "the élite of statesmen, scientists ["Scientificos"?], poets, novelists, journalists, scholars, the sober, frugal population" are not to be found in the camp of the unscrupulous rabble now in official power in the capital. Such of them as are yet in the flesh, are in exile or in hiding, eking out a miserable existence in the seclusion of the overcrowded town, or else they are in the mountains with a rifle in their hands, and are called "bandits" by those who have despoiled them. They are not touring the United States and being banqueted or making florid speeches regarding the wonderful way in which Mexico is "settling" down—settling down in the shadow, yes! These refugees get no notice from the press, indeed, their struggle is not dubbed "the struggle of a people for its liberties," yet if ever men struggled against an odious tyranny, that of the predatory and criminal class of their country, the wretched opponents of Carranza are those men.

All that is dear to them is at stake: their home, their country, their independence, their very faith. For let not the Catholics of the United States blind themselves to the fact that behind the support granted to Carranza from this country certain anti-Catholic forces are steadily at work. In return for the help they give Carranza they receive protection and encouragement, schools are given over to them, and the Catholic Faith of the people is attacked. But all this would not be possible without "interference." Meanwhile the Mexican people are groaning under this interference and those few who are benefited by it, far from being grateful, are insidiously hostile to their benefactors. The "recognition" accorded them they repay by plotting and legislating with the German and his friends in Argentina, Venezuela, etc., against foreigners, i.e., the citizens of the United States, making the acquisition or even the retention of property in Mexico by Americans quite impracticable, instigating the ignorant people to hate us and all other foreigners—except the Germans.

Action and Reaction of Bone-Dry Prohibitionists

GEORGE E. HOADLEY

DURING the past few years the Anti-Saloon League has been furnishing the Catholic viewpoint on Prohibition, giving the opinions of "famous priests" and "prominent laymen," some of them in the pay of the League. Occasionally, these pamphlets and leaflets have been decorated with insulting cartoons, the better, no doubt, to illustrate the Catholic idea. The League names a priest as one of its vice-presidents, and makes it a point to list a priest among its convention speakers. An advance press-notice, sent out to advertise a recent Anti-Saloon League convention, heralded the speaker as a "noted Catholic orator and friend of Billy Sunday." Again, they advertise this particular speaker as the "great champion of the miners," or the "great friend of Theodore Roosevelt."

At one of these conventions the "friend of Billy Sunday" was on the program with a representative of the Woman's Christian Temperance Association, an organization that "has moral-suasion arguments against the use of liquor for medicinal and sacramental purposes," though it has "never stood for a law against such use." The "Chicago Preachers' Quartet" and the "Rail-Splitter Quartet" furnished music for the occasion, all of which indicates the cosmopolitan spirit of the affair.

Sidney J. Catts, Governor of Florida, and the Rev. Dr. Wilbur F. Crafts, reformer by profession, have also spoken at these conventions from the same platform as the "noted Catholic orator." Anyone who has had anything to do with securing justice for the Catholic Indian schools needs no introduction to the Rev. Dr. Crafts. A few years ago, as head of the International Reform

Bureau of Washington, D. C., the gentleman was engaged in an attempt to place the Bible in the public schools. He boasted of the fact that a certain individual had paid for the printing of a few hundred thousand copies, for free distribution. As the book was illustrated in colors and did not look like a Bible, perhaps Dr. Crafts hoped to get it into the schools, quietly, for pictorial study. No Anti-Saloon League convention seems to be complete without an anti-Catholic of prominence and a Catholic priest on the program. In 1905, an officer in the American army, well known as the leader of an anti-Catholic movement, refused to speak from the same platform with the late John L. Sullivan, likewise advertised as one of the stellar attractions. Whereupon the pugilist read an eloquent lecture on bigotry.

A half-dozen, more or less, of the Catholic clergy are used by the Anti-Saloon League, evidently on a sliding scale of prices. The "noted orator" receives a fee of fifty dollars, plus expenses, a speech, while another priest, who gave twenty-nine "lectures" last fall, receives a fee of ten dollars and expenses for each lecture. These lecturers may not realize the anti-Catholic tendencies of the Anti-Saloon League, but they usually make an apology for their Church and explain that it is not an ally of the saloon! One of these speakers, addressing a convention about five years ago, prefaced his talk with a defense of the Catholic Church and said:

> I want to make an assertion that will be taken up by the enterprising newspapers of the United States, and that will be repeated in the years to come in every part of our beloved country. * * * I want to make an assertion that will help to place the Catholic Church in her true light before the minds of those who have wasted many a hard effort in fighting an imaginary menace: Every Catholic in the United States, whether priest or layman, is absolutely free to work for and to vote for National Prohibition. * * * The man who tells you that the Catholic priesthood and the Catholic Bishops of America are the allies of the saloon business is guilty of a gross and serious misrepresentation!

The W. C. T. U. is following the lead of the Anti-Saloon League, and is also printing the Catholic views on Prohibition, one leaflet quoting a young woman former employee of the League, and an unknown layman, as "ever ready to demolish any wet theologian's defense of the tottering saloon cause." The same leaflet adds:

> It is interesting to know that Rev. Father ——— is one of the men who do not believe in using fermented wine at the Lord's Supper. For years, he says, he has bought about two dollars' worth of grapes late in the fall, when they are sweetest, and from them has made his annual supply of altar wine.

The handful of men who have represented themselves as the appointed voice of the Church, attempted, a few years ago, to form a Catholic Prohibition League, which met with the Anti-Saloon League. The young woman referred to above, a convert, reputed to be the daughter of a Presbyterian clergyman, was then in the employ of the Anti-Saloon League, her particular business being to organize the voters in Catholic parishes, under the banner of the Catholic Prohibition League. The plan worked well for a while, and the Catholic Prohibitionists set up headquarters in Indianapolis. The expenses were met in part, I am told, by a prominent Knight of Columbus, who contributed a few thousand dollars to the cause. The Bishop of Indianapolis it is said refused to recognize the organization, the financial backers grew tired of the task, and the scheme went by the board, though it still holds to a spark of life in certain quarters.

One of the strangest publications in existence is edited and published by a clergyman who instigated the formation of the Catholic Prohibition League. Some of the articles printed therein are worthy of the Anti-Saloon League. Comment is made, for instance, on the appearance of a Catholic priest in a Protestant church, speaking for Prohibition. The editor quotes this priest as saying: "When I told them [the Bishops] that I had been in Protestant churches, the Bishops never did more than smile."

The editor of the publication in question is freely quoted as opposed to the use of fermented wine in the Mass. He declares that it is not consistent to hold that "Christ, in instituting this life-giving Sacrament, used a wine which contains 'the emblem of sin and death', and which was too impure for the Jewish sacrifices." This editor quotes a fellow-priest at writing, "I am glad that you are keeping to the fore that fermented wine is not necessary for the validity of the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass."

These workers in the vineyard of the Anti-Saloon League have evidently imbibed their employers' ideas of Catholicism. Catholics are referred to in the official organ of the Catholic Prohibitionists as "The ones that were last seen on the booze ship as it went down under public condemnation." We learn that "The liquor evil is becoming entrenched where Catholics are most numerous"; that "the liquor traffic has it in its power to cripple the finances in most of the parishes, where the clergy should dare to preach on this subject." A priest is made to say that "Temperance truth will be preached by our priests just as soon as their respective Bishops want it preached"; "The brewer," we are warned, "controls the politics of large cities and his sway will be unmolested as long as he plasters the mouth of the Church with bank checks and glucose." An article on Cardinal Gibbons tells us that "great men, like the sun, have spots and blemishes," and such twaddle passes muster as arguments for bone-dry Prohibition!

It is hard at times to understand the point of view of some Catholic Prohibitionists. At the last convention of the Catholic Total Abstinence Union a motion was offered asking the endorsement of a plan outlined by a prominent Archbishop, involving a direct appeal by Catholic voters, to members of the House and Senate, to secure the rights of the Church in regard to sacramental wine in Prohibition States. The suggestion dealt with the advertising, as well as with the shipment, of such wines. Immediately the motion was protested on the plea that the "Temperance forces might not like such interference." "The temperance lobby," a Methodist institution, however, "would be glad to take up the matter, if approached privately and quietly."

The Knights of Columbus were then in the field with their war activities, but it was suggested on the floor that the Catholic Total Abstinence Union be asked to raise money for "The United Committee on War Temperance Activities in the Army and Navy," and the motion carried! This United Committee, with offices in New York City, advertises as "participating organizations" the anti-Catholic Anti-Saloon League; the Board of Temperance of the Methodist Episcopal Church; the Epworth League; the Prohibition Party National Committee; the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, the Catholic Prohibition League and the Catholic Total Abstinence Union. The Prohibition party, at its last convention, attempted to put an anti-Catholic plank in its platform, and asked to have removed from the program the name of a priest who was announced to give the opening prayer. It is responsible for Governor Catts of Florida and for sundry anti-Catholic issues.

The following October, after the C. T. A. U. had agreed to help raise funds for the "United Committee," one of the "participating organizations," "The Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America," issued a manifesto for a general celebration of the quadricentennial of the Reformation. The resolutions declared that the Reformation brought to the Protestants "so much light, liberty and other blessings of the Gospel," "the heritage of a pure Scriptural faith," and "the inestimable blessings of civil and religious liberty." Surely a queer combination of interests, into which the Catholic Total Abstinence Union at least voted to pour what funds it could gather, for work among the soldiers and sailors.

The Knights of Columbus may not have the dainty slogan of the United Committee on War Temperance Activities: "With clean hands and clean lives, we give without rancor to a clean cause," but it would seem that a Catholic organization would prefer it to a combination of anti-Catholic forces, working to "uplift" the poor soldier and sailor. The plan of the United Committee, was, I believe, to have priests speak in the camps, presumably on Prohibition, certainly not on Catholicism, under the auspices of this "non-sectarian" committee which, after all, may have made it seem worth while for the C. T. A. U. to rally to the call for funds.

The Heart of Hinduism

NEIL BOYTON, S.J.

HINDUISM is numerically the third greatest religion in the world. Just what it is, is rather hard to say. One Hindu writer defines it as "That which a Hindu does." Another follower of the faith asserts that the orthodox Hindu "should be born of parents not belonging to some recognized religion other than Hinduism; marry within the same limits; believe in the doctrines propagated by Brahmanic teaching; respect the cow; and cremate the dead." Amid all this fogginess, one gets the suspicion that the world's third greatest religion is akin to Christian Science.

Among India's countless brown millions, more than seventy out of every hundred adhere to this false creed. Its gods are as the stars, but the triad are Brahama, Vishnu, and Shiva. These are somewhat like the States of the Union, "one and inseparable." As the Jew holds Jerusalem in his heart, the Mussulman looks to Mecca, and as we ourselves revere the Eternal City, so the devout Hindu regards Benares. "Holy Kasi," he calls it. He claims a rather startling antiquity for Benares, maintaining that it came before creation from the hands of Founder Vishnu.

There are some cities that after being seen fade into a gray haze in the memory, dim as hills at dawn, but Benares remains sharp-edged, like a well-focused picture. If one could take ancient Babylon and modern Coney Island, and blend them on the outer curve of a Mississippi River bend, he would have a fair concept of Benares on the Ganges.

For this holy city of the Hindus is huddled within a short sector of a great sweep of "Mother Ganges." At a distance it is a vision of fair domes, pyramids, galleries, hanging gardens, and temples, temples, temples. Brooklyn used to take pride in the title, "City of Churches," but she is as a godless mining town in the sight of Holy Kasi. About 2,000 temples are crowded into this three-mile stretch. Most prominently into the blue point the twin minarets of the Mosque of Aurangzeb, an insolent reminder that the followers of the Prophet once took this Hindu spot. But there is a sting to the triumph of the conquerors in the present-day fact that the worshipers of the Sacred Cow have so crowded their temples about, that the Mohammedans can only enter this exulting mosque by a side door.

The lure of Benares to the Hindus is their religious conviction that here is the gateway to their heaven. For they attach to Kasi the same importance that we attach to the Sacrament of Penance, and a plenary indulgence, gained at the moment of death. Their belief is that bathing in the Ganges at any of the ghats, or bathing places that front the city, is absolution; that the physical act of laving in this questionably clean water will whiten the soul. Hence it is that they journey from the far corners of Hindustan to this river. And if by happy chance, death should overtake them within the hallowed precincts of their Mecca, that fact releases them automatically from the Wheel of Life, for they will have no future reincarnations. So it is not surprising to hear that at some annual feasts this city of about 200,000 shelters another 100,000 "penitents."

This purgative bathing in the open river, of inhabitant and pilgrim, takes place all day long, but the rush hour is shortly after dawn. One would imagine that the whole city would then slip into the easy-flowing stream from the sheer weight of people at the bathing ghats. All ages, both sexes, all conditions are there: the old gentleman, who must be assisted to the river's edge and the delighted brown baby, who paddles about on "water wings" made out of cocoanut shells; the petty queen, with her many attendants, and the brawny coolie woman, who knows how to do the day's work of a horse; the holy man, or sanyasi, and the pariah, or "poor white trash,"—only he happens to be warm brown: all these meet at one of the feet of Mother Ganges, standing ankle-deep to waist-deep in the stream. They begin their ablutions by stooping thrice and cupping their hand, lifting the "holy water" to their lips. Then they pour it ceremoniously over head, shoulders and body. This is a municipal bath with a vengeance, but one wonders what the city fathers are doing in permitting sewers to vomit their poison directly into this sacred bathing-beach.

It is on looking along this great terraced circle, with its rajahs' palaces and its temples, its gardens and many steps, its brown folks and their half-discarded pink, magenta, yellow, green, crimson, and white clothes, that one's thoughts leap back to the well-remembered pictures in ancient history or Bible history of mighty Babylon of old. Sailing on the flat roof of the little houseboat, that your boatman-guide is poling down stream, you view this brilliant panorama as though it were some newly discovered process of colored "movies." You feel as though you were seeing a nation at their devotions. Yet the bizarre element comes in strongly, when you notice the irreverent youngsters, splashing and paddling about, perfectly contented. They are losing their sins and they are openly "having the time" of their young lives. Here is an elderly member of the devout sex. She stands halfway in the Ganges on a submerged step of the ghat, and in her right hand she grasps the brass cage of her favorite parrot. He is indignantly shrieking, but despite his protestations he is solemnly lowered until only the round nob of the cage is visible. Polly's sins may be wiped out, but they certainly begin again, as soon as his head appears above the surface.

Now we breast the burning ghats. At the bottom of the brown-stone steps several white-shrouded figures lie with their feet in the sacred river. On a deep step beyond are smoking pyres. The sharp crackling comes off to you. Attendants of the dead, in big white turbans and scant looking dhotis, move about unconcernedly. More corpses, covered with a white cloth and yellow flowers, and carried on bamboo stretchers, are being brought down the steps to the flames. There is an entire lack of mourners. But your attention is distracted from the burning ghat by seeing in the water at the side of your boat a half-consumed body. This will drift out into midstream in the course of the day, and the cruising crocodiles will be grateful. Not fifty feet from this floating Hindu, his fellow-religionists are bathing.

Leaving this city at the bath and climbing one of the innumerable brown-stone steps, you are instantly lost in the cow-path streets of Benares. Every other wall seems to be the side of a temple, and every temple seems to be running to a "capacity house." There are three temples that you are not likely to forget: the Golden Temple of Visweswara, the Patroness of Benares; the Temple of Annapura, Goddess of Plenty; and the Durga, or what is more rightly called the Monkey Temple.

The Golden Temple, which is the cathedral of Benares, is the holy of holies. Its shinning dome and spires struggle up from the mass of neighboring temples. And it is pestered by all the beggars in the world. They form a double line, with outstretching hands either side of you, and they all seem to have been afflicted with some physical ill before they reached you, for the blind, the legless, and the leper are all there. Devout Hindu pilgrims go up these lanes, giving some grains of rice or a fraction of a cent to each mendicant and so gain great merit.

In the home of the Goddess of Plenty, the big idol is hidden, except for her golden face, back of drapery and yellow flowers. Present are sacred cows and peacocks and nilgae, which latter have somewhat the same relation to the cow as the mule has to the horse. Here are squatted many saintly sadhus, who are holy men, rivaling Gunga Din in their attire, which is usually a rag and much cocoanut ashes. If it is true as asserted, that these men discard clothing as they acquire virtue, there must be several here, who are near the summit of sancity. There was one of these ascetics, clad in a suit of ashes and the minor part of a leopard skin, who had managed to combine godliness with a maximum of personal comfort, for he squatted like Buddha, and by his side was an American-made electric fan, whirring breezily.

The Monkey Temple has a large-sized tank, or swimming pool, immediately in front of it. Bright birds, squirrels and monkeys own the place. The last-named are remarkably tame and come around, like hungry tabbies, begging for grains that an obliging temple priest sells. It is a curious sensation to have a group of gods ask for alms, and you come away with you heart filled with pity for these poor pagans, who know not the true God.

Back through the narrow, swarming, furnace lanes, with the thermometer registering 112, you reach the Cantonment, and there stands a plain white shell of a building, with a plain white cross on top of it. It is St. Mary's Chapel. There is the almost deserted temple of truth, and yonder by the river's bank are the crowded temples of stark falsehood. Within is quiet and peace, and you fall on your knees before the plain door of the Tabernacle and from your heart comes an act of reparation for all this mess of idolatry and superstition and worse.

Father Searle's Distinguished Career

CHARLES J. POWERS, C. S. P.

THE death of the Very Rev. George M. Searle, former Superior General of the Paulist Fathers, occurred on July 7 at the principal house of the Fathers in this city. Born in London, England, on June 17, 1839, Father Searle had entered his seventy-ninth year when the Lord called him to his eternal reward. His career was an interesting and a distinguished one. He was widely known not only within the Church to whose service he had devoted his genius for many years, but also outside of it in the world of science and among scientific men.

George Searle came of old New England stock on his father's side, and he was connected by his ancestry with some of the most notable New England families. Although baptized as an infant in the Church of England, the Church of his mother, an English lady, his religious surroundings were Unitarian during his childhood and youth, as he and his only brother, left orphans, were brought up by his paternal uncle and aunt who professed the Unitarian faith.

In a unique collection of letters, some of which were written as early as his fifth year, in which many of his characteristics begin to disclose themselves, he has given us unconsciously charming glimpses of his childhood and his early mental processes. Amid the narration of the great joys and small griefs of the little boy, we discover the accuracy which distinguished the man in after years, manifested in the letters' perfect spelling, their neat penmanship and careful punctuation; we find, too, the quick intelligence and above all the precocious mathematical genius expressed in a longing desire for, and diplomatic effort to obtain, a book of tables of logarithms at an age when most boys can scarcely spell the word, much less apply the tables.

In the articles begun by Father Searle in the Missionary in 1916, entitled "Fifty Years in the Catholic Church," he tells of his boyhood and youth in the pleasant old town of Brookline. With that exquisite simplicity, which was one of his endearing traits, he describes the sweet and happy life of a good but not particularly religious boy reared in an atmosphere of comfort and of virtue, with little, if any, Divine sanction, his religion consisting chiefly in sitting through the morning and afternoon sermons on Sundays, not always with entire patience or spiritual profit.

At Harvard College, from which he was graduated in 1859 at the age of eighteen, his religious convictions carried him no further than an assent to the first article of the Apostles' Creed; and thus we find him beginning his career as a man without any belief in dogmatic or revealed religion. But if at this time there was little to presage his future as a priest or as an apologist of revealed religion, there was much in him that gave promise of greatness in a scientific career. In his senior year at Harvard he wrote a prize essay on astronomy which attracted attention and commendation from astronomers and particularly from the eminent Dr. Gould, under whose patronage he began work as a professional astronomer.

With Dr. Gould as director, he went as assistant to the Dudley Observatory at Albany, N. Y., in the spring of 1858, after having served for a time as computer on the "American Ephemeris and Nautical Almanac." At Dudley he devoted himself to computation and routine observation, in the course of which he discovered the asteroid Pandora. The close association with Dr. Gould begun at Dudley was continued in the work of the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey until the fall of 1862 when George Searle was appointed assistant professor of the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis, where he remained for two years.

While at Dudley George Searle began the journey which brought him to Rome. He and an assistant at the Observatory had become fast friends, no difficult matter indeed for one who was amiability itself. The latter, a High Churchman, induced young Searle to go with him to evening services at his church. Attracted by the music, for Father Searle was highly appreciative of the fine arts, he and his friend also went quite regularly to High Mass at the cathedral. He tells us in the "Stories of Conversions" that neither the preaching he heard—and he must have listened at times to that most graceful and persuasive preacher, the Bishop of Albany, afterwards Cardinal McCloskey—nor the ceremonial he witnessed at the cathedral had any conscious effect upon his religious opinions. "I had always," he says, "regarded the Catholic Church, not indeed with the positive prejudices and outrageously false notions which make many Protestants oppose it so vigorously, but with a kind of lofty disdain or rather indifference. It was to me like the Ptolemaic astronomy, a system which only the ignorant could accept." He thought, at this period, that he had done all that was necessary in the matter of belief in having reasoned himself into an undoubting conviction of the existence of God. "I cannot trace," he tells us, "the exact mental steps through which I passed from Unitarianism to the church of my mother. Morally and spiritually, I think a great change was produced by a sermon which I heard at this little church [of his High Church friend] one evening on the text, 'You cannot serve God and Mammon.' I gave up worldly ambition which had been, though secretly, my principal motive of exertion, and determined to do everything for God's sake alone."

In January, 1859, he returned to the Church of his Baptism, becoming a High Church man. The variations of Episcopalianism, however, compelled his trained and logical mind to further investigation of the religious problem, with the result that he sought admission to the Catholic Church and was received by Father Finotti in Brookline on August 15, 1862. His progress from Episcopalianism to the true Church is illuminating to one who will follow it in detail. The limits of this article, however, will not permit us to dwell upon this most interesting religious experience. Let it suffice to quote the final paragraph of his personal history of his conversion:

> I was baptized conditionally on the Feast of the Assumption, 1862, having been under instruction about six weeks. I had been an Episcopalian about three years and a half, and was a little over twenty-three years old. It took me a little time to get into Catholic ways and practices, but from the day of my reception till now doubt of the Catholic religion in any point, small or great, has seemed as impossible, unreasonable, and absurd as doubt about the truths of algebra or geometry. Religion instead of being a mere matter of speculation or of enthusiasm, which one must not investigate too closely, has been ever since then to me the most certain as well as infinitely the most important of all the sciences.

The time between George Searle's reception into the Church and his entrance into the Paulist Novitiate was passed by him partly in travel in Europe. In 1865 he determined to make a visit to Rome, stopping to see his English relatives on the way. The question whether or not young Searle should embrace the ecclesiastical state was becoming more insistent, and Father Finotti, his confessor, thought he should go abroad and make a test of his vocation at the American College at Rome. On his arrival there he made a retreat under the famous Dominican, Father Burke, and decided on the advice of those whom he consulted that God's call to the priesthood was not as yet fully evident. He was still passionately attached to the pursuit of science and disposed to apply himself entirely to scientific work. Shortly after reaching the decision to follow his natural bent and continue his work as a scientist, he received a letter from Dr. Gould, who was desirous of having him go to Argentina to assist in establishing the observatory at Cordoba. This invitation from his friend and former chief falling in with his own plans was accepted with pleasant anticipations of great opportunities for astronomical research. As the preliminaries, however, were not yet settled, George Searle determined to pass the winter in Rome, the Rome of Pius the Ninth before the Sardinian usurpation.

After Mass and his mischia in the morning, he spent his forenoons at mathematics and his afternoons in visiting the shrines and churches of the "city of the soul." We shall never know until the last day what his stay at Rome did for Father Searle. Profound faith and childlike devotion were characteristic of him during his whole life as a Catholic and who shall say what Rome had done to give depth to the one and delicacy to the other?. He bade at length a reluctant farewell to the sights and sounds and spiritual delights of the city and made his way back to America in a leisurely journey through Europe; only to find on his return to his own land that Dr. Gould was still engaged with the difficulties incidental to beginning the work of Cordoba. As the delay promised to be long, George Searle accepted a place as assistant at Harvard Observatory, where he met S. P. Langley, afterwards the distinguished head of the Smithsonian Institute, and in Father Searle's opinion the real inventor of the aeroplane. Between him and Father Searle a warm friendship sprang up and lasted through life. This proved to be the last position he filled as a layman. After two years' service there, he offered himself as a postulant for the Paulist novitiate, was accepted and began the preparation for the priesthood. Thus he realized the first plan of Father Finotti in his regard.

The little community of the Paulists was at the time in its first fervor. The original members, except the highly cultured Father Baker, were still living. The future seemed big with promise of noble work for God; the present was aflame with the ardor of preparation for it. The building that housed the little group was quaint—a house and church, the neighborhood was almost rural, the garden immediately about was fragrant and pleasant. The master of novices, Father Deshon, had been an officer of the army and had still a soldier's eye for discipline; the master of studies, Father Hewit, was a theologian and a gracious personage; the superior, Father Hecker, a man ardent with a mission to men, was in his prime; the whole atmosphere of the place was like a breath of springtime.

Father Searle tells us that it was always easy for him to get "into a rut." The routine of community life was quickly taken up and faithfully carried on during his long life. His noviceship was completed happily, although in the beginning he felt the curtailment of the time he might give to his beloved mathematics as a severe deprivation. His view, however, of relative values was changing as the scientist rapidly developed into the priest. Although he never lost his first love for the sciences, his office and duties as a priest were paramount from the day of his ordination, March 25, 1871, until the end.

There is one aspect of the life of Father Searle of which little notice has been taken. He is well known as a controversialist and apologist; his books, especially his "Plain Facts for Fair Minds," have probably been read by millions of people, so wide a circulation have they had. But, aside from controversy, he was deeply read in moral and ascetic theology which he taught for years and applied for a generation in the confessional and in the direction of souls. It was in the employments of community and parish that the largest part of his life was spent, yet the preacher, the teacher, the confessor, are lost sight of more or less by the general public. What was really only episodal in his life as a writer of books and articles, as lecturer, as an authority in astronomy, as a coveted member of learned societies, has caught the public eye; but Father Searle was above all and always, since the day of his ordination, the priest and a docile son of the Holy Catholic Church. The natural man was subordinated to the supernatural. Faith was to him "infinitely the most important of all the sciences."

When he resumed, in 1890, his professorial career as director of the Observatory and professor of mathematics at the Catholic University it was the motive of faith that impelled him to work and it was a like motive that led him to relinquish it. For faith's sake he crossed the continent in his old age to lecture at the University of California and almost to the last his pen and mind were busy with the record of his recollections and with a refutation of Christian Science. The last bit of writing traced by his trembling, dying hand was this mathematical formula:

$$(1 + i)\frac{1}{i} = e.$$

Did he mean unity plus infinity multiplied by unity, divided by infinity, equals eternity?

Knights of Columbus War Work

JAMES J. WALSH, M.D., PH.D.

THE most striking chapter in the history of this war is likely to be that which tells of how the common soldier and sailor were cared for while preparing for battle work and in the actual intervals of fighting during the campaign. There has been nothing like this in the history of the world. So far from thinking that the morale of an army may be improved by paying attention to its morals, or that the courage of soldiers may be heightened by encouraging religious movements among them, the feeling in the past has almost been that the rougher the condition under which the soldier lives and the fewer refining influences he is brought under, the better were likely to be his fighting qualities. If the coarser tendencies of men were not actually fostered at least they were never actively discouraged and the traditional good fighter was the man who neither cared for God or devil.

We have changed all that and have written a new chapter in the history of war. It is true that some of the Roman Emperors in the early days of Christianity learned the lesson that some of their best fighting legions were also praying legions and were surprised at it, but even they never had the slightest thought that to encourage that spirit in their armies might make for the distinct heightening of their effectiveness in war. We have deliberately come round to that idea and it is being worked out with triumphant success.

It seems almost Providential then that the experience at the Mexican border, disappointing though it was in more immediate practical results, taught us many precious lessons in caring for the soldiers. The Y. M. C. A. took advantage of the opportunity and organized social work among the soldiers. The presence of a great many members of the Knights of Columbus among the troops there, and particularly among the officers, naturally raised the question as to whether corresponding work for the Catholic fighting men could not be done. The Knights of Columbus as an organization recognized the need and at their own expense proceeded to erect a chain of buildings in more than a score of places in New Mexico, Arizona and Texas in which excellent results were secured. Needless to say the cost of erecting and maintaining this elaborate system of recreation halls on the rising war-costs of the time during the months when the United States troops were at the border made a large item of expenditure.

This was met entirely out of the funds of the Order, no appeal to others for help being made. The recreation halls and all the social and entertainment facilities thus instituted were thrown open without distinction and with cordial good-will to army men of all creeds. Of the thousands of non-Catholics who took advantage of them, many no doubt received from this experience their first idea of what thoroughly human beings Catholics could be. The buildings and equipment were in constant use, the officers being particularly delighted with them, as they have often said.

Consequently when America entered the European war the Knights of Columbus were in a very favorable position for continuing on a larger scale the work they had shown themselves so capable of doing. The United States authorities, noting the admirable success of the experiment and observing the utter lack of anything like the stirring up of bigotry, were in a position to realize how much the Knights of Columbus could accomplish. Hence their willingness to approve and recommend their work and encourage it in every way. Had we gone into the European conflict without that experience on the border, there probably would have been many difficulties in securing the prompt organization of Catholic recreational and social facilities.

That same Providential aspect has continued in every feature of the work. The presence of these Knights of Columbus halls in camps in this country and wherever the soldiers are in France has done more than anything else that has happened in our generation to allay bigotry, to take the sting out of intolerance, and above all to give an object-lesson to ignorance of what the relation of the Church is, under war conditions, not only to her own sons, but also to those not of her fold. The result has been most satisfactory. There is little difficulty now in having municipal and even national authorities interfere to prevent the public venting of bigotry toward Catholics and the Church, for Catholics have come to occupy too prominent a place in the army and the navy.

The Knights of Columbus buildings have been literally thronged during recreation hours, but the great surprise has been to find the halls crowded not only for the social evenings and entertainments but also for the religious services. The Knights of Columbus entertainments have presented some of the very best artistic and musical talent in the country and have also furnished amusements arranged by the men themselves. The cordial slogan has always been: "Everybody Welcome and Everything Free for the Men Here and Overseas." No wonder then that accustomed as they were to go to the K. of C. buildings on other occasions, non-Catholic soldiers when they saw their Catholic fellows crowding to Mass and religious services have often gone with them too. The surprise of course has been for all the army to find how faithful young Catholic men are in attending to their religious duties, so their brother soldiers, not of the Faith, have gone in many instances to find out what the attraction was. Not a few of them who possibly went thinking that they would find nothing but some curious superstitious practice have been strongly impressed with what they saw and remained to pray. In fact the Knights of Columbus encampment halls here have proved real non-Catholic missions in the best sense of the word.

Now it begins to look as though some effect of the same kind would be procured in foreign countries too. Already there is a K. of C. headquarters on the street of the Madeleine in Paris and centers in other large cities, notably at ports of disembarkation where fully equipped K. of C. buildings are now in operation. It is easy to understand how much edification for Frenchmen there is in this. The Hierarchy of France have recognized the value of the work and have not been slow to express their public commendation and to give help to it in every way that they could. Even the French Government has learned to appreciate the value of the Knights of Columbus war work and far from putting any obstacles in the way has done much to help it on. The best testimony to this is the fact that the French Government assigned 150 English-speaking soldier-priests from the French army to work with the Knights of Columbus chaplains. If the presence of the Knights of Columbus in France had done no more than thus afford opportunities for French priests to do their proper ecclesiastical work it may well be considered to have fully repaid whatever expense was incurred in setting up K. of C. buildings in France.

It is now proposed to extend the Knights of Columbus work to Italy where undoubtedly it will have an effect like that it had in France, for both of those countries perhaps needed the example of the Catholic laity actively at work in great Catholic practical causes. Both of them, it may be, have lacked the stimulus to faith and practice that is given by seeing young men attentive to their religious duties, and undeterred by any false shame or human respect, publicly acknowledging their obligations to their Creator.

The fact that three of the Knights of Columbus chaplains were decorated within a very short time after their arrival in France for heroic conduct on the battlefield shows the caliber of the men who were being enlisted for the Knights of Columbus work. Their secretaries and field workers have been enlisted from among the best class of Catholics and the fact that no fewer than 1,500 men between forty and fifty years of age from all parts of the country volunteered for service with the Knights shows how deeply the Catholic manhood of the country has responded.

But all this of course has taken money. The budget for the first year called for an expenditure of $7,000,000, one-third of which went for construction and equipment, nearly one-fourth for chaplains, secretaries and current supplies, one-fifth for operation and about one million for the extension of the work. The administration, however, has cost but $100,000, scarcely more than one and one-half per cent. But the erection of further buildings in this country, in France, in Great Britain, and in Italy, both behind the lines and in centers where the soldiers flock to spend their furloughs as well as at hospital bases, now demands an immense amplification of expenditure. The Knights of Columbus budget for the current year of war work calls for a total approximation of $50,000,000, and anyone who knows what has already been accomplished and yet how great will be the needs of an army of from 3,000,000 to 5,000,000 men will readily recognize the necessity for this. There is no doubt at all, now that we have come to realize that all our national energies must be turned to making this war victorious, that even this budget will find due support. The generosity of Americans has been awakened and Catholics and non-Catholics will surely unite as they have done on previous calls in making this successful.

The cause is one of the worthiest that has ever been presented to the American people, for it represents the organization of social service in behalf of the men who are offering life and limb for the liberties of us all. There is no sentimentality in the matter; indeed it is almost a question of plain duty, for the rest of us, without question, should give in something like this same measure that our brave fellows training here and fighting over there are giving. They are literally offering their all. The Knights of Columbus are calmly asking for what would have seemed an almost impossible sum before the war, but now it is not only within the bounds of reason but actually represents the consummation of a duty that should be fulfilled. All the highest motives urge us to be generous; our love of liberty for ourselves and for others, our love of religion and the necessity we realize of its being given a place in the world's great focus of interest, but above all that law of charity which dictates that we should do for others as we would be done by.

One Sunday's Impressions

To the Editor of AMERICA:

On a recent Sunday, in his sermon on purity, our pastor impressing upon parents their responsibility for the public amusements attended by their children, quoted that terrible warning of Christ's: "He that shall scandalize one of those little ones that believe in me, it were better for him that a millstone should be hanged about his neck and that he should be drowned in the depth of the sea."

Home, after Mass, I read again the article by the "Ursuline Religious" on "'Movies' and the Young," reprinted in the Catholic Mind for April 22, 1918, and, in connection with such film-plays as "Cleopatra," these earnest and appealing words seemed to re-echo those I had just heard from the pulpit:

> Must we spend our time in rooting out each day some noxious plant whose seed was planted in your child's soul by a suggestive moving-picture film? Do you know that your daughters, taught by the exciting school of the picture-screen, are half-convinced already that "love" justifies anything? That "a woman has the right to live her own life" as she pleases? That, in short, they are in danger of growing up with the most crooked notions unless somebody straightens them out before it is too late? Do you even suspect that ideas antagonistic to faith and morals are being imbibed by your children and are likely to spring into action just as soon as those children are old enough to escape from your loving care?

On the evening of the same Sunday as I passed along Broadway in the trolley-car, my attention was caught by an electric sign which blazed out among the lights on the "Great White Way" and announced that a very "popular" film-producer was presenting an even more "popular" actress in a most salacious picture-play.

To one familiar with the process by which the once Christian city of New York is becoming orientalized, there was nothing startling in this announcement. In fact, from the box-office point of view nothing could be more opportune. A recent odious scandal in London over this play would help the manager who, in its production, was only being true to his type and living up to his reputation, while the noted, not to say notorious, actress he had selected would have her due share of exploitation. Hundreds of people passed along Broadway, young and old, and many of the brave lads of our army and navy. Upon all shone down this baleful sign as if in mockery of Christian ideals of faith and conduct, and flouting the moral discipline and restraint imposed upon the defenders of our country.

I could not help wondering if among the crowd there might be some of the Christian gentlemen who only recently had been persuaded to stand sponsor for this enterprising manager and who must realize that they, too, were an important factor in advertising him and his wares. Surely an entangling alliance hardly to be justified, even if made for a temporary advantage, in a good cause.

A Wholesome Motto

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Some years ago, while living in a boarding house, I met an elderly lady and her daughter. The latter was a stenographer holding a very ordinary position with a very small salary. The mother had some church work which I presume helped to defray her expenses. I had seen so many stenographers and other workers moaning about their hard lot that I wondered why the young lady above mentioned always seemed so optimistic. One day she told me she belonged to a club, the members of which had for their motto: "Not to be ministered unto, but to minister." Would not this motto be a wholesome thing for young girls and boys to adopt? As it is, many of them never think of rendering any service but expect always to be served. If properly trained they would be ashamed to be found in the ranks of those who are willing "to be carried to the skies on flowery beds of ease, while a brother dies to win the prize and sails through bloody seas."

The Chaplains' Cross

ACCORDING to the Service Journals an army order has gone into effect changing the chaplains' insignia from the Cross to the shepherd's crook out of deference to the Jewish rabbis serving with the forces. They already possessed the privilege of substituting the crook for the regular chaplains' insignia but they contended that there was no reason why a symbol could not be adopted suitable to all creeds and offensive to none. As a result the new War Department order.

There was very little to distinguish the chaplain from the line officer before the issuance of this order, with the Cross still marking his collar. If the Cross goes there will be nothing at all, for the shepherd's crook is a very indefinite symbol and can easily be mistaken for the doctors' caduceus. It may not be amiss to remark that there can be no cause for complaint on the part of the Jewish soldier regarding the allowance made by the military authorities for the observance of his religious practices. In the army camps in this country ever since the call to the colors his holidays have been secured to him. Yet it was considered most remarkable in a certain camp last Good Friday that firing ceased on the artillery range for five minutes after the hour of three, out of deference to the request of a chaplain who reminded the commanding officer that it was a day sacred to all Christians, and that all but a handful of the soldiers who had been at the guns since sun-up were Christians. This respite of five minutes was merely a favor granted to men whose whole religious belief centered on the Crucifixion.

The quota of chaplains assigned to the different denominations is proportionate to the members of the denominations represented in the fighting forces. There has never been any statement from the War Department announcing that there are fewer Christians in the army than non-Christians, or more Jewish chaplains than others. Why then discriminate against the majority out of deference to the minority, when the rights of the minority are already secured by allowing them to adopt their own insignia?

In the English army there are many Indian troops, and they have rendered a good account of themselves since the beginning of the great war, yet Tommy Atkins in France and Flanders and far-off Mesopotamia has not been deprived of his "bully beef" because his little brown brother regards the cow as a sacred animal. "Sahib," said the Indian soldier to his English commander, "you are eating my sacred cow." "No," replied the officer, "I am eating my cow and it is not sacred. You do not have to eat it, but you have to remember that you are not the whole army, but only a part of it, and not a very large part at that."

Large-Mesh Law

EVERY once in a while, or even oftener, that large body of intelligent yeomen, known as the great common people, begins to stir uneasily. In the best sense of the abused term, these citizens are a "law-abiding" folk. They pay the law the practical reverence of observance, and take for granted, until the opposite is shown beyond question, that right as well as might, is on the side of the civil authority. But even the most loyal citizen is sometimes forced to admit, either that a particular law is not, as it should be, a dictate of reason, or that it is so interpreted as to make the administration of justice little more than a farce. Few American States are wholly free from these anomalies, but New York, as a recent decision of the Appelate Division of the Supreme Court bears witness, seems to have more than her share.

Following the political scandals of the last campaign, the Governor of the State convened an extraordinary term of the Supreme Court in the County of New York. Two Grand Juries impaneled by the Court, examined hundreds of witnesses, returned a large number of indictments, and urged the passage of laws making any future attempt to buy an election in New York, impossible. On the strength of these indictments, some sixty minor gentry stood trial, were convicted, and began to serve their respective sentences. But when indictments against men in high financial and political places were returned, the keen wits of certain practitioners at the bar were set to work. They discovered that the Court which had roused so much uneasiness in a group of reform politicians was, in point of fact, utterly without jurisdiction. There was a defect, a flaw, a rift within the lute, sufficient to make all attempts at legal harmony decidedly mute. For while the Governor, to quote the words of the Appellate Division, had ordered "that notice of the extraordinary term should be published twice, once in each week for two successive weeks, in two newspapers . . . the notice was so published in one of the newspapers, and twice in one week in the other." This decision, amply justified by legal if by no other precedent, "apparently undoes the work of two Grand Juries," writes a good authority. It makes void > an extraordinary term of the Supreme Court, work in itself flawless in every particular, and incidentally, may cause a jail delivery that is little less than appalling. According to this view, convicted murderers, bigamists, forgers and other criminals, are let loose on the community. . . . The cost to the people will run into hundreds of thousands of dollars.

We have large-mesh law with a vengeance, when men indicted for crimes which make the continuance of our American political institutions impossible, need not even stand trial, provided they can pay the price asked by keen-eyed lawyers. No fault is here found with the Appellate Division. It is imperative that reasonable legal technicalities be observed to the letter, and the technicality directing the publication of the Governor's order was reasonable. The fault is with the law in the case. There is no law, apparently, to touch the bungler, who failed to follow the technicality of publishing the order "twice, once in each week for two successive weeks, in two newspapers." What is to prevent a similar error at some future time, in cases of even more serious import? Nothing whatever, because no culpability can be attached in law, to the bungler. If crime is a detriment to good order, large-mesh law is a positive menace.

Is Industrial Peace Possible?

A STRONG argument for the possibility of a sound industrial peace is found in the almost universal favor with which the peace plans, established at the instance of the Government between the representatives of capital, labor and the public for the duration of the war, have met on every hand. "No one, not fanatically irreconcilable," says the Bricklayers', Masons' and Plasterers' Journal, in commenting on the work of the labor board, "can find fault with it. Under its terms neither capital nor labor can claim any advantage in the principles and policies laid down by it." The existing standards of all parties are protected:

> Although labor foregoes its right to strike, its right to organize and treat collectively is affirmed, and where union conditions exist there is no modification of them. The right of all workers to a wage insuring the subsistence of themselves and their families in health and reasonable comfort is declared, and there is no sex-distinction as to wages. The public, the third great party to the agreement, is assured of a maximum production of all war necessities, both on the part of employers and employees, without artificial increase of cost.

The agreement did not imply the end of industrial disputes, as the journal remarks; but it established a means of at once progressing towards their peaceful settlement through mediation. Should such methods fail the agreement further provides that the final decision is to be made by an umpire chosen by lot from a list of ten names selected by President Wilson. Why should not similar methods be successful in time of peace to the lasting exclusion of strikes and lockouts, together with all the bitterness they generate, the unhappiness and misery they cause, the harm they inflict upon production and the suffering they bring upon the innocent public?

That the possibility of a durable industrial peace through similar means is no idle utopian dream can readily be demonstrated by the success of the voluntary arbitration plan in the stove-molding industry. The trade-agreement drawn up in good faith by the representatives of the union and of the employers' Defense Association, during a period of industrial conflict, was each year readjusted in a joint conference of three union men and three delegates of the employers' association. The lasting peace thus established had continued unbroken for more than twenty-five years at the outbreak of the war. Why, then, could not similar plans be followed in all industries, not forgetting the interests of the general public? The tendency towards trade-agreements is the new and hopeful spirit in the labor movement. All the best powers of Christian laborers and employers should be devoted to its future development.

Write That Letter!

AGE or sex, physical infirmity or duties of even higher importance at home, prevent many of us from following the flag across the sea. We concede that our presence on the fields of Europe would scarcely turn the tide of battle. In fact, we ruefully recognize that any well-organized army unit would be at a loss to find a place for us. We are willing but incapable assistants. Lacking the strength bestowed by Providence on certain of the lower animals, we could not aid an ammunition train along its perilous trip to the front. Without skill in domestic duties, we should be, at best, only tolerated in the camp's kitchen. As bed-side nurses, we should but add to the grisly horrors of death. Our wishes are most decidedly not the index of our capabilities, for, summed up, our merits and demerits indicate that we were not made to fit in with the details of the modern science of warfare. Too poor to pay taxes and unable to fight, we are beginning to feel that in the world's great war-drama we are cast for the ignoble part of a slacker.

Yet we need not conclude that there is nothing for us to do, except, in the words of a soap-box orator, to "sit down supinely." Any man or woman who can write, can write a letter, and our soldiers like to receive letters from home. These epistles may lack the polished grace of a Cicero or a de Sévigné, but the homesick youngster on a foreign strand will be amply satisfied with "more matter and less art." Matter is what he yearns for, news from the old home-town. How is everybody? Who's got my "job"? Is the new bridge finished? Did Lyda marry Jim Bean, and where are they living? Remember he hasn't seen the Georgetown Times or the Booneville Bugle, for an age, so tell him all the news.

Except the bad news. As you hope for salvation, keep that to yourself. Don't let him carry the home burdens, but make your letters so "homey" and happy, and cheerful and chatty, that he will forget all about that last night expeditionary attack which wiped out about half of the party, including his closest friend. And don't fail to write at least once a week. Skip your meals, forego that walk in the park, that trip to the beach, even firmly and conscientiously drop a few of the spiritual exercises which fill your day, but don't neglect that letter! If Our Blessed Saviour has promised a glorious reward for even a cup of cold water given in His Name, what is the reward in store, if your kindly letter brings a smile into the eyes of a soldier far from home? Letter-writing, under these circumstances, is much more than the exercise of a polite accomplishment, or the fulfilment of social etiquette. To some down-hearted soldier-boy, whose young eyes have long looked upon horrors which most of us cannot even conceive, your letters may be a means of grace, just less valuable to him than prayer and the Sacraments.

Censorship and the "Movies"

A CLERICAL gentleman who some years ago acquired more notoriety than fame in "uplifting" San Francisco's Barbary Coast and environments, recently extended the field of his operations to New York. Heralded by the press, at fifty cents or thereabouts a line, he appeared amongst us, bearing in one hand the "message of a purified city," and in the other a roll, containing several thousand feet of film. The film purported to show how the city of San Francisco had been separated from its iniquities. It was destined to produce, on payment at the box-office, a similar wholesome effect in wicked New York, which for some months has been pursuing its busy way, unhindered and unhelped of "uplifters" for revenue only. Unfortunately, however, New York's Commissioner of Licenses decided that the film was not "uplifting" at all. In his opinion, it was nothing but a sordid attempt to commercialize lubricity. Prominent citizens, among them a police commissioner, the city chamberlain, and the Vicar-General of the Diocese of Brooklyn, agreed with the Commissioner, who forthwith forbade the exhibition of the film in the city of New York. On the reverend impressario's appeal to the courts, Mr. Justice Mullan sustained the Commissioner, and for the present, this particular bit of commercialized vice will find no market in New York.

All this is a simple story, but it throws the editor of the New York Times' dramatic page into a state closely resembling hysteria. "Do the people of New York realize," he asks, "that a city official is empowered to decide for them, as parents decide for their children, what they shall be permitted to see in moving-picture theatres?" Most unfortunately, this question implies ignorance of the real facts in the case. Great as is the need, there is no official censorship of films in New York. When their attention is directed to the matter, the police can act, under section 1140-a of the penal law, and the Commissioner of Licenses, subject to review by the courts, may bar films which in his judgment offend public decency. That, at present, is the extent of censorship in New York. The censorship exercised by a self-styled national board, since it is often worthless, frequently misleading, and never binding, may be regarded as practically non-existent.

When will the makers of moving-pictures begin to clean house? When will they realize that articles of the New York Times type, and films of the variety imported into New York by the San Francisco clergyman, only serve to rouse a hitherto indifferent public to the need of stringent censorship? It is nothing less than a public scandal that, in this time of national peril, when at the bidding of our civil and ecclesiastical authorities we ought to be on our knees in prayer, the professional pander is allowed to exercise his infamous trade on the stage and in the moving-picture theater. This consideration, however, is far above the comprehension of many purveyors of public amusement. For these, censorship is not sufficient. Only a vigorous criminal prosecution will teach them that decency is the best policy.

France's "Fighting Priests"

"THERE are about 25,000 priests in the army, but only 300 of them are officially appointed as military chaplains wearing three stripes," writes M. Maurice Barrès in his recently translated book, "The Faith of France." Those numbers, no doubt, were far more accurate at the beginning of the war than they are now, for during the past four years thousands of French priests must have died for their country, leaving few to take their places in the ranks of the clergy. It is safe to say that in proportion to their numbers more priests have fallen in battle than any other class of people. For the spirit of self-sacrifice which they received with the holy oils on their ordination day was made so strong a habit by the years they subsequently passed in the sacred ministry, that now as "fighting priests," they are the first to volunteer for every post of danger and are always shining examples of the purest patriotism to their fellow-soldiers.

The letters which M. Barrès quotes in his book indicate the high motives which fire the hearts of these soldier-priests who unite a crusader's courage with an apostle's zeal. Father de Gironde, for instance, who was killed in the battle of Ypres on December 7, 1914, exclaimed:

> To die young, to die a priest, a soldier, while attacking, while advancing, in the full performance of one's sacerdotal privileges, or perhaps giving absolution; to shed my blood for the Church, for France, for my friends, for all whose hearts are filled with the same ideal as my own, and for others who know the joy of belief. Ah, how beautiful this is!

The other priests who died in Father Gironde's dispositions are so numerous that M. Barrès cannot name them all. The month of September (1915) alone supplied him with 156 personal records of priests and religious who were slain in Champagne on the field of honor; 216 died gloriously during the battle of Verdun in 1916, and the author says that he had in his hands early in 1917 "the official text of 3,744 members of the clergy and of the Religious Orders who have been cited for recognition and who were deemed worthy of the six or seven stars, or palms."

When the war is at last ended will victorious France forget the whole-hearted devotion of her priests, those brave men whose sacred character should have freed them from the obligation of fighting and dying with rifles in their hands? The toll taken from the ranks of the French clergy by the dreadful carnage of the last four years will certainly create for the Bishops an after-war problem of the gravest character. The people of France, let us hope, will not then allow the unbelieving Government of the country to increase the Church's trials by continuing that deplorable policy of persecution which now, even in war-time, is subjecting to "souperism" the helpless orphans of France's heroic soldier-dead.

Literature

SAMUEL TAYLOR COLERIDGE

SAMUEL TAYLOR COLERIDGE, according to the judgments of his contemporaries, was, in many spheres of intellectual life, a giant of varying proportions and statures. "The only wonderful man I ever knew" said Wordsworth. "A subtle-souled psychologist" was the verdict of Shelley. "The largest, and most spacious intellect, the subtlest and most comprehensive that has yet existed among men," wrote De Quincey. And Carlyle, though adverse to Coleridge in many ways, states that he was "a king of men," "All other men whom I have ever known are as mere children to him," said Southey and Hazlitt wrote, "The only person I ever knew who answered to the idea of a man of genius." His powers of conversation were unmistakable; for he drew many gifted scholars in his retreat at Highgate. Madame de Staël marveled at his quick mind and ready tongue; Talfourd writes of seeing "the palm trees wave and the pyramids tower in the long perspective of his style." As a critic, especially of Shakespeare, and of the current ideas concerning poetry, his judgment was taken as ultimate; as a philosopher, he was classed with Berkeley, and as a poet, says one, "Alone perhaps of all men that ever lived he was ever a poet, in all his moods—and they were many—inspired."

The modern critics with more discernment, not being influenced by the charm of his personality, are less lavish with their praise, and in some cases, quite skeptical. E. P. Whipple, for instance, thinks that Coleridge was half-poet, half-charlatan. Professor Saintsbury believes that "Kubla Khan" is the greatest piece of poetry in the English language; Stopford Brooke writes: "All that he did excellently might be bound up in twenty pages, but it should be bound in gold."

Coleridge's contemporaries saw in him a remarkable intellect; their judgments of him were based more on what he could do than on what he actually accomplished. They were always predicting the triumphs that were to be his in various intellectual spheres. These triumphs consist, briefly, in a book of poems, of which three are of the first order, and four others of undoubted excellence; then there is his "Litteraria Biographia," made up for the most part of notes on his conversation and lectures, a speech or two of no great value, and his "Aids to Reflection" and "Church and State."

Coleridge's life was a series of beginnings, promises, miseries, a few triumphs and many failures. Born at Ottery, St. Mary's, Devonshire, on October 21, 1772, he passed through the schools at Christ's Hospital, and advanced as far as Cambridge. His university career, however, was never completed; he joined the army but soon wearied of it. On his discharge, he was reinstated at Cambridge and began with Southey to formulate plans for a new republic, called "Pantisocracy," which was to be built on the banks of the Susquehanna. On the failure of these plans and his withdrawal from the university, he started a newspaper named "The Friend," lectured on many occasions, though on many other occasions failed to make his appearance. His married life was happy for a time, but his wife eventually decided that she could receive better support from her parents than from him. As a Unitarian minister and preacher, he gave considerable promise. His greatest misfortune was the opium habit he contracted; for his life thereafter was full of despair, fitful attempts at work, hope and remorse. And his greatest triumph was, when placing himself in the hands of Dr. Gillman at Highgate, he subjected himself to a drastic regimen. He died on July 25, 1834.

There were two main reasons for Coleridge's failures and half-successes; an abnormally weak will and a dejection of spirit, which being fostered by his peculiar turn of imagination, killed anything like inspiration or enthusiasm. He was never capable of bringing a project to completion; he easily succumbed to the opium habit; he was never master of his time or talents. His imagination turned towards the dark, mysterious things in life. A mere glance at the contents of his poems shows us where his weak point lay. They bear such titles as: "Ode to Dejection," "Fears in Solitude," "Visionary Hope," "Melancholy," "Pains of Sleep," "Remorse," etc. The keynote of his poetry, undoubtedly is struck in the "Ode to Dejection." The poems worth reading are centered about this main idea.

> A grief without a pang, void, dark and drear,
> A stifled, drowsy, unimpassioned grief,
> Which finds no natural outlet, no relief
> In word or sigh or tear.

The three poems of the year 1797-1798, on which his reputation stands, "The Ancient Mariner," "Kubla Khan," and "Christabel," tingle with this grief: a kind of suppressed horror, which certainly is unnatural, and which grows darker and drearier through these three productions. Finally it becomes hopeless in his later poems. "Sad lot to have no hope," we read in "Visionary Hope," and in the "Ode to Dejection." "But now afflictions bow me down to earth."

His imagination was a peculiar mixture, Hindu and old English, diabolical and angelic, intensely real and intensely airy-fairy, with the predominance strongly in favor of the Hindu and diabolical. The subjects that suited him best were unnatural and in some cases unhealthy. The poem "Christabel" was the child of a no common-sense dream. "The Ancient Mariner" and "Kubla Khan" deal with a distorted world made somehow real. If we study these poems we find there a definite atmosphere of horror which would please the Eastern mind. There is something infernal about the woman in the grove "wailing for her demon lover" and "the scream of agony by torture long drawn out." In "The Ancient Mariner" we perceive the Hindu's aspect of nature, with the "star-dogged Moon," the "hellish thing" of killing a sacred bird, "the hot and copper sky," the deep that rotted, with the slimy things crawling on the waves, and the souls passing by "like the whizz of my cross-bow." Even the penance which the Ancient Mariner was forced to perform reminds us of the dervish. "Christabel" shows us another attitude of this Eastern spirit. With its meaning obscure and dark the poem has an atmosphere of horror and revenge. "Kubla Khan," however, is written in a kindlier spirit, but with a certain haunting music that brings back memories of the charmer and his snake. It may be said that "Kubla Khan" is the dream of a good Hindu, "Christabel" of a bad Hindu and "The Ancient Mariner" of a converted Hindu, and all of a clever Hindu.

There is, however, another spirit about the poems of Coleridge; his angelic side. Being eminently master of the ballad style he could not help manifesting many of the good qualities of the old English bards. He seemed to grasp the earnest, childlike, almost superstitious spirit of the ballad, along with the shifting of word-harmony to suit sense and emotion, and the choice of quaint diction. "The Ancient Mariner," "Love," "The Dark Ladie," are written in this meter, while "Christabel," though not strictly a metrical ballad, produces many of its effects.

Coleridge is rated high in the rank of poets, because in his best poems he developed a new technique almost to the point of perfection. There is hardly a slip in "The Ancient Mariner," only four or five perhaps in "Christabel," and none at all in "Kubla Khan." Coleridge produced a new order of things prosodically. Professor Saintsbury remarks: "In Kubla Khan Coleridge adjusted the older prosody absolutely and definitely to the newer poetry." Though he was the interpreter of the dream-world, still his intense earnestness throws the cloak of reality over his poems; he firmly believed in his dreams, and before his readers have finished his poems they grasp the poet's attitude of mind and become believers too, which is a sure sign that Coleridge was a genius.

E. K. Means. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.50.

To invoke the kindly aid of a frayed phrase, but most applicable in the present instance, this volume of short stories is a "real contribution" to the history of the Southern post-bellum darkey. Furthermore, to any reader who can readily follow negro dialect, it will be a source of pure delight. The quaint, wise folk-lore made immortal by the sweet spirit of Joel Chandler Harris, gives a superb picture of plantation life before the war, and of the slave who, forgetful of his own precarious position, "re-echoed all his master's prejudice of caste and pride of family." Other aspects, hardly less winning, of the old times that have passed away forever, have been caught and fixed, by the genius of Thomas Nelson Page.

In the present volume which, by what must seem a mere affectation has been left without a name, Mr. E. K. Means writes of the children of the old slaves. Millions of them live today in the small Southern villages, almost as care-free, and as dependent upon the "white folks," as their simpler ancestors. But the years that have passed since the close of the Civil War, and the opening of the free school and the voting-booth to the negro, have brought with them many changes of character and temperament. The child of the slave is passing, to be replaced by the half-educated, impudent, shiftless negro of the transition period, who too often has all the defects and none of the virtues which made the old-time darkey so lovable. Soon, writes Mr. Means, "he will be a memory, like Uncle Remus." Prophecy is always dangerous, but there are qualities in these eight stories which indicate that their author may rightly take his place with Harris and with Page. An occasional exaggeration in tone and incident indicates a style not yet perfected, and is but a minor literary sin. Mr. Means has a story to tell, a story that is transcribed from life, and ought to last as long as men are interested in the thoughts and the emotions that are rooted in the souls of their fellows.

Attack: An Infantry Subaltern's Impressions of July 1st, 1916. By EDWARD G. D. LIVEING. With an Introduction by JOHN MASEFIELD. New York: The Macmillan Co. $0.75.

"No. 6": A Few Pages from the Diary of an Ambulance Driver. By C. DE FLOREZ. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $1.50.

The attack on the fortified village of Gommecourt, which Mr. Liveing so graphically describes in the first of these books, was part of the Allied drive which began the battle of the Somme. It is so simple and vivid an account of a modern engagement that the reader will doubtless agree with Mr. Masefield that no better one "has been written in England since the war began." There are but four chapters in the volume: "Gathering for Attack," "Eve of Attack," "Attack," and "Toll of Attack," and they tell only of what the author actually thought, saw and did during the battle up to the time he was struck down and invalided home. Mr. Liveing pays a tribute to the unforgettable "sympathy and kindness" of the "R. C. padre" who attended to his wounds, remarks how impressed he was by seeing German prisoners behind the lines taking care of the British wounded, and gives the following account of his reflections just before the attack began that he took part in:

> I had an excessive desire for the time to come when I could go "over the top," when I should be free at last from the noise of the bombardment, free from the prison of my trench, free to walk across that patch of No Man's Land and opposing trenches till I got to my objective, or, if I did not go that far, to have my fate decided for better or for worse. I experienced, too, moments of intense fear during close bombardment. I felt that if I was blown up it would be the end of all things so far as I was concerned. The idea of after-life seemed ridiculous in the presence of such frightful destructive force. Again the prayer of that old cavalier kept coming to my mind. ["Lord, I shall be very busy this day. I may forget Thee, but do not Thou forget me."] At any rate, one could but do one's best, and I hoped that a higher power than all that which was around would not overlook me or any other fellows on that day. At one time, not very long before the moment of attack, I felt to its intensest depth the truth of the proverb, "Carpe diem." What was time? I had another twenty minutes in which to live in comparative safety. What was the difference between twenty minutes and twenty years? Really and truly what was the difference? I was living at present, and that was enough.

C. de Florez was the driver of Ambulance "No. 6," a Fiat automobile, and it was his duty to speed to the front and "evacuate" malades and blessés and carry them to the base hospitals as quickly, yet with as little jouncing, as possible. The horrors and suffering of this "scientific" war, in which half the brains of the world are trying to exterminate the other half, are vividly depicted in the author's diary. He fears that "under the present conditions of fighting" the war will never end. "The resources of men and money are greater than the destruction." "Many of us went to Mass," he records on more than one Sunday. "Catholics and Protestants alike seem to need a bit of religion." There are a number of powerfully written pages in the book describing the dreadful carnage and desolation of modern war and other passages which feelingly express Mr. de Florez's sympathy with the brave wounded. Some of the verses in the volume are too gruesome to be artistic.

Dieu Nous Aime. Par L'ABBÉ FÉLIX KLEIN. Librairie Lecoff, J. Gahalda Editeur. Paris. 3 fr. 60.

In presence of all the sorrows and tragedies which have overwhelmed the world and which in some cases have proved such a stumbling block to the faith of many, it is necessary to reaffirm the dogma of the Providence of God and to repeat to a generation which more than any other has need of them the consoling words "God is love." This thought has been the inspiration of the present volume. Its sub-title is "Avec les Blessés": "With the Wounded." As an ambulance chaplain the Abbé Klein has come in contact with hundreds of the human wrecks cast away by the storm of war. He has realized that the central dogmas of our holy religion, especially that of the love of God for his erring children must be brought home to these sufferers and to all those who either in body or in soul have felt something of the great horror which is now passing over us.

Confident in the power of all the truths of our religion to ennoble the heart of man, he boldly chooses the sublimest truths of faith to prove that God is love and that He loves us. He takes such subjects as "Lux in Tenebris": Darkness indeed surrounds us, but a light shines in the midst of the darkness the ever-burning torch of God's love; he finds lessons for our wretchedness in a contemplation of the hidden life of Our Lord, in the mission of St. John the Baptist, in Our Lady's compassion, in the Resurrection of Christ, in the contemplation of the Good Shepherd, of the august mystery of the Trinity where God is known and loved adequately even as He knows and loves. All these truths the eloquent writer handles in a familiar and solid manner well-suited to the sufferers for whom the book was written, the wounded in body and the wounded in heart and mind and soul by the great war. Footnotes to Formal Logic. By Charles H. Rieber. Berkeley: University of California Press.

This volume contains a series of eight essays on certain logical questions which have been much discussed in recent years by the absolute idealists and the pragmatists; for example, the import of judgment, the nature of inference, novelty and identity in inference. Professor Rieber is an idealist, and in attempting to give an answer to his problems he relies very largely on the presuppositions of idealism. Certain of his criticisms of pragmatism and new realism are excellent. When dealing with an opponent of either of these schools, he is direct, clear, and penetrating. It is a marked characteristic of the absolute idealist and the pragmatist that the best parts of their writings are those in which they destroy each other.

Professor Rieber says on p. 175: "Improvement and progress are indeed dignified words. . . . The modern enemy of traditional logic and ethics declares that knowledge is limited to a world of comparatives, whose superlatives are never in sight. . . . Any genuine improvement implies a direction, a goal. If we are in the least degree uncertain about the goal, we must in the same degree be uncertain about the improvement." These words bear a close resemblance to the following passage in Chesterton's "Heretics" (pp. 35-36): "As enunciated today 'progress' is simply a comparative of which we have not settled the superlative. . . . Progress, properly understood, has, indeed, a most dignified and legitimate meaning. . . Progress by its very name indicates a direction; and the moment we are in the least doubtful about the direction, we become in the same degree doubtful about the progress." But there is a passage in Chesterton's "Orthodoxy" (p. 45) in which he gives a very accurate description of the idealistic philosophy which Professor Rieber upholds: "There is a skeptic far more terrible than he who believes that everything began in matter. It is possible to meet the skeptic who believes that everything began in himself. He doubts not the existence of angels or devils, but the existence of men and cows. For him his own friends are a mythology made up by himself. He created his own father and his own mother." How just these words of Mr. Chesterton are, may be seen from the following sentences of Professor Rieber: "The nature of thought is to produce its own elements; it creates both itself and its members" (p. 126). "When we separate being from knowing, reality from thought, what is left . . . is real non-being" (p. 151). "The self does beget the not-self" (p. 169). "Thought is incessantly discovering that there is nothing genuinely outside of itself" (p. 169). Mr. Chesterton rightly calls this a "horrible fancy."

Motley and Other Poems. By Walter de la Mare. New York: Henry Holt & Co. $1.25.

"The beauty of the world has made me sad" seems to be the burden of this melodious poet's song. He knows how to choose words that give the reader vivid pictures of this world's fleeting loveliness, but he seldom holds out the hope of an unfading beauty that will be seen in heaven by those who now keep their hearts uplifted. He sorrowfully sings:

Clear eyes do dim at last.
And cheeks outlive their rose
Time heedless of the past,
No loving-kindness knows;
Chill unto mortal lip
Still Lethe flows.

And in these lines from "Alone" Mr. De la Mare shows how skilfully he can create with a few short words, a strikingly somber scene:

The abode of the nightingale is bare
Flowered frost congeals in the gelid air,
The fox howls from his frozen lair:
Alas, my loved one is gone
I am alone
It is winter.

In poems like "The Quarry," "Eyes," "The Old Men," "The Marionettes" and "Farewell," the author combines depth of thought with a musical flow of verse. The following lines on "The Sunken Garden" are in Mr. De la Mare's best manner:

Speak not—whisper not;
Here bloweth thyme and bergamot
Softly on the evening hour
Secret herbs their spices shower
Dark-spiked rosemary and myrrh,
Lean-stalked, purple lavender;
Hides within her bosom, too,
All her sorrows, bitter rue.

Breathe not—trespass not;
Of this green and darkling spot,
Latticed from the moon's beams,
Perchance a distant dreamer dreams;
Perchance upon its darkening air,
The unseen ghosts of children fare,
Faintly swinging, sway and sweep,
Like lovely sea-flowers in its deep;
While, unmoved, to watch and ward,
'Mid its gloomed and daisied sword
Stands with bowed and dewy head
That one little leaden Lad.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

The Catholic Mind for July 22 should be of special interest to all who wish to understand the position taken by the Hierarchy of Ireland regarding conscription. Dr. Peter Coffey's paper on "The Ethics of Irish Conscription" gives the moral and historical arguments which justify the people's resistance to the measure and in an article by the Rt. Rev. Patrick O'Donnell, D.D., Bishop of Raphoe, entitled, "The Irish Bishops and Conscription," his Lordship maintains that:

> The action of the Prelates was not a political move, much less something "purely temporal and political," as a certain body of English Catholics have assumed. In discharge of their pastoral office the Bishops in the past have adopted measures to cope with shortage of food, or wholesale emigration, or the defects of a bad land-system, or the evils of coercion or the want of university education. These are temporal concerns. But they are also concerns of mercy and justice, of the rights and dignity of men, of the essential interests of the Irish people. What the Prelates are now withstanding is a measure of dire oppression that is without warrant and without wisdom, and sure to defeat its own purpose.

The number ends with "Why 'America First'"? a patriotic address by Father Francis X. Reilly, S.J.

The new edition of Martin Anderson Nexö's "Pelle the Conqueror" (Holt, $4,00) fills two volumes of about 575 pages each. The author is a Dane who seems to describe in the four parts of the novel his own "Boyhood," "Apprenticeship," "Great Struggle" and "Victory." The book is meant to picture "from within" the life and career of a modern Socialist labor-leader who spent his boyhood on the island of Bornholm, in the Baltic, passed his youth as a shoemaker's apprentice in Copenhagen, and in manhood became the triumphant champion of labor over the tyranny of capitalism. The work, which seems to be well translated, contains many strong chapters describing the wretchedness of the laboring poor but far too many vivid pictures also of their dissolute lives and lax morals as well. "Pelle the Conquerer" is of course a Socialist tract which teaches that the International rather than Christianity is the cure for all the laborer's ills.

"Rough Rhymes of a Padre" (Doran, $0.50 net) by "Woodbine Willie," M.C., Chaplain to the Forces, are well-named, for the effects of blood-shed and war are easily seen in the plain and at times vulgar outbursts in the volume. God and God's ways are pretty fiercely challenged in the beginning of some of the poems but the writer has a unique way of showing himself and the reader, that God really knows what He is doing and that it is all for the best. Some of the pictures are powerful and their rough framework is almost forgotten in their vividness. "Well?" The first poem in the book and the "Sorrow of God" are especially noteworthy.——"Georgian Poetry, 1916-1917" (Putnam, $2.00) is a volume of contemporary lyrics which should arouse fresh hopes for an era of literary excellence. The wide range of its subjects, the variety of its imagery and sentiment, and the versatility of its external expression make the work, on the whole, one of artistic worth. Though the selection of war lyrics is, for the most part admirable, the loud realism of several individual pieces can scarcely find support on the principles of art. It is a mistake to confound the interest or even sensation such verses may arouse, with the esthetic pleasure of real poetry.

James Stephens, the author of a recent book of verse called "Reincarnations" (Macmillan, $1.00), explains in a note that the book ought to be called "Plunders of Pieces of Eight," or something similar, for he has very imperfectly paraphrased, rather than faithfully translated, the poems of such Gaelic bards as Egan O'Rahilly and Antoine O'Raftery. The latter's "County Mayo," however, of which the last two stanzas follow, is a translation:

I say and swear my heart lifts up like the lifting of the tide,
Rising up like the rising wind till fog or mist must go,
When I remember Carra and Gallen close beside,
And the gap of the Two Bushes, and the wide plains of Mayo.

To Killaden, then, to the place where everything grows that is best;
There are raspberries there and strawberries there and all that is good for men;
And if I were only there in the middle of my folk my heart could rest,
For age itself would leave me there and I'd be young again.

The author's attempts to put into English the poems of the old Irish bards are interesting, but, as he owns, he found the task beyond his powers.

"Dramatic Moments in American Diplomacy" (Doubleday, Page, $1.25), by Ralph Page, is, in a mild way, a startling book. Despite our policy of non-interference in world-politics, we have frequently been drawn into controversy with foreign Governments. How our representatives, more by straightforward defiance and, at times, typical Yankee bluff, rather than by intrigue and secret machinations, averted wars and obtained our demands, is a thrilling story not found in most of our histories. Here are portrayed moments perilous to the nation and dangerous to the individual; strange and whimsical incidents, as when Anson Burlingame, a Boston politician, was accredited the Ambassador from China, to the whole world. The later chapters of the book, dealing with events within the compass of our own years, are more interesting; the author gives the true history of our war with Spain, the revolution in Panama, which resulted in our building of the Canal, and the abortive attempts of German machinations against us in Samoa, in Manila Bay with Dewey, and in Venezuela. Mr. Page tells his story with a charm and grace that proves history to be anything but the insipid narrative found so often in our history books.

EDUCATION

A New Danger for Our Schools

THREE years ago, malicious charges were made against the Catholic secondary schools of Chicago preparing pupils for the city normal schools. The outcome was quite the opposite to what those responsible for the stir had anticipated. It brought to light the fact that of 104 pupils, representing eight Catholic high schools of the city, who had taken the normal entrance examinations that year, 99 had passed successfully. Not one of the many city high schools, maintained at an enormous annual expenditure, came anywhere near equaling this record. In fact, the showing of the city schools was so poor in contrast, that the agitation, resulting in the publication of these figures, had for its purpose the establishment of the rule to eliminate the examinations, and to admit to the normal school, only a fixed number of pupils from each of the high schools, private and public. This ridiculous proposal failed to pass, and the incident was forgotten, serving only to place on record the figures given above.

Catholic Juvenile Delinquents

THERE are still more interesting figures, bearing on the work of the parochial schools of the archdiocese of Chicago. The Rt. Rev. A. J. McGavick, D.D., Spiritual Director of the Archdiocesan Union of the Holy Name Societies, reported recently on the "Big Brother work" of that organization. He cited statistics covering the appearance of youngsters before the Municipal Boys' Court during the first five months of the current year. The total number was 2,148. The Catholic boys numbered 1,097, or about one-half. I will not stop here ot show why this is a very moderate Catholic representation. Information had been secured regarding the education of all but twelve of the Catholic boys appearing before the court. It was found that less than one-third, 308, had attended the parochial schools, the remainder, 777, having attended the public schools. Chicago's population of primary-school age is a little more than 412,000. Of these, 310,000 are in the public, and 102,000 in the Catholic schools, still, only one-seventh of the boys appearing before the Boys' Court, had attended the parochial schools, virtually the whole of the remaining six-sevenths having attended the public schools. Mindful of the further fact that scarcely one-half of the Catholic children of Chicago attend the parochial schools, we come to further illuminating figures regarding delinquency among the Catholic boys of Chicago, and the influence the Catholic schools are exerting for an honest and upright manhood.

I have not been quoting secret archives hidden away in the vaults of the chancery of the archdiocese; what I have stated here has been given wide publication in the city. The figures could be secured by any one sufficiently interested to procure them from their original source. But despite these facts, which are an irrefutable testimony to the educational excellence, to the moral power and to the general superiority over all others of the Catholic schools of the archdiocese, the Superintendent of the Chicago Public Schools, whose professional interest should be the maintenance of the highest standard in education, was one of a delegation that went to Washington to lobby for a bill establishing practically State monopoly of education which would strike a hard blow against the Catholic schools.

A Dangerous Bill

SEVERAL bills of this nature have been proposed. That to which consideration is given here, is the tentative draft prepared by the National Education Association Commission on the National Emergency in Education, in cooperation with the National Child Labor Committee. Briefly, it creates a Department of Education, with a Secretary, and provides for the annual appropriation of $100,000,000 to be divided between the various States, according to a complicated scheme based on population figures. To secure its Federal allotment, each State must appropriate an equal amount for the same purpose. One-twentieth of this sum is to be expended for the Americanization of immigrants; one-twentieth for the instruction of illiterates; five-tenths for the improvement of public schools of less than college grade; three-tenths for medical examination, physical education, and recreation, and one-tenth for the training of teachers, particularly for the rural schools. Furthermore, the act provides that not one cent of the $100,000,000 shall be used either directly or indirectly to benefit in any manner any privately-owned or religiously-controlled school. There is much more of interest in the bill but this must suffice for the present.

The bill, or one very similar, is certain to come before Congress shortly. It is in line with the tendency to vest more and more authority in the civil government. Possibly its proponents will claim that the bill is most modest in its provisions. Certainly some enthusiasts for the establishment of a Federal Department of Education hope to put far more radical authority in its hands. It is, moreover, quite certain that should a bill of the above type be adopted, there will be a constant stir for enlarging the powers of the Department of Education, so that unless public opinion asserts itself strongly to the opposite, we shall reach the undesirable goal of absolute State monopoly of education.

State Monopoly and Education

LITTLE exposition is needed to show how unjust is the bill to private systems of education. As long as education is a department of the local government, Catholics in their endeavor to maintain their own schools have but to equal the local public effort. Not only is this done, but Catholics frequently surpass the State's efforts. A bill of the sort in question puts the wealth of the nation at the disposal of, for instance, a rural school board, and will require that the Catholics of that district, in order to keep their schools on a par with the public institutions, make an effort equal to that which is possible for a rich and mighty nation. Let us here dispose of one doubt, if it exists; it is certain that if this tax is exacted of Catholics, they will not fail. But that is no reason why we should not seek to save ourselves from the injustice.

It will be asserted immediately that the bill is wholly in accord with American principles of government; that the prohibition against the use of the Federal school funds for the support of any sectarian institutions is true to the letter of the Constitution. But it is likewise true that the Federal Government may not legislate against any religious denomination, directly or indirectly. The Government disavows any intention of conscripting labor in normal times. But supposing that the Government went into the manufacturing business on an enormous scale and paid fabulous wages which no privately owned concern could duplicate, so that a general increase of living costs resulted. The employees of the private manufacturers would face the choice either of leaving their present employment and attaching themselves to the Government-owned establishment, or of starving to death. And the Government's assurance that it had not drafted labor would stand. The example holds good of Federal subsidies for public educational institutions only.

Fair Play for Catholic Schools

A RECENT bulletin of the Catholic Educational Association calls attention to the danger that Catholic education will be dealt a severe blow through legislation and emphasizes the necessity of preparedness. But this we can set down as absolutely certain: the Catholic protests against a bill of the kind mentioned here, will be received with very little sympathy outside our own ranks. Even within there will be many who will be at odds with us. Men ordinarily ready to see that justice is done, will let the weight of their opinion be measured with that of those who from far less worthy motives are seeking to establish an actual State monopoly of education. The necessity of religious education is far from being generally appreciated in America. Not even all those professing a religious creed are in sympathy with religious schools. Added to this is a decided American inclination to condemn whatever is not understood, particularly if it has a religious angle.

Catholic education must demand fair play. It cannot base its appeal on the primary reason for its existence for, if it does, it will find small audience. But it has another ground on which it can defend itself, one on which it is far more likely to meet victory. Men are losing patience with the present system of public education. The very movement to federalize the schools shows that under State control they have fallen short of the desired standard of excellence. The belief is that national control is a cure-all. No attention is paid to the fact that whether the schools must battle for their effectiveness in State or Federal legislature, they will meet the same polluting influence of politics. Our business men, who must pay the price of the incompetency and delinquency of employees, are daily interesting themselves more in the question of a system that fully educates the youth and does not merely hide imperfections beneath a high, non-wearing polish. The establishment of private schools in large industrial plants, to do what the grammar schools should have done, is testimony to this. The Catholic schools can go before the public with a telling argument to back their demand for fair treatment. They have achieved a standard of educational excellence that is unsurpassed. We are coming daily to a better appreciation of the intelligent, high-principled, patriotic manhood which they have contributed to the nation. For the cause of Catholic education, for our own defense against a grievous and intended injustice, we must overcome our difference and be a little more assertive of the excellence of our educational work.

"Who Steals My Purse"

WE have had a deal of talk about the morality of our soldiers; though the loudest clamor has been about their immorality. Somehow the fault-finders, who are the minority, always outcry the majority, who are satisfied; and no voice is so shrill as that of the professional "investigator." Why the conduct of our own soldiers has been specially animadverted upon may be explained, perhaps, by the fact that they are our own; for, as Seneca puts it, "Quidquid domi est, vile est," what is our own is cheapened.

So it came to pass, not long ago, that certain good souls, during a visit to one of our cantonments, were persuaded that conditions were simply awful. Forthwith they proceeded to let the Republic know of what moral stuff its boys in khaki are made. Not only are they corrupt themselves, it was stated, but they were inoculating the countryside with the devil's own virus. Maiden virtue was not safe out of doors, and not free from threat at home, and so forth.

INVESTIGATING THE CANTONMENTS

PEOPLE were deeply stirred. The authorities took up the accusations. The investigators were investigated, with the result that the fardel, borne by scandal, was found to be made up, for the most part, of "birds' eggs, morrow morns and bladders burst." It was another case of zeal taking the bit in its mouth and running riot.

One grants that the accusers meant no harm. Only they did not stop to think. The trigger was pulled on sight, and when the gun went off we heard a reiteration of the time-worn and hollow excuse: "We did not know it was loaded." But belated excuses bring no sovereign cure for reputations shot to pieces. Our zealots did not stop to think that in the cantonments there are thousands of men brought together from widely separated parts of the country, men of very diverse environment, education and character. They did not reflect that the military authorities watch jealously over the conduct of enlisted men, and that habits cannot be changed directly men are drafted and placed in training camps. They forgot that the great body of our soldiers were very decent men before enlistment, and that there is convincing testimony of their being just as decent now. They did not examine how much blame attaches to certain civilians whom common decorum should keep away from the camps, but who insist on seeing and being seen. So long as there are beings with freedom of action and rules to transgress, there will be irregularities, but it is manifestly unjust to brand a whole cantonment with wickedness because of delinquencies which are marked exceptions, which the great body of the men themselves condemn, which the military authorities strenuously try to prevent and consistently punish with severity.

No one is astonished that there is more crime in a great city than in a small community. It would be wonderful if the case were otherwise. Now, in a cantonment, as there is a concentration of men, so is there a certain concentration of lawless tendencies which, until discipline has made itself felt, will occasionally break out in irregular action. Even with discipline regularly established, because of the scarcity of confirmed angels, there will be back-slidings. However, it is quite safe to say that, on the average, law-breaking will be notably less than if the same men were scattered to their various home towns. And for three reasons. First, temptations are fewer; second, safeguards are stronger and more numerous; third, retribution is surer, and punishment more effectively applied under military than under civil law.

GOLD AND REPUTATION

FINALLY the accusers acted, as meddlers generally do, stupidly. The best that can be said of their efforts is that they abetted calumny and furnished sensational "copy" for the newspapers. Strange, when one looks at it from the view-point of decency and Christian charity, strange and awful, that a person who will shrink from pilfering a neighbor's flower-pot will not wink twice before despoiling another's reputation or plucking at his honor. It was not Shakespeare who discovered that > "Good name in man or woman . . . .

> Is the immediate jewel of their souls."

But in our own language, at least, no one has put the truth so well as Iago. We value the apothegm and quote it approvingly, not only because it expresses in brief and pointedly a truth that is the outgrowth of our common experience and conviction, but, in particular, it is the pithy and elegant utterance of a fact that touches each one of us very nearly indeed.

Who steals my purse subjects me to a hardship, greater or less. Yet the theft of my gold leaves upon me no mark of dishonor. Upright men will pity my misfortune and still make place for me in the marts of exchange. "He that filches from me my good name" makes me so poor that I am adjudged a moral bankrupt by everyone who values the name and place of a trustworthy man. Poverty may be unfortunate, but no man of sense holds it to be disgraceful. Poverty may force a man to live in loneliness and discomfort. But the poor man is pushed aside by an accident of fortune, not by personal unworthiness. The poor man may not be called to the tables of the rich, or asked to share in the councils of the powerful. This, rather because he lacks fine raiment and opportunity, than fitness of character; certainly not because he has forfeited his right to respect from his fellow-men. The man who has lost his good name is ostracized because he is branded as unclean. He is shunned because he is become a social leper. He is rated as an outcast stricken by a moral paresis, and is damned by the physicians who might heal him. He is spoken of only to warn others against him. If approached he must be, let it be cautiously done, as it were, with book, bell and candle. He is the spindrift of human kind, beaten about and dissipated by the breath of a wagging world.

Ourselves and Others

ALL this is so clear that to dwell upon it seems like harping on a truism. The school child appreciates that everyone has a natural right to a good name until one foregoes the right by misconduct, and hardly needs to be taught that to besmirch another's reputation is a scurvy thing. If we have any doubt as to what we hold in the matter let us recall what we said, and especially what we thought, when we learned that some one had belittled our own character or motives or achievements. In fact, were our practice as clean-cut as our theory, this matter of backbiting and slander would have few difficulties. The trouble comes from the fact that we ruthlessly legislate for others' actions, and thoughtlessly legalize our own; that we so readily accuse our neighbor, and so shiftily excuse ourselves; that we have such a persuasive doubt of others' intentions, and such a flippant cocksureness of our own. Blessed is the man who has learned to temper his self-assurance with a dash of sweet dubiety. Blessed the man who has realized that mere theoretical charity is a very worthless commodity. You can buy a folio of it for a pittance at any second-hand book stall. And, again, a most hopeful complaint is a chronic attack of knowing one's own business, and a very itching to mind it. F. J. McNiff, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Minimum Wage for Women

CALIFORNIA has passed a ten-dollar weekly minimum wage for women employed in professional and general offices, which became operative on July 2. The wage for beginners over eighteen years of age was fixed by the State Industrial Welfare Commission at $8.00 a week for the first six months, and $9.00 minimum for the second six months. After a year's employment the $10.00 minimum must then be paid. To prevent abuses the number of women beginners permissible was set at not more than twenty-five per cent of the total number of employees. The lowest wage for minors under eighteen years of age is $7.00 a week, with a minimum of $10.00 after eighteen months employment. In cases of physical disability permission for the payment of a wage lower than the fixed minimum must be secured from the Commission, which will then determine the wage of the individual.

President Indorses Drive of Marquette Medical School

MARQUETTE UNIVERSITY, Milwaukee, is conducting its second great drive for funds. Its preceding campaign netted over $500,000, which was the goal set for that occasion. The new drive is to raise $1,000,000 as an endowment fund for the Marquette Medical School, which is one of the few class-A institutions in the United States, and enjoys the highest reputation in medical circles. It is announced that without such an endowment it would be impossible to continue this school. The drive is to raise $666,000 in Milwaukee, while the remainder of the $1,000,000 is promised by the Carnegie corporation if the former amount is contributed to the present campaign. The following letter, calling attention to the imperative need of sustaining our medical schools in the present crisis, was received from President Wilson by the editor of the Milwaukee Journal, a member of the campaign committee conducting the drive:

> My dear Mr. Nieman: Your letter concerning the School of Medicine of the Marquette University gives me an opportunity to express, as the Medical Advisory Commission of the Council of National Defense has already expressed, a very deep interest in the maintenance of our medical schools. It is of capital importance to the country that they should be maintained at as high a degree of efficiency as possible. Never before did the nation need so large a number of thoroughly trained physicians and surgeons.
> Cordially and sincerely yours,
> Woodrow Wilson.

The fund is to be used solely as an endowment, and it is calculated that the interest from it, together with the income which the institution can rely on, will be just sufficient to continue the work. Marquette University Medical School will thus be one of the few endowed institutions of learning conducted under Catholic auspices. Gifts aggregating $175,000 were pledged at the very opening of the drive.

Methodist Eulogy of St. Ignatius

WITH the feast of St. Ignatius close at hand we can do no better than to quote the following eulogy of the Saint and of his Order which originally appeared in the Methodist Pittsburgh Christian Advocate and was recently reprinted in Our Sunday Visitor:

> It is true that Protestant Britain gave us Z. Macauley and David Livingstone, that our own country has sent forth a Thorburn, a Bashford, and a Headland to work mightily for the Gospel; yet it was Catholic Spain that gave birth to the first real modern missionary. This was Ignatius Loyola, a man with a world vision. It was the Jesuit priest who first broke down the barrier of seclusion in China and Japan and gave to a wondering posterity its first authentic news of these distant lands; it was the Jesuit priest in the days of French dominion in the valleys of the St. Lawrence and Mississippi, who bore with him the story of the Cross to the Indians, and who nurtured the soul life of the hardy French settlers in lower Canada; it was the Jesuit missionary who first planted education among his fellow-men, wherever the armies of Europe planted the flag of conquest and dominion. We owe debts to Ignatius Loyola—the splendid ideal of universal missionary enterprise, and the union of a doctrinal loyalty and an efficient educational scheme.

If we have frequently referred to unfair attacks and false statement from Methodist sources, we gladly acknowledge that we have likewise found within the Methodist Church some of our most candid and fearless champions.

Not Aliens, but Children of Mother America

IN an eloquent address at the unveiling of the service flag of the Holy Ghost parish, at St. Louis, the Rev. John Rothensteiner showed that the proportion of service men from this Catholic German-speaking parish was more than two and a half times as great as that provided on the average by non-Catholic citizens of whatever nationality by descent or origin. Those, he said, who were born upon our soil love the ground on which they tread as sacred and inviolable, and are determined, at the cost of life itself, to transmit it to their children as a sacred trust.

> Others among us, though born on alien soil, came here at this country's invitation, not as beggars and parasites, but as lovers of the God-given rights of man: life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. Our fathers and brothers found this country, especially its western part, a vast wilderness, and they, together with the sturdy Irish immigrants and the native Americans from the East, transformed the wilderness of prairie, forest and swamp, into one great garden, watered by a thousand streams. Yes, wherever they or their children are found, in the great commercial and manufacturing cities, they have helped to the upbuilding of the nation. In the quiet, peaceful country-towns, in the unnumbered homesteads amid the waving grain, in every field of human endeavor, in art, in science, in commerce, in invention, in the councils of the nation and on its battlefields, in the sanctuary of the Church and in the halls of learning, they have done hard, honest, intelligent, successful work. They have always given more than they received, in as far as their own earnest hearts and willing hands have created the wealth, which unaided nature was unable to produce, and which remains to the nation, as much as to the individual owners, a priceless heritage for all time to come.

Are they now the less patriotic, as he rightly said, that they do not lend their lips to cursings or to a propaganda of hatred?

They are pouring out their blood as freely as any, they are giving bountifully of their wealth and of their service. Every roll of honor is starred with the names of their valiant sons who have paid their bond in full. What more can they do? "Let the great heart of America respond. We feel sure it will not blame but rather praise. We are not aliens. We are children of Mother America."

Three French Priests Receive Legion of Honor

THE London Catholic War News Service recounts the heroic death of several priests recently killed at the front. It likewise refers to numerous military honors lately conferred upon the Catholic clergy. Thus the unusual award of the French Legion of Honor, the highest distinction in the army, was accorded to three French priests, two of whom are serving with the colors as combatants. The following are the official details:

> Jean-Benoit Dutang, lieutenant in the 15th Battalion of Chasseurs (Abbé Dutang, a student at the Grand Seminaire of Belley). An officer of the first order. Has distinguished himself in all combats by his remarkable courage and coolness. From the 15th to the 27th of October, 1916, kept his men together under a violent and persistent bombardment, in spite of heavy losses. Though himself severely wounded, he continued to give an example of the finest spirit, and only allowed himself to be taken to hospital after he had given an account of the situation to his captain, who was then in command.
> Regis Cléry, captain in the 128th Infantry (the Abbé Cléry, vicaire of St. Pierre de Montrouge, Paris). An officer of courage and determination. The commander of his battalion having been put out of action at the beginning of an attack, he took over the command and continued the advance across the German lines, taking numerous prisoners. When the operation was over, he brought back his men in perfect order under a violent fire, being himself the last to leave the enemy's position. Twice wounded and three times mentioned.
> The Abbé Eugéne R. C. Nicolas, chaplain to the stretcher-bearers of a division. Has shown several times admirable coolness and unwearying devotion, assisting the wounded and going into the most exposed places to encourage the men. Has given the finest example of courage and heedlessness of danger. Has been mentioned four times.

Thus while French officialdom continues to persecute the Church and seeks to rob her orphaned children of their Faith, her priests are decorated for valor and for patriotism on the field of honor.

"The Bells of Maurepas"

THE Rev Thomas Tiplady, a Methodist chaplain, describes in his recent book, "The Cross at the Front," how he found nothing left of the church at Maurepas but two great bells which lay just where they fell when the steeple tumbled down under shell-fire. He writes:

> The church had gone, but its music lingered. In peace time, the music of the bells had floated out over the rolling downs and through the sleeping valleys that lie around the village. As the people ploughed the land, gathered in the corn, or tended their stock, the sound of the bells came to them as a voice from heaven. Daily, like the peasants in Millet's picture, "The Angelus," they had, at the call of the bells bowed their heads and said an evening prayer ere the passing of the sun brought on the night, with its train of stars. On the first day of each new week they had left their fields at the sound of the music, and, donning their best garb, had sought in the church the absolution of their sins, and a fresh start. Mothers looking on the picture of the Virgin and Child had felt a new sacredness in the duties of motherhood. Fathers had gazed upon the crucifix and become reconciled to a life of self-renouncing labor for their offspring. Children, with wondering eyes, had looked upon the picture of the Angels surrounding the ascending Lord, and felt the power and glory of the world to come. All had listened to the simple words of the village priest and been reminded that they were but pilgrims, and must not set their affections too deeply on farmstead or field, but on things which are eternal and beyond the chances and changes of this mortal life. When Christmas had come the bells had rung merrily, calling to the farmers as aforetime the Angels of Bethlehem had called to the shepherds, "O come, let us adore Him, Christ the Lord." Holy days had come and gone, but never without the bells calling the people from the toil of the fields to rest and rejoicings in home and church. When the children went to First Communion, or when the Church's blessing was given to a bridal pair, how happily the bells rang! And how sadly, when some old man finished his journey and went to his long home! Back home [in England] old people and young children often die without any notice being taken of their passing. They just slip away like the birds in autumn. But in the district about Maurepas neither man nor child could pass away unnoticed and unlamented. The bells tolled the news to all, and expressed the sorrow of all. Now the church in which the old and young had prayed, bridal parties rejoiced, and mourners wept, was no more. Only the bells remained. But as "Music, when soft voices die, vibrates in the memory," so there abide the spiritual experiences to which the bells called.

May the bells of Maurepas soon again ring forth a jubilant peal in resurrected France!

The Russian Catholic Mission

AN earnest appeal for the salvation of Russia is made by the Russian Catholic Mission, recently established in America for the purpose of spreading the Catholic Faith among the Russian schismatics and warmly approved by the Apostolic Delegate. In the days of Czarism Catholicism was proscribed in Russia. The religious longings of the people were tyrannically restricted within the bounds of a narrow nationalism. No wonder then that the reaction which followed now threatens to sweep them into unbelief. But the same revolution, says C. Auroroff, president of the new Russian Catholic Mission, has through the grace of God given us the opportunity of promoting the Catholic Faith where all religion is seemingly perishing among the Russian people.

> Today is the opportunity. Tomorrow it may be too late. Tomorrow their simplicity and trustfulness may have delivered them into the hands of the Socialist, the anarchist and the atheist. When our Father shall ask us: "Where is thy brother, the Russian?" shall we dare answer: "Am I my brother's keeper?" I am a Russian, and I know and feel how willing and ready my brothers are to return to the arms of the Catholic Church.
> But has not the wave of anarchy completely overwhelmed the Russian people? Has it not completely rooted up their religious feeling and left us no field for work? These are the questions asked by the Catholic world, and I am able to answer with a definite, "No." The Russian people are in dire straits. If the Socialist and anarchist are allowed free play, they will be able to sway them and deliver them to the dangers of unbelief. If we extend to them the helping hand, it will be gratefully grasped, and we shall lead them back safely to salvation in the Catholic Church. We shall help them, and help them now.

The immediate objects of the Mission are the distribution of literature, the organization of Russo-Catholic parishes in America, the provision of means for the maintenance of churches and priests at home, and finally the rendering of moral and material assistance to the Russo-Catholic Church in Russia. From its funds and from the money raised by special collections, the society will send financial aid, through approved ecclesiastical channels, to the Russian Catholic Bishops of the Eastern rite in Russia. The quarters of the new Russian Catholic Mission are at 234 Bakewell Bldg., Pittsburgh, Pa. Membership is open to all Catholics of whatever nationality. "If the whole Catholic body will pay more attention to the religious darkness of Russia than to its political situation," writes the president of the Mission, "I am sure my dear Russian people will be saved."

The War.—The second battle of the Marne is still in progress, and is marked by the efforts of the Germans to extricate themselves from the dangerous salient in which General Foch's counter-offensive involved them by his attacks on both its western and eastern sides. The Germans, as was inevitable, are retreating, under constant pressure from the Allies, and it is believed that they are merely holding up the advance of the Americans, British and French, until they have prepared a strong line of defense, along which it is expected they will soon make a determined resistance. Various conjectures have been made as to where this line will run and as to the magnitude of the results which will turn on the issue of the great battle, but the Germans' plans have apparently been changed several times during the week. The Allies are striving to bottle up the Germans in a region between the Aisne and the Marne, and the Germans are fighting desperately to make their escape. The outcome is still problematical.

Bulletin, July 22, p.m.-July 29, a.m.

The advance of the French on the western side of the sector has had the most important results, the progress of the Americans on the southern side has covered the greatest distance, and the gains of the British on the eastern side have been comparatively slight. This inequality, however, has been the result of the varying degree of resistance offered on these different fronts by the Germans.

The Allied advance which last week had reached the outskirts of the city of Soissons, has been checked, largely because the Germans were determined to hold the city at all costs and also because its capture held out but slight military advantage to General Foch. Similarly the Allied advance just south of Rheims, although it has been pushed forward enough to relieve the danger of Rheims, has been held up some twelve miles east of Fismes. The reason for this is that the Germans concentrated large bodies of troops at this point, as it was of vital importance for them to keep the mouth of the salient open, otherwise their entire force of 500,000 men and their immense supplies would face absolute disaster. The principal endeavor of the Germans has been to withdraw their troops from the southern and southwestern sides of the salient, and as a consequence it is in these two portions of the fifty-mile front that the Allies have made their greatest progress.

Between Soissons and Oulchy-le-Chateau the Allies have made but little advance during the week, the latter place being strongly held by the Germans and situated on a plateau with very steep sides. By pushing along the Ourcq river, however, the French finally compelled the evacuation of the town and took Bruyeres. This success, together with the fact that an advance of more than ten miles had been made in a northeasterly direction from Chateau-Thierry to a point within about three miles of Fere-en-Tardenois brought the entire German line near the Marne into danger and resulted in a withdrawal of the German troops on a front of about twenty miles to a line which ran through Bruyeres, Villeneuve, Courmont, Passy, Cuisles, la Neuville and Chamuzy. Both Fere-en-Tardenois and Ville en Tardenois were under the fire of the Allied guns. Later the Americans and French took Fere-en-Tardenois, and entered Champvoisy, Athenay and Olizy.

In the vicinity of Montdidier the French have made a considerable advance, and at Massige they have recaptured all the territory lost by them at the beginning of the German drive. The British have made some local gains between Albert and Arras and south of Merris and Meteren. In Albania the Allies have captured the entire mountainous district dominating in the right bank of the Devoli above the confluence of Holta River; they have also taken the villages of Izgyuba and Kokoshovo.

Other Fronts

With the capture of Simbirsk, on the Volga, Czecho-Slovak troops now control territory on the right bank of the river as well as on the left. Professor T. G. Masaryk, commander of these forces, has instructed them to remain in Siberia to be a nucleus of the Allied expeditionary army that is expected to enter Asiatic Russia. The leader of the Czecho-Slovak troops recently cabled Professor Masaryk: "We ask for instructions as to whether we should leave for France or whether we should stay here to fight in Russia by the side of the Allies and of Russia. The health and spirit of our troops is excellent."

By a proclamation made by President Wilson on July 23, the Government assumes for the duration of the war full control of all telephone and telegraph lines in the country. The order went into effect July 31. The proclamation provides that the Postmaster-General shall have the supervision, control and operation of the entire wire system on land, but ocean-cable lines are still in the hands of private corporations, and the radio systems are already managed by the Navy Department. Postmaster General Burleson's first act was to appoint a committee composed of John C. Koons, First Assistant Postmaster General; David J. Lewis, a member of the United States Tariff Commission, and William H. Lamar, Solicitor for the Post Office Department, to take general charge of the situation. Mr. Burleson will act as Chairman of the committee. The President's proclamation provides that the two telegraph systems and the 9,000 or more telephone units taken over all receive a rental to be determined later, and for the present the companies' officers and employees will retain their positions. By another proclamation the President assumed control on July 25 of the Cape Cod Canal which connects Cape Cod with Buzzard's Bay, Massachusetts, is seven miles long and about nineteen feet deep. Work will at once begin at dredging the Canal's channel to a depth of twenty-five feet.

Government Takes Over Land Wires

According to reports from Washington Japan and the United States have reached a virtual agreement on the primary points under discussion concerning the help to be given to Russia. The Allied forces, which will include American, British, French and Japanese troops, but will not be in large numbers, have no other purpose except to establish communications between Russia and Japan and the United States, to move the bases of supplies closer to European Russia, and to afford sufficient military protection to the railroad lines. There is no intention whatever to reconstruct Russian boundaries, but merely to afford Russia the possibility of obtaining supplies, should that country elect to fight Germany. No military aggression is contemplated nor any interference with the wishes of the Russian people, whose sovereignty the Allies are determined to respect. The terms of the agreement have not yet been officially accepted, but it is known that both Japan and the United States are as one on the purpose of extending aid to democratic Russia and of protecting themselves and Russia from the autocratic designs of Germany.

American-Japanese Agreement

The following dispatch of the Associated Press sent from Havana shows that Cuba is not content to render mere moral support to the Allied cause:

Other Items

Cuba will send at least one regiment of regulars to France as well as all the volunteers who offer themselves for service in Europe, according to the Military Service bill adopted by the House of Representatives last night. The bill will come up in the Senate today. Provision is also made for the sending of a military commission to the United States, France, England and Italy. Formation of a Cuban aviation corps which will be trained in the United States is provided for in a decree signed by President Menocal. The Government has several hundred applications from civilians desiring to enter the aviation corps for service in Europe.

Siam also is prepared to enter actively into the struggle. More than 500 airplane pilots, according to Prince Valdyakara, Secretary of the Siamese legation at Paris, are ready to leave for France to take up aerial service.

The fifth national Congress of Turkestan has proclaimed Turkestan to be a republic, in alliance with Russia, and composed of the following districts: Semiretchinsk, Syr-Darya, Turgai, Samarkand, the Trans-Caspian province, Khiva and Bokhara.

The friendship which exists between Belgium and the United States makes King Albert's answer to President Wilson's congratulations of last week very pleasant reading. His tribute to the heroism of American soldiers is especially gratifying:

> I read with emotion your cordial telegram. In the name of all the Belgians, I heartily thank the eminent Chief Magistrate of the great American nation.
> The great weight carried by his every word imparts special value to the sympathy which he kindly expresses to me in his own name and in that of his compatriots.
> I have it at heart to pay homage to the heroism displayed by the American troops on the battlefields of France, which heroism has just been crowned by such splendid victories.

America has begun in earnest to redeem the pledge given to Belgium more than a year ago.

France.—An article entitled "The Order We Await" recently appeared in the Nouvelles Religieuses, edited by M. René Bazin, and called upon the Government of France officially to invoke the help of Almighty God and to ask for prayers from the Faithful. A strong letter of approval was sent to the editor by the Archbishop of Rheims, Cardinal Luçon, and the subject was given further consideration in a letter from the President of the Ministry, M. Clemenceau. The Cardinal wrote:

France and Official Prayers

> I chanced to read in the Nouvelles Religieuses, May 15, the article you entitled "The Order We Await." Permit me to subscribe most heartily to all you say and to offer you my respectful congratulations.
> Indeed, we await with impatience, and ardently long to hear that order by which the men who have the honor to represent France before God and before the nations shall fulfil their imperative duty to their charge and officially implore the Divine assistance. It is a humiliation for our native land to be the only country whose rulers have not called for national prayers in connection with the war now afflicting all the world. There is no valid reason to justify such an attitude, which has been obstinately maintained even to the present moment. All our friends deplore it; our enemies alone rejoice because of it. Is not the welfare of the country the supreme law against which no human law may avail: Salus populi suprema lex?

The King of England at the beginning of 1915, the President of the United States in October, 1914, and only recently on "Memorial Day," May 30, besought all their people to render solemn supplication to the Most High that He might grant them the necessary light and help. We need not be ashamed to imitate such lofty examples. The country which is so justly proud of her incomparable history will rejoice to behold those who are set over her destinies implore, at this moment of national crisis, the God whom Clovis and Joan of Arc invoked.

With what eagerness would not the Bishops of France assemble the people for solemn prayers, if demanded by the public authorities on the occasion, for instance, of the fifth anniversary of our country's entrance into the war, or in commemoration of the acceptance of our cause by the Allies—prayers to which the Government would give a truly national character by officially participating in them!

Such an act would in the sight of all the world reflect honor upon the statesmen who should dare to lead in this movement; it would offer a final refutation to the reproach of atheism now cast at official France; and all our Allies would join us in prayer, as they have joined us in arms, with a joyous enthusiasm.

To this letter M. Clemenceau replied, in the name of the President of the Republic, that full right was given to all the citizens to worship freely in their churches, and that they could there perform the public ceremonies in question. He then continued:

> Without doubt you desire official participation of the civil Government at these acts of religion. But you have already foreseen the answer that I must give in attesting that we are confronted with the decisive obstacle of the law. The power which the Government holds comes from the law alone. You will therefore understand that it is not possible for me to countenance the rejection of this law.

After enunciating these false principles, based upon the philosophy of atheism, M. Clemenceau added that he none the less appreciated the lofty sentiments which inspired the Cardinal's words, and that all efforts of whatever kind, made for the triumph of France, would meet with the sympathy of the Government and of all Frenchmen. In this way, he believed, was that union of souls to be attained towards which all were aspiring. Cardinal Luçon's utterances were approved in open letters by the Archbishop of Lyons, Cardinal Maurin, and by the Bishop of Perigeu and Sarlat. The latter strongly insisted, against M. Clemenceau, upon the duty of praying to God not merely as men, but also as citizens. Were the citizens only concerned, or was not France herself bleeding and endangered?

Ireland.—The Labor Gazette in reviewing the state of the Irish linen industry finds conditions none too good, especially in the Belfast district. Ireland supplies Great Britain and the Allies with nearly all the fine linen necessary for aeroplane wings, leaving very little linen for export purposes, and the Control Board is endeavoring to stop the export trade of material suitable for any essential national need. "This policy is being carried out gradually," says the Irish Weekly Independent, "but it hits the Irish industry especially, as the Irish mills were famed for their fine linen and may lose their foreign markets if the prohibition of exports is continued for any length of time." It must not be forgotten that the war has restricted the supply of flax coming into Ireland from Russia, Belgium, France and Holland. Imports from France and Belgium ceased almost as soon as the war began, while only a limited supply can be procured from Russia and Holland. At no time was the Irish supply of flax equal to the quantity necessary for the Irish linen trade.

Irish Linen Industry

On July 23 the Irish Nationalists returned to Parliament after an absence of three months due to the Government's decision to introduce conscription in Ireland. Before the Commons assembled, the Nationalists in a meeting decided to put a motion which would allow for a general discussion on the situation in Ireland. John Dillon, the Nationalist leader, notified the House that he would ask the Government to put aside a day for the discussion of the following motion:

John Dillon Quotes President Wilson

> The policy pursued toward Ireland by the Government is inconsistent with the great principles for the vindication of which the Allied Powers are carrying on the war.
> This policy has greatly alienated and exasperated the Irish people, and, if persevered in, will further alienate and exasperate them and will steadily increase the difficulty of reaching a settlement of the Irish question on the basis of friendship between the British and Irish nations.
> That this House entirely endorses the principles laid down by President Wilson in his great speech at the grave of George Washington, when, speaking of the objects for which America and her Allies are fighting, he said:
> "These great objects can be put into a single sentence. What we seek is the reign of law, based on the consent of the governed and sustained by the organized opinion of mankind. These great ends cannot be achieved by debating and seeking to reconcile and accommodate what statesmen may wish, with their projects for balances of power and of national opportunity.
> "They can be realized only by the determination of what the thinking peoples of the world desire, with their longing—hope for justice and for social freedom and opportunity."
> And that this House is of the opinion that the true solution of the Irish question is to put into operation without delay with regard to Ireland the principles laid down by President Wilson in his historic utterance.

Bonar Law speaking for the Government announced that on Monday, July 29, the motion would be debated in Parliament.

At a general meeting of the Irish Hierarchy held at St. Patrick's College, Maynooth, the following protestation was made:

The Bishops' Reply to Lord Curzon

> Lord Curzon is reported to have stated in the House of Lords on the 20th of June, 1918, that "The Catholic clergy in Ireland . . . advised their flocks, under pain of eternal damnation, to resist conscription." The context and the comments of journals like the Times and the Irish Times, seem to show that he spoke of the action of the Irish Bishops in connection with conscription. We protest against this grave calumny, rendered all the more grave inasmuch as he spoke in the name of the Government, who, no less than private persons, are bound by the Divine precept not to bear false witness against their neighbor.

His Eminence Cardinal Logue characterized the Curzon calumny as "outrageous and vulgar." The pronouncement of the Bishops on conscription, it will be remembered, was:

> In view especially of the historic relations between the two countries from the very beginning up to the present moment, we consider that conscription forced in this way upon Ireland is an oppressive and inhuman law which the Irish people have the right to resist by all the means that are consonant with the law of God.

"So far as the Bishops of Ireland are concerned," said Cardinal Logue, "there is not a word of truth in the statement reported in the speech of Lord Curzon. What the Bishops said was published, and certainly that gave no foundation for Lord Curzon's outrageous statement." In this connection it is interesting to recall Lord Wimborne's speech delivered during the debate in the House of Lords. Among other things he charged the War Cabinet with having removed from the Irish Government all or nearly all who were in sympathy with Irish nationality, or who professed the Catholic Faith. The War Cabinet included Ireland within the scope of the Man-Power Act against the advice of their own responsible representatives in the Irish Government. The ex-Lord Lieutenant who was in office for some weeks subsequent to the arrest of "the man in the boat" scouted the idea of a German plot. So far, he said, as he or any other member of the Irish executive was concerned, they were not aware of the existence of that plot "until it was discovered by the British Government." Speaking in the House of Commons, Lloyd George sought to make the Bishops responsible for the Government's new attitude on the Home Rule question. The attitude of the "Church in Ireland" he thought "one of the most fatal mistakes ever committed." Concerning this Mr. Asquith said: "The Catholic Church had been spoken of by the Prime Minister as if it had introduced an element of contention into the atmosphere which made Home Rule impossible for the time being. He read the facts in an entirely different way. What introduced that element was conscription." All the Roman papers quoted Lloyd George's speech on Ireland and the Osservatore Romano in a foot-note added: "It is evident that the words of the English Prime Minister on the 'attitude of the Church' refer exclusively to the attitude of the Irish clergy."

Mexico.—The details of the recent arrest and exile of Archbishop Orozco of Guadalajara by the Carranzista authorities are given in the Southern Messenger of San Antonio. The arrest took place on the charge that the prelate, who is greatly beloved by the people, had written several manifestoes subversive of public order and safety, that he had repeatedly disregarded the new Constitution of Queretaro, and that he was inciting Mexicans to rise in arms against their constituted Government. The accusations were without a grain of justification. In his pastorals, to which reference is here made, Archbishop Orozco confined himself to a dignified protest against the outrages committed against freedom of conscience and the inalienable rights of the Church. A refugee Bishop, now at San Antonio, says of him:

Arrest and Exile of Archbishop Orozco

> He merely repudiated the gross accusations brought against both the Church and himself. The famous and much-abused pastoral is, after all, but a simple protest, like many others of the kind. For instance, we learn of the late protests of the oil interests in Mexico, the protests of the working classes at Monterey, and others. Yet no one ever dreamed of apprehending these protestants as seditious. Such protests merely express the indignation felt on account of some violation of social or individual rights; but by no means do they imply any seditious campaign against the constituted authority.

Vast crowds of men and women surrounded the jail where the Archbishop was first confined at Lagos. When he was taken thence to Guadalajara the populace accorded him a triumphal entry into their city. Yet it was well understood that the Carranzistas might perpetrate any outrage against their innocent victim. An appeal was promptly made to the Apostolic Delegate, at Washington, and to Mgr. Kelley of the Extension Society, and representations, it is stated, were immediately forwarded to our Government. According to the latest reports Archbishop Orozco was ordered to be banished, in spite of the countless petitions that poured into the State Department of Mexico from all parts of that misgoverned Republic. Carranza himself remained inexorable in the perpetration of this latest outrage. It has been further officially announced that property of the Church and clergy in the State of Jalisco has been sold by the Government for the consideration of $4,000,000. The robbery includes the sacred vessels, utensils and chattels of the Church, together with its real estate.

Russia.—Mr. Gregory M. Ignatieff, a member of the Russian Supply Committee of this country, recently returned from Moscow, and says that Lenine and Trotzky are clearly maintaining themselves only by doing the bidding of the German Government. "Outside of Petrograd and Moscow," he reports, "the Bolshevist Government does not exist." Continuing, he states:

Chaos and Starvation

> The result, of course, is chaos. While some centers have too much bread, other centers are absolutely starving. The establishment of a bread monopoly by the Soviet authorities confines the distribution of bread to the Government supply institutions, which often as not are absolutely inaccessible to the population and compel many persons to go into the richer provinces for flour.
> Privations in foodstuffs are increased by the utter demoralization of the railroads. Most of the roads are now in charge of groups of conductors, machinists and laborers who operate them pretty much as they please. They publish a schedule, but make no pretense of conforming with it.

A correspondent of the Associated Press, writing from Petrograd in the middle of June, reports that the city is in "despair and near starvation." Asiatic cholera is raging there, too.

The Financial Status of Christian Science

FRANCES BEATTIE

WHEN Mrs. Mary Baker Eddy "discovered" Christian Science, she also discovered a unique business system to work along with her religion, a system which leaves not a loophole of escape for the elusive, though none the less alluring dollar. So carefully did she plan for the safeguarding of this dollar, that none has ever been known to have escaped the vigilance of the "Mother Church." If we marvel at the acute business acumen expressed so admirably in this very practical side of Christian Science, it is merely because we do not know that the system, like the religion, is of "Divine" origin, and therefore, not to be compared with the work of mortal man.

Mrs. Eddy has herself made this plain. The "Manual of the Mother Church," the foundation stone of "Science," now in its eighty-ninth edition, has provided, from the financial viewpoint, for every possible emergency of the future. This "Manual" contains the by-laws of the Church, its rules of discipline, and outlines the prerogatives of the "Mother Church" and its subsidiary, "the Christian Science Publishing Society." That all this was Divinely ordained, there cannot be the shadow of a doubt, for, upon opening the "Manual" we read an "Extract from a Letter in 'Miscellaneous Writings,' by Mary Baker Eddy," which tells us that "The Rules and By-Laws in the Manual of the First Church of Christ, Scientist, Boston, originated not in solemn conclave as in ancient Sanhedrim. They were not arbitrary opinions nor dictatorial demands, such as one person might impose on another." Not at all! "They were impelled by a power not one's own, were written at different dates, and as the occasion required. . . . hence their simple, scientific basis, and detail so requisite to demonstrate genuine Christian Science, and which will do for the race what absolute doctrines destined for future generations might not accomplish."

These "Rules and By-Laws" that were "impelled by a power not one's own," took particular care of the rights of Mrs. Eddy and carved the halo which all good Scientists hold over her meek and lowly head. For instance, Article I, Section 3, page 26 of the "Manual" decrees that, before the Christian Science Board of Directors could elect a clerk, a treasurer, an editor or manager of the Publishing Society, they must have the "consent of the Pastor Emeritus, given in her own handwriting." Section 4 orders the Board of Directors, before electing "Readers" for the Mother Church, to "inform the Pastor Emeritus of the names of its candidates," and, "if she objects, said candidates shall not be chosen." Section 5 declares that a vacancy in the Board of Directors shall be filled only "after the candidate is approved by the Pastor Emeritus," and "the request of Mrs. Eddy shall dismiss a member." The "Duties of Church Officers" are outlined in Article I, Section 9, pages 28-29, and it is ordained that should they fail to fulfil the requirements, a member of the church "or the Pastor Emeritus" shall complain thereof to the Clerk and the complaint be found valid, the Board of Directors shall resign, or failing to do this, "the Pastor Emeritus shall appoint five suitable members of this church to fill the vacancy." The concluding paragraph of Article I, page 30, gives the Boston house of the "Pastor Emeritus" to the "First Reader," during his term, "unless Mrs. Eddy requests otherwise," and directs the Board of Directors to pay from the church funds the taxes and rent on the property; to furnish it suitably, attend to the insurance and keep the property in good repair, "so long as Mrs. Eddy does not occupy the house herself and the occupants are satisfactory to her."

Article III, Section I, page 31, defines the "Moral Obligation" of the "Readers," and orders that they "devote a suitable portion of their time to preparation for the reading of the Sunday lesson" a lesson on which the prosperity of Christian Science depends. They must keep themselves unspotted from the world, uncontaminated with evil; that the mental atmosphere they exhale "shall promote health and holiness." Section 4, page 32, orders that the "Readers" confine themselves exclusively to the printed "Science and Health with Key to the Scriptures," and not read "from copies or manuscripts but from the books." Section 5 orders that the Reader before commencing to read from "Science and Health, etc." should "distinctly announce the full title of the book and give the author's name." Evidently that inspired friend of Mrs. Eddy's believed in monopoly and in advertising! Article IV, page 34, discussing "Qualifications for Membership," declares that "the Bible, together with Science and Health and other works by Mrs. Eddy, shall be his [the member's] only text-books for self-instruction in Christian Science, and for teaching and practising metaphysical healing."

These instances are cited to show the reasons for the extraordinary prosperity of the "Christian Science Publishing Society," the chief or at least a powerful financial asset of Christian Science. Article XIV, Section I, page 58, reads: "I, Mary Baker Eddy, ordain the Bible, and Science and Health with Key to the Scriptures, Pastor over the Mother Church. . . . and they will continue to preach for this church and the world." Article XV consists simply of one section, explaining the duty of giving the author's name, when quoting from "Science and Health." "It is the duty of every member of this church, when publicly reading or quoting from the books or poems of our Pastor Emeritus, first, to announce the name of the author," and members are also ordered to "instruct their pupils to adopt the aforenamed method for the benefit of our cause."

Here is where the financial genius of the inspired writer makes itself manifest. Article XXV, Section 8, page 81, says: "Only the Publishing Society of the Mother Church selects, approves and publishes the books and literature it sends forth." This rule, being of Divine origin, shall last, of course, as long as Christian Science. Forty-two or three different pamphlets are printed in the English language by the Publishing Society, and others are printed in ten or eleven different languages, including German. There are several editions of "Science and Health with Key to the Scriptures," about twenty-five stock books and "Messages," pictures of the church and the Publishing Society plant; photogravures of Mrs. Eddy, and kindred prints, and not by any means least, the Christian Science Monitor, daily; the Christian Science Sentinel, published weekly; the Christian Science Journal, a monthly publication, and the Christian Science Quarterly, without which no true Scientist could well exist. This last publication contains the "Lesson-Sermons" which are read at the Sunday services in Scientist churches, and on which Article III, Section 1, page 31, quoted above, says: "The prosperity of Christian Science depends." Then there are German and French periodicals, printed monthly. What a kindly interest had that "Divine voice" for the Christian Science Publishing Society, careful even to ordain that "Readers" must read only from the printed "Science and Health, etc.," and not from a manuscript! But the Divine voice went still a step further:

> Article XXI, Section 1, pages 63 and 64: "Each church of the Christian Science denomination shall have a Reading Room, though two or more churches may unite in having Reading Rooms, provided these rooms are well located." Section 2: "The individuals who take charge of the Reading Rooms of the Mother Church shall be elected by the Christian Science Board of Directors, subject to the approval of Mary Baker Eddy. He or she shall have no bad habits, shall have had experience in the Field, shall be well educated, and a devout Christian Scientist." Section 3: "The literature sold or exhibited in the reading rooms of Christian Science Churches shall consist only of Science and Health with Key to the Scriptures, by Mary Baker Eddy, and other writings by this author; also the literature published or sold by the Christian Science Publishing Society."

"Science and Health with Key to the Scriptures" every Scientist must have, of course. It is the only text-book of Christian Science and is published and sold by the Christian Science Publishing Society in a half-dozen different editions or bindings, at prices ranging from $3.00 to $7.50 a volume. The "Key to the Scriptures," however, is worthless to the Scientist, without the Christian Science Quarterly. This contains the Lesson-Sermons for the quarter. It costs the Scientist one dollar a year—payable strictly in advance. The thing is like shifting sand, changes with the quarter, and to be of any avail, must be the current edition.

The "Church Manual," "impelled by a power not one's own," is published and sold by the Publishing Society for $1.00 and $2.00 a copy, according to the binding. The inside-cover page of the June (1918) Christian Science Journal says it is a > handbook for the information and guidance of every member of the Mother Church. It contains the organic law of the Church of Christ, Scientist. It also contains the Tenets of the Mother Church, an explanation of the origin of the Church By-Laws, . . . and an appendix containing essential information for every active Christian Scientist. . . . Every Christian Scientist who sees that the extension of the religion of Christian Science is the most vital necessity in the world today, requires an intimate familiarity with the Church manual. . . . The natural inclination and desire of a Christian Scientist is to own, study, and understand [these italics are the Journal's] this revealed law of the Church of Christ, Scientist, and to gain a realization of the vital necessity for its rules and admonitions.

> "Of this I am sure, that each Rule and By-Law in this Manual will increase the spirituality of him who obeys it, invigorate his capacity to heal the sick, to comfort such as mourn, and to awaken the sinner."—Mary Baker Eddy in "The First Church of Christ, Scientist, and Miscellany," page 230.
> The Manual may be read, borrowed or purchased at any Christian Science Reading Room in the world.

Any Scientist, after reading the above extract from the full-page advertisement, would be a queer specimen of the faith within him if he would not purchase a copy of the "Church Manual." Here, then, are three products of the Christian Science Publishing Society which every well-regulated Scientist must keep on hand. Think not, however, that the "Church Manual" is the only publication of the Scientists that calls down the commendation of the Most High. The inside of the last cover-page of the June edition of the Christian Science Journal says of the Christian Science Sentinel, "Although divinely ordained and established as the result of spiritual inspiration, the Christian Science Sentinel remains a true Sentinel to each subscriber, reader and editor only as its inspired designation is individually understood, and its alertness and fidelity thereby perpetually maintained. . . . Are we doing all we can to put out more Sentinels, 'to hold guard over Truth, Life, and Love?'"

Let us turn to the "Church Manual"—that inspired volume—for additional light. We find it in Article VIII, Section 14, page 44: "It shall be the privilege and duty of every member, who can afford it, to subscribe for the periodicals which are the organs of this church." That, of course, settles the question, as poverty is an unknown quantity in correct Science circles. The Christian Science Monitor, the daily manna of the Scientist, came into being too late to secure an endorsement from the inspired voice, but where is the Scientist who could exist without it? Another article will throw more light on the financial side of Christian Science and reflect the halo carved out for Mrs. Eddy in the "Church Manual," not as "dictatorial demands," but "impelled by a power not one's own."

What the Catholic Press Most Needs

M. O'BRIEN

FOUR years of intensive work by the Catholic Press Club have resulted in forcing upon the members the recognition of certain facts and the conviction of certain needs. To summarize these facts and to outline these needs is the purpose of this article. Two facts stand out: There is an excellent existing Catholic press in this country; this Catholic press is not known and supported as it deserves.

The extensiveness and diversity of the Catholic periodicals published in the United States are illustrated by the fact that there are over two hundred periodicals printed in English and many printed in foreign languages. In character these publications vary greatly. There are local papers, usually combining local news, world news and literary features. There are weeklies and monthlies more or less general in character, touching upon vital problems of the day. There are many publications more restricted in scope: some are devoted to promoting missionary endeavor, some to promoting personal devotion, some to a special field of Catholic work such as education and charities. Various societies have their official publications, and many of our colleges issue periodicals. The wide extent of our general literature is nowhere more strongly brought out than in the lists of Catholic books in the public libraries in some of our large cities. The number of recognized authorities, the bulk of the material and the wide variety of subject-matter represented in these lists, make a first perusal a stimulating surprise to one unacquainted with Catholic literature. It would be possible to name representative Catholic writers in every division of literature who rank with the highest.

The attitude of the Catholic public toward this extensive and excellent literature is the next important consideration. While both friends and critics agree that there has been a prevailing attitude of indifference, in recent years there has been a steady growth of interest. One of the many and one of the surest indications of this interest is the spirit of inquiry which has found expression in the many articles and communications relative to the Catholic press that have appeared more and more frequently in our periodicals within the last two or three years, notably in AMERICA. Growing interest has also been evidenced in the efforts made by dioceses, parishes, schools and societies to promote the interests of the Catholic press. Splendid and effective as many of these efforts have been, how much more effective this work would be, if carefully organized and co-ordinated!

From this brief summary of the situation two needs stand out as imperative: The Catholic public must be made better acquainted with Catholic literature; the Catholic press must be given the moral and financial support of the Catholic people. The problem is national in scope and vital in importance.

As AMERICA has said:

> Somewhere there rests the great responsibility of arousing the people to the necessity of a strong Catholic press which knows no fear except of God alone. In this there is safety for the present and hope for the future.

In meeting a need so vital and so comprehensive, heed should be given to two great lessons learned from the development of modern efficiency and particularly from the problems presented by present war conditions—the necessity of centralized effort and the advisability of strengthening a central organization rather than multiplying organizations. There is at present only one central organization which aims to unite and further the interests of the Catholic press, the "Catholic Press Association." According to the constitution:

> The purpose of the Association is to unite all the Catholic publications and publishers of the United States and Canada in closer fellowship. . . . Any Catholic publication or Catholic publishing house shall be eligible for membership. . . . For the further and detailed work of the Association three bureaus shall be elected by ballot by the Association in convention assembled. These bureaus shall consist each of three members. They shall be called the news bureau, the advertising bureau, the literature bureau. The news bureau shall promote the efficiency of the news service furnished by the association; The advertising bureau shall endeavor to secure more advertising for the members of the association; The literature bureau shall aim to keep the Catholic press in touch with lively matters of particular interest to Catholics, encourage Catholic writers and promote a wider knowledge of Catholic books.

This program, if carried out, would solve the problem. The Catholic Press Association has already done much in establishing these bureaus and particularly in developing the news and cable service. Honor and appreciation are due to the men whose foresight brought the organization into being and to the officers who have assumed the burden of carrying out a comprehensive program. One thing alone stands in the way of a splendid achievement of the entire scheme—lack of funds to carry out the plans which have been formulated.

Given this central organization with a definite program adequate to the need, the solution of the problem becomes simple and obvious. It is solely a matter of assuring the organization ample support. This support must come from the Catholic public. "The Apostolate of the press depends not on the Catholic press alone, but on the reasonable cooperation of the Catholic public." Reasonable cooperation is, then, what the Catholic press most needs. The most direct and most necessary form of cooperation is financial support. Without it no work can be successfully carried on. Without financial support the Government could not carry on the war. Without financial support the work of the Red Cross, of the Knights of Columbus, of the Chaplains' Aid Association would not live a day. Without financial support our schools and churches would not live. Financial support is equally essential to the promotion of the cause of the Catholic press. To secure this the public must be reached.

With a membership of publications and publishing houses only, the Catholic Press Association has naturally not reached the public in a direct or popular manner. A publicity campaign is perhaps the first essential in enlisting popular support. A nation-wide appeal for funds would probably be the most effective form of campaign. Every well-managed campaign for funds has an educational value. It spreads among the many knowledge and information hitherto the possession of the few. Its appeal is direct and tangible. It is easier to solicit a dollar toward a fund than to solicit interest in vague generalities. It is also more effective. Once interest has been aroused by the concrete act of giving, it is likely to grow into further support. A well-organized campaign for funds would therefore secure for the Association not only the funds essential for its work, but through this it would secure the interest and moral support of the Catholic public. The cause of the Catholic press, sanctioned and urged by three successive Popes, is assured ecclesiastical support. There remains only the question of securing approval and cooperation in a particular work for the promotion of the cause.

No cause could more easily secure widespread and effective publicity. The organs of publicity and the cause are one and the same. Our papers can plead their own cause without fear or scruple. None of them are purely commercial enterprises. They are maintained solely to promote the interests of the Faith. There could be no question that the Catholic papers of the country would gladly give space to standardized publicity matter. They would gladly cooperate in featuring news items pertaining to Catholic authors and their work. Articles on the history of the Catholic press in our country, or in certain sections, would be welcomed. Every paper would be proud to publish in its own columns a history of its own work. The material is abundant. The writers are available. All that is needed is the stimulus of concerted action. A campaign in behalf of the Catholic press could rely upon the cooperation of the most perfect organization in the world. Directors of the great national drives for war-work funds have expressed the opinion that the organization of the Catholic Church is the most effective existing system for organized effort.

Immeasurable benefits would result from the endowment of the Catholic Press Association, which has already begun carrying out well-defined and comprehensive plans. A drive for funds would in itself make American Catholics better acquainted with Catholic newspapers and magazines and with Catholic books and authors. The funds secured would make possible the fuller development of the news bureau, the advertising bureau and the literature bureau.

With an ample income assured, these three bureaus could carry out all the plans that have been suggested for the betterment of the Catholic press. Among these might be a survey of present conditions as a logical basis for more intensive development and organization; the development of a wider cable and news service, which might be extended, on occasion, to the secular press also; the organization of a Catholic writers' syndicate; the encouragement of young writers by means of contests; the compilation of lists and bulletins giving definite data regarding Catholic books and periodicals; efforts to secure the recognition of more Catholic periodicals by "The Reader's Guide"; and the compilation of an index to Catholic periodicals corresponding to "The Reader's Guide" to general periodicals. Organized effort along these lines cannot but strengthen the Catholic press throughout the country. A stronger press cannot but strengthen the cause of Christianity.

The time is opportune for launching a campaign in the interests of the Catholic press of our country. Conditions at home and abroad favor such an undertaking. Catholic thought has been directed strongly toward the Catholic press during recent years. Everywhere one finds a desire to do something. The spirit of giving is in the air. World conditions offer unequaled opportunities for spreading Catholic truth. The seriousness of the problems presented during and those which will press for solution after the war makes it imperative that the Catholic public be intelligently informed. Our press must be strong to meet the opportunities and requirements of these momentous days. The Catholic people will not fail the press at such a time. Once a definite program is outlined and a concrete appeal is made, American Catholics will support the Catholic press as loyally and as generously as they have supported their churches and their schools.

The French Soldier After Four Years of War

BARBARA DE COURSON

THOSE who since the fateful second of August, 1914, have kept in touch with the French soldier, either on the line of fire, at home or in our hospitals, will not fail to notice how different is the fighting man of 1918 to the blue soldier of four years ago. He is mentally and morally different; more pathetically interesting, although more reticent; more deeply courageous, because in the making of his courage, resignation and devotion to duty have more part than enthusiasm.

The soldier of 1914 went into battle with a certain amount of enthusiasm and, it may be added, with many delusions, which we all shared, as to the real strength and spirit of the foe against whom he was called upon to fight. Once more, we may recognize that Providence is kind in keeping the future hidden from us; it is comparatively easy to live by slices, day by day, hour by hour, but more difficult, almost impossible to face long spaces of anxiety, loss and pain. The wounded soldiers who, in 1914 and 1915, filled our hospitals, had passed through many stern experiences. The retreat before the battle of the Marne, from Charleroi to Paris, was no child's play, but the men were comparatively fresh and their spirit was thus described to me by a young soldier, in time of peace a vine-grower from the Gironde. After telling me that, suffering from hunger, thirst and want of sleep, he and his comrades were staggering along the crowded roads, with the Germans in close pursuit, when an order came to turn back and face the foe, "We forgot everything," he added, "and we ran forward as if we were going to a feast." The military instinct of the race sprang into flame at the mere thought of going forward, and these tired, hungry, sleepy men proved the conquerors of the battle of the Marne.

The men who filled our hospitals in 1914 and 1915 were generally loquacious and, when they had recovered from the fatigue of the journey, enjoyed relating their adventures. In the mouth of a Southerner or even of a Parisian, the narrative lost nothing in the telling; all was new in their experiences and although certain features of the war, for example the losses in their own regiment, affected them almost to tears, they were too much absorbed by the strangeness of the tragedy, by its extraordinary magnitude and many-sided experiences, to linger long even on these losses.

The soldier of 1918 is more reticent, graver and his courage is made of a different metal. The war, in its progress, has developed, on the part of the enemy, features of ferocity that were, at first, less noticeable; the wider use that is now made of noxious gases, for instance, visibly impresses the wounded soldier and he talks of this with unfeigned horror. In reality, however, he talks less than the fighting man of two years ago, when, after a journey that is more easy and comfortable than the journeys of 1914, he arrives at a hospital, where he finds a friendly atmosphere and enlightened care, he is in no hurry to speak. Even when at his ease with his new surroundings he begins to smile, he is curiously reticent as to his experiences and bears only a distant resemblance to certain young soldiers, who, in 1915, called out from their stretchers to the Sisters who were waiting for them: "We have done good work."

This reticence comes from several causes: the novelty of the war has worn off and now many soldiers have been wounded four or five times; its methods are more cruel and leave a greater impression of horror. Also certain side-consequences of the ordeal affect the spirits of our men. The home of the peasant soldier is still the one place on earth for him but his thoughts are tinged with anxiety when he hears how the women and children's increasing weariness handicaps their efforts to keep things together. The vision of neglected fields and perishing vineyards haunts his dreams with an acuteness that only those can realize who know the passionate love of the peasant of France for his bit of ground. Then the uncertainty of when the war will end, the feeling that until he is killed or maimed for life he must go back to the line of fire and take up a task, of which he knows the difficulty and the peril, makes him thoughtful and silent. Added to these reasons, that explain our soldiers' present attitude, is, in some cases, the anxiety that those from the invaded provinces feel for their families in homes that are held by the Germans.

Yet, it must not be supposed that our soldiers are discouraged, afraid or rebellious; indeed it is the very fact of their courage being so finely touched with a clear sense of the magnitude of their duty, that makes their mental attitude infinitely pathetic and wholly admirable. They are more fully informed as to their task being a tremendous one than were the soldiers of 1914 and they go forward to meet it with a quiet heroism, the outcome of their conviction, fortified by four years of war, that German tyranny must be crushed for the peace and liberty of the world depend on this. They are too firmly convinced of the gravity of the work that lies before them to be as light-hearted as their predecessors. Yet it often happens that the innate cheerfulness of the race breaks out, together with sparks of quaint humor, the privilege of the Parisians. If their thoughts of home are sometimes anxious ones, on the other hand they realize more keenly than the soldiers of four years ago that they are defending their village, their cottages, their wives and children. The stories they hear from the lips of our returned prisoners, civilians and soldiers, make them understand that the war is their own, for if France ceased to fight, the fate of the people who are now living under German yokes would be common to all France.

Another impressive feature in our soldiers' mental attitude is their love for and trust in their chiefs. The soldier whose voice does not tremble when he relates his own tragic adventures often breaks down when he alludes to a dead leader. Our men in 1918 expect much from their leaders. This is a well-known fact that is easily explained by the length and severity of the ordeal, but if they expect much they give unstintingly. We know of men belonging to a "territorial" regiment, middle-aged peasants from the south, who fight with more resignation than enthusiasm, but who voluntarily returned under fire to rescue the body of their dead captain. Their resolve to remove the leader they loved to a safe place of burial made them disobey the general in command, who considered the task too perilous. Being a wide-minded man, he shut his eyes to the men's generous imprudence, rightly deeming it wiser to let their loyalty to the chief they worshiped manifest itself. Only the other day, a brilliant general, one of the youngest in the French army, was killed on the Aisne. His influence over his men was extraordinary, but, like our best officers, he recognized that the soldiers of 1918 need their leader's presence more than the fighters of 1914. If the chief has their confidence, he can do anything and lead them anywhere. "We would have gone anywhere with him," sobbed one of his soldiers, "he was like our father." This noble and gallant chief, a few days only before his death, explained to a friend what to outsiders might seem his imprudence. "If I go to the trenches and to the posts of the advanced lines, the men say directly. 'The General comes here, so we can remain, it is all right; surely where he goes, we may stay.'"

The mere sight of his tall figure and the sound of his cheery voice was enough to make his soldiers steady and confident; he considered it therefore his duty to go where the danger was greatest in order to keep up the spirits of the men.

Writing these lines on the morrow of the great German push, we feel that our blue soldiers, mentally so different to the fighters of four years ago, are, if anything, more admirable. Their patience, endurance and resignation, their steady devotion to their duty and their childlike confidence in the chief who wins their respect bring out the best qualities of the race. The enthusiastic fighter of 1914 resembled the typical Frenchman, impulsive and demonstrative; but the patient soldier of 1918 reveals to us solid qualities in which the Latins were supposed to be deficient. Let us add that the courage of many of our men is inspired by religious faith, either inborn or regained; like all great upheavals, the war brings out the extremes of good and evil. It has, no doubt, let loose the evil passions of some, but, on the other hand, it has made heroes of men whose spiritual development is the result of suffering, men who, whether they fall in battle or survive the war, will help, either here below or from the world above, to build up a new and better France.

Partial Christianity

J. D. TIBBITS

THAT something is wrong with modern Protestantism, is a fact too obvious to require proof. The precise nature of the trouble, however, is a matter of opinion with some and a matter of theory with others; but widely as both opinions and theories differ, they appear to be, upon one point, absolutely agreed. It is, indeed, an indisputable truth that the Protestantism of our day has lost all hold upon what is popularly termed the "masses," while it is no less true that the vast majority of those who could scarcely be so classified, are distinguished for their general attitude of indifference to all religion.

Now this condition seems not a little singular when we consider the trend of recent Protestant thought. For if there has been one idea uppermost in the minds of their theologians of the last half-century, that idea has been to reconcile theology with what they are pleased to term the "age." This has manifested itself in the vast literature dealing with the relations of science and religion to which the Victorian era gave birth; practically all of which is now worthless, and most of which was worthless at the time it was written; and it has manifested itself in our own day by the equally vast though far more superficial literature of the "new theology." Between these two, however, there is a difference as important as it is interesting. The up-to-date theologian of a generation or more ago strove to reconcile dogma with certain theories then fashionable. The new theologian of today has adopted a scheme at once far cleverer and far more elastic. He proposes not, indeed, to reconcile, but to remove the very necessity for reconciliation; and that by the simple and highly efficient process of subtracting from Christianity every trace of dogma. Thus all possibility of conflict is at an end. Thus the Church is placed in a perpetually friendly relation with each and every day. Thus all grounds of opposition, whether they be social or philosophical or scientific, vanish forthwith. The positive side of this new conception is expressed in several axioms, which are within the comprehension of anyone however mythological, and which are apparently considered as being self-evident. One of these is the quite gratuitous statement that the message of Christ was, "not a religion but a life." Another is more concisely expressed in the formula, "Deeds not creeds."

I propose to offer a brief analysis of this theory, but before doing so it is necessary to understand just what it implies, and just what are its motives. According to the traditional view, Christianity has ever been considered in the double aspect of a teaching and of a life; and the belief has been equally insistent that between these two aspects there was a logical and necessary relation. The man, therefore, who mentally assented to the teaching, yet failed to practise the life, was merely a partial Christian; while the man who practised the life in its highest sense, found in the teaching a motive, invariably adequate.

Now the new theology would utterly dissociate these two elements. Those indeed, who might be so inclined, could speculate upon the truths of religion without let or hindrance; but their speculations would be productive of no positive result for the simple reason that there would be no standard by which they could be measured or no court to which they might appeal. It would be but guessing at an insoluble riddle; but while the new theologians admit that it is insoluble they are no less firm in their assurance that it is unimportant. Their idea, in short, appears to be that any insistence upon dogma is a distinct detraction from ethics, and that we only require to destroy the one in order to bestow an indefinitely more abundant life upon the other.

We are, then, face to face with an interesting proposition. That part of religion which is chiefly mental is to be removed; while that part which is chiefly ethical is to remain. Just how this result is to be worked out is by no means clear, and the more the notion is analyzed the more obscure does it become. The new theologians are surely not ignorant of the fact that a motive must necessarily precede and induce an act; nor can they logically deny that this motive should be adequate to the act it induces. The adequacy, moreover, of the motives offered by traditional Christianity is attested by the entire calendar of saints; for their sanctity rested invariably upon a background of dogma. All this, however, is to be now removed. It is essential, therefore, for the new theology to draft upon some other source. And as every source having its roots in the supernatural has vanished with the discarded dogma, it requires only a simple process of elimination, in order to see clearly that those which remain to us must be sought in the domain of the purely natural.

Now it is not a specially difficult matter to catalogue what may be called the motives of nature. Complicated as they oftentimes appear, they may, nevertheless, be roughly classed under two heads. Of these, the first is most readily designated by the term "utility." That motives, proceeding from this source, may induce to a well-ordered life, is, to say the least, conceivable; but it is scarcely less apparent that they can never logically induce to sanctity of a very high degree. In no case can they be seriously considered as religious; and it is only justice to the new theologians to state that they are never invoked by them as such.

But there is another class of motives, which, although possessing a far greater diversity, may yet, not unfairly, be described by a single word. The word which perhaps best describes them is, "complacency." This may assume many forms and masquerade under many guises. At one time it is found in the approving voice of conscience. At another in those peculiar feelings of assurance which Protestants experience when they, "profess religion." It is as conspicuous in the revivals of Mr. Sunday as it was in those of Mr. Wesley; nor is it by any means absent from the professional philanthropist or social worker.

Now it is quite undeniable that what is really nothing more nor less than a pleasurable feeling, may be and often has been, a strong motive to high and upright living. The weak part of it all, viewed as a system of ethics, lies in two facts. The first of these is the constant temptation to measure the moral value of an act by the complacency which it evokes; and the second is the utter divorce of the whole scheme from all foundation in reason. And it is precisely these two facts which render the whole fabric of the new theology intellectually absurd. They hold up to me the life of Christ as a model eminently worthy to be followed; but they beg me not to dogmatize about His Divinity or His Sacraments or His Church. They admit that His injunction to love our enemies and His example of personal humility are immeasurably higher than any ethical conception uttered before or since; but they are particular to exclude from me every rational motive for its imitation. They never tire of impressing upon me that experience and not logic is the proof of Christianity; but what they seem unable to impress upon themselves is the very elementary fact that this "experience" is in reality nothing other than complacency itself, and they forget that this complacency can be no more evidential of the religion which they profess than of the sanctity of which they are assured.

That any of the pleasurable feelings which are so intimately associated with the faith should be looked upon as objects of suspicion, I would be the first to deny. They are great gifts, and to be used as such; but they are gifts not invariably given even to those upon a high plane of sanctity. In the annals of piety, desolation and consolation not infrequently alternate. It is reason which keeps the poise; which notes the advance or decline; and which bids us in the words of Cardinal Newman, "In our height of hope ever to be sober, and in our depth of desolation, never to despair." To employ, therefore, such feelings, either as sanctions for acts, or as measures for virtue or as proofs for religion, and this under the pretence of conforming to the spirit of the age and purifying the Gospel of Christ, is simply to affront the intelligence of thinking men. It places Christianity upon an intellectual plane far lower than cultured paganism, for cultured paganism had at least reason in its ideals, and cultured pagans occasionally made rational efforts to follow them. The new theology makes sentiments alike the motive, the means, and the end. To it it sacrifices every faculty, and all this in the wholly imaginary interests of spiritual and ethical progress, whose very existence is as chimerical as the foundation upon which it is supposed to rest.

We are accustomed to consider a man who mentally assents to the truths of religion, yet fails to live up to them, as a very imperfect Christian. The Christianity, however, of the new theologians, though in a converse sense, is every bit as imperfect. On the one side there are motives without corresponding ethics; on the other, ethics without corresponding motives. And from a purely intellectual point of view there is no choice between them.

A Moylan Outside the Fold

To the Editor of AMERICA:

A news item printed in most of the dailies says:

> QUINCY, MASS., July 21.—The destroyer Lansdale, named in memory of Lieutenant Philip Van Horn Lansdale, U. S. N., was launched at the Fore River plant of the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation today. Lieutenant Lansdale, a gun officer, was killed when suppressing an insurrection in Samoa in 1899. The new destroyer was christened by his widow, who came from San Francisco for the purpose. She was accompanied by Lieutenant Lansdale's sisters, the Misses Maria and Eliza Lansdale.

I wonder how many Catholics who read this statement knew that Lieutenant Lansdale was the great-grandson of General Stephen Moylan of Revolutionary fame, and that he was not of the Faith of his grandsire—the usual result of the "mixed" matrimonial alliances of the early "prominents"? There were four Moylans in the Continental service: General Stephen Moylan, the Muster-Master General, and his brothers, John, the Clothier-General of Washington's army, and James, the Commercial Agent of the United States at l'Orient, who fitted out there the ships of Barry, Paul Jones and Landais, as well as other cruisers and supply vessels, and Jasper, a half-brother, who was an officer in the Pennsylvania militia. It will, no doubt, be a positive shock to the active Prohibitionists of today to find that, on March 22, 1781, General Moylan wrote President Washington from Lancaster, Penn.:

> My brother James has sent you a case of claret. He prays your Excellency would pardon the liberty and accept it as a small mark of the veneration he had for your exalted character. These are his own words which I know correspond to his sentiments.

James Moylan, in 1777, negotiated a tobacco treaty with the French Government that was specially detrimental to British commercial interests. Another of General Moylan's brothers was the famous Bishop of Cork, and two of his sisters were Ursuline nuns in the convent that sent out the first religious community to be located in New York. An uncle was the Rev. Patrick Doran, S.J., who died in Cork in 1771. What a pity the American descendants of the Moylans lost the Faith!

The Catholic Boys' Brigade

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In an article entitled "Boy Scouting for Catholic Youth" in your issue of June 8, Mr. John F. Fogarty did not note the existence of a distinctly Catholic military organization for the boys in the Archdiocese of New York. This organization was not only approved by his Eminence the Cardinal, but in his letter of February 7, 1917, it is specifically recommended to the pastors of the various churches in New York City. This organization, affiliated to the Catholic Protective Association, under the Spiritual Directorship of the Rev. Thomas J. Lynch, 366 Broadway, completely covers the requirements of Mr. Hubert Hart in his communication in AMERICA for June 29.

The Catholic Boys' Brigade is equipped with a tasteful, attractive military uniform. Branches have been formed in many parishes. It has a specific Catholic name and specific Catholic aim. The only essential it lacks is the backing of influential Catholics. This C. B. B. was organized by a modest young man who had practical experience with boy-scout work in Dublin, where it developed into an active membership of over 6,000 boys. Here in New York he associated to himself a score of other young men who, although working during the day for their livelihood, founded and formed in the evenings within eighteen months eighteen branches, with a total membership of over 2,000 boys. A few of these branches have temporarily suspended, not because the organization was not adapted to boys, but solely on account of war conditions, such as the difficulty of drafting officers and drillmasters, of obtaining uniforms and equipment at prices within the means of the units, and especially because of lack of support and interest from Catholics who in normal times would have cheerfully helped and protected this organization.

A score of branches are still in a flourishing condition and accomplish much good spiritually and physically. They foster frequent Holy Communion, draw boys to Catholic schools and instruction, give them an opportunity for outdoor recreation with a patriotic aim, and what is equally important, preserve the boys' Catholic spirit and attract them to the Church of their Baptism. The boy-scout movement is not elastic or comprehensive enough to bring forth these points. Even if Catholic troops or units were organized in the scouts, they might do some good for some boys, but thereby the scout organization would be advertised and sustained, and thereby Catholic boys would join units not safeguarded with essential Catholic supervision. True, some Bishops have permitted the formation of Catholic troops, but they have laid down certain conditions. It is fair to assume that the Hierarchy would be more satisfied if the pastors would support an ecclesiastically endorsed organization such as the Catholic Boys' Brigade. New York has such an equipment, also several of the larger western cities, in one of which it is known as the Columbus Cadets. If all these different parochial and diocesan organizations were to unite, they would gradually develop into a national organization. It is the consensus of opinion of priests who have had considerable experience with boys that it is far better to be satisfied with the sodality or Junior Holy Name Society than to permit the boys to join an organization which is not entirely Catholic either in spirit or in practice.

New York. WILLIAM C. POMMERER.

The Boy Scout Movement

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I wish to thank Father M. J. Steffy for his kindness in endeavoring to clear up my difficulties regarding Catholic Boy Scouts. I assure Father Steffy that my criticisms of the Catholic scout movement do not apply to his troop. As I understand it, he is in personal charge of the boys, and personally supervises their camp. This is a wonderful advantage. If a priest could personally supervise every scout troop, camp, hike, etc., the most old-fashioned among us could not but admire. But unfortunately, in many dioceses, this is out of the question. In many places there is a shortage of priests. In hundreds of places, noble, devoted priests are overworked, and have barely time to conduct services and administer to the sick and poor. Thus they are compelled to give such work as "scouting" over to laymen. The laymen do their best, but of course they have not the priest's interest in his flock, are more easily discouraged, are usually not so keenly alive to certain dangers to faith and morals, and are not generally equipped to see the thing through to a successful culmination. As the Catholic men respond to the call of the country, Catholic scoutmasters will become rarer. Here appears the advantage of strictly Catholic societies for the boys, to safeguard them from "non-sectarian" organizations, the boards of directors of which are usually composed largely of sincere, splendid ministers of various denominations. The K. C. are now raising $50,000,000 to give the Catholic soldiers an organization of their own, that they may not have to turn to the "strictly non-sectarian" Y. M. C. A. May we soon have the fund all collected!

It is true that I did not prove my assertion that Catholic troops will languish and die on account of the usual apathy of Catholic laymen, who may serve as scoutmasters, but it has not been proved that they will not languish. I may be wrong all around. But can anyone actually prove that the scout movement is a good thing for Catholic children?

I was frankly amazed at the statement that "Every boy arriving at the age of puberty should have some instruction in sex hygiene." Am I to understand that sex hygiene like that given the scouts is now to be openly commended after "careful investigation and mature thought"? Were the Catholics who opposed it all these years wrong? From my intimate association with boys I know how many of them treat such matters when they get together among themselves. It seems to me that everything possible should be done to keep their minds off such subjects.

Because the scout law, so-called, states that a "scout stands for clean speech, clean habits," etc., it does not follow that all scouts become paragons of virtue the instant they have taken the oath (I understand they do take an oath!). My experience with several scouts has taught me that the opposite is frequently the case. I have even known them to violate their parents' express command, and sneak off to a Protestant church on Sunday morning to attend a rally and a service. It does not follow, of course, that all scouts are dishonorable, or would lightly break the First Commandment. My personal experience with individual scouts, however, has not raised the movement in my estimation. I believe that the notice which the uniform attracts tends to make a boy conceited. Constantly having pounded into them that the scout is this, that and the other, they seem to acquire the holier-than-thou attitude toward their companions, and become conceited. As a general rule, I think a conceited boy has already a start in the wrong direction. Humility should be stressed as a scout's virtue.

Father Louis Coloma's Novels

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I am a great admirer of Father Louis Coloma, S.J., but unfortunately I cannot get all his novels, although I have asked diligently for them in local bookstores. The only ones I could buy were "The Little Pilate" and "The True Hidalgo." I know he has written "Pequeneces," "Por un Piocho" and other stories, but where can I get them and what are their titles? As I do not read Spanish easily translations in either English, French, Italian or German would suit me better.

The Baltimore Cathedral

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In my article on the Baltimore cathedral in your issue of July 20 I should have stated that the altar rail erected at the time of the centenary was the gift of Mrs. Boggs in memory of her husband.

A Beautiful "Secret" Prayer

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Twice during the year, on the Saturday of the Fourth Sunday of Lent, and on the Fourth Sunday after Pentecost, the Secreta of the Mass closes with this petition: "Ad Te nostras etiam rebelles compelle propilius voluntates," which the Tournai English Missal translates, in the first place: "Mercifully constrain to thy services even our rebellious wills," and in the other, "Mercifully constrain our rebellious wills to thy service." More faithfully the Lasance Sunday Missal: "In Thy kindness compel our wills toward Thee, even though they resist."

To this petition, personally, or through the choir, or the Mass-server, the people say "Amen!" but knowing not what they ask, for even the manual of prayers does not give the Secreta. What a pity that they and indeed even chance comers into the church are not enabled and induced to make the beautiful prayer their own, by the printing of it over the sanctuary arch, or some other conspicuous place.

"Foreign-born" Chaplains

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Being a chaplain myself, it was with more than interest that I read Chaplain Thomas F. Coakley's letter on the religious spirit of Catholic soldiers "over there." But the last sentence of his interesting letter would make one believe that American-born chaplains, and they alone, will be able to guide our boys safely through the many dangers and temptations confronting them there.

Chaplain Coakley says he speaks only for himself, and so do I in speaking of local conditions. Of the six chaplains working with the 39th Division, four are "foreign-born" and two native-born. We are still waiting for a priest, born in this State, to volunteer as a chaplain. And it is a great blessing for this camp that not all of us are native-born, for who would have heard the confessions of the 5,000 boys, nearly all French-speaking, who left here recently for "over there" had not some "foreign-born" chaplain been here? And what would the poor Creole do, sick in the base hospital, and who but the foreign-born chaplains can create a smile and a tear, when he hears the soft dialect of his "bayou," of which the native-born chaplain is ignorant. And when two weeks ago some 10,000 boys from Ohio and Kentucky marched into our camp to complete this new "Rainbow" Division, there were happy smiles among the Catholics when they learned that at least one foreign-born chaplain could hear their confessions in German, as it made them feel at home and at ease.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I am sending you herewith page torn from this week's issue of "New York Attractions" in reply to the criticism in your issue of July 23. I am mighty glad to have had this criticism. I agree with your correspondent thoroughly that at least one or two of the famous cathedrals should appear both in the calendar of church services as well as under points of interest. That there was no intention of slighting the Catholic Church must be evidenced from the churches that actually appear in the calendar, and the omission of St. Patrick's Cathedral, at least from "Points of Interest," is an error on the part of one of my associates which I am only too happy to order corrected forthwith, and to use the other interesting and historical churches if space permits.

Perhaps some of us are too ready to jump to conclusions and to criticise unkindly before we are at least given the opportunity for explanation and correction. To charge us with any intention to deliberately slight any institution, religious or otherwise, is ridiculous, especially in these days when all of us are or should be striving shoulder to shoulder for the great cause in which all of Christian manhood is interested. I repeat, that we are mighty glad to have had this suggestion brought to our attention, and I also repeat that it would have come in better grace and in more Christian grace to have first established the intent before charging "slight."

"New York Attractions" is published under the authorization of the New York City Hotel Association and is distributed free to all people regardless of their race, religion, politics or color, and its editors are always pleased to have suggestions which will help to make it more and more interesting and useful to the strangers within our gates.

New York. CHARLES E. GEHRING.

[The latest issue of "New York Attractions" shows that four Catholic churches with the hours at which Masses are said are included in a page devoted to "Sunday Services in the Churches." In the same list of nineteen denominations, twenty-one Episcopalian and eleven Presbyterian churches are named. This information will no doubt be a convenience to hotel guests, but it does not meet the objection made by the Chicago visitor in the letter printed in AMERICA for July 13. No change has been made in the four pages of "New York Attractions" devoted to "Places of Interest and How to Reach Them" except to add the location of an undertaker's shop masquerading as a "church." It divides honors with the six Episcopalian edifices evidently supposed by the compiler to exhaust the ecclesiastical attractions of the Metropolis. There are more than a hundred Catholic churches on Manhattan island, a number of them, as the Chicago visitor noted, of great historical and artistic interest. And there are numerous other Catholic attractions, some of which a comprehensive list would hardly exclude.—ED. AMERICA.]

The New Social Era

THE principle of the Church in her insistence upon the right and utility of labor organizations is daily more fully recognized. The success of the United States national war labor board has evidently stimulated the recent industrial peace efforts of the English Government's committee on relations between employers and employees. In their latest supplemental report the members of this body, known as the Whitley Committee, not merely assume the existence of organizations of employers and employees, and grant full recognition to them, but proceed much further. In their opinion the aim of the Government should be to encourage the complete and coherent organization of trade, both on the side of the employers and of the employees. The service of the "works committee," they hold, will be of value in so far as they contribute to such a result.

In their proposed industrial-peace plans the creation of committees by workers in every establishment is suggested for the purpose of adjusting minor disputes affecting the daily life and comfort of the workers and promoting the success of the business. The larger question of wage rates, however, is not to lie within the sphere of these committees, but is to be left to district or national agreement between organizations of employers and workers. Thus we notice that the new idea of trade agreements, in place of the savagery of industrial struggles, of the endless strikes and bitter lock-outs of the past, is fast gaining ground in England likewise.

The report further states that no way towards industrial peace can be found by the mere appointment of works committees. Their success will depend entirely upon gaining the cooperation of the trade unions and of the employers' associations in the trade or branch of trade concerned. Government action, without the cooperation of these organizations, they believe, can only stand in the way of the improved industrial relationships. The period of individual bargaining is rapidly approaching its end. The laissez-faire attitude towards labor problems, which followed upon the Reformation and was all in favor of the economically stronger employer, is fast passing into the limbo of forgotten things.

A new era of cooperation between the State, the trade union and the employers' organizations is opening. But we must not forget that religion is no less indispensable in the relationship between trade unions and employers' associations, than in the dealings between individual employers and workers. Nor can the intervention of any State authority or works committee insure industrial peace and the reign of justice and charity, in which the interests of the public likewise will be safely guarded, unless religion is the guiding principle not merely of individuals but of trade unions and employers' associations, and of the State itself, which seeks to hold the even balance of justice. Religion alone can surely bring about the reign of universal brotherhood.

Behind the Drive

MILITARY critics have been busy offering opinions on the recent German breakdown and the victory of the Allies, between the Aisne and the Marne. No small degree of credit has been given to the American troops who have proved that they can stand up with the veterans of other armies, hardened to the game of modern warfare during four terrible years. Americans feel proud of Pershing and the men under him who have lived up to the simple sentence uttered by the American Commander of the Expeditionary Forces on the day of the landing of the vanguard, more than a year ago: "Lafayette, we are here." That sentence went straight to the heart of the French nation, and stiffened the defense and determination of the Allied armies. For they realized that all the resources of the most resourceful of nations were cast in the balance to outweigh the brute power of militarism. Force would meet force, as President Wilson declared. Yet the force of American arms would be backed by the power of the American people who have kept their eyes on God while sending their armies overseas. The Chief Executive has more than once urged on those at home the need of turning to the Almighty in this day of national need. In the terrific crash of physical forces the spiritual note has often been heard.

It is sounding again overseas, and it comes from one who bears on his shoulders the responsibility for Allied endeavor, the Generalissimo of the armies that are fighting for the freedom of the world. The Sunday before the great offensive was launched, the children of France and England were bidden by their parish priests to "pray for the intentions of General Foch." The children prayed and one of the great defensive successes of the war was soon followed by a brilliant attack. The New York World which carried the cable dispatch, pointedly remarks:

> History may ask in vain whether the great strategist ascribes his victory more to his own plans and the valor of his troops or to prayers offered by scores of thousands of young girls in France and England who have scarcely heard his name or comprehended the war.

A little French peasant girl has told the nation: "The invader will be driven from our soil when we turn back to the God who loves us." Is it the beginning of the turning of the tide, not only of the tide of battle on the Marne, but of that bigger battle between the forces of God and Satan that has been raging in France for many a year? Will the simple act of a great general and a great Catholic calling for prayers in a battle-crisis bear fruit in the councils of a nation that has too long held before the world the strange anomaly of a Catholic heart warped and seared by a godless head?

The Banner of the Sacred Heart

FROM one end of France to the other, there has been of late a remarkable revival of devotion to the Sacred Heart. Recent messages addressed to the Government on the subject of placing the emblem of Christ's love for man on the national flag have doubtless had their part in the movement, and the soul of the people has been stirred by the thought of a public protestation of the ideals which have so long been banished from official circles. Whether or not the hope of restoring Christ to an honored place in the counsels and works of the nation is destined to see fruition, there are at present no means of determining. But the fact is unquestioned that the heart of the people is pulsating with the desire to see the reign of the Sacred Heart extended from individual and domestic life to national and social life. Blessed Margaret Mary's message to Louis XIV is recalled with growing insistence, and there are many who look forward, if not with confidence, at least with longing, to the day when the image of the Sacred Heart shall be added to the tricolor, and shall proclaim to all the world that France is still what she has never ceased to be, a people devoted to the interests of Christ. It was in France that the revelations granted to the humble Visitandine took place, it was France that petitioned that the celebration of the feast of the Sacred Heart should be extended to all the world, it was France that built Montmartre, the magnificent fulfilment of a national vow.

So strong has grown the movement and so common the practice of weaving the emblem of the Sacred Heart into the standard of France that the Conseil d'Etat has drawn up regulations on the matter. A religious symbol may be joined, so it has been officially decreed, with the national colors for the purpose of decoration or ornamentation, or personal adornment, it may also be used in connection with the colors in the churches, provided the authorities have no reason to fear that it will lead to disorder. The only restriction laid down by the Council concerns the display of the national colors in the public streets. Here the standard must have only the traditional form sanctioned by established usage. Elsewhere full liberty is allowed. This concession by no means entirely satisfies the wishes of the people, but it is more than was expected. The way may yet be found to convince the Government that fears of disorder are absolutely groundless, because the people are solid behind the movement, and that the surest way to victory is through national reparation. It would be strange if out of the wreck and ruin of the war came the accomplishment, delayed for almost two centuries and a half, of the earnest desire of Jesus Christ.

Independence Hall and Saintly Relics

AS he passes through the old-fashioned doorway, the casual visitor is at once caught by the atmosphere of quiet dignity that pervades the house. His head is bared, he speaks to his companion, or to the guard, in an undertone. "Man in the street," as he may be, he realizes that he is standing in a shrine. Hat in hand, he pauses reverently before an almost commonplace placard, resting on a wooden easel; and if he can read the legend without a sudden rising of emotion, of which he is not at all ashamed, he is no true man.

If the honest inquirer wishes to know why the Church encourages the establishment of shrines, and why she teaches us to venerate images and relics, let him visit Independence Hall. There is no virtue, surely, connected with the chair in which George Washington once sat, and no essential reason why we should reverence the rude hall, in which the colonial delegates promulgated the fundamental law of the land. But if these symbols keep fresh the memory of an ardent lover of his country, and of the stirring events which marked the birth of a great nation, thereby inciting a spirit of patriotism, they are more than justified. The soldier who salutes the flag, the man who cherishes a faded photograph of his mother, the woman who counts among her dearest treasures, a broken toy or a little scuffed shoe, all know well what the Church means when she asks us to reverence the relics and images of God's warriors, the Saints. The flag symbolizes legitimate authority; the photograph, that sweetest thing on earth, a mother's love; the toy or the shoe, a little child, God's image, given as the holy bond of wedded love. Not less clear is the lesson taught us by images and relics. They raise our hearts to the Source of all true sanctity, they remind us that, if we will but accept God's help so freely given, we too may be made like to those heroes, whose lives are a golden record of love of God above all things, and love of their fellows, for His dear sake.

Save and be Poor

A PROFESSOR in the University of Wisconsin has stated, by way of warning and advice, that during the war the ambition of every good citizen should be "to treble his savings and reduce his expenses by at least twenty-five per cent." The advice and the warning are pertinent. Despite the survival of early New England influences, for nearly half a century we have been recognized as probably the most thriftless people in the world. We paid little heed to economical methods of dealing with our great natural resources, until it was scientifically demonstrated that these resources were only great, not inexhaustible. Even then we changed but slowly. It is painful to remember that the impression left on the minds of the Belgian Commissioners, as they journeyed from New York to Chicago a few years ago, was one of amazement at our wasteful schemes in agriculture. The national conscience, or want of it, was reflected in the lives of millions of citizens. We had alleged "needs," all centering about physical comfort, even luxury, and tiring, costly recreations, unknown in other countries. Many a young couple expended hard-earned funds that should have furnished the kitchen with necessary utensils, upon the purchase of a piano-player or a phonograph, while the spectacle of the cheerful idiot who mortgaged his little home to buy an automobile, was as common as it was mournful.

But all this was in the days "before the war." We are now beginning to reform. An old darkey "mammy" once said that she knew only one practical way of reclaiming such of her offspring as chanced to stray from the right path, and that was the judicious application of a barrel-stave. In our case, it would seem that a war was required to restore sanity. Ours was a grasshopper philosophy that knew no winter. Now that the winter is at hand we need a readjusted, or, better, a new philosophy. "Poverty" is not synonomous with "destitution," but if we Americans do not, in the monastic phrase, "practice poverty," we shall soon find ourselves in a state of "destitution." Speaking generally, "destitution" implies the want, and "poverty," the bare yet secure possession, of the necessities of life. On one condition only, will the advice freely offered by the Wisconsin professor, to cut down expenses by at least twenty-five per cent, be of immense value. That condition is that we follow it. Now is the time to begin. If we put off the day of our turning to the charms of simple poverty, we may reach, sooner than we expect, that day of destitution in which no economic salvation is possible.

The Woman's Share

IN days that are gone it was woman's part to send man to war while she stayed at home to watch and weep and pray. Today she is as much in war as man. Close to the fighting line as a Red Cross nurse or a Sister of Charity, or a canteen worker she is bearing the hardships and the horrors of the battle-front. In the great army of industry, backing up the armies in the field, she has successfully assumed burdens hitherto considered so big that only a man's shoulders could bear them. Only the other day nine three-ton trucks were driven by women from Lansing, Michigan, to Atlanta, Georgia, a distance of 1,014 miles. As yeomen in the navy, and members of the Signal Corps in the army, as deputy sheriffs attached to the commission on training camp activities, and members of the Secret Service, the share taken by women in this world-war is no slight one. And yet with all these new fields opened up to woman's activities, the outstanding fact remains that her greatest power and widest influence radiates from the home, where motherhood has crowned her supreme.

"The mothers of America are fighting this war," wrote a mother to the commanding officer of a regiment that had just received overseas orders. "You have taken my all, in taking my sons, and I have given gladly, though my heart is heavy and my hand is trembling as I write. Those boys of mine will never know the sufferings that are mine as I scan the daily casualty list, and I think of the many mothers like myself who must be ready to see a loved name appear on the roll of honor. Yet I would not have them back. We are all in this and in it to stay till it is finished."

There is no misunderstanding that spirit, for it speaks in tones of sacrifice. It is the bed-rock on which is built the morale of the fighting forces. Every other agency welcomed by the Government to further the work of keeping an army contented is absolutely dependent on the home-power wielded by the nation's motherhood. Indeed K. C. and Y. and Red Cross are merely the hands stretching across the sea from a million homes where hearts are praying God-speed to the men who have gone away, mother-hearts and great hearts who are going to win the war.

Literature

THE POET'S DEBT TO JOY

EVEN if it be admitted that "Our sweetest songs are those that tell of saddest thought" it would be a mistake to believe that very sad hearts wrote them. Deep sorrow knows no words. It cannot weep; far less, then, can it sing. Doubtless the noblest and tenderest poetry was written by men who had sounded the depths of suffering, but not grief alone was the source of their power. They did not, could not, tell their wo until peace, and hope, and joy had blossomed anew in their hearts. They sang of past grief that joy was lightening, or of joy unalloyed; not forgetful of sorrow, not blind, but with vision so keen that they saw above and beyond the domain of pain.

Before the Divine Comedy was written Beatrice's memory had become sweetness unmixed with pain, and the thought of eternity a solace to Dante's lonely, embittered spirit. It was only as the years of his exile wore away and sorrow and disappointment taught him to look hopefully and longingly toward a juster, brighter, kinder world that his immortal song slowly took form. Seventeen years elapsed between Arthur Hallam's death and the publication of "In Memoriam," and during the interval Tennyson's life had broadened and deepened; he had made new friends, and had won the ear of the world and more than one man's share of its love and admiration. In the agony of his first grief he thought of no quotable phrases, nor tirelessly polished exquisite stanzas to immortalize his pain. Had Keats been Shelley's best-beloved, "Adonais" would not have promptly paid tribute to his memory. It was only after the Fairy Prince awakened her with a kiss and the tragedies that overshadowed her youth were thrust into the background that Mrs. Browning's genius came to its "full flower-time." Few owed so much as she to happiness. "The Hound of Heaven" did not tell of Francis Thompson's struggles and sufferings until the kindness of the Meynells had dried his tears and bound up his wounds.

When the rule is broken and a poet writes "Out of the Depths" he proves that silence was the part he should have played. His work gives pain. He adds to the sadness of a too-sad world, a feat no man would envy. Possibly he eases his own heart, but he might have done that by writing volumes of verse—if volumes proved to be necessary—and burning them instead of sending them to a publisher. Henley's "Out of the Night That Covers Me" is a vivid picture of a pitiable state of mind, better hidden from the world, and Matthew Arnold was fond of writing such lines as:

> "For the world, which seems
> To lie before us like a land of dreams,
> So various, so beautiful, so new,
> Hath neither joy, nor love, nor light,
> Nor certitude, nor peace, nor help for pain."

No rainbow shines in this sky; the storm has not passed. How weak his wailing sounds compared with the sturdy optimism of "Rabbi Ben Ezra," with the splendid courage of Miss Guiney's "The Wild Ride," or the rather pathetic courage of Lionel Johnson's work, who, bruised and sensitive, knew that joy is greater than pain and will triumph in the end, that the reward is out of all proportion to the struggle, and heavenly love a prize for which earthly may well be sacrificed.

A quiet melancholy, more than half pleasurable, inspired much of our poetry, and the feelings which it excites are sad, perhaps, but sweet. Gray's "Elegy" is a standard example, "Break, Break, Break," a more striking one. This is the mood of many popular poems: of "I Remember, I Remember," "The Light of Other Days," and the familiar work of our American poets from Longfellow and Bryant to Joyce Kilmer and Tom Daly. The sorrows of which it sings are not new, nor even remembered with painful vividness. The night is past and day is dawning; or they were never more than little sadnesses.

Much exquisite verse is the flower of unclouded joy. It sings ecstatically of God and of His Mother, revels in the beauty and majesty of nature, or rejoices in home, friends, or love. Blake was not the only poet to write a "Laughing Song," although alone, perhaps, in so christening one. Goldsmith laughed as heartily, forgetful of yesterday and trustful of tomorrow, Scott was a boy to the end, Robert Louis Stevenson another, and Lewis Carroll saw everything but mathematics in merry sunlight.

Nature, a source of joy to all who befriend her, is lavish in gifts to her intimates, the poets, and their overflowing hearts spill sweetness into charming verse, brightening the world and adding incalculably to its store of literary treasures. The careful praise of Wordsworth, the exuberance of Nash's "Spring," the gorgeousness of Keat's "Autumn," the reverent awe of the "Hymn Before Sunrise," the dainty loveliness of Father Tabb's lyrics, all the exquisite verses addressed to skylark and to nightingale, to night, to dawn, to sea and sky and flower; these are children of joy. Nature tells her delicious secrets to the poets and they dishonorably repeat them, in their knowledge too happy to remain silent.

It was deep and fervent but placid joy which dictated "The Angel of the House," "I Love My Jean," Scott's spirited love-poems, and countless others; and surely we owe our stirring English ballads to men young at heart, in love with tragedy, because it seemed so safely far away. Joy at the sight of heroism rings in every line of "The Charge of the Light Brigade," "The Song of Marion's Men," and Campbell's martial ballads; it is quieter, but not less intense, in Collins's familiar stanzas beginning,

> "How sleep the brave who sink to rest
> By all their country's wishes blest."

That joy is present in all deeply religious poetry need hardly be said, our Christian Faith being essentially joyous. Even when the theme is death joy is there, allaying fear, soothing sorrow, and giving of the beauty which belongs to it and it alone. Vaughan, using all his genius for unforgettable metaphor, wrote tranquilly of his "Friends Departed," remembering that separation is for time and reunion for eternity. "The Dream of Gerontius" is death with all its bitterness gone and its sweetness distilled in matchless song. To Newman the king of terrors was indeed "a beginning not an end, a happiness not a pain, a meeting and not a parting." Through the somber majesty of his "Dies Irae" Crashaw's joy in the Faith, and his tender personal love of Our Lord flash forth, making his translation beautiful and very characteristic. His work, robbed of joy, is inconceivable.

No poetry is more transparently joy-inspired than the liturgical hymns. Even the "Stabat Mater" does not grieve to the end, but closes with a thought of eternal bliss, and the "Vexilla Regis" fluctuates between grief at the sight of Our Saviour's sufferings and joy in the Redemption which they win for us sinners. The "Salvete Flores Martyrum" is all joy, as are St. Thomas's hymns for Corpus Christi, the "Adeste Fideles," the "Veni Creator," and many others.

So have the poets sung their happiness. That, like other men, they are dumb in deep grief is one of God's kindnesses to a world quick to forget joy and prone to remember sorrow. Sacred it is, chastening, ennobling; but not for this were we made.

REFUGE

Altissimum posuisti refugium tuum.—Ps. 90

Not theirs, O Lord, who finger bead by bead
The rosary of dedicated days,
With regular silence and with regular praise,
In fortressed cloisters who securely lead
Lives safe from clamor! Oh, not theirs the need
Of blissful contemplation of Thy face—
But ours—who chaffer in the market-place,
And walk the town with weary feet that bleed!

They wear the habit of thine holiness;
Not theirs the agonized striving to attain
Our difficult peace . . . O Lord, we are much less Than they, and labor in a world profane;
More need have we in secular duress
The refuge of the high God's heart to gain!

REVIEWS

Religion. Par MGR. GIBIER, Eveque de Versailles. Paris: Pierre Téqui, 3 fr. 50.

This is the first volume of a series to be entitled: "Religion, Famille, Patrie." The series will thus form a complete study of the essential obligations and duties incumbent on every man, those towards God, his family and his country. These are the sacred foundation stones upon which rests the edifice of our temporal and eternal destiny. If those foundations are strong all is well, if they are feeble or insecure ruin threatens both the individual and society.

The learned Bishop of Versailles begins logically with a study of man's duties towards God. The book has all the qualities of the preceding works of the eminent author. In some ways it reminds the reader of "The Faith of Our Fathers" of Cardinal Gibbons. It is popular in style and expression, simple, full of unction, without the least tinge of acrimonious controversy. The presentation of the matter is methodical and logical. In the brief chapters which compose the volume the author gives a concise but exact résumé of what a Christian ought to know in order to render to God the double testimony of his faith and his works. There are four main divisions: religion in general and the Catholic religion in particular, the practices of religion, its doctrines and its works. Under the last head the author considers the works of charity, justice, humility, those peculiar to each state, the works of zeal, and of a larger apostolate. The lessons given are those of a man thoroughly acquainted with the spirit and the needs of his age.

When discussing the obligation incumbent on all to yielding to the claims which religion has upon mankind, Mgr. Gibier shows that to profess it and to practise it is a duty that man owes to his Creator, which parents owe to their family and citizens to society, that it is a duty of all times and places, of all ages and conditions, the supreme duty of man. Every other chapter is as simply and as forcibly developed. The work forms an admirable piece of popular apologetics. J. C. R.

Cape Cod New and Old. By AGNES EDWARDS. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Co., $2.00.

The first discovery of Cape Cod occurred about 1004, when the Norsemen glided into the harbor of what is now Provincetown. After new discoveries by the Italians, Portuguese and French, the Pilgrims made their first landing in America here, and at a later date dotted its coasts with trading posts and settlements. Though this narrow peninsula, jutting out into the Atlantic like an enormous fish-hook, has had a history longer than any place on the continent, though its people have had a large share in the nation's maritime and economic development, Cape Cod itself has ever remained one of the most provincial, bigoted and unprogressive of places. Its latest discovery as a vacation ground has worked momentous changes, and it is of these that Miss Edwards writes so charmingly. Her book is most opportune, for she is near enough to the old order to transmit its quaintness, and yet in time to welcome the new leaven with enthusiasm. She has caught the spirit of both, and seems to enjoy the contrast: of the landed stock receding from the ever-increasing Portuguese settlers, of the old captains deserting the sea to direct automobile traffic, of cranberries and summer visitors replacing the old industries of fishing and salt-making as the Cape's most profitable source of income. She even views with humor the horror that the old residents must experience at the sight of so many Catholic churches and missions being reared on the soil dedicated to Methodism and to revivals.

Though the essays follow a topographical order, they are more than a guide-book, for the author has skilfully woven into them much interesting historical data, together with wise comment on the industries, religion and characteristics of the people. The book is well illustrated and will interest not only the natives but the summer tourists and all who have read with pleasure the stories of Joseph Lincoln.

The Mythology of All Races. In thirteen volumes. LOUIS HERBERT GRAY, A.M., Ph.D., editor; Egyptian, by W. MAX MÜLLER, Ph.D.; Indo-Chinese, by SIR JAMES GEORGE SCOTT, K. C. I. E., Vol. XII. Boston: Marshall Jones Company. $6.00.

Indo-Chinese mythology may appeal only to the very learned and the specialist. But there is scarcely a student who has given any attention to history who has not felt the strange fascination which Egypt exerts on the mind. Its huge pyramids, its obelisks with their strange hieroglyphics, its sphinxes as silent as the deserts over which they crouch, the ox Apis,—the mysterious Nile which so long hid the source of its waters, Isis and Osiris, all these make us wonder. Among the Romans of classic times, Egypt was looked upon with a peculiar awe and under the strange animal worship of its people Romans thought some dark and incomprehensible mystery was hidden. Then in modern times there are few stories that can compare in interest with the romance attending the discovery of Champollion when he found the key to the strange carving on the monuments of the Pharaohs. Added to all this, the close associatio of Egypt with the history of the chosen people invests it with an atmosphere altogether its own.

The fascination of the land, Dr. W. M. Müller has to a large extent transferred to his book. While perhaps it is only the specialist who will follow his pages with ease, there is a great deal that will appeal to the general reader. The chapters on the "Worship of the Sun" and the "Osirian Cycle" are especially interesting. The religion of Egypt developed from a crude animism, yet the doctrine of life after death was richly developed. Dr. Müller admits that even in prehistoric times Egypt believed the soul to be immortal. In the "Pyramid Period" the practice of embalming began. Egypt reverenced the body and endeavored to preserve it intact after death, because it was the tenement of the soul. It believed also in a sanction in the after-life for the deeds done in the flesh; in a pool of fire and torments for the wicked, and a life of bliss for the virtuous. Eternal torture is implied and at times directly stated on their funeral monuments and in their ritual practices, but not so clearly perhaps as eternal bliss.

Dr. Müller brings to the discussion of his subject the widest and soundest scholarship. In the discussion of his difficult task, a presentation of Indo-Chinese mythology, Sir James Scott displays the same qualities. His subject is less known to the general reader, and as difficult as Dr. Müller's, perhaps more so. Those even who are little acquainted with that Far East with which he is so familiar, will not fail to read with unusual pleasure the "Festivals of the Indo-Chinese" and the "Thirty-Seven Nats" of Burma. As we read these scholarly pages we realize more and more how dim the light of reason can become when entirely left to its own helplessness. But the reading of this volume of the monumental work edited by Dr. Gray and his associates also convinces us that in the midst of their grossest errors men have always preserved the seed of truth which at any moment may bring forth its splendid harvest.

Interned in Germany. By H. C. MAHONEY. New York: Robert M. McBride Co., $2.00.

The interest with which this narrative was followed when it appeared serially insures it a welcome in its more permanent book-form. At the outbreak of the war the author was passing through Germany on his way to Russia. He was included in the sweeping order, executed with true German thoroughness and disregard, that all British subjects should be gathered into the prison camps. His earlier experiences are related in "Sixteen Months in a German Prison," to which the present volume, recording more in detail the conditions in the camp at the Ruhleben Race Course, is a sequel. In the beginning the lot of the five thousand prisoners was not an easy one, and it is not Germany's fault that the "Kaiser's guests," as they called themselves, did not succumb to epidemic or insanity. The main purpose of the story, however, is not the German treatment of the prisoners, but the development, through their own initiative and effort, of a most unique communal life. Gradually they evolved an organized scheme of government, had their own police force, provided various forms of entertainment and recreation, bettered the sanitation and hygiene, established stores and banks, introduced religious worship; in fine, converted the camp into a well-regulated community. This seems highly incredible, if one does not realize that the Imperial Government had fulfilled its purpose when the aliens were safely imprisoned, and was quite content to shift its responsibilities of providing for the prisoners.

The veracity of the account seems fully corroborated by Mr. Gerard's "My Four Years in Germany." Its fairness is evident, for Mr. Mahoney, with just cause for bitterness, refrains from much comment on his facts; he impartially acknowledges his gratitude for the scant kind treatment from certain officials and roundly berates the infamy of some pro-Germans among the prisoners. Now that some of our American soldiers are temporarily residing in these camps and accurate statements of their treatment are not yet possible, this sane and complete narrative of conditions should prove of the highest interest.

Psychology and Preaching. By CHARLES S. GARDNER, Professor of Homiletics and Sociology in the Southern Baptist Seminary. New York: The Macmillan Co. $2.00.

Psychology is a word to conjure with. Preaching is a leaven for human conduct. Hence may be inferred the felicity of the above title. It suggests an art treated in the light of one at least of the ultimate elements on which that art is based. And such it proves to be. For the purpose of the book is to analyze the intellectual and emotional activities and tendencies that are brought into play in a sermon both on the part of the preacher and of the hearers. In doing this the author draws extensively on modern writers. As he is also professor of sociology, he discusses at considerable length the characteristics of the groups that go to make up the modern audience, and describes the present-day attitudes of laymen outside the Church on religious questions. The book is intended for students of the Baptist ministry and may be welcomed by many. But if one has been accustomed to clear ideas and clean-cut definitions in psychology and to orthodoxy in religion, he will be disappointed with the volume's perusal, for it is distressing to have to search for what may be useful among so bewildering a mass of errors.

But one is prepared for this at the outset, for Professor Gardner warns us that his psychology is distinct from philosophy. Evolution crops out unexpectedly here and there and skepticism, relativism and subjectivism are freely acquiesced in. Enlightened Christianity, in the author's view, must be adogmatical and pragmatical. Religious belief "is the affirmation of the reality of the supersensible objects and relations which are felt to be necessary for the satisfaction of the fundamental needs of the personality." And the proof is a quotation from the Psalm, "My soul thirsteth for God." As for the religion ascribed to the modern business man, it is hard to see how it is religion at all. The author's sentiments on the Catholic Church may be understood from the words with which he concludes his book: "Christianity almost lost its original simplicity and was corrupted by the elaboration of imposing ceremonies—many of them thought of as having a magical potency—which dwarfed its ethical and social meaning; and was perverted by the establishment of a priesthood which administered magical rites and interposed itself between God and the common people." The helpful suggestions for preaching to be gleaned from this work may be summed up in a few words—To be effective a preacher should combine the intellectual treatment of his subject with imaginative and emotional appeal.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

In "The Fetichism of Liberty" (Marxian Philosophical Society, $0.25) Mr. Harry Waton endeavors to show that Socialism, "which takes for its basis the endeavor after an ever-increasing constraint of the individual by society," is the sole philosophy which can be demonstrated to be "true in theory, in accord with the facts of social life, and therefore realizable." While Catholic students will accept none of the conclusions, and very few of the many brilliant observations, contained in this essay, they will find that Mr. Waton presents his case strongly, and in a manner that is wholly free from the objectionable features which frequently mark the Socialistic-propaganda pamphlet.——"Prison Reform" (H. W. Wilson Co., $1.25) is a compilation made by Corinne Bacon, for the purpose of giving a general knowledge of prison conditions in the United States, and of the forces which aim to improve them. As is inevitable in a handbook of this kind, the citations are of uneven value, and it is somewhat marvelous that the most recent Catholic author on the subject known to Mrs. Bacon is Pope Clement XI.

The thirteen "Great Ghost Stories" (Dodd, Mead, $1.50), which Joseph Lewis French has selected, include such masterpieces of the eerie as Bulwer-Lytton's "The House and the Brain," Quiller Couch's "The Roll-Call of the Reef," Margaret Oliphant's "The Open Door," Amelia B. Edwards' "The Four-Fifteen Express" and Thomas Hardy's "The Withered Arm," all of which should be read, to secure their full effect, by a sputtering candle about midnight, while the wainscoating creaks and a soughing wind is heard in the pines. The inclusion in the volume of Théophile Gautier's "Clarimonde," however, with its maudlin confessions of an unfaithful priest, is, to take no higher ground, an error in literary taste.——"Tales of War-Time France" (Dodd, Mead, $1.25), is a collection by French contemporary authors well translated by William L. McPherson, which show a fresh artistic development in the short story. Some of the writers, Jean Aicard, Mme. Lucie Delarue-Maldrus, Pierre Mille, are well known to the French public, while the others, Maurice Level, Frédéric Boutét René Benjamin and Alfred Machard, are newcomers. The tales themselves are centered about the war: the soldiers at the front, the wives, mothers and sweethearts at home, the aviator, the spirit of Alsace, the foreign soldier and the wounded poilu. The stories are simple in plot, but with the necessary twist of thought and emotion to make them interesting. With this singleness of thought, a conciseness, a unity of impression and an emotion that is always kept suppressed, the tales are quite artistic. The ending is a novel feature; it comes suddenly and naturally and inevitably carries with it a surprise.

These stanzas by Gerald H. Crow, entitled "Ad Dominam Suam Mariam Virginem," are among the finest in the book of "Oxford Poetry, 1917" (Longmans, $0.50):

O Lily, Lady of Loveliness,
O tender-hearted, marvelous-eyed,
Bend from Thine aureate throne and bless
The lonely people and comfortless
At Jesu-Mass and Vespertide.

And bless the mighty and proud of mien,
The scornful folk that pity and pass—
For they are lonely as none have been,
The proud that lack on whom to lean—
At Vespertide and Jesu-Mass.

And bless before Thou makest end
Both me and mine in sorrow and pride,
Where frankincense and prayer ascend
And kneeling lilies whisper and bend,
At Jesu-Mass and Vespertide.

In "The Confessions of a Browning Lover" (Abingdon Press, $1.00), by John Walker Powell, the author's gentle modesty disarms criticism, and, in point of fact, we have no disposition to criticize in an unfavorable sense any of his literary principles. It is only when he advances with more assurance his ethical and theological views that one suffers something of a shock. The writer, as we gather, is a doctor of divinity, or at least a minister of the Gospel. Yet one reads on page 126, "Suppose the Church to have been wrong in a thousand particulars, . . . cut even the historical accuracy of the New Testament or the ultimate validity of Saint Paul's interpretation of the crucifixion of Jesus; still . . . the essential truth of Christ's religious and ethical teachings have not been touched." This is only a specimen of the attitude taken towards religious truth throughout the book. On page 135 we read: "The open-hearted reader may get more sound theology from Browning than from his minister"; and, in fact, one fears that this may be true of Dr. Powell's own congregation. We may indeed marvel at such a surrender of faith, but we may reflect that the writer is only another of those who overturn the foundations of belief and still serenely hope that the ornamental superstructure will remain intact.

The popularity of "The Best Short Stories of 1917" (Small, Maynard, $1.50), edited by Edward J. O'Brien, seems attested by the fact that it is now in its second printing. This annual collection of the best magazine stories into more permanent book form is a commendable but unsatisfactory task. Tastes differ so egregiously and the short story is such a mobile and fluctuating medium that any choice, however it might interest, would scarcely satisfy the critical mind. Mr. O'Brien seems to realize this, but he is not therefore less dogmatic; he endeavors to assign with the accuracy and precision of a schoolmaster relative values to stories that range from somber tragedy to lightest fantasy. As to the collection itself, there are fewer war stories than one would expect, far too many tinged with pessimism and despair, and a fair sprinkling of the impressionistic and ultra-realistic type. In his introduction the editor is not thoroughly optimistic about the technique of our American writers; the reviewer is inclined to be less optimistic about their ethics, if he may judge them by these tales.——Timely for the vacation reading of the schoolboy is a story of a summer's sport, with adventures thrilling and heroic, which fall to the lot of boys of sterling character. In his story of the Maine coast and its fisheries, Albert W. Tolman has done just this. PercyWhittington's reclamation will interest any American boy, and the hero, "Jim Spurling, Fisherman" (Harper, $1.25), will surely gain his admiration.

"The Democracy of the Trees" (Gorham Press $1.00) by Edward Andrews, is a small volume setting forth the various phases of Christian service in the novel form of an adaptation of Joatham's parable of the trees to democracy and what it needs and expects from its citizens. The general scope of the author is commendable, laying stress as he does upon the great need of religious principles as the guide and norm of the State as well as of the individual. But the religion he advocates is too vague to be useful. It never becomes more explicit than righteousness, spiritual ideals and religion in general. Then we are regaled with the old popular fallacies and faded Protestant myths which to the initiated are beginning to be a bore. This sentence, for example, among many like it: " . . . modern progress of the best kind received its greatest impulse by the Reformation movement," in the light of what is, registers a distinct jolt to any mind attuned to the present and not still immersed in the complacent assurance of a past generation.——"Christ's Challenge to Man's Spirit in this World Crisis." (Longmans, $0.75.) Advent addresses delivered at the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, New York, by George William Douglas, D.D., S.T.D., is a book containing four sermons entitled "Christ's Challenge to the Spirit of Man," "What Spoils the Human Spirit, Pride," "Laying Hold on Eternal Life," and "The Transfiguration of Humility." The author has stressed a growing conviction which seems to have burst forth like an inspiration. "The great surprise of life these past three years has been the spirituality of it." "Many intelligent men had supposed that if you develop the intellect, man will thereby of himself alone outgrow what is brutal in him." A practical consequence, not insisted upon in the addresses, is the Catholic contention that education without religion must necessarily lead to disaster. A description of our school system might properly have furnished the author with an application of much point and force.

As Lieutenant C. E. Andrews, the editor of "From the Front: French Poetry" (Appleton, $1.00) admits in his preface, the soldiers in this war, if we except Rupert Brooke and one or two others, have produced very little poetry that is likely to live. Most of their immortal lines have been gathered in this book, together with a vast deal of other lines that are only verses. This prayer, "Before Action," by Lieutenant William Noel Hodgson, however, has poetry in it:

By all the glories of the day
And the cool evening's benison,
By that last sunset touch that lay
Upon the hills when day was done,
By beauty lavishly outpoured
And blessings carelessly received,

By all the days that I have lived,
Make me a soldier, Lord.
By all of all man's hopes and fears,
And all the wonders poets sing,
The laughter of unclouded years,
And every sad and lovely thing;
By the romantic ages stored
With high endeavor that was his,
By all his mad catastrophes,
Make me a man, O Lord.

I, that on my familiar hill,
Saw with uncomprehending eyes
A hundred of Thy sunsets spill
Their fresh and sanguine sacrifice,
Ere the sun swings his noonday sword
Must say goodby to all of this;
By all delights that I shall miss,
Help me to die, O Lord.

EDUCATION

The Federal Government and Education

IT was a wise scholastic who premised that things were not to be multiplied without good reason. In his own day, he was accused, no doubt, of a fondness for the obvious, and thereupon relegated to the dust of his own bookshelves. But a good grasp on the obvious is a most useful possession, and whosoever can state it as well as the author of the tables of addition and multiplication, for instance, deserves a monument more lasting than bronze. Many of our troubles, I think, arise from the fact that we like to eschew the happy obvious, to imitate Icarus. Unfortunately for the parallel, not all of us fall into the sea. But somebody always suffers.

Government by Amendment

JUST at present, a band of well-meaning educators, attached to that somewhat amorphous but exceedingly powerful body, the National Educational Association, is advocating the creation of a Federal Secretary of Education, thereby eschewing the obvious fact that public education is the concern, not of the Federal Government, but of the several States. This personage "shall sit in the cabinet," and shall have a competent and complete apparatus of under-, assistant- and subsecretaries, with whatever additional factotums and experts may be deemed useful or necessary. How all this brave show is to be created, except by another Constitutional Amendment, is not clear; certainly, it does not seem to fall under the classification of measures absolutely necessary for the continuance of the war. But one of the cheapest and readiest political shortcuts we have today is the Federal Amendment. That venerable document, the Constitution, once a classic statement of fundamental principles, is assuming the voluminous proportions of a statute-book. If certain extremists have their way, old Jim MacKenzie, time out of mind, the village tippler, will soon fall under its reforming influences, while cigarettes, coffee and pie are marked by hordes of other cranks, for successive destruction through the agency of one or more Federal Amendments. Since these things are possible, there is no good reason why a Secretary of Education should not be created, his powers defined in detail, and the salary of his office-boy fixed for all time, or until the next Administration, by an Amendment to the Constitution of the United States of America.

Local Control Imperative

"THE constant attempt to break down the proper relations between the States and the Federal Government," said H. St. George Tucker, in his lectures on the Storrs Foundation at Yale, in 1916, "is certainly a great cause for alarm." "Too much centralization is now our danger," wrote John Fiske, in "The Critical Period of American History," "as the weakness of the Federal tie was our danger a century ago." By constitutional provision, in time of war much power is centered at Washington. That is the case today, and there is always a tendency to retain measures adopted during a period of stress, after the exigencies which justified them have passed away. War is a poor time for tinkering with the Constitution. The thirteen original States proceeded wisely in ordaining a Federal Government of strictly enumerated powers, and while they transferred certain ancient rights from the States, they also framed the Tenth Amendment, whereby the powers not granted in the Constitution, are reserved to the States or to the people. And most wisely indeed did the founders make no enumeration whatever of any Federal power to found or to control a public system of schools within the States. "It has been well settled always," writes Tucker, "that among the duties and rights which pertain to the States of the Union, is that of understanding and controlling the education of the children of the State." He subjoins the reason. "Perhaps the wisdom of the founders of the Constitution has been shown in no greater degree than in leaving this important domestic duty in the hands of the government which is closest to those whom it affects."

Prussian Methods in Education

TRUE, the National Educational Association, the advocate of this plan, so dangerous to every private system of education which, in accordance with American ideals, wishes to retain its independence, hastens to affirm that the scheme involves no Federal monopoly of education. "We believe that the administration and control of public education should be left in the hands of the several States," protests the president of the Association, Dr. G. D. Strayer, in the New York Times, for July 21. However the Association may protest, it is surely clear that the plan of appropriating Federal funds for local schools, under conditions laid down by a Federal board at Washington, is but the opening wedge for a policy of pure governmental control. In effect, the plan is simply this: "Conduct your local schools, as you please. That is your right. But if you do not conform to the ideals set up at Washington, you need look for no help from the Federal Government." If this is not governmental control, it is the most dangerous imitation of that menace which has as yet appeared in this free Republic. It is nothing more nor less than "souperism," a policy which under the name of "patronage," has long been popular with grimy politicians. But it has no place in a government which is fighting to make the world safe for democracy. Every Catholic, every citizen interested in the freedom of education, should see that his vote goes to no Senator or Congressman who favors this insidious, unconstitutional attack upon local self-government in the schools.

The School in Politics

THIS is an objection which the proponents of the new plan for diverting Federal funds, have thus far met by silence. But not only is the scheme an attempt to overturn the constitutional balance of Federal and State power; it is further open to grave objection on the grounds that it will inevitably draft a new army of office-seekers, and may easily make the State educational systems mere pawns in the game of politics. Writing to William Johnson, nearly a century ago, June 12, 1823, Thomas Jefferson said:

> I believe the States can best govern our home concerns, and the general government our foreign ones. I wish, therefore, to see maintained that wholesome distribution of powers established by the Constitution for the limitation of both; and never to see all offices transferred to Washington, where, further withdrawn from the eyes of the people, they may more secretly be bought and sold as at market.

A cognate thought is thus expressed by another statesman, born and bred far from the regions in which the older doctrine of States Rights was carried to a logical conclusion:

> If there were centered in Washington a single source of authority from which proceeded all the governmental forces of the country—created and subject to its will—upon whose permission all legislative and administrative action depended throughout the length and breadth of the land, I think we should swiftly demand and set up a different system. If we did not have States, we should speedily have to create them.

What Mr. Charles E. Hughes here says of the necessity of keeping in their pristine vigor, coordinate, yet in their own spheres independent, the powers of the State and Federal governments, has a direct application to the matter in hand. The question of education is too vast, too far-reaching, too much an affair of local interest and concern, to be administered or controlled by a Washington board. If the States did not now control education, we should be obliged, in Mr. Hughes' phrase, to create a State control.

Prefects from Washington

IT is somewhat irritating that one cannot write today of the relation of the State to the Federal government, without being dubbed a "secessionist." The correct doctrine touching the right of the State to manage its own concerns, originated with the founders of the Constitution, and is no more "secessionist" than Miss Ophelia. But there is a solemn warning in the following words, not written by the late Jefferson Davis, but by that rock-ribbed Northerner, John Fiske:

> If the day should ever arrive (which God forbid) when the people of the different parts of the country shall allow their local affairs to be administered by prefects sent from Washington . . . on that day the progressive political career of the American people will have come to an end, and the hopes that have been built upon it for the future happiness and prosperity of mankind will be wrecked forever.

We cannot safely put the control of local education in the hands of "prefects sent from Washington." Yet that is the logical, the inevitable outcome of the plan to federalize the schools, proposed by the National Educational Association. "Were we directed from Washington when to sow and when to reap," wrote Jefferson, "we should soon want bread." The motives which have brought this scheme into public notice at this time, may be left in abeyance for the present. But all citizens, interested in freedom of education, will see in this proposed departure from constitutional government, a plan to withdraw the schools "from the eyes of the people," establish at Washington an educational bureaucracy, and if not to sell the offices connected with it, ultimately to make education in the United States a government monopoly.

SOCIOLOGY

Juvenile Delinquency in War-Time

WHETHER or not the manufacture of that saccharine mixture known to the youthful population as "taffy" be a necessary industry in war-time is a matter open to dispute. To Johnny and Sue, a world without taffy, and taffy vended at a reasonable rate, is an exceedingly abnormal world. With this view, the anxious manufacturers very probably agree. Trifling as it may seem, the question is directly in line with graver interests. The most serious task which faces the civil authorities is to combine the maintenance of normal domestic conditions in times which bring demands that are far above normal, with the complete satisfaction of military necessities. It would not be safe to leave anything undone which might bring the war to a speedy and successful conclusion, but at the same time we must so order domestic needs that little reconstruction will be called for when peace is declared.

CONDITIONS AT HOME

NO small part of the war-problem is the adequate protection of the child. For reasons that are economic as well as Christian and humanitarian the children must be the last to suffer. The proposal to take them from the home and the school, placing them, under the plea of military necessity, in the fields and the shops, has met with a fairly definite rejection throughout the country, although we may look for plentiful evasions of the child-labor laws during the next twelve months. But unless we at once adopt a policy of vigilance, we shall, as the war continues, be obliged to meet a vastly increased juvenile delinquency calendar. To believe that we can escape without serious effort what has overtaken every other country now at war would be a fatal error. Complete figures are not at hand, but a number of cities are even now witnessing overcrowded juvenile courts and correctional institutions. Buffalo reports, for the year just closed, a larger number of violations of the school and labor laws, "an alarming number of arraignments for petty larceny," and "many children brought into court as ungovernable or disorderly, especially among those who are employed." In Cincinnati, the delinquency cases between April 1 and November 1, 1917, exceeded by twenty-one per cent the cases in the corresponding period for 1916. Columbus reports that the delinquency record for 1917 is greater than the average of the preceding three years by fifty-four per cent, and Detroit notes an increase of about fifty per cent in the winter of 1917-1918. New York shows a slight increase which is attributed to "mothers going out to work." While Philadelphia, Washington, Kansas City and Denver show conditions that are normal, in Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Minnesota and California the requests for admission into the State reform schools are far more numerous than in preceding years.

IN ENGLAND

THESE facts, while by no means conclusive, seem to indicate that the factors which have caused an increase of juvenile delinquency in England and on the continent are beginning to operate in the United States. England's experience should be our warning. As early as May, 1916, Sir Edward Troup, Under-Secretary of State at the Home Office, called the attention of the Justices of England to the "increase in the number of offenses by children and young persons under sixteen years of age." Statistics from seventeen of the largest cities showed an increase that was startling. In larceny cases, it was nearly fifty per cent, "but there were also more charges of assault, malicious damage, gaming, and offenses against the education acts." As one of the most potent causes bringing about this dangerous condition, Mr. Cecil Leeson, an English authority, quotes the short-sighted policy which took over more than 1,200 school buildings for war work. The dispossessed children were either put on part-time, and this gave them an ample leisure which they spent in the unhealthy environment of the streets, or they left school altogether to take up factory work. The report of the Committee on Juvenile Education in Relation to Employment shows that the effect upon the morals of the children was decidedly bad. Unfortunately, too, because of enlistments and conscription, the probation system was seriously interfered with, and in some localities was practically suspended. Summed up, the increase in juvenile delinquency can be traced to the partial breakdown of the school and the probation system at the very time when the customary safeguards for the child had been greatly weakened.

ON THE CONTINENT

REPORTS from France, Germany, Italy and Russia, although less detailed, tell practically the same story. According to a recent bulletin of the Children's Bureau at Washington, the evidence that juvenile delinquency has greatly increased in France is not so clear. It is suggested, however, that the smaller number of arrests in Paris in 1915 may be due "in part, at least, to a relaxation of police surveillance." Marseilles and Rouen show an increase, and the Revue Pénitentiaire calls attention to "the number of school children one meets daily on the streets, where they are learning habits of laziness and vagabondage," and calls upon the authorities to enforce the laws for the protection of the child. In Germany, a general increase was reported towards the end of 1915, and two years later Judge Koehne of Berlin wrote that conditions had hardly improved. The causes are variously stated as the breaking up of the home, due to the death of the father, the weakening of the continuation schools, and the consequent exploitation of the child for war work. Writing in the Rivista di Discipline for April 1, 1917, Giulio Benelli finds a notable increase throughout Italy, due to homes broken by the absence or death of the father, the employment of mothers and children in factory work, and the diversion to war purposes of funds usually employed for the protection of youth. He also notes that "one of the main causes is the inefficient work of the magistracy in guardianship cases." In disrupted Russia, as might be expected, the effect of the war upon children, especially upon young girls, is sad beyond description.

The Plain Lesson

THE lessons to be drawn from this sad record are plain and manifold. We must prepare, and at once, for preventive work. A stitch in time saves nine, and in many cases reconstruction is a disheartening, if not an impossible, task. To begin with, it is imperative that nothing be allowed to interfere with the schools, with the strict enforcement of the child-labor laws, or with the work of our city probation and attendance officers. Since the need of all these agencies is greater in wartime, they should, on the contrary, be strengthened. On the part of our Catholic institutions, while retaining to the full their autonomy, an even closer and more cordial cooperation should be established with the attendance and probation officers. There was a time when Catholics looked askance, and the look was justified, at the work of these officials, but that time, at least in the larger cities, may be said to belong to ancient history. Many priests have learned by experience that the help they can give is beyond price. These officers are public servants, and there seems to be no valid reason why we should not use what they are ready, and often anxious, to give us.

What Catholics Can Do

EQUALLY important is it in these unsettled times that we make the fullest use of the parish system for the protection of our children. In the school, our Sisters and Brothers can acquaint themselves with home conditions, and at once report anything out of the ordinary to the superintendent or to the pastor. The pastor cannot be expected personally to investigate or supervise every case involving danger to a child, but here is his opportunity to enroll the associates of his Sodalities, the Holy Name Society, and the Conference of St. Vincent de Paul, as active members of a vigilance and visiting committee. In some localities, these devoted men and women act as genuine "Big Brothers" and "Big Sisters," and their work, because of the spirit which animates them, is enlightened, patient and effective. There is no reason whatever why delinquency should increase among our Catholic children during the war. In fact, if we employ the means at our disposal at once and perseveringly there is every reason to believe that it can be greatly lessened. The child is the hope and the pledge of the future. Upon him, humanly speaking, depends the force and vitality of the Church and the State of the next generation. Few of us can work for the Church in foreign missions; many of us are unable to serve our country on the field of conflict. Here is our opportunity to do "war work" of immense value. To help the child is practical patriotism, practical religion, practical love of God.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Creighton University Summer Sessions

THE Creighton Courier announces the success of the sixth summer session of the University, with an enrollment of 227 students. One of the notable features of the year is the large number of applicants for the Master's degree. Many of these had taken their Bachelor's degree in other institutions. Nineteen States and Canada are represented among the students and almost twenty Religious Congregations have members enrolled in the various courses. This sufficiently indicates the value of the summer sessions. As an additional educational and recreational feature select moving pictures are displayed on Mondays and Fridays. Ample provisions are thus made to render it possible for all our Catholic Sisters, who so desire, to secure their degrees from a Catholic university. Similar opportunities are likewise offered them in other parts of the country.

Chaplains Over Age Limit Requested by Pershing

AN unusual appeal for 100 chaplains who are over the regular age limit of forty-five years has been issued in accordance with the request of General Pershing. This information is offered by the Religious Publicity Service of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America. It is stated that the men thus appointed will serve in a general capacity in disembarkation ports in France or in other large centers, away from the firing line. Applicants for appointment to these posts must be men "of mature experience, outstanding personality, and of exceptional caliber in every way." No preliminary training at the Chaplains' School will be required of them. It is added that applications are being received by the Rev. Clyde F. Armitage, Secretary of the General Committee on Army and Navy Chaplains, Woodward Building, Washington, D. C. Another item of interest is the new Navy ruling, according to which the uniform of the chaplains now becomes identical with that of other officers. In place of the single-breasted clerical coat and black braid, they are now to wear the regulation double-breasted coat, gold braid on sleeve and cap, and epaulets of the same type as for other officers.

Laws to Abolish Illiteracy

THREE drastic educational bills, aimed as a "blow at illiteracy," were recently enacted into law by the New York legislature. "Education," says the Knickerbocker Press of Albany, "is no guarantee of morals, but the absence of any schooling is a real source of danger." The three measures are thus summarized:

> The first provides for the training of teachers to give instruction to illiterates over the age of sixteen. The second makes it mandatory for all minors between the ages of sixteen and twenty-one, who have not such ability to speak, read and write English as is required for the completion of the fifth grade in the public schools, to attend either day or evening classes until they have reached that standing. They may go either to public, private, parochial or industrial schools, and either day or night, as they wish, but sufficient penalties are provided, both for the minors and for those who have control of them or who employ them in violation of the act, to make sure that they will get the required instruction. The third bill provides for the establishment and maintenance in cities and in union free school districts of the classes necessary to carry out the plan.

It is of the utmost importance that Catholics take an active interest in the education of the immigrant. Opportunities should be provided for all Catholic immigrants to receive their patriotic training through Catholic sources. Our school buildings can readily be used for this purpose in the evenings, while our Catholic parish organizations can supply an efficient teaching staff. The New York legislation is typical of similar laws that will doubtless be enacted elsewhere. The Church in America could desire no better opportunity than this for the exercise of her Divine apostolate, while Catholics can repay in no better way the lasting debt of gratitude they owe their native land.

K. of C. Follow the Flag

TO their familiar slogan, "Everybody Welcome and Everything Free," the K. of C. have added the new watchword: "Follow the Flag!" This implies that wherever American troops may be stationed, there will the Knights of Columbus be found at their service. They have recently opened a club in London and have decided to erect recreation huts for such of our fighting men as by mischance may be interned in Switzerland. No small part of the work of the Knights of Columbus secretaries, we are furthermore told, consists in finding information concerning soldiers at the request of friends at home. "The case has yet to be recorded where the efforts of a chaplain or a secretary have failed to bring eagerly awaited news to those who desire it." So too a letter addressed to a soldier and given in care of the K. of C. is certain to find its destination. But more and more men are needed who are willing to devote their skill and their energy to the boys in camp or at the front, men between forty and fifty years of age, machinists, traffic managers, bookkeepers, stenographers and others eager for this service. Even when the 2,000 men called for now are enlisted, there will still constantly be need for more. The last party sailing for France included, besides a number of chaplains, seventy secretaries and the famous major league ball player, "Johnny Evers." We are assured that the national pastime is nowhere more popular than with the boys "over there." All the home activities are at present consolidated, at the Order's headquarters in New Haven, under the direction of William J. McGinley, Supreme Secretary of the Knights of Columbus.

Soldier and Sailor Insurance

THE popularity of the Soldier and Sailor Insurance may be gaged by the fact that up to June 28 the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance had written $21,566,000,000 insurance, representing 2,570,455 applications. The average amount of insurance applied for is $8,387. In some battalions and regiments every man has taken out an insurance, while in certain units every man is insured for the maximum $10,000. General Pershing recently sent the following cablegram to Secretary McAdoo:

> All ranks of the American Expeditionary Forces appreciate deeply the generous measure the Government has taken to provide insurance for their families, in proof of which more than 90 per cent of men have taken out insurance. To wisely provision for their loved ones heartens our men and strengthens the bonds that unite the Army and people in our strong determination to triumph in our most righteous cause.

Thus the Government insurance is looked upon in the army as an element of victory.

A Ruby Fund for the Colored Missions

REFERENCE to jubilee celebrations is rarely made in our pages, but there is one we must not overlook for the sake of the cause it represents. Forty years ago, on August 4, Mgr. John E. Burke, General Director of the Catholic Board for Mission Work Among the Colored People, received the plenitude of the holy priesthood. Soon after, when Cardinal McCloskey decided to establish a church for the colored Catholics of the eastern metropolis, the young levite volunteered for the work. The entire energy of his heart and soul were thenceforth given to the race which in many ways has suffered such cruel wrongs at our hands. We can well understand, therefore, with what enthusiasm he entered upon the larger field of national apostolate which opened up to him when in 1907 the Colored Mission Board was created and the vast territory it embraced was entrusted to his zeal. Yet it is not of this that we wish to write here, but rather of what is of greater practical moment at the present time, and that is the "Ruby Fund." So far from accepting any personal gifts, Mgr. Burke has himself offered the first donation towards a $40,000 jubilee fund which is to be placed out at interest for the great cause he represents, and which is to be held in reserve while additions will gradually be made to it. Although his own modest request is confined to $40,000, the Catholics of the United States will certainly forget that it is only his fortieth year, or will double or treble that sum. He writes:

> We beg every bishop and priest in the country to send us at least one dollar for the fund. Every religious community of men and women, every school, college and academy; yes, every society of every church we pray to have on its list of subscribers. Who will begrudge this small offering? Who cannot afford it?

Several of the clergy have already remembered Mgr. Burke with a check of $40.00, and a New York lady, enclosing a check of $50.00, quite properly remarks in her letter that New York alone, which has witnessed his labors and struggles for the colored race since 1883, should round out the full sum that is asked for the noble work of giving the negroes the Faith.

President Indorses U. S. Employment Service

THE great strain placed upon our industries by the war calls at the present moment for the utmost husbanding of our available manpower. The purpose of the Government is to centralize all the recruiting agencies of civilian labor engaged in war work. We here give in its entirety the message of the President:

> For more than a year it has been our pride that not our armies and navies only, but our whole people is engaged in a righteous war. We have said repeatedly that industry plays as essential and honorable a role in this great struggle as do our military armaments. We all recognize the truth of this, but we must also see its necessary implications—namely, that industry, doing a vital task for the nation, must receive the support and assistance of the nation. We must recognize that it is a natural demand—almost a right—of anyone serving his country, whether employer or employee, to know that his service is being used in the most effective manner possible. In the case of labor this wholesome desire has been not a little thwarted owing to the changed conditions which war has created in the labor market.
> There has been much confusion as to essential products. There has been ignorance of conditions—men have gone hundreds of miles in search of a job and wages which they might have found at their doors. Employers holding Government contracts of the highest importance have competed for workers with holders of similar contracts, and even with the Government itself, and have conducted expensive campaigns for recruiting labor in sections where the supply of labor was already exhausted. California draws its unskilled labor from as far east as Buffalo, and New York from as far west as the Mississippi. Thus labor has been induced to move fruitlessly from one place to another, congesting the railways and losing both time and money.
> Such a condition is unfair alike to employer and employee, but most of all to the nation itself, whose existence is threatened by any decrease in its productive power. It is obvious that this situation can be clarified and equalized by a central agency—the United States Employment Service of the Department of Labor, with the counsel of the War Labor Policies Board as the voice of all the industrial agencies of the Government. Such a central agency must have sole direction of all recruiting of civilian workers in war work; and, in taking over this great responsibility, must at the same time have power to assure to essential industry an adequate supply of labor, even to the extent of withdrawing workers from non-essential production. It must also protect labor from insincere and thoughtless appeals made to it under the plea of patriotism, and assure it that when it is asked to volunteer in some priority industry, the need is real.
> Therefore, I solemnly urge all employers engaged in war work to refrain after August 1, 1918, from recruiting unskilled labor in any manner except through this central agency [The United States Employment Service]. I urge labor to respond as loyally as heretofore to any calls issued by this agency for voluntary enlistment in essential industry. And I ask them both alike to remember that no sacrifice will have been in vain, if we are able to prove beyond all question that the highest and best form of efficiency is the spontaneous co-operation of a free people.

To bring the U. S. Employment Service to the notice of the public an extensive advertising campaign has been planned, similar to that conducted in the interest of the Liberty Loan and the Red Cross. It is looked upon as the best means of speedily eliminating all the present unnecessary shifting of labor in our essential war industries.

The War.—The Allies have gathered momentum during the past week and have completely ousted the Germans from the Soissons-Chauteau-Thierry-Reims salient. The enemy has extricated himself from the dangerous position in which the reversal of his plans involved him, but he has had to pay a frightful cost, and has been completely defeated in one of the great battles of the war. The victory has been due in large measure to the American troops, not merely on account of the numerical superiority they brought to the Allies, but also because of the very important part they have taken in the battle and the confidence with which their dash, courage and military skill have inspired the French and British. Both these countries, and Germany also, now realize that the soldiers of the United States are equal to the best.

Bulletin, July 29, p.m.-Aug. 5, a.m.

As was the case last week, the principal fighting has taken place on the western and southern sides of the salient. After the capture of Fere-en-Tardenois, the Allies crossed the Ourcq, further south, and captured Seringes. From this point they advanced both north and east. Northwest of Seringes the Allies took Butte de Chalmont, Beugneux, Cramoiselles, Cramaille, Grand Rozoy, Hills 205 and 206 and Hartennes. Later they drove the Germans from the Chaudun Plateau, crossed the Crise River and by getting south of Soissons necessitated the evacuation of the city which they entered on August 2. East of Seringes the Allies pressed forward in a northeasterly direction, taking Sergy, Cierges, Nestles, Chamery, and the Meunière Wood. Later they enlarged their gains by capturing Goussancourt, Coulonges, Aougny and Romigny. The capture of Romigny and the advance of the Allies on the eastern side of the salient which had resulted in the capture of St. Euphraise and Bligny, made it impossible for the Germans to hold Ville-en-Tardenois. Accordingly a general retreat took place on the entire thirty-mile front. The Allies have reached the southern banks of the Vesle from Soissons to Reims, and have taken Fismes. They have also crossed the Vesle at a number of points.

The retreat has apparently made the Germans fearful for their line in Picardy, where they have retired near Albert on an eight-mile front to the east bank of the Ancre, and also on a ten-mile front between Moreuil and Montdidier to the west bank of the Avre.

On August 3 the Administration announced that a new bill, recommending that the selective draft ages be changed so as to include all men from eighteen to forty-five years, inclusive, would be introduced in both Houses on August 5. The bill has been prepared by the War Department and has the approval of President Wilson, and according to official predictions in all probability will become law as soon as Congress reconvenes. Speaking of the measure Secretary Baker said:

The "Man Power" Bill

> All the possible combinations of age limits were carefully studied, and it was found that in order to get the men into Class 1 for the program proposed, eighteen to forty-five was necessary. The bill when introduced, however, will contain a provision authorizing the President to call men out of Class 1 by classes, according to ages, so that if it is found possible the men between eighteen and nineteen will be called out later than the older men who are found eligible to Class 1. This will undoubtedly have the effect of taking men who are otherwise deferred and putting them into useful labor, but it does not conscript anybody for labor. It is purely a military matter.

Senator Chamberlain, Chairman of the Senate Military Committee, commented on the proposed legislation as follows:

> The bill will remove all danger that it will be necessary to invade classes two, three and four of the present draft, I believe. We can get enough men from the eighteen to forty-five class without going into those classes.
> My understanding of the number of men who will be affected by the new draft is that it will be sufficient to provide an army of at least 3,000,000 or 4,000,000 in France and keep up the training of as many more at home. This cannot be done unless we change the draft ages in the manner suggested.

Estimates of the number of men affected by the bill, if it becomes law, vary from 13,000,000 to 16,000,000. The former figure, which is that submitted by General Crowder in his annual report, includes 3,087,063 in the class of eighteen to twenty, and 10,683,249 in the class of thirty-one to forty-five. Of the eighteen-to-twenty class the percentage of those unmarried is ninety-six. Of the thirty-one-to-forty-five class twenty-three per cent are unmarried, of whom, according to General Crowder, the Provost Marshal, 1,389,338 will be available for military duty.

On August 3 General March, Chief of Staff, announced that 300,000 men had been transported to Europe during the month of July, and that 1,320,000 Americans were now in France, Belgium and Italy, of whom 1,000,000 were under General Pershing in his own area, the rest being brigaded with other generals. Of all those embarked about 300 have been lost. On the same day the British Secretary of the Admiralty announced that the British warships and auxiliary craft at the present time amounted to a displacement of 6,500,000 tons against 2,500,000 tons in August, 1914, representing in spite of the 750,000 tons which had been lost, an increase of 160 per cent. He said that in April, May and June of 1918 the output of the world's tonnage had exceeded losses from all causes by 100,000 tons. Speaking of the success of the convoy system he declared that since the system had been introduced only 0.61 per cent of the 61,691,000 tons convoyed had been sunk. The Americans, he said, had transported nearly one-half of their own troops; and Great Britain, since August, 1914, had transported nearly 20,000,000 men to different destinations, 2,000,000 animals and 11,000,000 tons of naval and military stores.

Ireland.—On July 29 a motion by John Dillon, the Nationalist leader, condemning the Government's Irish policy was defeated by a vote of 245 to 106. Mr. Dillon suggested that the Irish question be referred to President Wilson for solution, but Premier Asquith replied that it was too much to ask of the American President at this time, and the problem was one that the British people would have to settle themselves. It was of overwhelming importance, said the Premier, and the Government should bestir itself to settle it even at the eleventh hour. The Labor party supported Mr. Dillon's motion, and its spokesman, Mr. Adamson, declared that the Irish question could be settled by a generous measure of Home Rule, and the British people ought to grant it at once. The Nationalist leader maintained that the question of Ireland was a war question, and that was why he introduced it at this time. How could Great Britain, he asked, put before the world as one of her objects in the war the freeing of small nationalities when there was Ireland lying at her back door "under the unhappy tyranny of a military government?" The way to conquer German plots, continued the Nationalist leader, was not to break faith with the Irish people but to win their sympathy. No one in Ireland believed in any pledge of the British Government or that the Government would stick to any policy whatever. The Government should abandon all coercive measures at once. Mr. Devlin remarked that the Nationalists had done their share in sending recruits to the army. Deducting from Ulster's contribution those who were Nationalists, Mr. Devlin declared that the figures stood 38,000 for Ulster and 55,000 for the Nationalists. After the Nationalists had converted England to Home Rule through forty years of constitutional action they had been denied what they had won, and the Sinn Fein had received its chance. The Nationalists now proposed to the Government to put in operation the principles which President Wilson declared the Allies were fighting for. Recruits could be gained in Ireland by establishing a governmental system there, based on the people's will, and intrusting recruiting to an Irish Parliament. Secretary Shortt, he said, would no more succeed in his policy than his predecessors had done. Mr. Shortt replied that the Government did not wish to enforce conscription if it could be avoided, but that no help had come from the Nationalists in the present difficulty. Ireland was now exceedingly prosperous, he continued, a very small use had been made of the Crimes Act, and he hoped that something might be done to make her contented, so that an era of good feeling might be inaugurated that would make it possible to pass a Home Rule measure. A year ago the whole country desired to have such a measure passed, but it could not be passed today at any general election in England. The Secretary then appealed to all the Irish members to do all they could to make recruiting a success in Ireland.

The Debate in the House of Commons

Bonar Law, in a statement following the debate, declared: "John Dillon never came within 100 miles of the real difficulties of the problem; the solution does not rest in the differences between Englishmen and Irishmen but between Irishmen and Irishmen." Press comment on the debate varies. The Sheffield Telegraph states:

> Dillon's suggestion that President Wilson should be asked to decide the Irish question is not a very helpful contribution to the problem. In the first place, the English people never would accept the mediation of another State in this question; in the second place, it is not likely that President Wilson would be willing to accept such an invidious position.

The Evening Star believes the electorate will take a hand in solving the problem:

> Dillon said with regard to the war that he stands where he stood in 1914; for him it is a war on which the liberties of mankind depend, and he bitterly resents the action of the Government which is driving Ireland out of it.
> There is no doubt that Ireland was in the war with her whole heart until the illimitable stupidity of our professional politicians alienated her manhood. Dillon now appeals from the professional politicians to a jury of Americans to be appointed by President Wilson.
> Our professional politicians are shocked by this proposal, but if they cannot or will not settle the Irish question themselves sooner or later it will be taken out of their feeble hands by the disgusted electorate. Unless all the parties combine to save Ireland there will be a revolt against the statesmen who are incapable of statesmanship.

And the Daily Mail concludes:

> We cannot get rid of Ireland by ignoring or coercing her, nor can we dispose of the Irish question by affecting to treat it as a dead issue. Sooner or later it will arise to plague us; it will embarass us at the peace conference; it will be a source of discord—perhaps now the last one—between the United States and ourselves; it will weaken us both during the war and after it.

All the Irish papers carry the full text of the Mansion House Statement. It is signed by the Lord Mayor of Dublin, "Chairman of a Conference of representative Irishmen whose names follow: Joseph Devlin, John Dillon, Michael Egan, Thomas Johnson, William O'Brien (Labor), T. M. Healy, William O'Brien, Thomas Kelly, John MacNeill, acting in the place of E. De Valera, and A. Griffith, deported 18th of May, 1918, to separate prisons in England, without trial or accusation—communication with whom has been cut off." The Statement is addressed to the President of the United States, and its opening paragraphs read:

The Mansion House Statement

Sir—When, a century and a half ago, the American colonies dared to assert the ancient principle that the subject should not be taxed without the consent of his representatives, England strove to crush them. Today England threatens to crush the people of Ireland if they do not accept a tax, not in money but in blood, against the protest of their representatives.

During the American Revolution, the champions of your liberties appealed to the Irish Parliament against British aggression, and asked for a sympathetic judgment on their action. What the verdict was, history records. Today it is our turn to appeal to the people of America. We seek no more fitting prelude to that appeal than the terms in which your forefathers greeted ours:

> We are desirous of possessing the good opinion of the virtuous and humane. We are peculiarly desirous of furnishing you with the true state of our motives and objects, the better to enable you to judge of our conduct with accuracy, and determine the merits of the controversy with impartiality and precision.

If the Irish race had been conscriptable by England in the war against the united colonies, is it certain that your Republic would today flourish in the enjoyment of its noble Constitution?

Since then the Irish Parliament has been destroyed, by methods described by the greatest of British statesmen as those of "blackguardism and baseness," Ireland, deprived of its protection and overborne by more than six to one in the British Lower House, and by more than a hundred to one in the Upper House, is summoned by England to submit to a hitherto-unheard-of decree against her liberties.

The document continues to discuss the points at issue between England and Ireland. Conscription raises a sovereign principle between the two nations, provoking the fundamental issue of self-determination. "While self-determination is refused, we are required by law to bleed to make the world safe for democracy in every country except our own. Surely this cannot be the meaning of America's message to mankind glowing from the pen of her illustrious President." From eight millions seventy years ago the population of Ireland has dwindled to four and a half millions, "and it is from this residuum that our manhood between the ages of eighteen and fifty-one is to be delivered up in such measure as the strategists of the English War Cabinet may demand." The Parliaments of Australia and South Africa refused to adopt conscription, and "this was well known when the law against Ireland was resolved upon." "For opposing the application of this law to Irishmen and while this appeal was being penned, members of our Conference have been arrested and deported without trial. It was even sought to poison the wells of American sympathy by leveling against them and others an allegation which its authors have failed to submit to the investigation of any tribunal."

The Mansion House Statement covers every point in the historic relations of England and Ireland, and in conclusion states: "In every generation the Irish Nation is challenged to plead to a new indictment, and to the present summons answer is made before no narrow forum but to the tribunal of the world. So answering we commit our cause, as did America, to the 'virtuous and humane,' and also more humbly to the Providence of God." Up to the present the press in the United States has not carried the Mansion House Statement.

All public gatherings have been forbidden in Ireland unless official permission has been obtained for holding them, and the Sinn Fein, the Irish Volunteers, the Cumann Na Mban and the Gaelic League have been declared dangerous and "are designed to terrorize the peaceful and law-abiding subjects of his Majesty in Ireland." The proclamation of the Gaelic League is a surprise, as it was founded more than twenty years ago to foster the Irish language and includes in its membership people of every creed and shade of political opinion.

Proclamation of Ireland

Russia.—The result of the recent negotiations between Japan and the United States regarding the best way to help Russia was announced on August 3 by Mr. Frank L. Polk, Acting Secretary of State. After stating that the purpose of the military force entering Siberia is "to render such protection and help as is possible to the Czecho-Slovaks against the armed Austrian and German prisoners who are attacking them, and to steady any efforts at self-government or self-defense in which the Russians themselves may be willing to accept assistance," the proclamation continues:

America and Japan to Aid Russia

> The Government of the United States has, therefore, proposed to the Government of Japan that each of the two Governments send a force of a few thousand men to Vladivostok, with the purpose of cooperating as a single force in the occupation of Vladivostok and in safeguarding, so far as it may, the country to the rear of the westward-moving Czecho-Slovaks, and the Japanese Government has consented.
> In taking this action, the Government of the United States wishes to announce to the people of Russia in the most public and solemn manner that it contemplates no interference with the political sovereignty of Russia, no intervention in her internal affairs—not even in the local affairs of the limited areas which her military force may be obliged to occupy—and no impairment of her territorial integrity, either now or hereafter, but that what we are about to do has as its single and only object the rendering of such aid as shall be acceptable to the Russian people themselves in their endeavors to regain control of their own affairs, their own territory, and their own destiny.

Mr. Polk announces that the Allied Powers have assented in principle to the proposed plan and that the United States hopes to send into Siberia along with the military force, a commission of merchants, agricultural experts, labor advisers, Red Cross representatives, and agents of the Young Men's Christian Association to spread useful information, render educational help, and relieve the immediate economic necessities of the people, as opportunity offers.

On August 2 the Official Gazette at Tokio published a similar proclamation announcing the impending dispatch of troops to Vladivostok, protesting the Japanese Government's sincere friendship for the Russian people and reaffirming its avowed policy of respecting the territorial integrity of Russia, and of abstaining from all interference in her internal politics. They further declare that upon the realization of the objects above indicated they will immediately withdraw all Japanese troops from Russian territory, and will leave wholly unimpaired the sovereignty of Russia in all its phases, whether political or military.

Japan has loaned the Siberian Government $250,000,000 for the formation of a strong army.

News came via Amsterdam on July 31 that Field Marshal von Eichhorn and his adjutant, Captain von Dressler were killed by a bomb which was thrown at them as they were driving through the streets of Kiev, the capital of the Ukraine. The assassin, a youth of 23, was an agent of the Social Revolutionists of the Left in Moscow.

Von Eichhorn Assassinated

The London Daily Express remarks that the violent end of Von Eichhorn will cause no surprise to those who knew how bitterly he was hated by the Ukrainians owing to his cruel exactions. The paper continues:

From the very beginning Eichhorn treated the Ukrainians as slaves, whose only reason for living was to see that Germany obtained enough food from the land. His first measure was to force the peasants under the most severe penalties to cultivate the land for the Germans' benefit. His last was to fix a price for corn which would enable the Germans to obtain bread more cheaply, but which would absolutely ruin the Ukraine peasants and landowners. The climax was reached when he had two popular members of the first Ukraine Government arrested and sentenced to various terms of imprisonment for plotting against Germany. The sentence of the German field tribunal last week caused general indignation.

After the assassination of Von Eichhorn more than 500 persons were arrested, including ex-Premier Winneschinks and many members of the Constitutional Democratic party, and martial law was proclaimed throughout the province.

New proofs of the control Germany is exerting over the Bolshevist Government at Moscow reached Washington on July 30. For the Allied embassies which recently left Vologda, on the advice of the Bolshevist Foreign Minister, were refused permission to land at Archangel by the local Soviet, which acted under orders received from Moscow. Soon after, however, a revolution against the Bolsheviki of Archangel and in favor of the Allies was successfully carried through, the Soviet troops fleeing from the city and the Allies occupying it.

According to the Associated Press, refugees from the Russian Provinces occupied by German troops report a growing hatred of the peasants for the invaders. In the neighborhood of Pskov, Esthonia, the confiscation of foodstuffs by the Germans led to uprisings which were mercilessly put down, and the natives are now menaced with starvation. The working classes of Riga are almost destitute too, the Germans allowing each person only one pound of bread a month. Conditions in Petrograd, an Associated Press correspondent writes, are growing worse and worse. He says:

Fighting Starvation and Anarchy

Long lines form early in the morning before the shops to buy food. Thousands storm incoming trains in a wild scramble for food brought in by peasants and traveling soldiers. In front of every shop window where foodstuffs are displayed people stand and gaze longingly with their eyes glued to the window-panes.

One need not be surprised if the lady dressed in silks and satins—once a member of the bourgeoisie—who sells him a biscuit on the corner addresses him in any of the two or three foreign languages she knows. Then, one may buy newspapers from graybeards in frock coats and silk hats and former army officers in shiny boots. All are trying to earn a livelihood in the "commune" of Petrograd, where property is confiscated and incomes have vanished. Some of those on the Nevsky are girls, pretty ones, and they walk the long length of the street all the day and into the night asking for the little postage stamps that pass for money in Russia now—because they are hungry.

One of the mysteries of Russia is where the vendors of cakes and biscuits get the things they sell. There is absolutely no flour to be had, and the bread allowance per person, which one sometimes gets and sometimes doesn't, is one-half of a pound daily for the proletariat and one-eighth of a pound daily for the bourgeoisie. The bread is black and heavy, and its ingredients cannot be identified. Sugar cannot be obtained in the shops. In the homes, horse meat, dried cabbage, and what bread is available constitute the principle diet for the majority. Eggs, butter and milk are high in price and extremely scarce.

Mr. Gregory M. Ignatieff, a member of the Russian Supply Committee, on his return to this country not long ago was interviewed by a New York Times reporter regarding conditions in Moscow:

Mr. Ignatieff stated that it was the custom of the Soviet Government to treat the Red Guards exceedingly well, in order to retain their loyalty. Not only would they be well paid, well clothed and well fed, better than any other class of the population, but ordinarily the Red Guards would be billetted around to the best houses in the city, every bourgeois family being compelled to receive at least one Red Guard as a permanent inhabitant in the household.

There seems to be no other purpose in this practice than to make the families of the middle class as miserable as possible. It is not uncommon to see a Red Guard enthroned in the best room of a bourgeois household, watching the other members of the family with a rifle across his knee.

As for the present situation in Moscow, Minister Ira Nelson Morris of Stockholm lately reported to Washington that wholesale arrests were taking place in Moscow, that the jails are overcrowded and other places are being converted into prisons.

Christian Science as a Financial Asset

FRANCES BEATTIE

WHEN Mrs. Mary Baker Eddy wrote the "Church Manual" of the First Church of Christ, Scientist, wherein the Rules and Regulations and By-Laws and sundry other laws are laid down, it must be remembered that she was not attempting to create a monopoly, or to build a little financial fence around "Science" for all days to come. We have her own word for it in "Miscellaneous Writings." For an extract from this volume, following the title page in the "Church Manual," tells the reader that the Rules and By-Laws are not "arbitrary opinions nor dictatorial demands," but genuine dyed-in-the-wool inspirations, "impelled by a power not one's own."

It will be remembered that one of the inspired rules (Article XXI, Sections 1, 2 and 3, pages 63 and 64), dealt exclusively with the reading rooms of the Christian Science Church. Wherever there is such a church, there is also a reading room, not as a part of the church, but usually located in the heart of a city, occupying a store or office building. Section 1 says that "each church of the Christian Science denomination shall have a Reading Room, though two or more churches may unite [though they seldom or never do] in having Reading Rooms, provided these rooms are "well located." Section 2 says that "The individuals who take charge of the Reading Rooms of The Mother Church shall be elected by the Christian Science Board of Directors, subject to the approval of Mary Baker Eddy." Section 3 ordains that "The literature sold or exhibited in the Reading Rooms of Christian Science churches shall consist only of 'Science and Health with Key to the Scriptures,' by Mary Baker Eddy, and other writings by this author; also the literature published or sold by The Christian Science Publishing Society." The inspired writer goes a step farther in Article XXV, Section 6, in protecting the rights of Mrs. Eddy and the Publishing Society, by the decree, pages 81 and 82:

> Only the Publishing Society of The Mother Church selects, approves and publishes the books and literature it sends forth. If Mary Baker Eddy disapproves of certain books and literature, the Society will not publish them. The Committee on Publication are in no manner connected with these functions. A book or an article of which Mrs. Eddy is the author shall not be published nor republished by this Society without her knowledge or consent.

The Committee on Publication, to be sure, cannot feel aggrieved by this clipping of their wings, since it is not the result of "arbitrary opinions nor dictatorial demands, such as one person might impose on another. * * * They sprang from necessity." The future financial welfare of the Christian Science Publishing Society, as well as the material welfare of Mrs. Eddy, were, of necessity, provided for by this friend from on high. First, the reading rooms are made an absolute necessity; a Science church cannot be established or recognized, until this "ordained" By-Law has been fulfilled. Each church, too, must have these reading rooms. With three churches in a town, or only one reading room, the business of the Publishing Society might suffer one-third; hence, the provisions that "sprang from necessity."

The reading rooms, further, must confine their labors to the products of the Christian Science Publishing Society exclusively. In order to furnish a reading room properly, the first requisite seems to be a photogravure of Mrs. Eddy. The size "specially adapted for reading rooms," according to the advertisements of the Publishing Society, in the June number of the Christian Science Journal, may be obtained for the small sum of $3.50. The Publishing Society advertises other prints of Mrs. Eddy at $1.00 and $2.00 each, but specializes in the $3.50 picture, as a reading-room adjunct. Suppose the inspired voice, dictating the "Church Manual" to Mrs. Eddy had overlooked this little detail—imagine the sad condition of three churches located in the same town, but with only one reading room, for the Society would lose the profit on two photogravures. Such a condition in one town, multiplied by similar conditions around the world, and the omission of so trifling a detail would perhaps spell a financial tragedy to the Publishing Society. "A Photogravure of The Mother Church and the Publishing House" sells for $5.00, other prints of the church slide down to $3.50 and $1.25 each, but no Christian Science reading room would consider anything less than the $5.00 print. Then there are post-cards of the Mother Church, Sunday-school supplies and a great array of pamphlets and periodicals. A reading room, even a Christian Science reading room, can hardly exist without well-filled shelves and the forty-two or more pamphlets stocked up in quantities, besides all the periodicals and publications, represent a neat cash outlay for each reading room.

Moreover, the books published by this agent of a higher power are by no means to be considered in the cut-rate class. A previous article dealt with the prices of the volumes which are a necessity to every well-regulated Scientist, but all the works of the Christian Science Publishing Society should be also necessities among the faithful. The "Miscellaneous Writings" of Mrs. Eddy, for example, wherein she explains the Divine origin of her demands, sells for from $2.25 to $5.00 per volume. "The First Church of Christ" and more "Miscellany" sells for $2.25 to $4.00 a copy, according to binding, while the "Concordance to Science and Health" comes a little higher, selling for $4.50 and $5.00 a copy. The "Concordance to Mrs. Eddy's Published Writings other than Science and Health" climbs a step higher and sells for $6.00 a copy; "Christ and Christmas" goes for $3.00, with a cheaper volume at $2.50; "Unity of Good" sells for $3.25 and $3.50 a copy, and so on down the list, most of the books selling at about the same price, though the "Messages to The Mother Church," by Mrs. Eddy may be had from $0.25 to $1.50 each. From the sale of all the foregoing publications the Christian Science Publishing Company has managed to keep the wolf from the door.

The Divine inspiration sent Mrs. Eddy far into the field of finance, for Article VIII, Section 13, page 44, elects that "Every member of The Mother Church shall pay annually a per capita tax of not less than $1, which shall be forwarded each year to the Church Treasurer." Which means a steady flow of dollars into the treasury, for to become a member is the goal which every loyal Christian Scientist hopes one day to reach. Readers in all branch churches must be members of the Mother Church. In order to become a member of that church, it is only necessary that the applicant be a "believer in the doctrines of Christian Science, according to the platform and teaching contained in the Christian Science textbook, Science and Health with Key to the Scriptures, by Rev. Mary Baker Eddy. The Bible, together with Science and Health and other works by Mrs. Eddy, shall be his only text-books for self-instruction in Christian Science, and for teaching and practicing metaphysical healing." (Article IV, Section 1, page 34.)

Another little financial detail is provided for in the "Church Manual," in an inspired chapter dealing with the teaching of Christian Science. Article XXVI, Section 1, page 83, provides that "teaching Christian Science shall not be a question of money, but of morals and religion, healing and uplifting the race." Section 2 provides that "Christian Scientists who are teachers shall carefully select for pupils such only as have good past records and promising proclivities toward Christian Science." He is enjoined to "promote their progress," not only during the term of the class, but after it, and to "watch well that they prove sound in sentiment and practical in Christian Science." Moreover, he shall "persistently and patiently counsel his pupils in conformity with the unerring laws of God," [as witness the "Church Manual"] "and shall enjoin them habitually to study the Scriptures and Science and Health with Key to the Scriptures as a help thereto."

Section 4, page 84, provides that "The teachers of Christian Science shall teach but one class yearly, which class shall consist of not more than thirty pupils. After 1907, the Board of Education shall have one class triennially, a Normal Class not exceeding thirty pupils." Section 5 provides that "A student's price for teaching Christian Science shall not exceed $100 per pupil." With thirty in a class this insures, by Divine command, an income of $3,000 a year for spreading the doctrine of Christian Science. Article XXX, Section 7, page 92, provides, however, that "If both husband and wife are duly qualified to teach Christian Science, either one, not both, shall teach yearly one class."

But "A member of this church shall not teach pupils Christian Science unless he has a certificate to show that he has been taught by Mrs. Eddy or has taken a Normal Course at the Massachusetts Metaphysical College or in the Board of Education." It is provided elsewhere (Article XXX, Section 4, page 91), that the "tuition for class instruction in the Board of Education shall be one hundred dollars." Just how long the regular terms of instruction last, apparently rests with the will of the teacher, but the sessions of the Normal Course must not continue more than one week. "The term of the Massachusetts Metaphysical College will open, etc. * * * The sessions will continue not over one week." Article XXX, Section 1. Section 2 provides that:

> Not less than two thorough lessons by a well-qualified teacher shall be given to each Normal class on the subject of mental practice and malpractice. One student in the class shall prepare a paper on said subject that shall be read to the class, thoroughly discussed and understood; this paper shall be given to the teacher and he shall not allow it or a copy of it to remain, but shall destroy this paper.

Finally, to receive a degree, a teacher must be a member of the Mother Church! Who but a Divine power could foretell that back-sliders would exist in the Christian Science fold? The "Church Manual" says (Article XXVI, Section 8, page 85): "A loyal teacher of Christian Science may teach and receive into his association the pupils of another member of this church who has so strayed as justly to be deemed, under the provisions of Article XII, Section 1, not ready to lead his pupils." The last article quoted, page 55, reads:

> For sufficient reasons, it may be decided that a teacher has so strayed as not to be fit for the work of a reader in church or a teacher of Christian Science. Although repentant and forgiven by the church and retaining his membership, this weak member shall not be counted loyal till after three years of exemplary character. Then the Board of Directors may decide if his loyalty has been proved by uniform maintenance of the life of a consistent, consecrated Christian Scientist.

Again, Article XXVII, Section 2: "These beloved brethren whose teacher has left them, can elect an experienced Christian Scientist, who is not in charge of an association of students and who is ready for this high calling, to conduct the meetings of their association."

The Divine leader of the way, however, fails to specify what financial arrangement follows in such cases, as tuition in the art of Science is invariably paid in advance, though cases have been known where seekers of the light have been known to make payments on the installment plan, care being taken that the payments were completed, before the pupil completed the course.

But the "Roman Catholics," alas, are black-listed by the Divine power. They may be healed, but they are preordained to grope ever in darkness, for "impelled by a power not one's own," Mrs. Mary Baker Eddy was forced to write, in Article XXVII, Section 4, page 87, that "Neither the Pastor Emeritus nor a member of this church shall teach Roman Catholics Christian Science, except it be with the written consent of the authority of their Church." This is probably the only instance in which "Thou Shalt Not" has been said to Mrs. Eddy, but, moved with compassion, perchance, the section quoted concludes with this ray of hope: "Choice of patients is left to the wisdom of the practitioner, and Mrs. Eddy is not to be consulted on this subject." So, a Catholic, suffering with tuberculosis or cancer, or dangerously wounded at the front, may be received as a patient, the healing being left to "the wisdom of the practitioner." The next article will show how carefully Mrs. Eddy was protected by the Divine power, from "mental malpractice," as well as from other things.

Prestige and Publicity

RICHARD A. MUTTKOWSKI

AMONG the blessings arising from the great war the moral revival is frequently named as the most prominent. Men once more speak openly of Christianity, of sin and redemption, of God and His justice, of faith and hereafter. Clergymen especially are overjoyed and hope much for the future. Yet they overlook the fact that the future lies in the hands of the leaders and especially the educators. This is not to signify that these leaders, as a body, cannot think or say wrong, but their ideas, their beliefs of today are likely to be those of the public tomorrow. I have in mind especially the educators. In general, these are rationalists and materialists that are little concerned with the religious awakening. While they "deprecate the declining birth-rate," as Dr. Walsh points out (AMERICA, July 6), they are busy continuing and enlarging the present program which will insure the further spread of the very thing they deprecate.

Of the Catholic educational system and its ideals and practices educators are cognizant only to the extent of opposing the parochial schools and stigmatizing them as "undemocratic." The National Educational Association advocates a ministry of education similar to that found in most European countries. While in itself a good plan, what can be expected when its leaders are already committed to what they call a "program of democratic schools"? Private schools, specifically parochial schools, "are undemocratic," they hold with Dr. Dewey of Columbia University, and "must be abolished." They deprecate the existence of these schools and term them "distinctly second-class." It is known, of course, that this "second-class" reproach is extended only too readily to everything Catholic, be it educational, economic, political, or otherwise. To one familiar with Catholic achievement the frequent and often studied discrimination in history, in science, the arts, and the press, are as astonishing as provoking. On numerous occasions, in articles, editorials, and book-reviews, AMERICA has deplored the disregard of Catholic authorities by specialists, a disregard amounting to insult. It is an old procedure and yet it leaves Catholics indifferent. Why? Of course, Catholics are accustomed to slights. But inaction in the face of years of insults and slights has results in loss of prestige. Someone, I forget who, has said: "Everything Catholic lacks prestige." Prestige! An eloquent word. "Weight or influence arising from reputation," the "Century" defines it. As far as reputation goes, the "reputation" of the Catholic Church is perhaps the most baffling to define because of the complexity of the Church. Catholics know it not, and her enemies know it still less. But Catholics have trusted too much in the spuriousness of the attacks, in the Divine assurance of impregnability, in the fact that so many enemies became ardent followers. In short, Catholics were so proud of the Faith to which they were born that they became slothful in their pride, and permitted "a reputation" to be foisted on the Church. Let me point out briefly the "prestige" resulting from this "reputation."

"History," says Dr. Walsh, "has long been a conspiracy against the truth." Lecturers on the position of the Church in politics, on her relations to the State and to the people, reveal an attitude so unsympathetic, so biased, that it ought to be clear to any auditor that such an account can only be prejudiced. Inimical sources are quoted on Catholic topics, while the works of Janssen, Grisar, Griffin, Walsh, Ranke, and many others are ignored. Yet such lectures, transcribed into published volumes, form the text-books and syllabi of our colleges and schools. Indeed, perversion has gone so far that even Catholics, because of this constant iteration, come to believe as true that "The Church opposes progress and deprecates knowledge."

In the field of economics the specialists are prone to point out the Latin countries as "decadent," and frequently mention their Catholicism as the cause of their backwardness. Conversely, industrial nations such as Germany, England, Holland, and the United States, are progressive because of their Protestantism. This is an economic fallacy, as has been so often stated, but the imputation is generally believed, although so splendidly disproved in this war.

In science, in education, and the history of education Andrew White and Draper are regarded as authorities.

How well acquainted most educators are with White and Draper and how indignantly they quote their manufactories, quite as if a refutation had never been written! And here is the psychological quirk. White's statements are accepted as true because "authoritative," and yet they are favorites because attacking authority. "A clergyman reading White must cringe with shame." As a matter of fact, scientists and educators in general seem to be quite unaware that White's statements might be untrue, that a rebuttal to the "Warfare" had been written, or conceivably could be written. This betokens a spirit of unfairness? I would hesitate to call it that. Rather view it in another way. Pressure is so great, the need to be informed on a myriad of topics is so paramount, the incentive for "original" work so continuous, that perforce the existing books are accepted as true when written by "authorities." Or rather, the reputation, the prestige of the writer is accepted, his intellectual honesty being taken for granted. It is supposed that an educated man can write with an unprejudiced mind and with an objective viewpoint. Authors like Draper and White, therefore, are read in good faith. But the truth is not at all tested, or even suspected. With all their reverence for authority educators dispute the authority of the Church, theology is not a science to them and theologians cannot be scientists. White's "Warfare of Science and Theology" is quoted lugubriously as authority against "authority," but Walsh's splendid refutation is passed by. White's gifted falsehoods are accepted as truths, but Walsh's brilliant corrections seem utterly unknown. Where Catholics have achieved prominence the fact of their creed is carefully ignored or regarded pityingly as "a taint of mysticism" in an "otherwise well-balanced mind." If the scientist be priest also, distinction is made between priest and scientist, his achievements being attributed to the "man," as if accomplished despite his priesthood, unless it be of polemical advantage to combine the two, as in the instance of Father Wasmann, the "scientific Jesuit" and "Jesuitical scientist," whom they taunt that he is "unable to divorce his science from his religion."

One would suppose that at least among the arts, especially in painting, sculpture, and architecture, there would be a sympathetic understanding and valuation of the Catholic Middle Ages and of the influence of the Church. Yet here, too, they speak of the "Age of Mysticism" or "the Dark Ages." They go so far as to condemn the Church unreservedly for her "opposition to progress" and "constant oppression of arts," and do not find it contradictory that under the rule of that same Church the arts simultaneously with "oppression" should have progressed so wonderfully. They accept the monumental churches and abbeys, cloisters and hospices, with their treasures of painting, sculptures, and goldsmith's skill, with the feats of engineering and trained skill involved in their construction: these they accept without further thought. These, like the Bible in the Protestant mind, apparently "just happened," happened somehow. Which causes the reflection: If the Dark Ages could bring forth monuments for which our war-news fills us with admiration and astonishment, then the Dark Ages were miraculous indeed. Think of astonishing moderns! The war has again centered our attention on these "feats" of a past age. One might intimate as Providential that millions of our boys are going to France and will behold the churches and galleries, with their treasures of art and endeavor, steeped in history, monuments not of this age, but dating back to the Dark Ages, the products of a period that was loud and demonstrative in its Catholicism. In a subsequent paper we will examine the Catholic's lack of prestige in the field of literature, the press, etc.

Saving the Soldier's Home

GERALD C. TREACY, S.J.

IN A QUIET section of a southern camp, far from the shout of commands and the blinding dust that swept over the fields from the wake of marching squads and companies, a court-martial was in progress. A soldier was on trial for desertion. He had been in the guard house for some offense, and instead of serving his sentence, he broke guard, absented himself without leave for several weeks, and finally gave himself up to the military authorities, walking to the nearest military reservation in citizen's clothes. The points of military law violated were many and well known to the offender, and yet when he took the stand he made this simple statement: "I plead guilty to every charge but desertion. I was getting letters day after day describing the sufferings of my aged mother, and the terrible condition of my home. I could stand it no longer, so I took 'French leave,' and worked until I made enough money to put things at home in a decent condition, and then I gave myself up, prepared to take punishment. I would do the same thing again. I wanted to save my home."

It is to save the soldier's home that the Red Cross has its Home Service branch and no one can overestimate the good that it does. We are prone to think of the Red Cross in terms of hospital and nursing, and very few realize that one of the strongest forces for heartening the man behind the guns is the quiet, all-too-little-known influence of the Red Cross home-worker. In a Red Cross drive it is never featured on poster or advertisement. It cannot be. Yet its supporting arm sustains that which is everything to an army in training or at the front: morale. You may have the best soldier-material in the world; if "blue" letters come through the lines, and the ghosts of home-troubles stalk down company streets, worry enters and efficiency goes from the fighting man. In these days when the whole nation goes to war, the families that have given their all in giving their sons must not be allowed to suffer want and thus bear a double burden. It is the function of the Home Service to see to it that the enlisted man's family shall not want for any of the essentials of decent living in these times of high prices. It is the fitting complement to the Government allotment-plan, and Government insurance. Every Home Service worker has a responsible share in keeping up the courage of the forces in the field. These workers will never have the experience of going overseas to minister to the sick and wounded, yet the morale of the American army is, to a great extent, in their hands, and theirs is the influence, silent but strong, that keeps the flag flying 3,000 miles away from American soil. These volunteers enlist for the time of the war and many devote their entire waking day to the work.

War conditions have affected many families to the extent of breaking down their powers of self-helpfulness. In these cases the Home Service lends a helping hand to prevent the lowering of home-life ideals, and even to anticipate the social consequences of war and block every tendency to deterioration. Again, emergency relief is furnished by the Home Service, when a soldier's family is in financial distress, due to delay in receiving an allotment, a not unusual occurrence when it is remembered that Washington has to make out allotments by the million. As month after month passes and more of our troops are engaged in active warfare the Home Service will have to reach out and give help to the returning soldier and sailor disabled from wounds or disease. To prevent permanent disability will be the supreme task of the Home Service worker, and every effort must be made to carry on the work begun in convalescent homes and Government training shops. To fit men after their military discharge to take up the threads of industrial life and to interest individual employers in these men are functions that will grow as our casualty list grows.

It need hardly be stated that the responsibility of the volunteer Home Service worker is great, as the field of such service is extensive. For the families of soldiers and sailors in the service of the United States are not the only objects of Home Service care. It includes within its sphere the families of soldiers and sailors of the Allied forces, if these families live within the United States, and it stretches out in generous aid to the relatives of civilians who have suffered wounds or death as a direct result of war activities. The Red Cross in this phase of its activity shows great nicety and tact in entering no home without an introduction. At the same time it never fails to give help at the request of a man in the service. Whether the request comes from the soldier or his family or from the chaplain of a regiment. Indeed it has been a big help to the chaplain in camp who is called upon for relief work of one kind or another to have the Red Cross Field Director at his side ever ready to set the wheels of the Home Service bureau in motion and lift a burden from some worried soul in khaki.

Preserving the health of the family is one of the many cares of the Home Service worker. The experience of th Allied nations during this war, especially of France, shows the possibility of the rapid spread of tuberculosis. The first indication of tubercular conditions in members of a family visited are met with prompt treatment by the Red Cross visitor. The attention of the local physician is called to the case and proper care is procured in a hospital, a sanitarium or at home. In cases of acute illness other than tuberculosis, it may easily happen that the advice or care of a specialist is imperative, and the physicians who voluntarily cooperate with the Home Service section are generally able to furnish one. How proper surgical treatment can be procured is illustrated by the following extract from the diary of one Home Service visitor:

> We were asked to furnish crutches in a family for a lame boy of thirteen. He lives with his father, mother, and five brothers and sisters. The oldest boy has enlisted. I found all the others in bad physical condition owing to a combination of insufficient income, poor management, and lack of knowledge of food value, so I took every one of them to a dispensary, where they were examined by specialists. Two doctors examined the boy who "needed crutches." With the consent of his parents and the parish priest, he was operated on with satisfactory results. I am teaching the mother how and what to cook. There is an astonishing physical improvement in every member of the family.

It was Great Britain's mistake in the beginning of the present war to attempt the speeding up of industry at the expense of the health of the working element in her population. President Wilson has pointed out that there is no excuse for America making this mistake. Federal and State laws are on the statute books protecting the worker against unreasonably long hours and unwholesome working conditions. And the Red Cross expects its Home Workers to be familiar with these laws and cooperate in their enforcement. For that reason, twenty-five Institutes on Home Service have been opened in different cities throughout the country to train those who are anxious to do their share in this line of war work. The course in these Institutes calls for four hours of lectures and discussion each week for a term of six weeks, and about twenty-five hours each week are spent in practical work in the Home Service section. Those who complete the work in one of these Institutes with credit are given a certificate by the Red Cross, and a list of "Don'ts" is given the individual worker to call attention to things that ought not to be done. A few of these Don'ts are worth knowing, as they show the efforts of the Red Cross officials to safeguard family privacy:

> Don't discuss the affairs of a family; don't tell the facts that come to your attention in the course of Home Service work to any outsider. Don't give confidential information about the family when making inquiries. Don't make inquiries of the neighbors or do anything that will expose the family to gossip. Protect them as you would your own family from anything that would hurt their self-respect. Don't venture to make permanent plans on a first visit. Don't fail to discover whether there is immediate and urgent need of relief and to make some temporary provision for supplying it before waiting to make further inquiries. Don't fail, however, to inquire (before paying the first visit, if possible) what other agencies, including churches, are interested.

There is no doubt that in the working out of the Home Service idea mistakes may occur, as in the case of the volunteer who, on hearing of the Home Service Section, without more ado, jumped into his auto, and with a Red Cross flag flying, set out to visit every soldier's family in his village. More than that, prejudice or bigotry may be found at times thrusting out their serpent heads beneath the cloak of Home Service. The duty of Catholics who have done and are doing so much for the Red Cross is to batter down prejudice and fight bigotry wherever found. The Home Service idea is good, and has done efficient work for the man in khaki, as anyone who has knowledge of relief work for the soldier can testify. What Lieutenant Gitz-Rice says to the pacifist in his song from the trenches is applicable to the man or woman who criticizes the Home Service plan without making criticism constructive by taking means to correct whatever is found to be faulty in specific instances: "You've got to go in or go under."

Christian Missionary Activities in the East

NEIL BOYTON, S.J.

THE backbone of Protestant missiondom throughout the entire East is America, and it must be a generous Protestant America that gives and gives to support these establishments of our separated Brethren. Protestant missioners east of Suez and west of San Francisco are predominantly American as Catholic missioners, before the world-war, were French.

They are strong in the Europeanized cities of the Orient, but they have also penetrated into the interior. Even in India, where you would expect to find the Church of England the absolute lord of the Protestant missionary fields, you meet the compound of a missionary American. The Celestial Kingdom, or the Celestial Republic as we must call it now, has its quota. And an American is sometimes greeted with the sight of the flag, swaying over the sampan of a missioner, going the rounds of his villages through the endless canals that water the more than endless rice-paddies. Up by the Great Wall, within sight of Central Mongolia, there is a gray-walled village, and by the side of the "foreign" church, flies the Stars and Stripes. Then crossing into the Flowery Kingdom, the evidences of American Protestant missionary work increases. They work in every city of first or second importance, they have spread out into the picturesque country, and there is a Protestant missionary-boat that has spent many years cruising about the islands of the Inland Sea.

All over the East there is a demand for the English language, for English is the commercial tongue of Asia. As it is necessary for the natives to carry on trade with the foreigners, hence there is a constantly increasing demand for schools where the young East Indian, or Chinese, or Japanese may acquire this important language. Our Protestant fellow-countrymen have been quick to recognize this growing demand. They teach English as an aid to their missionary propaganda, and their schools do not lack pupils. As a result the traveler everywhere meets young Orientals, who speak "American" English and speak it fluently.

Another prominent feature of American Protestant missionary work in the East is the opening of numerous dispensaries, where the natives receive free medical advice and treatment. Many American women, who hold trained-nurse's and even doctor's diplomas, are engaged in this work, and there is no question of the hold these lady missioners have on their patients, and the corresponding influence they are able to exert in their districts. The thought often strikes home, what splendid nuns many of these faithful women would be, did they but receive the gift of faith!

But the work of Protestant American missiondom, that stands out stamped as "one hundred per cent American" is the ever-increasing sphere of activity of the Y. M. C. A. We do not usually look on that organization as a foreign-mission enterprise, but a trip through the East changes one's views. In Bombay, Calcutta, Madras, Canton, Hong Kong, Singapore, Shanghai, Pekin, Tokio, and other leading Oriental cities, this organization has substantial buildings, staffed, at least in the principal offices, by vigorous Americans. They display the red triangle, whose three sides symbolize that they give equal attention to the physical, mental, and the moral man. They attract the young by offering opportunities for clean physical exercise. The mental man is taken care of by numerous classes; the most popular being that in which English is taught. On the moral side of the triangle, a "non-Y" observer is forced to the conclusion that their moral training consists principally of "sing-songs" and whatever influence a capable Secretary may obtain by "the personal contact."

But what should interest us Catholics most is the obvious fact that the Y's success in the East is based on the constant use of modern American methods. They pervade the whole establishment. If these, our Protestant missioners, can go into pagan lands and attract Asiatics by the use of new-world ways, what may we not expect from the American Catholic missioners, who will be called or sent into these fields in the next decade.

men, who will Catholicize these attractive American methods, men, guided by the light of the one Faith?

As the backbone of Protestantism in the East is American, so the lion's share of the Catholic Church's work was carried on by French missioners. These, little, bearded, soutaned workers in the fields afar are familiar figures in the Oriental life. Depending on the alms of the Faithful, they have made a franc go, where the Protestant missioner has spent a dollar, or "gold," as Yankee currency is usually referred to in Asia. On these meager sums collected annually, and on the donations of European friends, they have built substantial churches, chapels, schools, hospitals, and orphan asylums. They have built up well-established Catholic settlements in or near the big cities, and they have spread the nets of the Fisherman far into the remotest villages. Where Protestantism has yet to penetrate, these present-day apostles have lived for years.

The big congregation that has sent its members into the greatest parts of the fields afar, is the Missions Etrangères of Paris. Its American equivalent is that baby of bright prospects, Maryknoll, which has just received its first "patch" southwest of Canton. The missioners of this zealous French Foreign Mission Society are literally everywhere. After this big unit comes the work of the various Orders, Congregations, societies of priests, Brothers, and Sisters; the majority natives of France. They are all societies, for missionary activity is not the work of the secular clergy, for it requires the financial aid and the assurance of a supply of reserves that only a religious organization can give.

But the legions of Germany have decimated these French missionary activities, decimated them as effectively as though they had turned machine guns against them. And so today the works of the Catholic Church in teeming Asia, that before the year 1914 gave such promise of a rich harvest, have been arrested, stopped in the very act of advance, and viewing the havoc, one is strongly reminded of No Man's Land after a barrage has been laid down.

This wounded continent looks to Catholic America to take up the splendid work of the European missioners, who have half sowed the field and now halted before their evening, have been compelled to leave their plows to turn back to their native land. These Christians of the East, to whose ancestors St. Thomas and great-hearted Francis Xavier came, are praying today for shepherds, and are looking expectantly across the blue wide Pacific towards the Gate that is prophetically called Golden. And it is American to think that their prayers will not be offered in vain, that our Catholic land will give of her purse, gold, and, more precious, of her sons and daughters, valiant priests and Brothers and nuns. These financed missioners of the next decades will come into fields, verily ripe for the harvest, and with their American methods of spiritual agriculture, bind up a harvest exceeding great.

The Passing of a Journalistic Landmark

A CALL has been issued for the annual national convention of the Catholic Press Association to meet in Chicago on August 15. There will be, no doubt, the usual addresses on Catholic literature and resolutions about the progress and mission of the Catholic press, but a jarring note may be occasioned by the fact that the New York Freeman's Journal, the third-oldest Catholic weekly in the country, recently suspended publication. The demise of this paper, with whose earlier years so many distinguished Catholic names are associated, leaves the Cincinnati Catholic Telegraph (1831); the Boston Pilot (1836) and the Pittsburgh Catholic (1846) the sole survivors of the many Catholic papers begun in the first half of the nineteenth century. From 1806 to 1911 there were 550 Catholic publications started.

New York's first Catholic paper was the Truth Teller, published by William Denman from April 2, 1825, to March 31, 1855. In the course of years the taint of trusteeism and politics occasioned the advent in October, 1833, of a rival, the Weekly Register and Catholic Diary, which lasted three years. This was followed in 1839 by the Catholic Register and a year later, James W. and John E. White, nephews of the famous Irish novelist Gerald Griffin, published the Freeman's Journal. In January, 1840, the two papers were combined as the Freeman's Journal and Catholic Register. Eugene Casserly and John T. Devereux with indifferent success followed the Whites as editors and in 1842 Bishop Hughes took control of the paper, keeping it going with the aid of his then secretary, the Rev. James Roosevelt Bayley, the subsequent Bishop and Archbishop. Bishop Hughes thought it would be a good idea to import Orestes A. Brownson from Boston and give him the paper so he had Father Bayley write him, on March 27, 1848, as follows:

> The Right Reverend Bishop having resuscitated the Freeman's Journal from the state of debility into which it had fallen is desirous of turning it over into some good safe hands. He has authorized me to write to you to inquire if you would be willing to take it out and out. Its affairs are in a very sound state, no debt, and a good clean list of subscribers. It would afford you at present a clear income of $1,200 or $1,500 a year, which might be doubled without difficulty.

Brownson declined the offer. The paper then went to that strange, erratic character James Alphonsus McMaster, under whose direction it became the leading Catholic weekly of the United States, and for many years kept that place unrivaled. McMaster was born at Duanesberg, New York, April 1, 1820. He became a Catholic in 1845. In the first enthusiasm of his new faith he joined the Redemptorists but in less than a year finding he had no vocation he returned from the novitiate in Belgium to take up journalism in New York. Early in 1848 he thought of starting a semi-monthly magazine. "You may smile at the name I have chosen for it," he wrote Brownson, "possibly you may not like it—but it is indicative in more ways than one of the tone I desire to reign in it and I like it—it is to be called simply Ave Maria." Nothing came of this scheme. Then he had a plan for a semi-weekly independent Catholic paper. Writing to Brownson on June 12, 1848, he thus outlined the plan of his journal:

> It will say what I think best on political and other matters without asking anybody's favor. The clergy, many of whom have been spoken to, heartily approve of it, and as regards the Bishop I shall tell him before I begin, but neither ask nor expect his consent. I may shock you awfully, but I do not consider that appertains any more to his jurisdiction than to arrange the colors of the coats I shall wear during the summer. . . . I hope for it a wide circulation, as it is to have no diocesan trammels nor responsibilities, and it is to give the news oftener, fuller and more correctly than the lumbering things they call "Irish papers." Our friend George Hecker is interested and volunteers to advance, or if need be lose, the money necessary for the undertaking.

This project also came to naught, but a few days after the letter was written the Heckers loaned McMaster the money to buy the Freeman's Journal from Bishop Hughes. The Bishop and he were two positive men of testy and combative temperaments. There was friction almost from the very start of the new ownership, as is indicated by another Brownson letter dated September 9, 1848:

> All the address and finesse that I know how to use only just suffices to keep from open hostility. It is easy to see that he deplores the necessity by which he was cornered into selling me the Freeman, or having it sink alongside of a paper wholly independent of him, and you know him well enough to see that the character and eminent success of the Journal since I have had it does not render it more agreeable to him. . . . But my course is taken with him. He is always managed by some one; never acts independently. I am going to undertake the job, and think the Bishop will never sacrifice me as he has some others—because I shall never trust him, never directly oppose him and never suffer him to cease fearing me. By the aid of God and of these interesting dispositions—which I need not caution you that I do not proclaim on the housetop—I look to weathering a good many storms and being still editor when the Bishop shall be entered into his eternal reward.

The manner in which he planned to conduct the paper he outlined in this fashion:

> Generally, of course, it is thought I am too hot and too heavy—and in truth I have no idea of keeping up so much excitement as is raised about it just now. But, in the first place, I want to increase its circulation, and I find this just the way to do it, as nobody who is anybody likes to miss seeing a paper that presents each week among other dishes one or two roasts.

Although the above was written seventy years ago it certainly sounds like the most "advanced" kind of modern journalism. It had the expected effect for the paper soon attained a national repute. Everybody who was anybody wanted to read what "the Abbé McMaster," as he was popularly styled, had to say. It was the heyday of "personal journalism" and "the Abbé" had an unlimited vocabulary and a bulging arsenal of invective. With Archbishop Hughes and other members of the Hierarchy he had many a battle royal and his old friend Brownson he scored unmercifully, when they differed over some of the issues of philosophy that are now forgotten. The Archbishop in 1859 started the Metropolitan Record, with John Mulally as its editor, to have a local antithesis to the Freeman. McMaster was a rabid States-rights Democrat and Anti-Abolitionist in politics and his fierce assaults on President Lincoln and the "Black Republican" administration resulted in his being arrested as a disloyal citizen in 1861. He was confined in Fort Lafayette for some time; the paper was suppressed and did not resume publication until April 19, 1862. After that a milder tone was adopted in national politics, but on other topics the old style still obtained. The Paris Univers and its editor Louis Veuillot were largely his models. In the years that followed McMaster was a strong and valiant champion of the rights of the Holy See and an uncompromising advocate of the principle of Catholic schools and education. For many years Miss Ella Eades was the Freeman's correspondent in Rome and her weekly letters were the source of much valuable and authoritative information. If the frequent intemperate tone of the editorials could be overlooked the paper certainly offered its readers a strong, well-written sheet.

With another generation and new ideals the prestige of the paper waned and age told on the vigor of its editor. In 1880 he took as his associate Dr. Maurice Francis Egan, who had come to New York in 1877 and was then at the outset of the literary career that has since won him such distinction. Dr. Egan's brilliant and attractive editorials gave new life for a while to the paper, but he was cramped by the whims and idiosyncrasies of a querulous old man who grew worse and more difficult to manage as the end of his career, which came on December 29, 1886, drew near. Dr. Egan, who had done all the work on the paper, which had only a shadow of its former influence and circulation, for the last three years McMasters lived, tried to keep it going, but gave up the task in 1888. It was then sold, in the settling up of the McMaster estate, to the Messrs. Ford.

Nothing more radical could be imagined than this change of ownership, the new standing for almost every characteristic opposite to the old. In 1894 the Rev. Louis A. Lambert was engaged as the editor of the paper and so continued until his death, September 25, 1910. Father Lambert had been the editor of the Catholic Times of Waterloo, New York, and a later paper of the same name in Philadelphia, which was combined with the Catholic Standard. He was a much more successful controversialist than editor as his "Notes on Ingersoll," "Tactics of Infidels," "Christian Science Before the Bar of Reason," "Thesaurus Biblicus," and other volumes attest. Under his direction the Freeman recovered little of its lost prosperity and, since his death it had lumbered along without a change to better fortune. During the last municipal election it presented the abnormal spectacle of unblushingly supporting the Socialist candidate for mayor. The more recent formal questioning of its loyalty by the Government need not be detailed. The inevitable final disaster came before the end of June. When the paper was sold by the McMaster estate it was said that there were only two complete files extant: that used in the office, which was then given to the library of Notre Dame University, and the other a set owned by the late Dr. R. H. Clarke of New York. So much valuable Catholic history is contained in those printed pages, and now nowhere else attainable, that it would be a real calamity were these files not safeguarded as far as possible against accident. For all interested in the cause of Catholic journalism the paper's failure is a sorrow even if it had lapsed so far from the high estate it occupied when Brownson and Hecker in New York; Father Roddon in Boston; Bishop O'Connor in Pittsburgh; Dr. White in Baltimore; the Purcells and Dr. O'Callaghan in Cincinnati; Spalding and Ben. Webb in Louisville; Bakewell in St. Louis, and Mason in Philadelphia were the figures that loomed large on the journalistic horizon. How little the present generation knows about them, or cares for the differences over which they contended!

Fox Hills Clearing Hospital

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Through the courtesy of the Constructing Quartermaster, Major E. A. Simmons, an opportunity was recently afforded the writer and the Reverend Doctor M—— to visit the Fox Hills Clearing Hospital, situated on the heights of Staten Island and commanding a view of the upper and lower bay. It is now completed and ready for the accommodation of fully 3,000 wounded soldiers and furnished with the fullest up-to-date appointments necessary for their individual care and comfort. The site of the hospital has been well cleared, and macadamized roads lead to the fifty-seven buildings erected, all of which are connected together by means of ground-floor galleries. The hospital is equipped with dental departments, surgical dressing-rooms, consulting and examination rooms for eye, ear, nose and throat diseases, and with superbly equipped and well-lighted operating rooms. All this work has been done in less than six months.

At the time of my visit, July 20, there were only a few men in the wards, though a number of wounded soldiers were expected. There is a large detachment of soldiers from all over the country doing guard duty at the hospital. They are thoroughly representative of the American soldier for intelligence and fidelity to duty. It is quite evident from the visit of inspection we made that the greatest harmony exists between officers and privates. The sleeping quarters of the latter are models of tidiness and so also are the various offices in which the purely clerical work is done.

Your readers will no doubt be glad to know that the military authorities both here and in Washington have planned that every possible facility shall be accorded the individual soldier for the exercise of his religious duties. The chief officer and medical director of the receiving department, though not a Catholic, laid emphasis on this, and discussed with us his plans. His assistants make a careful record of the soldier's condition from day to day, and in the event of serious danger the nearest minister, priest or rabbi will be sent for, and the nearest relative will be notified either by phone, letter or telegram.

The numerous buildings, which it took us about two hours to inspect, are of wood, but they have all the comforts of more pretentious edifices and every possible contrivance has been installed for the care and comfort of the wounded. Moreover, they have at present an assembly room which is used for social or religious meetings, containing an organ, a platform and a table. The first Masses were to be offered on Sunday morning at six and eight o'clock by a priest from Rosebank. We found among the soldiers many Catholics, as was evidenced by the respectful greetings Doctor M—— received. The officers one and all from Major Simmons down expressed their pleasure at this visit of a Catholic priest and urged him to call again. They were more than civil and manifested a warm personal regard for him and a desire to secure his cooperation in behalf of our soldier-boys. However, the saddest thing of all, as it seemed to us, was the lamentable lack of Catholic chaplains. This is a situation that is doubtless engaging the attention of the Hierarchy; still the need is very pressing. When one who studies the situation realizes the large percentage of Catholic soldiers and sailors who have entered the service and who feel keenly the need of priests, the necessity of more Catholic chaplains is indeed very urgent. The good example of our Catholic boys and the ministration of their chaplains are already having effect on their brother-soldiers not of their Faith.

A Coney Island Sunday

To the Editor of AMERICA:

When I sent you the note printed in AMERICA of July 13 complaining of the lack of Catholic items in the local hotel guide I never thought it would make such a commotion. But good results have followed. In this week's (July 28) "New York Attractions" distributed at my hotel there is a list of churches, including four Catholic, with the time of service and St. Patrick's cathedral mentioned among the "Places of Interest." Perhaps further progress may develop in the near future. My success as a visitor-reformer prompts another suggestion. I was among the 300,000 who went to Coney Island last Sunday afternoon, my first trip there in several years. What a dreadful change! Anything more indicative of a degraded, demoralized community could hardly be realized. The apparent lack, among the swarms on the beach, of the sense of public decency, decorum and good manners supposed to obtain in civilized centers was appalling. What has wrought such moral havoc in so short a time? Can nothing be done to check its further inroads? Just before leaving I wandered back of the mob to the little shrine church of Our Lady of Solace where as part of some current devotion there was exposition of the Blessed Sacrament. Two of the parish clergy were about the trimly kept grounds and inside a half-dozen women were piously adoring. A solitary man came in while I was leaving. Outside, a stone's throw away, were Surf Avenue, the Bowery, the Beach and moral chaos! What a contrast! Thanks to the zeal of the pastor of this little shrine Sunday begins well at Coney Island, for he has a Mass during the season at half-past one in the morning. It is not his fault that the rest of the Lord's Day is not as well kept.

A Suggestion for the C. P. A.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Permit me to endorse the suggestion of William A. Clarke that you bring to the attention of the forthcoming convention of the Catholic Press Association in Chicago the suggestions of Mr. Michael Williams on a Catholic press bureau. It would probably facilitate matters if Mr. Williams were invited to be present. Mr. Clarke justly calls attention to the work done along this line by the Census Bureau of the Centralverein. Perhaps cooperation between this bureau and the Catholic Press Association would result in carrying out the more practical and less ambitious suggestions of Mr. Williams.

Some of the things he suggests are being done on a small scale by the C. P. A. For instance, during the past year its literature committee, of which Very Rev. John J. Burke, C. S. P., is chairman, I believe, has supplied the Catholic publications holding membership in the association with a series of articles by the Rev. Dr. John A. Ryan and others on important questions. It should not be so very difficult to do more of this work by getting other leading Catholic writers of sound principles to furnish contributions. The writers would receive more compensation, while the various weeklies would have to pay less than would be the case if each deals with some writer of note exclusively. A better exchange of news could also be arranged. Of course, it would be idle to expect the officers who have their own work on their respective publications to do this without additional funds. Some of these would be raised if publications still outside the association would cooperate.

It seems to me that we should try to build up our own press before we try to reform a ruling press which is to a great extent without even the most fundamental Christian principles. I think we shall make more progress if we first better instruct our own before trying to convert the readers of sensational dailies. Great good would no doubt be accomplished by a large and efficient bureau "keeping tab" on misrepresentation and calumny in secular journals. But even this will not fundamentally change the ruling press while the resources implied by such a bureau are not available at present. When they become available, they will go far toward building up an efficient and popular press of our own.

Catholic Publicity

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Although the writer has not followed very closely the articles discussing the practicability of a Catholic daily that have appeared in your columns during the past few years, yet after reading Mr. Antonio Huot's account of what has been accomplished in Canada in the case of L'Action Catholique, there can be little or no doubt that similar effort by any American Cardinal or Archbishop, or better still, by the united action of the American Hierarchy, would be crowned by equal, or even greater, success. However, it is the scheme of Catholic publicity working chiefly through the medium of the secular press that appeals most strongly to the writer. This secular-press plank was first incorporated in the Constitution of the first American Catholic Truth Society founded under the inspiration of the first American Catholic Congress held in Baltimore and under the auspices of Archbishop Ireland, in 1890, in the following words: "The publication of short timely articles on Catholic doctrines in the columns of the secular press, to be paid for if necessary, and the prompt, systematic correction of slanders, calumnies and libels against the Catholic Church." The idea has been almost a hobby with the writer ever since. It is a mistake to suppose that all editors, reporters and correspondents, many of whom are our personal friends and neighbors and not a few of them Catholics, are leagued together against the Church. If, frequently, they publish statements which we, as Catholics, know to be false and absurd, it is often because they themselves are the victims of shrewd and designing men who appreciate the power of the press more than we do. At any rate, if misstatements, slanders and libels of Catholicism occur in the secular press, that is where the corrections must appear if they are to reach those for whom they are intended.

Then why not make the most of our opportunities in the secular press? In the absence of a daily Catholic press, why not make the daily press Catholic? Like a huge megaphone presented to our lips, we have only to speak through it to be heard around the world. Like a fleet-footed steed, all saddled and bridled, it stands at our doors champing and neighing, ready to carry any Paul Revere who is willing to ride it. Then why not make it the bearer of good as well as of evil news?

By way of illustrating how cheaply this work can be done, it might be mentioned that during a short vacation the writer secured orders for his "Catholic News and Views" at the syndicate price of $2.00 a letter in the Sunday editions of leading secular papers in St. Paul, Minneapolis, Dubuque, Milwaukee, Buffalo, etc., and his local paper not only published them but furnished twenty-five to thirty corrected proofs to be mailed to the other papers. The chief difficulty was that having only Saturday evenings and Sundays to prepare the matter, and not wishing to interfere with the I. C. T. S. which furnished a similar service gratis on the first and third Sundays of the month, he never succeeded in securing a sufficient number of patrons at one and the same time to justify abandoning his regular business and devoting his whole time to this feature of the apostolate of the press. That the service was appreciated not only by Catholics like the late lamented Father A. P. Doyle, C. S. P., was evidenced by the receipt of many letters from non-Catholics, an occasional ten-dollar bill instead of the syndicate price of $2.00 from a generous editor, and the fact that several papers published the series for more than two years without omitting a single letter. That the service was attracting considerable attention and accomplishing some good, was also evidenced by the anti-Catholic pressure that was evidently brought to bear on some of the publishers. The gradual "crowding out" of the letters and the appointment of a new managing editor in the local paper who politely informed the writer that on account of the "high cost of paper" the corrected proofs could no longer be furnished caused the writer, whose health was failing, to suspend operations about two years ago.

Experience teaches, therefore, that the work of Catholic publicity must be thoroughly organized, fully approved and endorsed by the Hierarchy, backed and supported by the American Federation of Catholic Societies, the Knights of Columbus, the Ancient Order of Hibernians, the Catholic Order of Foresters and other strong societies, both men and women, and must be provided with sufficient funds to enable it "to carry on" without being hampered for want of necessary means. Mr. Williams has clearly pointed out the way. Let us not be slow to put the plan in practice. For "now is the acceptable time." Now is the golden opportunity! Catholicism and paganism are locked in a death-struggle. The Catholic Church is in the lime-light all over the world. Millions of non-Catholics in our own America are looking anxiously for a "new light." Our young men with "Pershing's Crusaders" have drawn the sword. It is the duty of us who remain at home to wield the pen and prove its mightiness in some such manner as to merit the encomium bestowed by Pope Benedict on our worthy President: "President Wilson's pen is doing more for the cause of just and popular peace than 20,000,000 swords."

Catholics, Americanization and Social Service

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Up to the present time, Catholic organizations have made no effort to participate directly, by systematized method, in problems relating to living and working conditions, and especially those relating to Americanization. They have restricted their operations exclusively, or practically so, to religious affairs, the reason being, perhaps, that they feared that ventures in economic or social matters might have the consequence of involving the Church, in some manner or to some extent, in politics.

While it is imperative, of course, that the Church never should be an active factor in politics, it is equally imperative that Catholic associations should become community influences throughout the United States and show a lively, well-ordered interest in the betterment of living and working conditions. Heretofore, there has been little need for these bodies to broaden the scope of their activities, except with regard to Americanization; but a new situation has come into existence, largely as a result of circumstances caused by the war, and the developments which will be produced during the war will form the precedents for policies and methods subsequent to the war.

Catholic organizations have made a mistake, in my opinion, in failing to attach serious importance to the Americanization of foreigners. Notwithstanding that a large majority of the foreigners who arrive in this country with the intention of becoming citizens are Catholics, their adaptation to their new environment has been entrusted to the Young Men's Christian Association, which is fundamentally Protestant, and whose ultimate objects must, necessarily, be Protestant. The explanation of the connection of the Young Men's Christian Association with this work seems to be that it was virtually the only association which appeared to be ready to act. The leaders of the Americanization movement probably had heard of no other association, and they evidently were disposed to take the easy course.

Now, Catholic organizations cannot afford, in conscience, to permit any anti-Catholic association to undertake the education of Catholic foreigners. There is too much hazard that representatives of such an association would take advantage of the opportunity for proselyting. And, even if this were not the case, there still would remain the probability that these newcomers would imbibe American history with a flavor unfavorable to Catholicism. It is a risk which Catholic organizations should not tolerate. It might be said that the Catholic associations have no organization for the Americanization of foreigners. In reply, I would maintain that they have a better organization than the Young Men's Christian Association, and a far more efficient organization.

The best illustration of the existence of the organization, as well as of its efficiency, was the German propaganda, prior to our entrance into the war. Although sensational credit is ascribed to the Prussian spy-system for cultivating sentiment favorable to Germany, I believe that nobody will dispute that the real force of value to Germany was the necessity of colonization. Too little importance has been attached to foreign colonies in America. Americans of German birth, like other foreigners, speaking a strange language, were obliged to live together, to form colonies, as it were, until such time as they should be assimilated. Their language and their colonization formed a close contact with the fatherland. It was comparatively easy for the German agents to foster friendly sentiment through these colonies.

The special point which I am making is that Catholic associations can, and should, carry on Americanization work through the schools, clubs and societies which are connected with Catholic churches in which foreign languages are or have been spoken. It is not only a better organization than that of the Young Men's Christian Association, but it is an available and more economic organization.

The work of the Young Men's Christian Association has been conducted by arrangement with manufacturing companies, to whose interest it is that employees should speak the same language and adopt the same customs. Through this education not only is the number of accidents reduced in factories, but the efficiency of labor is advanced. As to the corporations, it is of no particular concern to most of them whether the Americanization is directed by the Young Men's Christian Association or some other association. In many cities the work is carried on under the auspices of the local Chamber of Commerce or Rotary Club, or, perhaps, an employers' association.

The best way to meet this condition is for the Knights of Columbus to arrange for the education of foreigners, as well as for their recreation and for the improvement of their living conditions. While an understanding may, and in many places should, be reached with the corporations or the commercial bodies, this is not necessary, as a rule. If the foreigners are trained in American language, principles, laws and history by or through the Knights of Columbus, they cannot be forced to submit to similar education through another association. The new situation with respect to the general betterment of living and working conditions requires prompt consideration from the executive officers of the Knights of Columbus and similar associations.

Apparently, very close relations are being established between manufacturers in all the leading industrial cities and the Young Men's Christian Association under the auspices of the War Department, or, more correctly speaking, the Industrial Service Section of the Ordnance Bureau of the War Department. Manufacturers are forming in the different manufacturing centers what are called Employers' Associations. Regulation of the labor supply and the relationship with labor is the primary object, but the associations are raising funds for the purpose of bettering working conditions and promoting standards of living. In every city, and, in fact, in every large plant, there will be reading rooms, recreation rooms, clubs and like attractions, and there will be a secretary who will have charge of employees. Unless Catholic associations quickly get in touch with the War Department and with the Employers' Associations, Chambers of Commerce, and so on, precedents will be established and a great opportunity will be lost.

In offering these suggestions, I have no intention of criticizing the Young Men's Christian Association or minimizing the value of its work. In conducting hotels and club rooms, and in general social-service activities, it is proceeding admirably and is entitled to great praise. That association cannot be blamed or criticized; it is the Catholic associations which have been remiss.

How Ireland Can Enter the War

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The vast majority of the American people, as I am firmly convinced, have two great wishes with regard to Ireland—that she take her full part in the war, and that she be accorded her rightful independence. In the work of attaining these two great ends, every effort is valuable; the mouse freed the lion, and the obscurest suggestion, if conceived in good-will, may prove the seed of great results. It is for this reason, and not without qualms at my own presumption, that I put forward a possible solution that has occurred to me.

We may as well admit that, whatever her achievements in the early days of the war, Ireland is not at the present time taking her full part in the conflict. Whether or not her present abstention is justified is a debatable question, and I shall not discuss it here. But it will be universally conceded that the chief and only obstacle to Ireland's participation is her preoccupation with her own domestic troubles. It is useless to tell her to forget them. The problems are too vital and pressing for that, and Ireland can never take her full part in the war until the cause of her preoccupation is removed.

How may this best be done? Not certainly by dragoonings and courts-martial, unless the recent suggestion of a reverend clergyman be adopted and Cromwellian "plantation" introduced again on a larger scale! The cause of Ireland's preoccupation is British military rule. The brutalities of the past two years, and especially the shootings in 1916, have left an indelible impression, and even if provocative conduct had not been continued to this day the very presence of English soldiers would still be a continual exasperation.

The solution that presents itself is a simple one. Remove the cause of preoccupation. Let American troops take the place of the English troops. Let the United States establish a military protectorate over Ireland for the period of the war, guaranteeing, as soon as conditions return to the normal, to hand over the reins of power to whatever form of government is desired by the majority of the Irish people, as determined by popular election. The civil government might be entrusted to a provisional committee of prominent Irishmen, chosen irrespective of party, acting in conjunction with the American military command.

Irishmen who desire to fight for the cause of human freedom would then be at liberty to fight under their own flag, untroubled by doubts as to the future of their country, without compromising their nationality by an oath to an alien king, or assuming the uniform of the firing-parties of Easter Week. Does anyone doubt that the response would be worthy of the opportunity? Aside altogether from Irish enlistments, this plan would economize man-power. The 100,000 British soldiers in Ireland are not all of them—nor half of them—needed for defense against invasion. A third of this number of American troops would suffice, for the Irish Volunteers, instead of being potential enemies, would be Allies in the field.

I submit that this solution offers an easy and effective way for the Allies to get out of the Irish difficulty. It would reinforce the Allied cause with not inconsiderable man-power, and the added moral strength would be enormous; our professions would be vindicated before the eyes of the world. It would attract to the Allied cause the warm good-will of the Irish race, rivet with bonds of steel the ancient friendship between Ireland and America, relieve Britain of an arduous task, and release a large army for her needs in France. To Ireland it would bring the goal to which she has been striving for 800 years.

The Irish question is now an international matter, and no one outside of the handful of English reactionaries will deny its right to that status. With the same negligible exception, no one in England would object to America's intervention, and Ireland would welcome it with joy. What will America do? It rests with President Wilson to right the oldest wrong in history and to add to the proud muster of the free nations the youngest in freedom, yet the oldest in nationhood, of them all.

Father Coloma's Works

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I do not know just what Father Coloma has published since 1915, but I can give you a sort of memorandum of his works from the beginning of his literary career down to that date. As for the matter of translations I can say very little. He published: "Polvos y Lodos," in the Messenger of the Sacred Heart (Spanish), April and May, 1865; "Istoria de Un Cuento," Messenger, June 1885; "Ranoque," "Le Almohadilla del Niño Jesus" under the direct influence of Fernan Caballero or Cecilia Bolil de Faber; "Solaces de un Estudiante," "Pequeñeces," in English called "Currita, Duchess of Albornoz;" "Boy," a novel, translated into English; "Recuerdos de Fernan Caballero," "Fray Francisco," the story of Cardinal Ximenes Cisberos; "Retratos de Antaño," on the decadence of eighteenth-century France; "El Marqúes de Mora," a historical novel; "Ratón Pérez," a child's story; and "Sernonún," in English under the title "Don Juan of Austria."

The Assumption

THE assumption of the Blessed Virgin marks the final stage of her glorious mortal career. The Church and the Faithful believe that the immaculate body of the Mother of God by a very special favor was saved from the corruption which is the appointed portion of the corporal part of human nature, that it enjoys the qualities of a glorified body, has come into its full recompense, and is in possession of that beatified state which is reserved for the rest of the blessed only after the last judgment. As her soul at the first moment of her existence was preserved through the merits of her Divine Son from the moral taint of original sin, so her body through the same merits was preserved from the physical degradation to which all flesh is heir after it has been laid away in the earth. Like Christ, she died and was placed in the tomb; like Him also, but unlike Job, she had no kinship with corruption. Never having known sin, she was spared sin's consequence, the dissolution of the grave. She had not to wait for the long lapse of years before she could see her Redeemer face to face, nor was the resurrection of her body deferred until the imperious trumpet call shall summon the earth and the sea to give up the dead that are in them. Her resurrection followed almost immediately on her death. Her stainless body was taken up to Heaven before the first signs of corruption set in, and the integrity of her human nature having been restored, she was crowned with the diadem of Queen of Angels and of Saints.

This is the belief of Catholics, founded, not on popular legends and apocrypha, the accretions of the period of transition, as those who would deny her honor have said, but on authentic and authoritative teaching, dating back certainly to the sixth century, evidenced as some think as early as the year 58, a teaching clearer in the West, less outspoken in the East, but growing steadily in every part of the Church with the centuries, assuming a bolder relief in the arguments drawn from tradition, authority, Scriptural comparisons, and the sense of what was meet and fitting for the Mother of the Lord who gave to Christ His Adorable Body and His Precious Blood, and acquiring, in the clearer understanding of Catholic truth, a more prominent and a more insistent place in the liturgy, theology and preaching of the Church.

The Assumption of the Blessed Virgin is not merely a miraculous occurrence, the proof of which rests solely on historical data, it is a theological and doctrinal fact, intimately bound up with the other prerogatives of Our Lady, the acceptance of which is sanctioned by long centuries of belief by the teaching body of the Church and by the Faithful. Every Catholic believes it, because it has the approval of the infallible Church. It has not, however, received the stamp of a dogmatic decision proclaiming it, like the Immaculate Conception, to be a revealed doctrine. Many have longed for such a decision, a formal request that it should be declared an article of Divine Faith was laid before the Vatican Council, but the Council dissolved without having acceded to the request. Since then many similar requests for a definition have been sent to the Holy See, but the Holy See has been silent. Whether it will break that silence, no one may say, but in the meantime all Catholics rejoice that Our Lady's glory is complete, that her tomb is filled with roses, and that, as she had her Golgatha with Christ, so too has she had her Thabor, not passing but permanent, not the transitory transfiguration of an hour but the enduring beatification of the eternal years.

Dishonoring America

FEW more noteworthy utterances have issued from the White House than the President's unqualified condemnation of those who, under the guise of patriotism, have taken the law into their own hands and meted out punishment that in some instances was murderous and in every instance criminal. The Praeger outrage in Illinois is the most disgraceful instance of misguided patriotism dishonoring a sacred cause, and registering dishonor in innocent blood. In various parts of the country since our entrance into the war there have been outbreaks of violence, sporadic instances of mob law. The President in denouncing these unpatriotic promoters of violence voices the sentiments of the nation:

> No man who loves America, no man who really cares for her fame and honor and character, or who is truly loyal to her institutions, can justify mob action while the courts of justice are open and the Government and the States and nation are ready and able to do their duty. We are at this very moment fighting lawless passion. Germany has outlawed herself among the nations because she has disregarded the sacred obligations of law and has made lynchers of her armies. Lynchers emulate her disgraceful example. I, for my part, am anxious to see every community in America rise above that level, with pride in a fixed resolution which no man or set of men can afford to despise.

We proudly claim to be the champions of democracy. If we really are, in deed and truth, let us see to it that we do not discredit our own. * * * I can never accept any man as a champion of liberty, either for ourselves or for the world, who does not reverence and obey the laws of our beloved land, whose laws we ourselves have made. He has adopted the standard of the enemy of his country whom he affects to despise.

Lynch law has been the disgrace of the United States. Arising from race hatred and inflamed passion in days gone by it has given the lie to the very fundamental principles of our Government and made the true American regard for law and order a byword among the older nations of the world. The disgrace is magnified in the present crisis when our cause is the cause of freedom against the forces of violence and lawlessness. We can never hope to better a world suffering from the arbitrary and law-despising element that dominates the councils of our enemies, unless within our own confines we set the example of reverence and respect for law and order. The ignorant or unthinking, who, under astute leadership, take the law into their own hands and through mob violence commit injustice or murder form but a small minority of the population. But their acts are taken by a watching world for the acts of Americans whose men are dying bravely and whose women are suffering nobly to bring back the reign of law and order to a universe gone mad through the lawlessness of a world-minority. Absolute, unflinching enforcement of law by Federal and State authorities against mob rule wherever and however manifested, by prompt trial and punishment must be the answer to President Wilson's utterance. Sane public opinion will make that answer permanent and do away forever with a national disgrace.

St. Ignatius and Annapolis

ANY program which sets up Bill Jones as his own master, is far more flattering to the William Jones in all of us, than the iron doctrine that Bill Jones has many lawful superiors. Only in fluffy philosophies is man his own master. In real life, he usually lives in abject fear of his cook. Yet most men find a secret pleasure in the thought that they are "free," with a freedom that has but dim and misty limits.

In the days when, after deep potations of the heady wine of the later Renaissance, the world was still somewhat unsteady, there were fluffy philosophies in abundance. Granting that a man was free to think as he pleased, it was hard to deny him liberty to act as he pleased, at least if his acts had no directly unpleasant effects upon the community. It was in these times that the Soldier-Saint of Loyola formulated in unmistakable terms, his ideal of perfect obedience. Not only were the orders of lawful superiors to be fully executed, but, as far as might be possible, every loyal subject should judge that to be best which was commanded.

For it cannot be denied that obedience comprehends not only the execution, so that the person do that which is commanded, and the will so that he do it willingly, but also the judgment, that whatever the superior commands and thinks good, seem just and reasonable to the inferior; so far, as I have said, as the will by its force and vigor can bend the understanding.

This, the "blind obedience" of St. Ignatius, is made a target of scorn by many a fluffy philosopher. Yet, as is clear, it is not an obedience which, as has been alleged, "blinds" itself to undeniable facts. It is the act of a loyal follower, who in the absence of undeniable facts to the contrary, judges the command of his superior officer to be "just and reasonable." It is a spirit which the head of every organization, whether he be the Bishop of Rome, the President of the United States, the manager of a department store, or the editor of a Socialist weekly, rightly demands of his subordinates, for it is a spirit without which confidence and cooperation are impossible. "The first of his ideals," writes an Annapolis professor, of his midshipmen, in the July Scribner's, "is obedience—unhesitating, thoughtful and loyal obedience."

The ideal of obedience the midshipman strives for is not to question, even in his own mind, any lawful order he receives. The cheerful "Ay, ay, sir!" with which he will execute the most distasteful of orders is an inspiration to one accustomed to the more dilatory and recalcitrant obedience of civilian students.

If the fluff of the Renaissance indicates the philosophy of a laudable liberty it would seem that the iron of St. Ignatius and of the Naval Academy can only result, as the followers of St. Ignatius have been reminded for centuries, in a race of unreasoning mannikins or unreasonable bigots. But when shams fall away to reveal realities, as in the stress of war, it is not difficult to see on what side the truth is to be found. Without obedience, an army is a mob, laws are but empty verbiage, and civilization a mere figment of the imagination.

"The Ethics of the Drink Question"

"WHAT are they trying to make out of the laboring man—an animal? Do they want him to work and go home to bed as a horse does?" indignantly asked a hard-working man who keenly resents the attempts being made by over-busy "uplifters" to dictate to him what he shall drink, what he shall eat and how he shall pass his scant hours of leisure. A strong desire to regulate for him the details of the poor man's private life was shown in certain influential quarters just before we entered the war, though the man of means was assumed to be so thoroughly capable of avoiding all excesses in the matter of food, drink, clothing, amusements, etc., and even in the number of children he reared, that zealous uplifters felt that they could safely neglect supervising the rich man's private life and confine themselves instead to "ameliorating" the condition of the poor laboring man. Invading his humble home forthwith, they offered him vast quantities of advice regarding the best way of heightening the family's "efficiency" and then published at great expense the results of their "investigations." Consequently Pietro Pitozzi, simply because he was poor, had his domestic problems freely discussed in "uplift" circles, but Marmaduke Manners just because he was rich, could squander his money in all kinds of wanton excesses without receiving a single call of protest from even the most zealous social worker.

Now that the nation is at war, many restrictions on the freedom of individuals which in time of peace would be intolerable, are necessary and lawful and will doubtless be patiently borne by all until a final Allied victory is won. Unhappily, however, fanatical uplifters of various kinds are taking advantage of war-time conditions to make wholly unjustifiable invasions of private and individual rights. Nation-wide Prohibition, for instance, as understood and advocated by certain extremists among its promoters, is unquestionably an unjustifiable invasion of individual rights, for if "bone-dry" Prohibition were enforced throughout the country in the way many of its fanatical supporters ardently wish, millions of Americans' most sacred rights of conscience would be ruthlessly violated. If the extremists in the movement succeed in stampeding and carrying with them our more conservative and sober-minded Americans, it may not be long before, under the guise of "indispensable war measures," even more unjustifiable legislation will be carried through and we shall perhaps wake up some morning and learn to our amazement that Congress has solemnly decreed that every man and woman in the country shall enter without delay the married state.

Apropos of the unethical foundation on which the nation-wide bone-dry Prohibition movement rests, three Jesuit priests expound in the current Catholic Mind the Church's age-old doctrine on the use of alcohol, Father Keating discussing "The Ethics of the Drink Question," Father Kenny writing on "Prohibition and Alcoholism" and Father Lockington urging that "Personal Prohibition" rather than national is the remedy for the drink evil. The pamphlet remarkably clarifies an issue which is of vital concern to every Catholic.

"God's Soldier Be He!"

IN his admirable book, "The Faith of France," M. Maurice Barrès, the eminent Catholic author, has an inspiring chapter called "The Sacrifice," in which he quotes many an effective passage from letters written home by brave and believing young soldiers just before they entered an engagement. "This evening we start for the trenches," wrote Bernard Lavergne, the thirteenth child of his parents. "Tonight I shall watch over you, my gun in hand. You know who watches over me." "It is the hour of attack!" he called out to his soldiers when the time came for him to die for his country. "Forward! To the bayonet charge for France and for our mothers!" "I will fight for France, offering my heart to God," wrote young Michel Pinet, not long before he fell. Other lines from the farewell messages sent home by the brave Catholic soldiers of France and cited by M. Barrès are no less noble and striking than those quoted above, but there is nothing finer in the book than the last letter written by Jean Rival, a lieutenant of only nineteen, who was killed in Alsace two years ago, as he led his section against the Germans. It breathes so lofty a spirit of piety, courage and patriotism that if the Frenchmen now fighting beside our American soldiers along the Marne are like Jean Rival, it is no wonder we hear such glowing accounts of their valor. On the eve of his last battle he wrote to a dear friend:

> Tomorrow at dawn, to the tunes of "Sidi-Brahim" and the "Marseillaise" we shall charge upon the German lines. This attack will probably be murderous! I wish, on the eve of this great day, which may be my last, to recall to you your promise. Reassure my mother that she will receive no news of me for a week. Tell her that when men go to the front they can no longer write to those they love, and that they have to be satisfied in only dreaming about them. And should time roll on and still no word from me, leave her some hope, help her. If finally you learn that I fell on the field of honor, let your heart utter, my dear J——, the words which will console.
> This morning, when only a few yards from the trenches, I heard Mass and with faith received Communion. Should I die, I will die as a Christian and as a Frenchman. I believe in God, in France, in victory. I believe in beauty, in youth, in life. May God protect me to the end. Yet should the shedding of my blood aid toward victory, my God, let Thy will be done.

Our own brave soldiers are now holding the crossings of the Marne. With their breasts they are making a living rampart for the citadel of civilization and liberty. Their blood has already sealed the new charter of the world's freedom. By their valor and skill they have proven themselves the true brothers-in-arms of the heroes who held Verdun and once before rolled back the tide of invasion on the very fields where now, side by side, Americans and Frenchmen are stemming the surging billows of war. These brave men are laying down their lives on the fields of France for the world's peace and liberty. They are giving their best. Thousands of them are fighting and dying in the spirit of the knights and crusaders of old, for they too are fervent Catholics, and echoing the inspiriting words of Jean Rival, each one can say: "I believe in God, in America, in victory!" "Then God's soldier be he," every one, who, like the gallant young men of France described by M. Barrès, shows by the beauty of his life and the Christian courage of his death, that "The spiritual element, after all, is the dominating force in this war."

Literature

FRAY GERUNDIO AND PADRE ISLA.

"CAMPAZAS," so wrote the witty Jesuit Padre José Francisco Isla in 1758, "is a place of which Ptolemy made no mention in his geography, probably because he had no knowledge of it, owing to its having been founded 1,200 years after the death of this illustrious geographer." This widely unknown city is "situated in the province of Campos, between the west and the north, looking directly towards the east from that part which is opposite to the south." Now, with the latitude and longitude so accurately indicated, anyone will easily find out this wonderful metropolis. The reader undoubtedly would like to know the etymology of that magic word "Campazas," but Padre Isla tells us that the learned do not agree on this important subject, and in support of his assertion quotes the extremely diverging opinions of Anthony Shearero, Blas Garlicketo, Domingo Sheepfoldos, and Pasqual Oniono, along with those of Cesar Cloutycloakon and Daniel Coverall. If Campazas was not one of the most famous towns of old Castile, and if it is not its own fault "that it was not as large as Madrid, Paris, London, or Constantinople, since without any impediment whatever it might have been extended ten or a dozen leagues towards any of the four quarters," it has at least one title to glory and immortality which cannot be overlooked. It was the birthplace of that paragon of preachers, "Fray Gerundio de Campazas, alias Zotes," or Blunderhead. Brother Gerund was the Don Quixote, more properly the Sancho Panza, of the pulpit, a reincarnation of that jolly Barletta of the Middle Ages, who was set up as a model for the popular preachers for all time to come, for the good folk used to say: "Qui nescit barlettare, nescit praedicare."

Fray Gerundio is the creature of Isla's fertile imagination. Isla was a wag, a born humorist. In his translation of Le Sage's "Gil Blas" he almost made the world believe that Le Sage had stolen his romance and his hero from the Spanish. He made Fray Gerundio a reality. Fray Gerundio is a caricature, it is true. But he seems in spite of it to be a living person. He is an ecclesiastical and oratorical fop. But he neither makes us laugh at religion nor despise the genuine arts of the pulpit. In his person the defects of the preachers of the Gospel are exposed and held up to ridicule, but the Gospel and its teachings are never assailed. If the vagaries and the unpardonable excesses of a thoroughly unsound and false system of preaching are held up, it is only that they may be remedied.

Isla's "Fray Gerundio" is a bitter and caustic satire on the bombast and bad taste of the Spanish pulpit. Whatever may be thought of the purpose of Cervantes in writing his Don Quixote, it is certain that Father Isla wrote his strange book to smile away the ridiculous and unseemly pulpit oratory of eighteenth-century Spain. In exposing the defects then prevalent in the national clergy and among the friars, the colors were purposely exaggerated. The work would never have been effective had the Jesuit been satisfied with a calm presentation of the facts. These had to be distorted. The "Gerundios" whom Isla intended to convert were too thick-skinned to be attacked with ordinary weapons. They had to be bludgeoned into the ways of righteousness. The padre ruthlessly knocks them down and then shakes with Homeric laughter at their fall. But he bowled them over so masterfully and thoroughly that they never dared raise their heads again. In doing so the outspoken Jesuit accomplished a work for which Spain should be profoundly grateful.

In the history of literature, as in many other fields, the spurious is ever found side by side with the genuine article. Even when Shakespeare is giving the language its masterpieces, the rank weed of Euphuism thrives in the hardy soil of Elizabethan letters. While the virile genius of Milton puts forth the columnar growth of "Paradise Lost," the followers of Cowley and Crashaw indulge in their far-fetched conceits and labored phraseology. In France at the very time when Corneille startles the stage with the heroic accents of the "Cid" and "Polyeucte," and Bossuet is about to appear, the "Précieuses" of the Hotel de Rambouillet bring into the language their simpering graces, their maudlin and unnatural refinements of thought and style. In a one-act comedy Molière was to sweep them rudely away. In Italy the same tendencies had been noted under the name of Marinism. In Spain at the very moment almost when Cervantes was giving the world that masterpiece of idiomatic and vigorous Spanish, the "Quixote," and only a few years after the simple but noble accents of St. Teresa and the Venerable Luis de Granada and Fray Luis de Leon had died away, the poet Gongora was inaugurating his school of bombast, conceit, exaggerated trope and metaphor, the school of sounding brass and tinkling cymbal, where less even was meant than met the ear. Gongorism became a national plague. Confined even within the narrowest circles the plague was a misfortune. When it invaded the sacristy and the pulpit, it became a national disaster. Spanish preachers, whose deep faith and sincere piety were never for a moment in doubt, became inoculated with the poison. With Paravicino out-Gongorizing Gongora himself, it threatened ruin. Spain forgot that she had once such masters of the Word of God, such solid, sound and substantial preachers as the great Dominican Alonso de Calbreara, the Augustinian Juan Marquez, or the Jesuits Florencia and Pineda. Models of Christian eloquence like Blessed John of Avila and St. Thomas de Villanueva were ignored. "Friars, filled with the spirit of the Seraphic Father, friars animated with the zeal of Dominic, Jesuits imbued with the spirit of Ignatius became infected with the microbe of pulpit-babbling." Pagan philosophers and pagan mythology were quoted as often as the Gospel. Scripture was treated with a familiarity which would shock us from a modern evangelist of the "hit-the-trail" variety. It was distorted into meanings absolutely irrelevent to the sacred text and expounded in a style unworthy of the sacred theme and the sanctuary. Councils, Popes, bishops protested, warned, threatened. They were for the most part unheeded. A wily, witty, humorous Jesuit, once a bit of a Gongorist himself, but far too shrewd not to see very soon the error of his ways, thought of a remedy. Serious weapons had been useless against the evil. Argument had been of no avail. He laughed it away with a jest and a smile.

In Fray Gerundio, the country bumpkin who thinks he has a vocation for the pulpit and becomes a friar, a fairly good one on the whole, so that he may astonish the world by the thunders of his eloquence, Isla personifies all the defects of a class. He heaps upon his head the sins and misdemeanors of his brother-preachers. In him he pillories and castigates all their rhetorical and oratorical delinquencies. He has little or nothing to say against their moral character. Their taste was abominable. Their lives were irreproachable. The Gerundios may have been buffoons. But they were not rogues or criminals. Describing one of them just at the moment when he was to set out on his remarkable career, Padre Isla tells us that he was just turned three and thirty. He was tall, robust and corpulent, his limbs well-set and well-proportioned, but rather pudgy and stout. He had a top-knot to his tonsure, which was studiously and exactly rounded. His habit was always clean, and the folds long and regular. A silken skull-cap adorned with beautiful needlework, with a tassel dangling from it was perched upon his head. "In short he was a most gallant spark." He added the "grace of a nice pulpit lisp" to his many accomplishments, could tell a story well, was a good mimic, had a very taking manner, a roaring style and a bold fancy, and knew when and how to sprinkle his sermons with quips and jests and "proverbs and fireside phrases" and infinite merriment.

Like his masters, Fray Gerundio was thoroughly versed in all the tricks of the pulpit. No one knew better than he at what time it is wise and comely to extract out of the left sleeve, but ever so daintily and gingerly the silk handkerchief so cosily bestowed in its ample and graceful folds. "He was never known to fail to make a couple of affected tosses of the head, whilst proposing his subject, and after having proposed it to give two little jumps, as it were rising on his toes, looking at the same time rather disdainfully at his audience." He delighted in such profundities as "the science of ignorance, the wise ignorance of science." "This trick-track," he would say to the "Padre Predicador Mayor," "this playing and ringing the changes upon words, in which your Paternity couches the subjects of almost all your sermons, is a thing that quite ravishes me." A finer thing, he adds, could not be said. He did not quite understand what it meant, "but what sounds to me, sounds to me. . . ." Sounds, words, high-flown language, bell-tinklings, cymbal-thumping, rantings, verse and prose, Scripture and fable, conceits and paradoxes, vulgarity and slang, empty prettinesses, meaningless, subtle and ridiculous interpretations, these were the pulpit-baggage of Fray Gerundio and his peers. The Jesuit felt that they had to be driven out of the sacred place, so he excoriated all this nonsense with a certain Rabelaisian humor, but without the coarseness of the French satirist.

We are not astonished that he made bitter enemies. All the Gerundios of Spain thundered at him. The Holy Office for a time put its ban upon the book. But Pope Benedict XIV, Queen Barbara, King Ferdinand remained his stanch friends. He bore his troubles with the unfailing humor and kindliness which had ever marked him. When the Society of which he had ever remained a faithful and loyal son, was suppressed in Spain, he went into exile with his brethren, and died in Bologna in 1781 unembittered by trial and adversity, at the age of seventy-nine. Thank God, nearly all the Gerundios of the peninsula died a happy death with their executioner. Even before their demise, Father José Isla had preached their funeral sermon. They themselves should thank him, were it possible, for his immortal panegyric.

Last Lectures. Being the Lowell Lectures, 1914, and Three Lectures Delivered at the Royal Institution, 1915. By WILFRID WARD. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $4.00.

These two sets of lectures are preceded by an introductory study by Mrs. Wilfrid Ward. While nothing more than a sketch, it gives us an especially vivid picture of Wilfrid Ward's intellectual and social life, though its briefness prevents adequate treatment of matters in which our interest is aroused, e. g., Ward's attitude toward Modernism. It will, no doubt, be of great value to his future biographer. The six Lowell Lectures on "The Genius of Cardinal Newman," which make up the body of the book, are at once a rejoinder to those who criticized Ward's "Life of Cardinal Newman," for the high place it gave to Newman as a philosopher, and they are a further development of aspects of Newman's philosophy which are only hinted at in the life. "Newman and the Critics," the first lecture, is devoted to refuting such critics as Carlyle, who said Newman had "the intellect of a moderate-sized rabbit." In this lecture Newman's right to the title of philosopher is vindicated and the remaining five lectures analyze the content of his philosophy.

We hardly need to be told in the introduction to these lectures that they are the result of forty years' close and sympathetic study of Newman's published writings, since every lecture bears its own evidence of Ward's complete familiarity with the Cardinal's opera omnia. The absence of such familiarity is what has hitherto marked practically every attempt, notably the Modernists' to delineate and evaluate Newman's philosophy. Ward's work is, as far as it goes, final, because based on actual data instead of pseudo-critical reconstruction. The lectures show moreover that Ward has searched out the gems of philosophy embedded in Newman's vast correspondence. Of the six lectures, the best are undoubtedly "Newman's Philosophy" and "Newman's Psychological Insight."

The lectures delivered at the Royal Institution "on the methods of depicting character in fiction and biography" are the mature generalizations of a master biographer. The second lecture on "the character study in biography" is perhaps the most interesting. In it Ward discusses the proper handling of biographical material, such as letters, reminiscences, diaries, etc. He illustrates his rules by references to the four biographies he wrote—Newman, Wiseman, Aubrey de Vere and W. G. Ward. The style of all the lectures reflects that of his great master, Cardinal Newman.

High Adventure: A Narrative of Air Fighting in France. By JAMES NORMAN HALL. With Illustrations. $1.50. The Fighting Fleets. Five Months of Active Service with the American Destroyers and Their Allies in the War Zone. By RALPH D. PAINE. With Illustrations. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co. $2.00.

These volumes vividly describe how our men fight now in the air and on the sea. Unlike the average American author of war-books, Mr. Hall gives his work a literary finish and a refinement of humor that make "High Adventure" very pleasant reading. His account of the American Escadrille's early training is amusing enough, particularly his friend Drew's sayings and mishaps. But the author himself had no lack of thrilling adventures, and narrow escapes not a few. The latter he attributes to his "godfather Chance," a fact which shows that he is far from being the consistent Christian that Captain Guynemer, "the ace of aces" was. An interesting talk Mr. Hall had with a veteran French aviator describes the origin of aerial combats. In August, 1914, hostile airmen out merely on patrol duty, would courteously salute, and carried no weapons. Now they aim to kill one another in any way they can, and fly heavily armed. The last heard of the author he was lying wounded in a German prison.

In "The Fighting Fleets," Ralph D. Paine, the writer of numerous sea stories, tells what he saw and heard as he sailed in an American destroyer to visit the over-seas fleets. He went ashore in Ireland but does not appear to have stayed there long enough to understand why the people are opposed to conscription, and he uses language about the Irish which the official reader of the book's publishers should have had deleted. Both books are fully illustrated.

The Secret of Personality: The Problem of Man's Personal Life as Viewed in the Light of an Hypothesis of Man's Religious Faith. By GEORGE TRUMBULL LADD, LL.D. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $1.50.

Early in his book, Professor Ladd remarks: "Let it not be forgotten that our inquiry is not, what it is to be a disembodied soul, much less an angelic or glorified spirit; but, the rather, what it is to be a person as the human being is a person, and is known to himself and to other selves as personal." The reviewer cannot see that the author has solved the question very clearly. Historically he has traced how personality has manifested itself by "The Evidence of Fact," by "The Witness of Words," by the forming of habits, and so following; but what is meant by a "person," what is personality itself, does not clearly appear. Again, the author shows how differently a human being and a beast are actuated even in such elementary actions as the acquiring of food. The one seeks nourishment with the consciousness of a higher end than the mere sating of appetite; the other does not. That is to say, man is a reasoning animal, a beast is not. Consequently, man has urgings, motives, aspirations, that can be founded only in a principle which is the seat of actions that distinguish the rational from the irrational creation.

Further, that man in every state of his existence has recognized his dependence, in some fashion, upon a supra-mundane power, simply points to the common and compelling argument, "quod semper, ubique, ab omnibus," what has been universally and unwaveringly held by mankind, is due not to mere prejudice, superstition, education, or other inconstant factors, but to something deeprooted in man's very nature. When, therefore, man yields to this urging, he exhibits his personality in another way, but the fact does not tell us what is personality, but only displays outwardly a person in action. Religious beliefs and practices have gone strange and contradictory ways. The noteworthy thing is first, that man has always held to the necessity for religion in some form; secondly, that nature unaided by revelation has not, and cannot attain to an adequate concept of religion, except as "through a glass darkly." BOOKS AND AUTHORS

An admirable sonnet in "Drums of Defeat" (Erskine Macdonald, London), Mr. Theodore Maynard's recent book of poems, is entitled "In Domo Johannis," and gives this picture of Our Lady just before her summons to Heaven:

Here rest the thin worn hands which fondled Him,
The trembling lips which magnified the Lord,
Who looked upon His handmaid, the young, slim
Mary at her meek tasks, and here the sword
Within the soul of her whose anguished eyes
Gazed at the stars which watched Gethsemane,
And saw the sun fail in the stricken skies.
In these dim rooms she guards the treasury
Of her white memories—the strange, sweet face
More marred than any man's, the tender, fain
And eager words, the wistful human grace,
The mysteries of glory, joy and pain,
And that hope tremulous, half-sob, half-song,
Ringing through night—"How long, O Lord, how long?"

"The Control of the Drink Trade" (Longmans, $2.50), by Henry Carter, is an account of the means taken in England to combat at inefficiency of the workingman during the early period of the war, which threatened the nation with disaster. Two elements contributed to that inefficiency—high wages and much consequent drink. The former were not to be touched for many reasons; but something had to be done with the workman coming in on Tuesday morning, having spent Monday in recovering partially from his debauch. The drink trade had to be controlled and this book tells how it was done, and with what results. It is useful reading; and, we are happy to say, shows that results are obtainable without the trampling ruthlessly on personal liberty that universal Prohibition implies. This may be necessary as a temporary war-measure, and as such all will, if called upon, submit to it willingly; most of what is in Mr. Carter's book could be put in force permanently, without harming in the least rational liberty.——"Alcohol, Its Action on the Human Organism" (Longmans, $0.60), is a little volume containing the report of the advisory committee regarding the action of alcohol on man's body. The committee was appointed in November, 1916, by the Central Control Board of Great Britain to consider the effects of alcohol on health and industrial efficiency. The findings of the committee deal with alcohol as a food, its mental effects, its influence on digestion, respiration and the circulation of the blood and its poison action. The final chapter of the book treats of alcohol and longevity. "To avoid a continued action on the tissues, such an interval should elapse between the times when alcoholic beverages are taken as will prevent the persistent presence of a harmful amount of the drug in the body. To avoid direct injury to the mucous membrane of the stomach alcohol should not be taken in concentrated form and without food."

In "The Retinue and Other Poems" (Dutton, $1.50), Katharine Lee Bates has gathered together her verses on the war and those inspired, for the most part, by other events or occasions. The stanzas that give the book its title are the best in the volume. The author writes:

Archduke Francis Ferdinand, Austrian Heir-Apparent,
Rideth through the Shadow Land, not a lone knight errant,
But captain of a mighty train, millions upon millions,
Armies of the battle-slain, hordes of dim civilians. . . .

Spirits bright as broken blades drawn for truth and honor,
Sons of Belgium, pallid maids, martyrs who have won her
Love eternal, bleeding breasts of the French defiance,
Russians on enraptured quests, Freedom's proud alliance. . . .

Flocking from the murderous seas, from the famished lowland,
From the blazing villages of Serbia and Poland,
Woman phantoms, baby wraiths, trampled by war's blindness,
Horses, dogs, that put their faiths in human loving-kindness.

Tamburlaine, Napoleon, envious Alexander
Peer in wonder at the wan tragical commander,
Archduke Francis Ferdinand—when shall his train be ended?
Of all the lords of Shadow Land most royally attended.

EDUCATION

Lack of Unity in Modern Education

THE need of coordination in the teaching, especially of languages, receives more and more attention from educators. For instance, in the Classical Journal for June, 1918, Professor Burr of Beloit College says that Latin is to be compared at every step and in every lesson with the mother-tongue (p. 626). Professor Painter of New York State College writes that "the contribution which language study makes to the understanding and right use of our mother-tongue is its most vital and practical significance for the average student" (p. 636). Professor McCrea of Columbia University urges the Latin teacher to become familiar with the books studied in the English classroom. "We could then," he says, "by explicit references and quotations coordinate the work of the two classrooms" (p. 663). The Classical Association of New England sent out in 1917 the following question: "In the teaching of Latin would you recommend that emphasis be laid upon English vocabulary building and the literary features of the author read, with the study of forms and syntax made not an end but a means to an end?" The question was addressed to school superintendents and educators. Out of the 153 replies, 146 answered yes.

The Departmental System

THIS cry for coordination heard insistently on all sides indicates a pressing evil which has resulted from the departmental system of modern education. The problem did not exist in the simple, well-ordered schools of former days, even of thirty or forty years ago. The evils of excessive specialization of mere information, instead of educated faculties, of neglected essentials and half-learned fads, of students who have a smattering of a thousand "isms," and a conceit fattened with some highly technical terms, and who at the same time cannot write or speak their own language; these are evils which may be traced to the multiple and unrelated education of our time. I am not a "calamity-howler" and I wish to say that I believe the wise conservatism of Catholic schools and their fortunate lack of funds has kept them from many of these evils. But I do desire to utter a warning against introducing multiplicity into our Catholic education. We are all creatures of our times, and are subject to the current educational fads and fashions. While we must be always willing to welcome the good, we must be watchful against the evil, however specious the guise under which it presents itself.

Lack of correlation or coordination is an evil admitted by all modern educators. To find the remedy I propose to investigate the cause. What produces the multiplicity of modern education with its host of unrelated subjects and what was the secret of former simplicity and unity? The theory of education from earliest days to less than fifty years ago can be easily stated. The chief purpose of primary school, high school and college was to train the powers of expression, to make the student master of writing and speaking. After the student could write and speak, it was believed that his faculties had been somewhat trained, and he was then allowed to apply himself to any science, to any profession to which he felt himself inclined and adapted. In this system there was perfect unity during the formation period. There was not simply a series of subjects running on parallel lines, all leading to a different science or art, but there was one art, that of language, set as a goal, and all the chief means were focused upon that simple goal. Only when the art of self-expression was attained, was there radiation to the multiplicity of sciences and arts found in the university, and in the world.

The University in the Grades

WHAT, on the contrary, is the situation today? University aims and university methods have worked down first on the college, then on the high school, and then on the primary school. Catholic schools, partly through conservatism and partly through a happy lack of funds, have resisted longest the disintegrating tendencies of modern education. Modern schools have their highly specialized teachers for a hundred and one branches, each one striving to fill the memory with the technical terms and systematized information of some science. The old system held to the supremacy of language, mastered as an art, and insisted on the power of speaking and writing as a means of education and as a preliminary to university work. Ex-President Eliot advocated all sciences as a means of education. Culture or educated faculties, he claimed, could be gained from "chipping and filing and sawing" and, apparently, from anything else. Modern schools followed the lead of Dr. Eliot. Sciences multiplied rapidly, and every one of them knocked at the door of the schoolroom, even of the primary schoolroom. Then came the theory of vocational study, and a thousand trades demanded admittance into the schools Then came the social wave, and it swept down upon the schools to make them centers of social work. False theorists approved, declaring that man was not one being, but a collection of many tendencies or capacities. They despised the word "faculties," although they admitted the reality under other names. Other theorists said that there was no transference of training. You trained what you trained, and there was no such thing as discipline and development of the intellect.

Why a School at All?

AS a result, these multiplied sciences, these many trades, and these false theories, with the help of patient tax-payers, have made of our schools laboratories, foundries, machine-shops, offices, farms, newspaper-rows, parks, art galleries, flower-gardens, zoological parks, dairies, gents-furnishing, ladies-tailoring, kitchens, dance-halls and what not. In a word, school is being transformed into a miniature of the world, and there are some educators who grow enthusiastic over it all, and welcome into every school, not only the world and all nature, but the universe, from the tiniest particle disclosed by the microscope to the most distant mass picked up by the telescope. Finally, the wonder of the age and latest source of multiplicity, the moving-picture, is going to revolutionize education, and now is at the door.

A plain, simple man might ask after all this if the school is to become a toy universe, why have school at all? Why not distribute the children around each morning, some to the woods, some to the parks, others to the morgue, department stores, or manufactories, all ending up at the "movies," under the leadership of a megaphone mounted on a sight-seeing car?

You will say that I am caricaturing and drawing the black lines with too heavy a hand. Well, caricature is a legitimate means of centering attention upon an evil, and of stimulating effort to remove the evil. At all events, you will admit that there is lack of coordination in our schools, especially in the schools supported by the public money, and in schools more likely than private schools to be made the subject of experimentation. On the other hand, in the past there was simplicity and no lack of coordination. Examine now what was the source of the unity and coordination throughout the past up to the school days of most of us who are now reading this article.

A Clear Division and Aim

TAKE, for example, the Jesuit system of education, which was not intended to be a new discovery, but was, and is, a choice of what has proved itself best in the history of education. How was coordination effected in the study of languages? First of all, the Jesuit system, as all other systems until yesterday or the day before, divided schools into the upper or scientific schools, of law, medicine, theology and other sciences, and into the lower schools, where language held the chief place. By separating language study from the intensive study of science, by keeping in the lower schools language supreme and other things subordinate, order and clearness resulted, and the way was cleared for perfect coordination. The language of science and of the learned world was Latin, at the time the Jesuit system came into being. Greek, modern languages and the indispensable erudition of history, geography and mathematics, all were subordinated to Latin. In the course of time the emphasis has changed. Latin, except for the Church, has ceased to be the key to science and learning. The national tongues have come to the front, and there is now a difference of emphasis. Latin tends to fall into the place that Greek formerly occupied, and, outside of the Church, instead of being an end in itself, it has become an instrument of education.

Former systems, therefore, avoided multiplicity and lack of coordination by separating the intensive study of science from the intensive study of language, and by subordinating to the art of expression all information studies. In the next place, former systems avoided multiplicity by keeping to one chief purpose in teaching language. Expression was the practical goal, the art of speaking and writing. Former systems did not treat language as a university subject in the lower schools; they did not study language as a science, but taught it as an art. There were no lectures on the history of literature, the tendencies of literature, the evolution of literature, the philosophy of literature, but there was a great deal about the art of literature. "Reproduction is the soul of the literature lesson," is the way in which the ideal was expressed by Jesuit authorities. A sentence was explained that the student might write a sentence; a letter was explained that he might write a letter; a poem was explained that he might write a poem, and a speech was explained that he might give a speech.

The Art of Expression

AGAIN in former school systems, the precepts or rules of art were carefully graded, following the well-known qualities of style, clearness, interest and force, and these precepts were taught in classes of grammar, literature (belles lettres, humanities) and rhetoric. The languages were not taught with different purposes, but all languages were focused on the same point, as far as possible. Authors were chosen and graded, not to illustrate the history of literature but to teach writing and speaking. Exercises were based on the authors and exemplified the precepts. In this way all multiplicity was avoided. There was the strictest correlation; there was unity, one teacher using several languages for one definite end. Professor Goodrich of Yale exemplified this method in his "British Eloquence," he taught English oratory, and used Demosthenes and Cicero, and English speakers, to make orators. This system is exemplified in Kleutgen's well-known rhetoric, "Ars Dicendi," where Latin, Greek and Italian masterpieces of poetry, oratory, and of other types of composition, are studied side by side, to illustrate the same rules and to teach the art of expression.

How then may you have perfect coordination in the teaching of languages? Avoid a multiplicity of information subjects and any early specialization in them. Center on expression as the chief purpose of language study from the early grades up to the first years, at least, of college. Subordinate the rest of the course to the art of writing and speaking. Follow Professor Gildersleeve's splendid advice, giving a minimum of precept, a maximum of practice, and having early contact with the authors in continuous passages. Grade your precepts and your authors to exemplify the precepts. Teach letter-writing through Cicero and English models. Teach narrative through Caesar, Xenophon and Macaulay, or Irving. Teach the simplest of short stories through the fables of Aesop, Phaedrus and Gay. Teach the essay through Cicero, Plato and Newman. Teach epic poetry through Homer, Virgil and Milton. Teach lyric poetry through Latin, Greek and English poets. Teach pastoral poetry through Theocritus, Virgil and Tennyson. Teach the drama through Sophocles, Plautus and Shakespeare. Make your pupils speakers with the help of Demosthenes, Cicero and the orators of England, Ireland and America. Have one book of precepts for each of the arts of rhetoric, poetry and essay-writing, using the same terminology for all languages, and illustrate the same rule simultaneously from the different authors. Have one professor for the three languages. To divide the languages among different professors would be to multiply them unnecessarily, and to destroy the unity and simplicity of education. Do not have professors of Latin, Greek or English, but have professors of oratory, of poetry, of essay-writing, of correst expression, of forceful expression, of interesting expression, using all languages for one art.

Not Coordination, but Unity

THIS system has succeeded in the past, is succeeding in the present, where the well-tried and fruitful methods of experience have not yielded to ceaseless experimentation. With this system there never existed the problem of coordination which vexes our modern educators. There is no coordination; there is something vastly better; there is supreme unity; there is education and power.

I have not attempted to determine where and to what extent information-subjects and sciences are to be introduced along our courses. My prime purpose was to examine the correlation of languages, and I would urge the mastery of the art of expression, before any intensive study of the sciences. True science will be helped by the fact that its students can write and speak good English, and can, consequently, think.

ECONOMICS

War Labor Recruiting

AMONG the most interesting phases of the great world war are the industrial revelations to which it has led. Developments which would hardly have seemed possible in time of peace, often came to pass within a few months. The phenomenal productiveness of the United States in her war industries, with the least pressure or compulsion exercised upon employers and employees, has been particularly remarkable. The criticism widely exercised in the beginning upon our methods of production, soon gave way to admiration and hearty approval. But the height of efficiency, it would appear, has been reached in the United States War Labor Program, which became effective August 1, 1918.

In spite of past successes, which all were now willing to admit, many and serious difficulties still remained to be overcome. Competitive recruiting of labor, with its constantly rising scale of wages, threatened at last to prove disastrous both to the war and to the welfare of the nation at home. The unregulated shifting of labor forces, causing men to seek afar for work while local opportunities and urgent needs were frequently overlooked, implied a serious loss of time and efficiency. Labor-hoarding, like food-hoarding, was naturally practised by not a few employers to hold themselves in readiness for future orders. War industries, moreover, were unequally provided with labor, some being over-supplied with men, while others lacked the most necessary help. Hence the enactment of a new program of labor centralization under the authority of the War Labor Policies Board, composed of representatives of the War, Navy, Labor, and Agricultural Departments, the War Industries Board and Emergency Fleet Corporation, and the Food, Fuel, and Railroad Administrations. All war industries were thus centralized and coordinated, and can now be certain of an impartial recognition and a carefully proportioned supply of labor forces according to their respective needs.

Basic Principles

The fundamental principle of the new program is that "In time of war all the labor resources of the country should constitute a common supply for the benefit of all industries connected with the war." Industries not directly connected with the war are to contribute their equal share of labor to keep the war industries fully manned at all times. It was felt that for this purpose a central agency was necessary which, in the words of the President, was to "have sole direction of all recruiting of civilian workers in war work." Thus all the men needed could be supplied, at whatever cost. They could be gathered from the localities nearest to the demand, the deadly competitive increase of wages could be avoided and a fair and stabilized wage-rate be set for all. To this end the recruiting and distribution of labor will now be controlled by the United States Employment Service of the Department of Labor, with the aid of local labor boards, while the stabilization of wages will be effected by the War Labor Policies Board. All private recruiting will be duly regulated and all competitive recruiting of labor prevented by the United States Employment Service. Besides conducting hundreds of paid branch offices, this Government agency will be assisted in every county throughout the land by volunteer agents of the Public Service Reserve.

Whenever it becomes apparent that there is a shortage of men in certain trades all recruiting for such men will be centralized exclusively in the Government agency, and the entire country finely combed to locate all skilled laborers engaged in such trades in non-war work. The available supply will then be distributed according to the relative needs. By the same method accurate data can be secured as a basis for training new men in the various skilled trades as they may be needed. In the meantime private recruiting may still continue, subject to Government regulations. Assistance will also be given to non-war industries by the public agency.

Labor Recruiting Prohibitions

As regards unskilled labor, only such employers, engaged in war work, are prohibited from recruiting whose maximum force exceeds 100 men, though labor may be recruited privately for railroads and farms. The latter occupations are considered as war work to the extent that they are protected from all recruiting by other industries. Employers engaged in non-war work must refrain from offering superior inducements or in any other way competing with or endeavoring to get labor from the Government or employers engaged in war work. They are permitted to advertise for labor only under the supervision and control by the local representative of the United States Employment Service. Private recruiting agencies may still be employed by them, but under the above restrictions.

In regard to skilled labor, all employers, whether engaged in war work or not, must abstain from solicitation of whatever kind that might affect men already engaged in war work. No advertising may be done except with the authorization of the local representative of the United States Employment Service. And finally employers may not advance money, pay, or arrange for interstate transportation of labor except through this agency or with its consent.

Rights of Employers and Employees

Employers are not restricted in any way in regard to the men recruited for them. They can exercise their right of rejection either at the plant or, preferably, with the State director at the place where the labor is recruited. A laborer who applies to them unsolicited may be accepted, but it is desired that they should not do so without the consent of the man's employer, unless the workman has already left a war employment. All doubtful questions as to the nature of the work or the employment of men should be referred to the State Director. Appeal can be made from him to the Director General of the Employment Service and, in cases of serious importance, a final decision can be secured from the War Labor Policies Board.

Employees, too, are under no compulsion to undertake war work, but are left to the promptings of their own sense of duty. They are free to take or to refuse the employment offered them by the Government, but they will obviously greatly facilitate the task of equipping the national war work with the necessary force of men if they will comply with the suggestions made to them. Even when already transported to the place of employment, under Government auspices, the laborer may still refuse to accept the work offered him. He is told, however, that "Such refusal ought not to be made except on good grounds and on refund of any transportation paid." Neither is there any length of time set within which he must retain the position accepted by him. Nevertheless he is to regard such work as "His post of duty, which he should not desert except for excellent reasons." Yet of these reasons he remains the sole judge. The Government will not prevent any man from changing his employment, but it urges him to seek the advice of the local employment office before taking any final step in this regard. The liberty of both employers and employees is thus amply safeguarded in these particulars. Other important regulations still remain, the explanation of which must be left to another paper.

NOTE AND COMMENT

President Urges Support of K. of C. Campaign

FOLLOWING upon the tributes given to the Knights of Columbus by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, comes a letter from the President himself commending their work. In the prosecution of the war, he says, we must make every effort "to lighten the burdens of the men who carry our colors and to keep them close to the ideals of the homes for which they are making the supreme sacrifice in camps, at home and abroad." At the same time we are to give the world the message of an unselfish America in its service to all "without regard to race, or creed, or nationality." Lauding the generous work of the K. of C., the Y. M. C. A. and the Y. M. H. A., he asks all, without distinction, bountifully to support the Knights of Columbus campaign:

> The campaign which the Knights of Columbus are undertaking to raise a special fund for their work is of capital importance to the useful work they are doing in increasing the comfort and contentment of our citizen army, and should meet with generous response from all our people.

Miss Margaret Wilson, the President's daughter, recently sang at a K. of C. concert given at Camp Kelly, Tex., and in a letter from the White House expressed the delight her visit had given her. From over in France comes the same cheering news of the practical appreciation shown for the service rendered by the Order. "The most welcome sign to be seen in France by American soldiers and sailors," we are told, "is the K. of C. legend: 'Everybody Welcome and Everything Free.'" The latest item of interest is the news of the construction of a K. of C. building on the grounds of Westminster Cathedral, London. A new and mighty impetus will doubtless be given to the work of the Knights by the "Victory Convention" held August 6 and 7, at New York City.

Quinine for Sisters at Leper Colony

THE latest Red Cross Bulletin informs us that twenty pounds of quinine have just been shipped by the American Red Cross for the relief of the Sisters of St. Vincent de Paul who are conducting the leper colony at Farafangana, South Madagascar.

> A letter received by the American Red Cross through its Paris office reported that the Sisters in the mission were in dire need of quinine, which, owing to the prevalence of fever in the country, is necessary to the maintenance of their health. The Sisters had appealed to the French minister for the Colonies in Paris, but had been told that it was unlawful to export quinine from France at this time; so the appeal was turned over to the French Commission of the American Red Cross.

A transatlantic steamer is now bearing the shipment on its long journey to Soeur Louise and her community.

Importance of Medical Education

A WIDE-AWAKE publicity campaign has been carried on in connection with the Marquette University million-dollar drive for the endowment of its medical school. Leading editorials in local daily papers call attention to the need of supporting our medical schools and to the earnest desire of the Government that the numbers and efficiency of our medical practitioners should be increased to the utmost. Out of a total of 95,000 doctors in active practice in the United States, says the Milwaukee Journal, 23,000 are already in service and 27,000 more will eventually be needed. All the countries engaged in this mammoth conflict realize the need of filling out the ranks of this profession which, perhaps more than any other, is being depleted by the war. "We at home can see to it that there is no lack of money for medical education." America, as Dr. Mayo remarked, is called upon to supply for the dearth of doctors in France and Belgium, and even England has failed to provide for this grave emergency:

> Under these conditions you can see the vital importance of maintaining the high-grade medical schools of the country at their present efficiency. We must not let the supply of medical men, already dwindling because of the increased safeguards placed around the profession, be further depleted.

Marquette Medical School, he believed, was destined to add as much luster to Milwaukee's name as Harvard Medical School has to the fame of Boston, or Johns Hopkins to that of Baltimore. The final results of the drive have not reached us at the present writing, but a great portion of the necessary fund has already been collected in the very opening days of the drive, so that its success can hardly be considered problematic.

The War.—During the week the battle-line in the west extended from the east of Reims to the sector north of La Bassée, the heaviest fighting occurring on the Vesle and in the Montdidier-Amiens territory, and east of Albert. In the region of La Basseé, the furthest north, the retirement of the enemy seems to have been at least partly voluntary and at first of small extent. In the other localities both in the amount of ground won by the Allies, and the number of prisoners and guns and the amount of military stores captured by them, the results were of first-rate importance. The general consensus of military experts now is that for the present at least the initiative has passed to the troops commanded by Marshal Foch.

Bulletin, Aug. 5, p.m.-Aug. 12, a.m.

After "ironing out" the Soissons-Château-Thierry-Reims salient, the Franco-American troops had driven the enemy to the southern bank of the Vesle. Here their efforts, though determined and unceasing, slackened a little. However, they still pressed the fighting in an endeavor to cross the Vesle and force the Germans back of the Aisne. In the face of the most stubborn resistance encountered since the Allied counter-offensive started, they established bridgeheads at several points on the northern bank of the river. The high ground north of the stream was occupied on a narrow front at several places. There was heavy fighting between Sermoise east of Soissons and Fismes, at Fismes, and between Fismes and Braisne. But the position of the Allies north of the stream does not seem as yet to be thoroughly established.

While the fighting on the Vesle was in progress the battle was creeping northward. In the Somme sector the Germans by an attack on the Bray-Corbie Road won some advanced British positions. South of the Somme in the Avre River region, the French pushed forward and reached the river below Morisel just opposite Moreuil. The enemy was not left long in the possession of the Bray-Corbie positions. On August 7 Field Marshal Haig struck heavily at the armies of Crown Prince Rupprecht on the southern side of the Lys salient. Attacking on a front of nearly five miles, the British advanced their whole line to a depth of 1,000 yards, while to the south, on the front east of Amiens they recaptured all the principal positions on the Bray-Corbie Road which they had previously lost.

A still more important movement followed. Under the command of the British Field Marshal, the Franco-British troops struck a terrific blow at the German lines from near Albert south to Braches on the Avre above Montdidier. According to the official British report the enemy gave way along nearly the entire front of more than twenty-five miles and the Allied forces made swift progress, headed by a large supply of tanks. The Allied thrust showed a gain of nearly seven and one-half miles. The general line reached by it ran from Plessier-Rozainvillers to Beaucourt, to Caix, to Framerville, to Chipilly, and to the west of Morlancourt. The Allied troops captured about 10,000 prisoners and 100 guns. The following day the Allies continued their advance east of Amiens, and late on August 9 the Anglo-French forces were in possession of the line running through Pierrepont, Arvillers, Rosières, Rainecourt and Morcourt, a maximum advance since the previous night of about five miles. In this drive Allied cavalry had approached to within a mile of the important railway junction at Chaulnes. On the same day in the Lys sector on the Flanders front the British advanced their whole front between the Lawe and Bourre Rivers to a maximum depth of 2,000 yards, taking possession of Locon and fourteen villages.

The Albert-Braches movement was to be followed by another severe blow to the enemy. On August 10, throwing his first army against the apex of the German salient southeast of Amiens, Marshal Foch captured Montdidier, and followed up his success by breaking into the salient for an average depth of six miles on a thirteen-mile front, reaching a line extending from Andechy, seven miles northwest of Montdidier, to Elincourt, ten miles to the southeast. French patrols reached Chaulnes, the principal German railway center west of the Somme. The general line reached by the Allies in the Albert-Montdidier sector was described in Field Marshal Haig's report as running from Lihons to Fresnoy-les-Roye, to Lignières and Conchy-les-Pots. A conservative estimate puts the total number of prisoners captured by the Allies at 35,000. They are also credited with having taken 500 guns. By August 10 the army under General von Hutier was in full retreat along the Montdidier-Noyon Road, leaving behind it vast supplies of stores and ammunition. The latest reports indicate that Field Marshal Haig's troops advanced their line on the high ground between Etinehem and Dernancourt, the latter about two and one-half miles south of Albert. Further south on the other side of the Somme, the Germans effected a temporary breach in the British lines at Lihons, about two miles west of Chaulnes, but were later repulsed with heavy losses. It was unofficially reported that Chaulnes was captured by the British. The French advanced between the Avre and the Oise, reaching as far as Canny-sur-Matz.

Major-General William S. Graves, until recently assistant chief of the Army General Staff, was selected to command the American Expeditionary Force to be sent to Vladivostok. This force is to co-operate with a Japanese military force in assisting the Czecho-Slovaks to clear Siberia of German and Austrian prisoners of war who have organized a small army and are attempting to gain control of that part of Russian territory. The American military expedition will comprise about 7,000 men. The Japanese, according to a previous agreement with our Government, will send a similar number. According to Major General March, Chief of the General Staff, the force is relatively small and is not for the purpose of establishing an eastern front in Russia, but for the purpose of protecting the rear of the Czecho-Slovaks in their westward movement across Siberia. General Kikuzo Otani will command the Japanese section and will be the ranking officer of the expedition.

American Troops for Siberia

On August 7, in the House of Commons, on the eve of the parliamentary recess, Premier Lloyd George gave a review of the war situation. He emphasized the great service of the British navy, announced the sinking of 150 submarines, and dwelt on the size of the reinforcements sent to France, after the first German onset of this year. He acknowledged the services of the American troops, and members cheered his compliments to the high efficiency of the American officers. He denounced Germany's ruthless methods of making peace, and declared that no league of nations would be possible until Prussian arrogance had been eradicated by a definite military defeat.

Lloyd George on the War

France.—Louis J. Malvy, former Minister of the Interior, having been found guilty of malfeasance in office, was sentenced by the High Court on August 7 to banishment for the space of five years. The sentence is the minimum provided for the crime in the Penal Code. It carries with it the forfeiture of his seat as a member of the Chamber of Deputies, but does not involve civic degradation. Not having been found guilty of treason, he escaped the extreme penalty. On August 10 he left Paris for Irun, a town in Spain near the French frontier.

Banishment of Malvy

The first formal charges brought against M. Malvy were formulated by M. Léon Daudet in a denunciatory letter addressed to the President of the Republic, and read by M. Painlevé, the President of the Council, to the Chamber of Deputies on October 2, 1917. M. Daudet accused M. Malvy of having communicated military secrets to the enemy; of having made known to the enemy the plan of attack at the Chemin des Dames, and of having by this means frustrated the French hopes and of having provoked mutiny among the soldiers. The Procurator-General declared at the time that these charges were without foundation.

When the charges were formulated, M. Malvy was no longer in office, having resigned his portfolio, the previous August, as a consequence of the attack made on him by M. Clemenceau in the Senate towards the end of June, 1917. M. Clemenbeau was not at the time Premier, for he accepted that office only in the following November. Nevertheless he charged Malvy, not with treason against France, but with having betrayed the interests of France by the continued assistance he had given the Pacifist and Defeatist party. The acceptance of the premiership by Clemenceau marked the beginning of a vigorous prosecution of the Defeatists, which resulted in the execution of Bolo Pasha, and M. Duval, the director of the Bonnet Rouge. Almereyda, the editor of the same paper, committed suicide in prison. Caillaux was arrested and is still awaiting trial.

Malvy, in virtue of his being a deputy from the Department of Lot, appealed for trial before the High Court of Justice instead of before a military tribunal. His request was granted. The prosecutors, M. Pérès and M. Mérillon, formally charged him with being guilty, not of having betrayed the interests of France, but of having betrayed France herself, by the favor and protection he had shown the anarchists and internationalists who by all sorts of intrigue fostered the idea of giving up and making a German peace; by the patronage he extended to convicts and the Bonnet Rouge partisans; and by allowing himself to be made the tool of Caillaux. Contrary to expectations, Malvy personally directed his own defense, which was very vigorous and impassioned throughout. Caillaux's influence, which had been strong enough to make of Malvy a sort of irremovable minister, securing for him a place in all ministries of all complexions, proved to be not strong enough to save him at the end. His condemnation is an evidence of Clemenceau's strength.

Ireland.—Edward Shortt, the Secretary for Ireland, replying to a query of John Dillon, the Nationalist leader concerning the Government's Irish policy, declared in the House of Commons on August 8 that he would be engaged during the recess in drafting a Home Rule bill. He also announced that the Government was determined to deal vigorously with the Ulster situation, and seize 50,000 rifles that Ulsterites are reported to have in their possession. "If the Government could get the rifles without trouble," was the Secretary's significant statement, "so much the better." At this remark the Nationalist members cheered.

It will be remembered that over a year ago, on July 25, 1917, the Irish Convention began its first sitting in London. Every party in Ireland with the exceptional of the Sinn Fein was represented. It was created practically by a decision proclaimed by Premier Lloyd George in the House of Commons on May 21, 1917, which declared: "The Government has therefore decided to invite Irishmen themselves to put forward their own proposals for the government of their own country." On April 8, 1918, Horace Plunkett, the chairman of the convention, handed in his report to the Prime Minister. The Home Rule bill mentioned by the Secretary for Ireland will be based on this report.

On August 9 Mrs. F. Sheehy Skeffington was deported from Kingstown, Ireland, under guard. Mrs. Skeffington, who recently made a lecture tour in the United States, was allowed to return to England on condition that she would not visit Ireland. On August 3, however, she arrived in Dublin, having eluded the British authorities. She is the wife of the former editor of the Irish Citizen, who was shot and killed by an officer of the British army during the Easter Week revolt.

Mexico.—After much delay the sentence of exile against the Archbishop of Guadalajara has been carried out. He was put on board a freight car and taken to Tampico in charge of General Cesar Lopes de Lara. Eventually he crossed the border and reached San Antonio, Texas, on July 22. According to the Revista Católica of July 28, the arrest and banishment of Archbishop Orozco caused popular indignation to run high, and many demonstrations took place, which the authorities suppressed with a hand of iron. A number of Catholic ladies took part in a public demonstration; at the request of the Liberals, the Government officials arrested a large number of them, some in their own homes and others while they were assisting at the Sacrifice of the Mass. The Southern Messenger of July 28 gives the text of formal protests made by the Young Men's Catholic Association of Guadalajara, the Catholic Workmen of Jalisco, the Latin American Union of Guadalajara, and the Young Men's Catholic Association of Aguascalientes. All these protests were disregarded.

Archbishop Orozco's Banishment

The Government is steadily proceeding with the confiscation of property belonging to the Church and to priests. Nor is private property secure. The Revista Católica declares that the mere suspicion that a private individual has in his possession property, belonging to clerics, is sufficient justification in the eyes of officials to enter his house, and seize whatever cannot be proved by documents to belong to the possessor. Private residences, according to the Southern Messenger, to the number of more than 1,000 have been confiscated in this way. In Puebla and Michoacan, as in Jalisco, official robberies on a grand scale have been in progress. In Puebla, for instance, the Government seized property amounting to millions of dollars belonging to a society called La Piedad, on the ground that religious institutions are incapable of acquiring or administering landed property and the income derived therefrom; the presumption that the property of a society belongs to a religious institution is deemed sufficient pretext for its seizure. A recent decree has marked out for confiscation a number of churches in Mexico City, Atzapotzalco, Tacuba, San Angel, Tacubaya, Tialpam and Mixcoac. The Denver Catholic Register of July 25 quotes from a Protestant review as follows:

Confiscation of Ecclesiastical Property

> The attitude of the Mexican Government toward Protestants is openly favorable, despite the apparent obstacles found in the Constitution. Some well-informed friends assure us that many do not understand the dispositions of that document, and that others intentionally give a false interpretation. In no instance has the Constitution seriously interfered with Protestant activities.

Contrasted with this favorable attitude towards Protestantism is the policy of restriction observed towards Catholicism. Whereas only one priest is allowed in Jalisco for every 5,000 inhabitants, all of whom are Catholics, each Protestant sect may have its own clergyman. The Minister of the Interior determines the number of churches that may remain in use and those which should be closed.

Rome.—The establishment of diplomatic relations between China and the Holy See, when announced some weeks ago, came as an agreeable surprise. Further details of the reasons which led to the event have recently been published in the Osservatore Romano. China was influenced in her request to have an official representative at the Vatican, first because of the large number, which is steadily on the increase, of Catholics in the new Chinese Republic, under whose auspices the Church is enjoying a greater measure of freedom; and secondly, because the prestige and influence of the new Republic would be much increased by diplomatic relations with the greatest moral power on earth.

Diplomatic Relations with China

The advantages accruing to the Church were no less marked. The Propaganda has long desired to have a representative, residing permanently at Peking, with an officially recognized position of legate, such as is the case with other countries distant from Rome. His duties will be manifold: supervision of the spiritual interests of the Chinese, now cared for by various Religious Orders and Congregations; coordination of different methods of evangelization; augmentation of vicariates and prefectures apostolic; authoritative settlement of difficulties and disputes; prudent direction of works of zeal; and in general the fullest possible development of religious life among the Chinese. The recognition of the Chinese delegate to the Holy See emphasizes anew the doctrine, always taught by the Church, that all well-ordered authority, no matter in whom vested, comes from God and should be respected by Catholics. The Church is glad to recognize this principle as applied to a pagan country no less than in the case of schismatical and heretical peoples.

A dispatch from Peking to the New York Times, dated August 10, states that the Chinese Government has signified that the appointment of Mgr. Petrelli as Papal Nuncio to China is not acceptable "on the ground that being the friend of Admiral von Hintze, he might be unwelcome in Peking." Admiral von Hintze was formerly German Minister at Peking. The dispatch says:

> The Government's action follows the interesting situation created by the French Minister's protest on the ground that the appointment contravenes the Tientsin Treaty of 1857 recognizing the French protectorate of Catholic missionaries in China; also because it is asserted to be German inspired in order to lower French prestige, and, further, because the Vatican is alleged to have shown a predilection for the Central Powers rather than the Entente.

As the dispatch does not give the source of its information, it is impossible at present to test the accuracy of its statement either in regard to the action of China or the reasons alleged to have been given for France's protest. That France should object, however, is not unlikely, for it will be remembered that a similar protest was made in 1886 by the French Government, when the Holy See proposed to send a Nuncio to China. At that time France threatened to withdraw the French Ambassador from the Vatican, unless the plan were abandoned. The Holy See, in view of the greater evils which would result from a break in diplomatic relations between the Vatican and France, did not persist in its intention to send the Nuncio. France's protest was based on the ground that it would put an end to the French protectorate at Peking.

There was really no ground for the fear, as La Croix clearly pointed out in its issue of July 22, 1918. If the residence of a permanent Papal Nuncio at Constantinople was not thought to be a danger to the French protectorate in Palestine, why should the case be different in Peking? Besides the protectorate exercised in favor of the Catholics in China should not be made to turn to the detriment of those whom it protected. The proposed Nunciature of 1886 infringed on no right of the French Government accruing from the treaty of Tientsin nor on any of the privileges of honor accorded to France by the Holy See in the Orient and the Far East; it left intact the protection extended by France to the material interests of the Catholic missionaries and would in fact have enabled France to extend that protection to spiritual interests not within the competence of its civil authority; the Nuncio would indeed have safeguarded the interests of the French Government. The same considerations apply to the Nunciature of 1918 no less than to that of 1886.

Portugal.—The attempt of the Freemasons to eliminate Catholicism from Portugal has failed. Following on the exchange of diplomatic courtesies which recently took place between the President of the Republic and Mgr. Ragonesi, the Apostolic Nuncio at Madrid, on the occasion of the latter's official visit to Lisbon, there came a formal request from the Portuguese Government for a resumption of diplomatic relations between that country and the Holy See. The agreement was reached early in July when the Holy Father graciously acquiesced in the appointment of his Excellency Captain Don José Felicien da Costa, formerly Minister of Public Works in Portugal, as the first representative of the Republic at the Vatican.

Diplomatic Relations with Portugal

Russia.—On August 2 a Constitutional Assembly representing six northern districts after a successful revolution against the Bolsheviki, established at Archangel a new Government called the "Country of the North." A proclamation which was issued announced: "Because of the treason to the country committed at Brest-Litovsk; because of famine; the failure to recognize the rights and liberties of the country; because of pillaging, illegal shootings, and constant arrests, the power of the so-called Soviet, of traitors and criminals, is past." The proclamation then stated that the aim of the new Government would be:

Archangel's New Government

> (1) The regeneration of Russia, the resumption of relations between Russia and other Governments and the organization of local power with the Government of the North. (2) The defense of the region north and the whole nation against all territorial violation by Germany, Finland and other enemies is the second aim of the Government. (3) It seeks a reunion with Russia of the peoples who have been taken from her. (4) The reestablishment of the two organs of the people, namely, the Constituent Assembly, Municipal Dumas and Zemstvos. (5) The reestablishment of legal order by the expression of the will of the citizens and the reestablishment of political and religious liberty. (6) The security of the rights of agricultural workers. (7) The defense of the interests of labor in accordance with the political and economic interests of the North and the rest of Russia. (8) The suppression of famine.

The decisive defeat of the Bolsheviki occurred August 3. They fled from Archangel carrying away 40,000,000 rubles in money, but left many supplies behind them. American troops made up a part of the Allied forces that entered Archangel and all were enthusiastically welcomed, the new Government proclaiming that it "counts upon Russian, American and British peoples as well as those of other nations for aid in combating famine and ameliorating the financial situation. It is recognized that the intervention of the Allies in the interior affairs of Russia is not directed against the interests of the people." It is hoped that the Allies will be able to avert the threatened famine.

Why Do Catholics Lack "Prestige"?

IN a preceding paper we noted the fact that Catholic achievements in the field of history, science, etc., are generally disregarded by the world at large, and we offered an explanation of the phenomenon. Catholic literature suffers from the same handicap. In literature in its various forms as the novel, the short-story, the essay, pagan principles and pagan ideals rule. Sensualism, materialism, and rationalism until recently have been the dogmas of our fiction. The zeal with which God and eternity were effaced from the pages of current literature might be laughable if it were not so pitiful. They called this expurgation "non-sectarian" and "unprejudiced." The war is changing things. Writers, ever quick to respond to currents of public thoughts, again evince a genuine interest in God and the hereafter. I express the sanguine hope that a text-book may again find its way into school even though it mention God. But still the inimical note is present. They look for the truth in the shadows and fail to behold it glorified in the light.

The press: We have a Catholic press. But do Catholics flatter themselves that anyone pays attention to or is remotely aware of their Catholic publications? How frequently are Catholic-press opinions quoted by the influential secular press? The occasions might be called red-letter days, so rare are they. This has its basis partially in the fact that at present none is important enough to be recognized as representing the "national" opinion of Catholics. Hence the need, previously voiced, of a national weekly of force and character. As for fairness, we get what we call for. And our insistence on fairness will be rewarded to the extent of our prestige. It is not in what is said, but in what is omitted that the press shows its unfairness. It has an insidious way of relegating Catholic news to obscure pages and neglected corners. News is recounted as if a boon were conferred by mentioning that news. If praise be given a Catholic organization, this praise is carefully divided between the Catholic and other aspirants. Editors claim they "wish to be fair to all." Somehow they got it into their noddles that the Church is something aloof, something tyrannic that exacts tribute, something so intolerant that it cannot hear voiced the praise of another organization, and therefore her rivals are constantly held before her. One studies in vain the biographies of prominent Catholic contemporaries to find a statement of their creed and training. To a Catholic his creed is of paramount influence in his life. But newspaper biographies of men like Schwab, Ryan, and Stettinius, carefully omit such mention, although I feel certain that they would proclaim their Masonic affinities if they possessed such. The general attitude of so many while friendly, is distinctly patronizing. "She (the Church) is all right, oh yes, but so backward, so unprogressive, so old-fashioned, you know." The patronage is amusing, but also disgusting. The aggravating part is the knowledge that if Catholics took a little trouble to assert themselves this superciliousness would soon cease.

Thus it is along every line of human knowledge and endeavor. Bias, indifference, and outright hatred in every field. Yet coupled with the general ignoring of the Church there is a paradoxical admiration for her "organization." The leaders profess to admire her definite stand on moral questions, they praise her for what she has accomplished for democracy, for womanhood, for knowledge, for civilization. Yet they condemn her for "her dogmatism, her strictures," and in general regard her with aloofness and an utter lack of sympathy. With her enemies they accuse her of the most contradictory ambitions and practices, ambitions and practices which Chesterton has stigmatized in some of his most joyful paradoxes, in his inimitable chapter on the "Paradoxes of Christianity." They call her "too pessimistic and too optimistic, too terrorizing with hell and yet comforting with a fictitious Providence, that she finds everything beautiful and everything ugly, that she is a nightmare and a fool's paradise, too cowardly and too aggressive, too peaceful and yet the mother of wars, meek and yet battlesome, given to sackcloth and robes of gold, too plain and too colored, restraining sexuality and stimulating it, despising Jews and yet Jewish,"—a reputation that is a refutation for all attacks. But please note, that not each enemy states all these things. Only one or the other is stated by an opponent and the average person knows only the one or the other. It takes a Chesterton to discover and be convinced by the complexities.

Perhaps some will call this survey pessimistic. But I am interested in facts, not in fancies. And the facts, as I see them, are these: The classroom, the rostrum, the pulpit, the press, all those agencies that formulate public opinion are indifferent or hostile to Catholic ideals and achievements. The tremendous spiritual force of Catholicism is not recognized, or given only minimal recognition, even by those who call themselves Christian. The experiences gathered through the centuries in all branches of knowledge and human effort are brushed aside as incompetent or inconclusive. The results of Catholic endeavor, as set down in published volumes, are not found in the libraries, or, worse still, stand unread, unread alike by Catholics and non-Catholics. Here is a body of Catholics, constituting one-sixth of the population of the country, with magnificent schools, colleges, hospitals, churches, orphanages, asylums, convents, and other institutions, whose record dates back to the beginning of the Christian era, a body that is utterly ignored and slighted, and that permits itself to be ignored and slighted. True, Christ has said "As the world hated me, they shall hate you." But that does not mean, you shall accept hatred, insult and even persecution passively and inertly.

The clergy, and the Catholic "intellectuals," to borrow a fashionable and vastly titillative term, have long been aware of the situation and have worked to remedy it. Publicity is the recognized remedy. It is time to change the modest "By their works ye shall know them" into the modern and more practical version "Ye shall know of their works." Hence the subject is again presented so that appreciation of the real situation will gradually permeate the Catholic body. Not until the movement is begun and its direction indicated, can it gather strength. Our efforts need to be canalized. Center on publicity and the prestige that is justly ours will accrue to us. The argument is for an effective press, for influential weeklies, and eventually for Catholic dailies. All argument to the contrary overlooks the essential fact that without our own press we are dependent on the good nature of others, that we, in effect, are suppliants. Before this fact all argument must fall. How can we expect to be treated as equals when we fail, or rather, fear even to make an attempt for our share, in the "publicity game"?

No Malpractice Permitted in Christian Science

FRANCES BEATTIE

A DIVINE power, guiding the pen of Mrs. Mary Baker Eddy, in preparing the "Church Manual," devoted a chapter to "Discipline." Let it not be forgotten that the rules laid down therein, were not the words of Mrs. Eddy, but as the preface tells us, in a quotation from her "Miscellaneous Writings," "they were impelled by a power not one's own." If that supreme power, dictating that wonderful volume, took minute care of Mrs. Eddy, that gentle founder of Christian Science should not be charged with putting forth "arbitrary opinions nor dictatorial demands," as the preface itself makes plain.

With Christian Science blossoming like the rose, and practitioners in every corner of the globe, what must be the chaotic condition of Mrs. Eddy's mind,if a small army of devoted followers proceeded to give her absent treatment for diseases which did not exist. With one "Scientist" treating her for softening of the brain, for instance, and another for an exaggerated ego, while the third tried the treatment for measles, what a disturbance would ensue in her delicate system. But the unseen dictating that wonderful volume, prepared for just such an emergency.

Article VIII, Section 8, page 42, warns us that: "Members will not intentionally or knowingly mentally malpractise, inasmuch as Christian Science can only be practised according to the Golden Rule 'All things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them.' (Matt. VII:12.) A member of the Mother Church who mentally malpractises upon or treats our Leader or her staff without her or their consent shall be disciplined, and a second offense as aforesaid shall cause the name of said member to be dropped forever from The Mother Church." Again, Article XI, Section 9, page 53: "No member shall enter a complaint of mental malpractice for a sinister purpose. If the author of Science and Health shall bear witness to the offense of mental malpractice, it shall be considered a sufficient evidence thereof," and, Article XXVI, Section 3, page 84: "Teachers shall instruct their pupils how to defend themselves against mental malpractice, never to return evil for evil, but to know the truth that makes them free, and thus to be a law, not unto others, but to themselves."

Not only can there be no malpractice in Christian Science—according to Divine law—but there must be "no adulterating Christian Science." Mrs. Mary Baker Eddy and her writings must be protected, until Science shall be no more. For, Article VIII, Section 10, page 43 says: "A member of this church shall not publish profuse quotations from Mary Baker Eddy's copyrighted works without her permission, and shall not plagiarize her writings." Lucky Mary Baker Eddy! Her entire career mapped out by the Divine power that controlled her pen!

Not "arbitrary opinions nor dictatorial demands such as one person might impose upon another," were the following, but, rather, they were the rules and regulations "impelled by a power not one's own:" For, it is written, Article XI, Section 3, page 51: "Any member who shall unjustly aggrieve or vilify the Pastor Emeritus (Mrs. Eddy) or another member, * * * shall either withdraw or be excommunicated."

Article XI, Section 7, page 52: "If a member of this church shall, mentally or otherwise, persist in working against the interests of another member, or the interests of our Pastor Emeritus, and the accomplishment of what she understands is advantageous to this church and to the cause of Christian Science, or shall influence others thus to act, upon her complaint or the complaint of a member for her or for himself, it shall be the duty of the Board of Directors immediately to call a meeting, and drop forever the name of the member guilty of this offense from the roll of church membership." Section 8, page 53, of the same article reads: "If a member were to treat the author of our text-book disrespectfully and cruelly, upon her complaint that member should be excommunicated. If a member, without her having requested the information, shall trouble her on subjects unnecessarily, and without her consent, it shall be considered an offense."

Section 10, page 53, continues: "If a member of The Mother Church publishes, or causes to be published, an article that is false or unjust, hence injurious to Christian Science or its leader (Mrs. Eddy) and if, upon complaint by another member, the Board of Directors finds that the offense has been committed, the offender shall be suspended for not less than three years from his or her office in this church and from church membership."

Section 11, page 54: "If a member of The Mother Church of Christ, Scientist, or a member of a branch of this church breaks the rules of its Tenets as to unjust and unmerciful conduct—on complaint of Mrs. Eddy, our Pastor Emeritus—and this complaint being found valid, his or her name shall be erased from The Mother Church and the branch church's list of membership and the offender shall not be received into The Mother Church or a branch church for twelve years."

Section 12, page 54: "If a member of this church, either by word or work represents falsely to or of the Leader and Pastor Emeritus, said member shall immediately be disciplined, and a second similar offense remove his or her name from membership in The Mother Church."

The Divine power that dictated the above, also prepared a chapter dealing with the "Relation and Duties of Members to Pastor Emeritus." It covers all of Article XXII, pages 64 to 70, inclusive, and although the first copyright noted in the "Church Manual" bears the date of 1895, this far-seeing all-wise power peered into the future at least eight years in Section 1, and changes the title of "Mother Eddy" to "Leader," explaining that, while Mrs. Eddy objected to being called "Mother," she consented because it meant "nothing more than a tender term such as sister or brother. In the year nineteen hundred and three and after, owing to the public misunderstanding of this name, it is the duty of Christian Scientists to drop the word mother and to substitute Leader, already used in our periodicals." Section 3, page 65, deals with obedience in this summary fashion:

It shall be the duty of the officers of this church, of the editors of the Christian Science Journal, Sentinel, and Der Herold, of the members of the Committee on Publication, of the Trustees of The Christian Science Publishing Society, and of the Board of Education promptly to comply with any written order, signed by Mary Baker Eddy, which applies to their official functions. Disobedience of this By-Law shall be sufficient cause for the removal of the offending member from office. The vacancy shall be supplied by a majority vote of the Christian Science Board of Directors, and the candidate shall be subject to the approval of Mary Baker Eddy.

The guiding light also seemed to foresee possible trickery in the future, for in Section 6, page 66, it is provided that "When a letter or message from the Pastor Emeritus is brought before a meeting of this church, or she is referred to as authority for business, it shall be the duty of the church to inquire if all of the letter has been read, and to require all of it to be read; also to have any authority supposed to come from her satisfactorily attested." Also, Section 7: "Members of this church shall not report on authority an order from Mrs. Eddy that she has not sent, either to the Boards or to the executive bodies of this church!"

The unseen power also took care of little details like: "A strictly private communication from the Pastor Emeritus to a member of her church shall not be made public without her written consent." (Section 8, page 67) and Section 9, on the same page: "A member of this church shall not employ an attorney, nor take legal action on a case not provided for in its By-Laws—if said case relates to the person or to the property of Mary Baker Eddy—without having personally conferred with her on said subject." Such a rash act would be termed "Unauthorized Legal Action." Section 11, pages 67, 68, says, regarding the "Opportunity for Serving the Leader:

At the written request of the Pastor Emeritus, Mrs. Eddy, the Board of Directors shall immediately notify a person who has been a member of this Church at least three years to go in ten days to her, and it shall be the duty of the member thus notified to remain with Mrs. Eddy three years consecutively. A member who leaves her in less time without the Directors' consent or who declines to obey this call to duty, upon Mrs. Eddy's complaint thereof shall be excommunicated from The Mother Church. Members thus serving the Leader shall be paid semi-annually at the rate of one thousand dollars yearly in addition to rent and board. These members whom she teaches the course in Divinity, and who remain with her three consecutive years, receive the degree of the Massachusetts Metaphysical College.

Section 12: "Rev. Mary Baker Eddy calls to her home or allows to visit or locate therein only those individuals whom she engages through the Christian Science Board of Directors of the Mother Church. This By-Law takes effect on Dec. 15, 1908." Was the unseen power again delving into the future, or did he return again and again, as Mrs. Eddy herself tells us in that quotation from her "Miscellaneous Writings" given in the "Church Manual": "They were impelled by a power not one's own, were written at different dates, and as the occasion required."

An "Incomplete Term of Service" is provided for in Section 14, page 69: "If a student who has been called to serve our Leader in accordance with Article XXII, Section 11 of the Church Manual leaves her before the expiration of the time therein mentioned such student shall pay to Mrs. Eddy whatsoever she may charge for what she has taught him or her during the time of such service." The climax of these By-Laws is reached in Section 15, page 69, under the head of "Help"—the crowning jest of the Divine dictator:

"If the author of the Christian Science Textbook call on this Board for household help or a handmaid, the Board shall immediately appoint a proper member of this church therefor, and the appointee shall go immediately in obedience to the call. 'He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me.'" (Matt. X:37.)

"The Golden Rule," Article VIII, Section 27, page 48 ordains: "A member of The Mother Church shall not haunt Mrs. Eddy's drive when she goes out, continually stroll by her house, or make a summer resort near her for such a purpose."

To be at once the mouthpiece and the handmaid of a Divine inspiration, was difficult enough for a poor mortal like Mary Baker Eddy. But to be compelled to go out into the high-ways and by-ways to discover a cook or a maid; to have curious followers "haunting her drive when she goes out," and other Scientists "mentally malpractising" upon her, this unthinkable series of calamaties was mercifully provided against by the still small voice that tempted Mrs. Eddy to write: "He that loveth father or mother more than me, is not worthy of me." How the same light guarded and guided the destinies of the Mother Church in other devious ways, will be shown in another article.

Some Indian Religious Customs

NEIL BOYTON, S.J.

THE externals of religion in India are one of the first things to strike the roving alien eye. It is not alone in temple or mosque or church, but in the very street costumes of the different communities. You tell a man's gods by the clothes he wears. The followers of the Prophet are instantly picked out in the crowded roads by their red or golden or green fez; their baggy flowing trousers and the tight-fitting blue or white "vest" that goes over the shirt. Those who have made a pilgrimage across the hot sands to Mecca forever afterwards dye their beards a dull red. The bearded Jews in flowing garments are robed as they were in the days when Our Lord trod the narrow Jerusalem streets.

The many color-combinations of the turban betray the particular sub-faith of the Hindus. As their gods are a thousand and one, the blend of hues is bewildering. But the principal religious mark is the smear of ashes or paint across the forehead. The only thing similar to this that we have is the sight of Catholics returning from church Ash Wednesday morning. These marks take many forms, as they are daily put on by the Brahmans in the temples. Shiva's followers usually have two yellow bars or a tiny red circle in the middle of the forehead, while the worshipers of Vishnu bear aloft a U-shaped mark or two vertical lines. The Brahman wears his cord across one bare shoulder. The professed ascetic has his stick and beads and begging bowl.

An essential Hindu tenet is to pay honor to the cow, and Hindustan is a cow's paradise. The Brahmanee bulls wander at will through the bazaars. They are even found undisturbed in the European sections of the cities. A Hindu gains merit by touching these sacred beasts, and so all the devout populace make it a practice to pat the wandering bulls. Indeed they will always give these sleek, meek-eyed animals the right of way. It is not an uncommon experience to find the tram, on which you are riding to an important appointment, stop in mid-block, and looking ahead you will see that the cause of this delay is the presence of a big mouse-colored bull on the lines. The khaki-turbaned motorman will speak politely to the beast and wait till, at its own sweet pleasure, it chooses to amble off the way. Then only will the tram proceed.

Another familiar sight is to see several bulls wandering through the bazaar. They will stop before a Hindu merchant's stand, where greens are displayed. They leisurely look the vegetables over, as a lady with a market basket on her arm might, and having chosen the choicest bit, mouth it and slowly trail away. And the Hindu seller will look on delighted that My Lord, the Bull, has deigned to "honor" his products. But woe betide the near-sighted sacred beast that mistakenly stops before a Mohammedan's stall. Hassan has no respect for his sanctity, and the indignant animal will lumber rapidly away.

Speaking of Musselmans, recalls the practice of many daughters of the Prophet. Under the title "Bibi Miriam," or the Lady Mary, they hold in high esteem Our Lady. They look on her as a great Prophetess, and the Mother of a great Prophet, and so it is no strange sight to see some of these Mohammedan women enter a Catholic church and head for the Lady Altar. There they will make salaams before the statue of the Mother of God. This often makes one wonder how she repays this devotion. That her tender heart must be touched is self-evident, and it may be hoped that as a reward for their reverence she gives these blinded ones sight before the end of their lives.

Among the Indian Catholics the majority come to church, as they go through life, barefooted. They squat on the floor, crowding up as near the altar-rails as possible. The women, as they use an end of their white dress as a shawl, and throw it over their heads, somewhat resembling Our Lady as she is usually represented in marble statuary.

With the Goanese Catholics, those whose ancestors received the waters of Baptism from the very hands of the Apostle of the Indies, one of the noticeable traits is their unshaking devotion to this same "Father Francis." Half the boys bear his name, and almost as many of Goa's churches too. And they invoke his aid in all dangers. A case in point: these Goanese going back to Goa, will avoid a larger boat to pack themselves and their luggage into a smaller one, if it only bears the magic name. And on this steamer "St. Francis" they will put out unafraid into the Arabian Sea, where today lurks violent death, thanks to the German's thoughtfulness in dropping mines from neutral shipping, knowing that in St. Francis's name there is security. Moreover, they will challenge you to name a steamer "St. Francis" that has suffered disaster on the Malabar Coast.

Christian funerals are, like death in India, sudden.

And if the person died before the early afternoon, his body will spend the night in the cemetery. Hence it is that the ceremonies are simple. The body is placed in an open coffin, carried through the roads on a bier, or in a gharri (open victoria) to the church. Here the priest says the prayers, and the procession proceeds to the cemetery. If the friends are poor, they follow the coffin on foot, otherwise they crowd into gharris, driven by red-fezed Mohammedans. The Requiem naturally is said after the funeral. And at this a black-draped catafalque is used.

Most native Catholic churches in India are built along airy lines of architecture, they open to the rare breezes, and are without pews, for there is just kneeling-space in the nave. The confessionals have no boxing about them, a criss-cross of wood separating penitent and priest. A familiar institution is the pankha, which consists of long rows of hanging cotton that the hidden pankhawallah by means of a mess of ropes keeps gently waving overhead. It is supposed to create an artificial breeze, and sometimes it almost does.

But it is at the time of a feast that the native Christians' love of display "breaks surface." Similar to our "Forty Hours Devotion," the East Indians have a "Thirteen Hours Adoration." After High Mass, the Host is enthroned. All day long bright lines of home sodalities and sodalities from the surrounding parishes, the invariable orphans from the nearby convent, with a white-clad nun as their marshal, and the strength of the parish, enter and leave the church. Then in the evening's cool they all crowd back by thousands. Lights, like the stars overhead, glimmer and flicker. Coolies carry great clusters of sparkling glass and candles enclosed in globes. The parish, dressed in white or brilliant shades, falls into line, and the procession winds under the palms about the church compound. Several times at gorgeous temporary altars, Our Lord is raised in blessing over the bowed heads. And finally Solemn Benediction closes this Catholic Arabian Nights scene.

It is these church services that bring home to a kneeling "foreigner" the truth that the Church is one. For the land may be strange, the language alien, the people different-skinned, but the priest at the altar in pagan India goes through the same ceremonies as did the priest at the altar on the other side of the globe, back in boyhood's days. If anything, the Lord in the Host, who is lifted blessingly, seems more lonely here, where there are so few to do Him honor.

The Nuns of France and the War

BARBARA DE COURSON

MANY articles, even books have been written, since the war, to celebrate the courage and self-sacrifice of the Red Cross Associations, whose members have devoted their lives to the assistance of our stricken soldiers. Among these brave women, nuns, belonging to different Religious Orders, have a place of honor, but in general, their work in this respect, is less widely known than that of women of the world, who left their homes to take up the life of hospital nurses. This comes from no desire to minimize or ignore the work of the religious, but, as our readers know, they shun, rather than court, attention and have a marked aversion to self-advertising. Moreover, the very fact of their being nuns, that is to say women, whose vocation implies total self-renunciation, makes even their heroism appear the natural consequence of their state of life. This is, after all, our indirect tribute paid by outsiders to the religious vocation that carries with it, as an essential condition, self-sacrifice in its highest form.

Nevertheless, it is only just that the work of the French nuns since the war began, should be made known, however briefly to American readers. The same readers have not forgotten that, some years before the war, the anti-clerical French Government drove the nursing Sisters from the public hospitals and, on this occasion, the medical men, who might, perhaps, have interfered successfully in their favor, failed to do so. Now, these same surgeons and doctors are eager to secure the nuns' services and openly recognize their value as sick nurses in times of danger and overwork. A nun's sacrifice of her life to a higher ideal is made on the day when she puts on her religious habit and it is a small matter to her whether the sacrifice is accepted sooner or later. She is free from the strong and tender ties that bind a wife and mother to earth; and there are times when the latter's home duties may clash with her required professional service.

At the outset of the war, certain religious women, who nursed the wounded soldiers, near the eastern frontier, were, through circumstances, forced into positions of unexpected responsibility. One of these was Sister Julie, who belongs to the Order of St. Marks, of Nancy. She was superioress of the hospital of Gerbeviller, a little town of Lorraine which the Germans entered on August 23, 1914. Sister Julie is a woman of over sixty, solidly built, short and square, whose homely features are redeemed only by an expression of combined kindness and strength. She is a woman of deeds, rather than of words, impatient of compliments and impervious to fear. When the German officer in command entered her hospital, he had a revolver in one hand and a naked sword in the other. Sister Julie kept close to him, when he insisted on visiting the wards where lay the wounded French soldiers. She reminded him that they were helpless and must be respected, and carefully replaced their bed-coverings, when he threw them aside to see if their wounds were real. Hearing that the church was on fire, she flew to the spot, rescued the ciborium from the tabernacle and communicated herself to save the Blessed Eucharist from profanation. Early in September, the little town was taken by the French and, at a moment of intense stress and confusion, Sister Julie was, to all intents and purposes, the "Mayoress" of Gerbeviller. She provided food for the troops, and remedies for the wounded, while, at the same time, she encouraged the civilians who came in contact with her invigorating personality. For her services, Sister Julie was given the Legion of Honor by the President of the Republic, a mark of consideration that she neither expected nor desired.

At another little town, Clermont en Argonne, a Sister of Charity, Sister Gabrielle, was at the head of the local hospital, when news of the Germans' approach spread like wild fire through the country. The civil authorities fled and the military authorities, who were ordered to leave, offered to take away the Sisters. "Can you also remove the old people whose home is at the hospital?" asked Sister Gabrielle. This was impossible for motor cars were not in sufficient numbers. "Then I remain," she said, and alone in the deserted town she waited. After a terrific bombardment the Germans made their entrance and broke into the hospital. Sister Gabrielle was there; she spoke no German, but explained in French that her house was an asylum for old people but that she had beds to spare for the German wounded. "According to the laws of war and obeying the precepts of my religion, I will nurse your wounded with entire devotedness, but you must spare the town and the hospital." The officer promised, but a soldier having set fire to the neighboring houses, Sister Gabrielle again interfered, and she argued to such good purpose with the German chief that he gave orders that the fire should be put out. Part of the town perished, but the hospital was saved through the presence of mind of this brave daughter of St. Vincent. Like Sister Julie, Sister Gabrielle was mentioned in dispatches and decorated by the French Government.

The Sisters of the hospitals of Arras remained at their post in the bombarded city when the inhabitants fled and their attitude was praised by their Bishop, the late Mgr. Lobbedey. A young Augustinian nun was killed in the wards; as she fell she was heard to say: "I offer my life for France." The diary of a Sister of Charity of Arras is instructive; it is very simple reading, the writer tells of the havoc wrought in the doomed city during the month of October, 1914; how the Sisters led their daily life, catered for provisions, provided for their orphans, their sick and their poor, and between whiles said the rosary with a perfect faith in God's protection.

Another journal which has come under my notice was written in a convent of Champagne and records the arrival of the Germans, who, revolver in hand, searched the convent. The writer relates events in a quiet, matter-of-fact way, that speaks volumes for the spirit of the community. When the roar of the cannon prevented them from sleeping, the nuns went to the chapel and said the rosary. "Each one resigned herself to the will of God. We are in His hands." They evidently had talked over the possibilities of being killed and, writes the Sister, "We thought we preferred to die by a mitrailleuse than by a revolver." The battle of the Marne delivered the nuns from their unwelcome guests, who beyond pillaging the house did no further harm. The annalist dwells cheerfully on God's loving mercy and protection and passes lightly over material losses.

Since 1914 similar scenes have taken place at Reims, the martyred city, that has only lately been evacuated by its Archbishop, Cardinal Luçon. The members of several communities were, at their urgent request, allowed to remain after the greater part of the inhabitants had been removed by the military authorities; among these nuns the last to leave Reims were the Sisters of Charity and the little Sisters of the Assumption, the nurses and servants of the poor. As long as any poor and sick remained in the cellars, where the people dwelt night and day, the Sisters had work to do and they did it with a cheerfulness that is a charming form of heroism. In the course of last winter one young Sister was sent back to the mother house in Paris for a rest; she obeyed orders, but her heart was at Reims and when she was thought fit to return there her delight was unbounded. It struck even the official from whom she had to demand the necessary passport; when the paper authorizing her to return to the bomb-swept city was put into her hands the little Sister colored with pleasure and next day, as her companion on the occasion expressed it, she went away as if she were going to a fête. When Cardinal Luçon left the town the little group of nuns who had remained in Reims followed, the city being given up to the troops.

All the French nuns have not experienced the tragic adventures that made Sister Julie and Sister Gabrielle famous, but throughout the length and breadth of France they have worked unceasingly on behalf of our wounded soldiers. The nuns of Soissons, of Senlis, of Compiègne, of Bethune and Bapaume, have been mentioned in dispatches and given the Croix de Guerre. The French nuns of Bagdad were decorated by Sir Stanley Maude a week before his death in recognition of their devotedness to the wounded British soldiers. Others, whose work lay outside the army zone have expended the same devotion on our soldiers, but the happy results of their influence will only be revealed hereafter; till then they are content to work day after day, quietly, humbly, silently, shunning rather than courting attention, their eyes and hearts fixed on the Master to whom their lives are consecrated.

It has been my privilege since the war began to be in constant touch with the nuns who direct a hospital for wounded soldiers in a Paris suburb. Before the war the house was the novitiate of the Little Sisters of the Assumption, the servants of the poor. The novices have been removed to the provinces and the villa-like building, surrounded by trees, is a hospital for French wounded soldiers. A few ladies are allowed to help the Sisters in their work, but it is the nuns who direct and govern, who dress the wounds and exercise a strong and softening influence over their guests. I have noticed, during nearly four years, that in general, whether he is religious or the reverse, the French soldier prefers to be nursed by nuns; he has a curious sense of possession where the Sisters are concerned. It is awkwardly expressed, but one gathers the meaning that underlies the words: "The nuns think only of us," said one man, and another: "The Red Cross ladies are very kind, but the Sisters belong to us." Another observation that results from my close contact with the French nuns of 1918 is the utter futility of the accusations brought against the nursing Sisters, when, some years ago, the Government drove them from the hospitals. They were said to be old-fashioned in their methods, averse to science, careless in their ways, etc. Whether or not these charges were well founded then, they cannot be made now. The nursing Sisters are certificated Red Cross nurses with the proper training and they have passed the regular examinations, without which they cannot deal with serious cases, and they are fully competent.

It is not only in the hospitals that the nuns of France serve their country at a moment when its energies are taxed to the utmost. They are the good angels of the refugees, whom the recent German advance has driven from their homes. The other day at the Paris Gare du Nord arrived 150 little waifs, boys and girls, who came straight from St. Omer, then furiously shelled by the enemy's airships. They were under the care of four sweet-faced Sisters of Charity, around whom they gathered when the train stopped. At the request of the director of the canteen the children were marshaled into a big room and fed with bread and milk. It was good to see their reliance on the Sisters and the latter's gentle authority over their little flock; evidently under the shadow of the white cornette the children felt safe. This reliance also exists among the soldiers. In September, 1914, the hospital of Senlis, crowded with wounded French, was shelled by the enemy. The nuns walked up and down the wards saying their rosary. "Do not leave us, Sisters," cried the helpless soldiers. "If you are with us we feel safe." Their confidence was rewarded. The hospital walls were partly destroyed and the furniture shattered, but no soldier was killed. This feeling of reliance is made up of respect and affection. It speaks volumes for the attitude of the religious women, who, for the last four years have been the good angels of thousands of stricken fighting men.

The Easy Language

WILLIAM POLAND, S. J.

"AND the earth was of one tongue and of the same speech." (Genesis xi. 1.) That was before the dispersion of the descendants of Noe from the land of Sennaar. Men spoke one tongue. Now they speak tongues a thousand and one. Very earnest and very intelligent effort has been made in our day to establish a common articulate medium of communication. There has been a general presumption that it would be impossible to have any one of the existing languages adopted as a common medium. Recognizing the force of the presumption linguistic scholars have evolved for us new languages such as the Volapuk and the Esperanto. The advantage of each of these new languages lies in this, that, whilst being an approach to various tongues in use, it is absolutely free from irregularities in spelling, pronunciation, grammar and construction.

The main obstacle to the acceptance of the new language for universal service has been that it has never been used by any people or tribe or the smallest community; not even by the members of one family. If Volapuk had been found to be the speech of some people in Central Asia, Volapuk might be in very common use today. If, fifteen years ago, Esperanto had been found to be the tongue of some little tribe in the Atlas mountains, Esperanto might be in the schools today. But the new language comes always devoid of the social voice needed to make the appeal. The adepts and promoters are individuals. As individuals, they are scattered. The new speech cannot be passed on as the necessary social instrument of province or town or home.

The new language was offered as an ideal means to a desirable end. We cannot secure the condition required for the new application of the ideal means. But the effort has had the important and hopeful result of fixing attention on the end. It has prepared us to appreciate the fact that the end has now become even more desirable. In five years peoples have come closer together. Within a year, when the twilight seemed to be creeping over their civilization, they have learned more of one another than they had learned in a century before. There is soon to be a new status of peoples. Under the wreck of the slaughter the foundations have been deeply laid. In view of the near approach of this new status would it be rash to consider the possibility of some agreement upon one of the old languages as a common vehicle of thought? There would be no question of the literature of the language or of the refinements of style but merely of the knowledge needed for intelligible conversation and correspondence.

If a choice were made it would have to fall upon one of eight tongues which are widely spoken in varying degree by western peoples. These eight are: Slavonic, Scandinavian, German, English, French, Spanish, Italian, Portuguese. We may eliminate the Slavonic and the Scandinavian. German is excluded by its inflections and construction. English, beautiful in its simplicity, is barred by the anarchy of its spelling. There remain the Romance tongues descended from the Latin. We may omit the Portuguese. French, too, is ineligible. The spelling, though thoroughly consistent, is different from the spelling of other languages; and then there is the labyrinth of the verb. This leaves the two related tongues, the Spanish and the Italian. Would it be possible to put one or the other to practical service for the general convenience? It does seem possible. Which one? The choice could be made by the outsiders. Spaniard and Italian would readily accept the choice for the common good. The Spaniard and the Italian can, each, get a working knowledge of the language of the other in a very short time.

The availability of either language seems to be supported by the test of inquiry. There are certain fundamental points to be considered. It is easy to name the most obvious. And it is better to do this with a reference to one of the languages, only, so as to avoid an appearance of comparison. Reference is made to the Italian since it has the prerogative of precedence in the alphabetical order. Stability. It may be said that the Italian of Dante is the Italian of today. Pronunciation and Spelling. There are no sounds in Italian that are not found in all other tongues. The pronunciation can be learned in a very few lessons. The spelling is regular; the same combination of letters is always pronounced in the same way. Grammar. The grammar is a minimum, almost as simple as the English grammar. Euphony. In this, Italian is first without dispute. Actual use. It is hardly an exaggeration to say that Italian is spoken by from sixty to seventy million persons. Resemblances. Italian, with French, Spanish and Portuguese, is of Latin origin. Those who speak Spanish or Portuguese can learn to read Italian in a few weeks. Those who speak French only, with no knowledge of Latin, would require a little more time. But persons who have an elementary knowledge of Latin possess the key to Italian. This makes Italian easy for those millions of the northern peoples who have made elementary studies in Latin; whilst the French, the Spanish and the Portuguese who have studied Latin can acquire a very serviceable use of Italian in a few months.

As Italian is a spoken language, both teachers and practice are available. If students were to let the impossible languages go and were to cultivate one that is impracticable, five years would bring about a universally satisfactory result. If only one-tenth part of the time that is given in our own schools to French and German were given to Italian, we should have students coming out by thousands with a practical knowledge of Italian such as very rare individuals ever get of French or German.

For a number of years the high schools in Japan have given special attention to the study of English, French and German. This has been done in order that the Japanese people might have access at home to the best learning of the western world. The students, therefore, have been given an opportunity to prepare in these languages, and professors have been invited from the west to lecture in the University of Tokio in English, French and German. Very lately an economy at once simpler and more far-reaching has been contemplated. A comparative study of languages has been made with the view of discovering which one language might be most easily learned by the Japanese people to serve as one general medium of communication with the western world. The conclusion arrived at was that the easy language is the Italian. In this finding of the commission is there, perhaps, the prelude to what may not be altogether a day-dream? It is the verdict of the only people who have made the practical and successful experiment. The success has, of course, been distributed according to the attention bestowed upon one or other of the difficult languages. What may come to pass if general attention is given to an easy one?

Mr. Hoadley and the Anti-Saloon League

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In his article, "Action and Reaction of Bone-dry Prohibitionists," Mr. Hoadley recently made an attack on the Anti-Saloon League as if it were constitutionally and nationally an anti-Catholic organization. At least he seemed to have that prejudice, which he tried to justify by associating the League with a number of notoriously anti-Catholic societies and individuals that happened to meet on a common platform to oppose a common adversary, the drink evil. But it has not yet been shown that the League, as an organization, is anti-Catholic; nor can this be done by showing that a certain anti-Catholic element belongs to its membership and would use its power to strike a blow at the Catholic Church by trying to outlaw sacramental wine. Let it be proved that this element is in the majority and ascendency; that the welcome extended by the League to Catholics to cooperate with it for temperance is hypocritical and perfidious—then we shall believe.

I am not a member of the League, and since its change of course from temperance by local option to Prohibition and total abstinence by legislative coercion, I have lost most of my sympathy for it. But before that change, I saw it in operation to promote a local-option measure in territory that sorely needed "prohibition in the first degree" or the abolition of saloons. I met some of its foremost officials and speakers, among them ministers, and I could not but be impressed by their broadness and friendliness to Catholics, both priests and people. In fact, the cooperation of Catholics in that campaign served to disarm all local prejudice towards our Church as it served to elicit from the League officials assurances of their sincere friendship for the Church. Shortly after that, Mr. Baker, National President of the League, published in large type on the first page of their official organ a protest that the League in its purpose and work never for a moment contemplated any ban on sacramental wine. Therefore, the contrary actions of individuals, or even local officers, should not be charged to the League. Let us be temperate in speech as well as in all other things.

A Chance for Statisticians

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Some one has asked me a difficult question, and I know of only one source whence to get an answer. How are the 17,000,000 Catholics in the United States divided according to birth or ancestry? Is there any department which has statistics on that particular question?

Catholic Accountants Needed

To the Editor of AMERICA:

It is a matter of surprise to me that comparatively few of our Catholic young men enter the profession of public accounting. It is all the more surprising because it is at least one of the professions, perhaps the only one, which is not overcrowded, for the demand for public accountants is much greater than the supply. The new income and war taxes call for returns which few laymen are competent to prepare properly. The war-tax legislation imposing those taxes is so complicated that it is very difficult to interpret; indeed, until the Treasury Department gives an official interpretation of some of its provisions, or until the Supreme Court passes on them, neither accountant nor lawyer can say exactly what they mean. You can therefore imagine how bewildering and confusing these matters must be to the ordinary business man. In the circumstances he generally sends for an accountant, with the result that, since the enactment of the law, the demand for trained men in the accounting line has greatly increased.

The great business organizations of the country today are calling for trained men, men with trained minds, possessing initiative, resource and capacity to handle problems when they arise. The cry is for efficiency; and efficiency is nothing more than doing a thing methodically, quickly and correctly. Why do not our Catholic young men avail themselves of the educational opportunities at their doors? Is it due to lack of proper direction from those who are charged with their upbringing, or is it lack of ambition in the men themselves? I have been reliably informed that the majority of the men enrolled in the College of the City of New York, in the Pace Institute of Accountancy, in the New York University and in Columbia University are non-Catholics.

In a few years more, if we do not arise from our lethargy, we shall find this profession crowded with non-Catholics, and some of us may be inclined to whine because we occupy inferior positions and possess no standing in the business world. And here let me remark that this is a matter in which prominent Catholic laymen and clergymen might well take an interest. There are at the present time many young men in New York who if their latent powers were developed could easily double, and sometimes treble, their present incomes. They are in a rut, and unless somebody takes an interest in them the rut will eventually become their grave, for if you walk long enough in a rut it becomes so deep that you cannot get out of it.

Training our young men is practical patriotism—it helps to win the war; it helps the Government; it promotes prosperity, for by reducing waste and abolishing inefficiency you are increasing production. You are supporting the army and navy by furnishing the sinews of war, and, what is of very great importance, you are preparing our country to meet the severe competition which is sure to come after the war.

I suggest that a committee composed of priests and laymen be formed to discuss the matter. This committee could act in an advisory capacity, and could not fail to be of great advantage to our young men who need counsel as to how to prepare for productive business careers. The time is ripe for the most intensive cooperation between clergy and laity in respect to these matters. Let us make a beginning at once.

The Bishops' Reply to Lord Curzon

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Your comments in your issue of August 3, page 395, relative to the "Bishops' Reply to Lord Curzon" appear to be inaccurate. In Lord Curzon's speech upon June 20, he did not speak of the Bishops, but of "The Irish Catholic Clergy in Ireland, who advised their flocks under penalties of utter damnation to resist conscription to the uttermost." A circular on this subject was issued by Lord Curzon quoting extracts from recent utterances made by Irish priests, which were the foundation of his statement. These appeared in the London Times of June 27 and other papers, and anyone reading them cannot fail to realize that the comments made by Lord Curzon were justifiable.

New York. E. C. WILSON.

[AMERICA made no comment on Lord Curzon's speech. What was printed on page 395 was a quotation from the official statement of the Irish Hierarchy. The Irish Bishops are certainly better judges of the utterances of their clergy than the London Times and "other papers." Cardinal Logue characterized the Curzon charge as "outrageous and vulgar." According to a dispatch from London to the Catholic Press Association, Lord Milner wrote to the London Times, saying these "extracts", justified Lord Curzon and asking "what Sir Mark Sykes, the Catholic M. P., thinks of Father Lynch, Father Brennan and other members of the 'hierarchy' (?!) of which he seems so much enamored!" Father Lynch denies he made the statement attributed to him and says that Lord Curzon was misinformed by a bigoted person. In the House of Commons the Attorney General for Ireland declared that no priest had said that persons who obeyed the law in Ireland would be liable to eternal damnation.—ED. AMERICA.]

Behind the Drive

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Your recent editorial, "Behind the Drive," pointing out the wonderful efficacy of the united prayers of the children of France and England, calls to mind the no less marvelous effect of the prayers which preceded two former drives in France. The incident was told to me by the Countess de Merode, who is also the Princess de Croij, one of the noblest and most highly respected families of Germany. While I served as chaplain at intervals during the first two years of the war at the Castle de Merode, she told me that before the first great battle of the Marne, neither General Joffre nor Castelneau's plans were fully matured, and yet at the turning of Von Kluck's army toward the north the need of a plan was most urgent. At this point General Castelneau intimated his intention of going to hear Holy Mass the following morning and of receiving Holy Communion, and he requested those of the staff who were willing to follow his example to do likewise. They did so, and when Mass was over the plan was completed, which resulted in the battle that will go down in history as the great victory of the Marne.

On another occasion when the fate of Verdun hung in the balance, General Castelneau with his staff was behind the lines. One evening he entered a village church that was crowded with people praying very earnestly. He requested them to say one Our Father and one Hail Mary for each year of the earthly life of Our Lord. They prayed the whole night, and on the morrow began the famous counter-offensive that saved Verdun.

The Chaplain's Cross

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Regarding your editorial in AMERICA for July 27 about the changing of the insignia for the army chaplains from a cross to a shepherd's crook, the service journals on whose authority you based the editorial are mistaken. Inquiry made by me recently at the War Department elicits the information that no such order has, as yet at least, been issued. The Cross is still the insignia of the chaplains.

Complaints and Protests

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The article by Father Dinneen, entitled "Chicago's Censorship of Films," in your issue of July 20, interests me very much. I know, too, it interests many others. Few there are who do not see "movie" pictures now and then. Frequently, one may hear that something decidedly and offensively objectionable was thrown on the screen, and that in one's own home neighborhood, whilst young and impressionable people were present, whose minds must have been befouled or seared by the evil things exhibited. And some have complained—but, oh, the pity of it!—in that useless and meaningless way, namely, by merely grumbling, doing nothing, and communicating nothing to somebody who might correct the evil or at least start something that will at least effect a wholesome modification by "cut-outs" and the like. Yet these same people, among them the very best of our communities, would tell the milkman that his milk on a certain day was sour, if that were the fact; or tell the butcher in plain English that his meat is spoiled, if that were the fact; and if the plumber does an unworkmanlike job in repairing the tubs, he will be sure to hear of it very positively. Thus would complaints be brought home to any and all tradesmen if there were thought to be provocation therefor. And more than that, if the milkman does not deliver better milk, or the butcher show more care, or the plumber mend his job, they will all count one customer less among their patrons. And they will know it by letter or telephone: and the milkman, the butcher, and the plumber will know who makes the complaint, and why. But the manager of the "movies!" What immunity he enjoys from any complaints! Yet he, too, has a telephone, an address for mail, and presumably at least a disposition to please his patrons. His offenses do their damage in the hearts and souls of the innocent. Do parents and guardians never think to complain to the local managers of the movies which can do harm infinitely worse than sour milk or rotten meat or leaky tubs?

By Mr. Creel's Authority?

AMERICA has had much to bear from certain members of foreign missions which, from time to time since the beginning of the war, have been accredited to her friendly shores. It should seem elemental, but some foreign nations have yet to learn that an embassy, presumably of peace, yet headed by bitter, unscrupulous and voluble enemies of the Catholic Church, is decidedly out of place in this country.

But the climax was reached in the recent visit of a party of seven Italian editors, one of whom, Signor Agresti of the Tribuna, Rome, marked the opening of his hospitable reception by a lying attack upon the spiritual head of millions of American citizens. As reported by the New York Evening Post for August 7, this shallow-pated individual thus sought "to enlighten American opinion:"

> The position of the Vatican is very false, and everybody in Italy judges its conduct as quite anti-Italian. The Pope has talked altogether too much—not openly but secretly—and has been too much in favor of Germany and Austria. The Catholics themselves blame the politics of the Pope, as well as every one else in Italy.

Briefly, according to this Italian, the Holy Father, whose mission has been as that of an angel of mercy in this blood-drenched world, is a liar, a hypocrite, and a coward, disseminating in secret what he fears to say in public. That the Holy Father has favored Austria and Germany, is a statement refuted by its own patent mendaciousness.

Contempt and silent loathing would mark the attitude of Catholics towards this band of seven, were it not that, according to the Post, "they are visiting the United States as guests of the Bureau of Public Information."

Is Mr. George Creel willing to allow this calumny to be offered as "information?" As an official, holding his place by appointment of the President of the United States, does he stand sponsor for this despicable attack upon the man whom millions of Americans, irrespective of creed, regard with respect and even veneration?

Mr. Creel will do well to teach the editor of the Tribuna a lesson, by arranging for his immediate transportation to Italy. Whatever his usefulness at home, whatever his usefulness might have been in this country, Signor Agresti chose to begin his mission by contributing to a despicable anti-Catholic propaganda. The deed marks his utter unfitness to be a guest of the Bureau of Public Information, much less of the United States of America, in whose defense thousands of American Catholics will lay down their lives.

"Everybody Welcome, Everything Free"

AS the delegates to the "victory convention" of the Knights of Columbus gathered in St. Patrick's Cathedral to attend Mass two aeroplanes dropped from the sky pamphlets bearing the slogan that has become classic in the annals of war relief. It stands over every K. C. hut both in this country and overseas and it spells a message of welcome to every soldier and sailor wearing the United States uniform. In a single sentence it epitomizes the work of the Order and proclaims its spirit in the great task it has undertaken with the forces in the field. All the supplies that are sent to the camps in this country and abroad are to be given gratis to the men who are fighting the battles of the country. Small wonder that the victory convention rose to its feet in a wild outburst of applause when the chairman of the committee on war activities declared that there would be an appeal made for $50,000,000 to enable the Order to live up to its war-relief motto.

When the Knights of Columbus followed the flag to the Mexican border in 1916 they gave evidence of their ability to meet war conditions. From San Antonio to Nogales a chain of buildings was constructed and where it was not possible to have buildings, tents were put up. All this work at the border was accomplished without any appeal for support from the public, indeed without any special call on the members of the Order for financial aid. The entire cost was defrayed out of the general-expense fund and by economizing in other directions. In April of last year when the manhood of the nation was called to the colors the Knights of Columbus answered the call. Welcoming the entrance of the Knights into the field of war relief Mr. Fosdick declared, speaking for Secretary of War Baker and the Commission on Training Camp Activities: "We approve the strong stand that your organization has always taken in regard to the moral hazards surrounding a young man's life and I am confident that your influence in the camps will add much to their general tone. We shall be very glad to cooperate with you in every possible way."

After more than a year with the colors, the victory convention went before the country with its war record. In this country there are 160 recreation halls with 485 secretaries, and at the rate of seventy-five a week secretaries are being sent abroad to handle the work there. "Wherever the American fighting men go," in the words of the Supreme Knight, "the Knights of Columbus war-relief work will follow. On the sunny plains of Italy, on the frozen steppes of Russia, among the hills and vales of England, and on the shell-scarred fields of France," soldier and sailor will read the motto that is now familiar to the men in service: 'Everybody Welcome, Everything Free.'"

Much has been done by the Order for Church and Country in the days that have passed since the war began. Much more will be done in the days that are to follow before another victory convention marks the passing of another epoch in the Order's history. The pledge of the late convention is an omen of the future's success. "Another year of greater effort lies before us. But who except Him who reads the very hearts of men shall tell us what it portends? All that is certain is our unfailing faith in God's justice, our unswerving loyalty to our country and our firm and unfaltering determination to follow the flag to the very end of the far-flung battle lines."

Religion on the Battlefield

IN the New York Tribune, for August 5, there appeared a thoughtful and in many ways a very consoling article on the growth of religion on the battlefield. In the course of his reflections, which are based for the most part on what Protestant chaplains have written on the subject, and have little bearing on conditions among Catholics, Mr. William T. Ellis points out two phases of current religious experience of which the first must be very familiar, and the second very startling to non-Catholics. He says:

> Old usages and old creeds seem to have succumbed to the U-boats or some other force on the way over. All things, from the very existence of a Supreme Being to the right of a church to exist, have had to face the challenge of this new, emancipated, free-thinking, audacious war-mind.

This statement comes as a surprise to no one who has followed for the past decade or so the trend of religious thought outside the Catholic Church. Sincere belief in the Divinity of Christ and the Divine obligation of accepting whatsoever He taught, has long been a desideratum in the attenuated forms of Christianity preached from many Protestant pulpits. Careful observers have long noted two currents: one towards Catholicism, and the other towards atheism, agnosticism or some comfortable substitute for revealed truth, such as Theosophy or Christian Science. It is no wonder that these two movements should have been accentuated by the stress of the war.

> The one religious body in Britain, aside from Christian Science, which has made definite progress during the war, is the Roman Catholic Church. Interviews with its leaders, clerical and lay, show that the Church is not only holding its own with its own members and finding them responsive in ways affected by the war, so that Masses and special prayer services for the soldiers are unusually well attended, but that it is also winning hundreds of converts from the non-Catholic population. Especially among military officers have the recruits come to the Catholic Church. The priest who has had most conspicuous success as a missionary to non-Catholics tells me that these men want to be spiritually right before they go to the front—or, in a significant number of cases, before they return to the front. They covet the sure word of the Church.

It is only natural that the grim realities of war should sweep away the mists of obscurity, the miasma of old habits, family and racial prejudice, and the soothing fallacies of social environment. Brought face to face with the prospect of death, men think honestly in the clear light of truth. Self-deceit, temporizing, and sham lose their power over souls, made sublime by heroic sacrifice. Thus far, therefore, it is easy to follow the article in the Tribune.

But what about the opinion of those many British clergymen, who, according to Mr. Ellis, declare "that this war will reintroduce the churches of the Reformation to the Eucharist, to the crucifix and to prayers for the dead"? That the churches of the Reformation, as organizations, will return to the Faith of their Fathers, even the most sanguine will not dare hope; for the price, submission to Rome, is too heavy for them to pay. Individual members of those churches, however, are meeting the spectacle of Christ on the Cross at every turn in France; fervently, though it may be furtively, they are praying for their dear dead, because they cannot stifle the cry of their hearts; the consolation and strength derived by Catholics from the reception of the Holy Eucharist and attendance at Mass are to many of them matters of holy envy. It is no wonder, then, that conversions are numerous and on the increase; but it is individual souls, not official church bodies, that are turning towards the staples of Catholic belief. The fields are white to the harvest, only the workers are few. Chaplains, more Catholic chaplains, are the need of the hour.

When Our Boys Return

IT is a wholesome thought to pray for the dead, but a very unwholesome thought to take for granted that every other enlisted man is as good as dead. True, we shall pay a heavy toll before the sacrifice of war is transformed into exultant victory, but we only add to our burdens by measuring the toll with an uneasy imagination. From time to time, estimates of the war's probable fatalities, based upon official French and English reports, have been published in these pages. These estimates do not bear out the statement, industriously propagated, it would seem, by hostile interests, that "the majority of our boys will never return." On the contrary, they indicate that the number of American soldiers who "will never return" is very small in comparison with the number of enlisted men. The Reverend Thomas Travis, a returned overseas Y. M. C. A. secretary, bears out this contention. "It is wrong," he remarked in a recent interview, "to impress upon our departing boys the probability of their never coming back."

> The truth of the matter is, and the statistics will bear me out, that about eighty per cent of our boys will come back from the war without a scratch. Ten per cent of them may come back wounded. Even of these, many will not be seriously handicapped. The ten per cent who will not come back, will die the finest, cleanest, noblest death for a mortal to claim as his destiny.

However optimistic these figures may be, their optimism is of a kind that should be encouraged. Only a heart of stone would suggest to the old mother at home, that her boy is doomed to certain death. Pessimism and undue depression create an atmosphere of sorrow which, in the end, will reach the old mother, and those who watch and pray at home, as surely as the heartless spoken word. There is high warrant for the statement that sadness has killed many, and there is no good in it. God still rules. If in His own time He asks a sacrifice, He will surely give the strength to bear it. From most of us, He will not ask it, for the great majority of our boys will surely return, finer men, better citizens, nobler Christians, after their baptism of fire and blood.

Municipal Ownership

THAT justly revered, but often misunderstood instrument, the Constitution of the United States, confers wide war-time powers upon the Federal Government. Extreme as these powers sometimes appear, no American can, or does, object to their use by the Government. To object would not be prudent, neither would it be safe. To oppose the Federal Government, once Washington has fixed its official mind, is quite as dangerous as to curry a Missouri mule of uncertain temperament, fixing a dreamy gaze the while, upon the lifting mists of the far horizon.

Nevertheless, some of the Government's thoroughly justified war measures have given to the theory of the municipal ownership of public utilities, a prominence and a favor that it by no means deserves. Municipal ownership of street cars, telephones, markets, and other public utilities, is a benefit only when the community can give an equal or a better service, at a lower expenditure. Furthermore, in the long run, municipal ownership is a disaster, not a benefit, if it tends to break down private energy and enterprise. Because the Federal Government can successfully operate the railway systems, it does not necessarily follow that the Toonerville trolley would serve its patrons better, if owned by that thriving community. It might give better service, but that it will, cannot be presumed. It must be proved. The majority of American cities have not been so well managed as to create a presumption in favor. The presumption is rather to the contrary.

Seven-cent street-railway fares should be averted, if at all possible, but it might be cheaper to pay seven cents, than to insist upon the old rate and be forced to pay a higher tax-bill. For the politicians, who under municipal ownership, would apply their giant intellects to the problems connected with transportation, must receive an ample quid for the quo of the gray matter thus expended. Even then their efforts might not be crowned with complete success. Better than municipal ownership, or the present system, would be a stricter supervision by the public authority of all public utilities. This method does not interfere either with the rights of private owners, or with individual enterprise, yet seems calculated to secure a maximum of good service for the public.

Bringing the War Nearer

NOTHING has been done by the Government to bring the war nearer to the people at home that equals in interest the second feature-film of the war presented by the Committee on Public Information under the title of "America's Answer." It places before Americans in this country what their kith and kin are doing on the other side of the Atlantic in the great world-struggle. Reading official accounts from the front, the impression is very common that everything important takes place in No Man's Land or in the fields withered by the flame of battle. "America's Answer" corrects that view. It carries the audience overseas and reveals what is being done not only by the men who fight but by those who build bridges, railroads and big plants, assemble locomotives, and send supplies to the men at the front. It makes clear the vast reach of the war behind the lines and the important work being done by those who do not belong to the combatant forces.

The picture brings out two striking facts, the effort that the Government makes to win the interest of every citizen in the war, and the power that the screen holds as an educational factor. Mr. Creel is very plain in making clear the Government's purpose:

> The picture represents one phase of America's fight for public opinion. It is a fight that is being made not only in the United States, but in every country in the world. Through the written word, the spoken word, the motion-picture, the poster, and the sign-board, we are carrying the message and meaning of democracy to all peoples, preaching to them the justice of our cause, the certainty of our victory, and the great truth that this victory contains no benefit for us that may not also be enjoyed by the whole world. In the rush of preparation there have been failures, but on the whole a great task has been greatly discharged. Let us continue to be impatient with inefficiency, but when we have to replace a defective brick, do not let it be used as an excuse for tearing down the whole structure of achievement.

You might be told that the work of the American engineers in France is wonderful, but when you see a port in course of construction that might have been made in peace days along home shores, and realize it is going on in France by American workmen who have had to run the risks of submarine attack, and use materials that have been shipped across miles and miles of dangerous sea, you are convinced of the wonder. Here lies the power of the "movie" for good or ill. Its message burns into the mind more deeply than the spoken or written word. Speeches or pamphlets could never bring the war as near to the people as the film can. It is the same with the moral lesson that the picture brings to the thousands of children that fill the moving-picture theaters in all our communities. Where the houses are high-class the little ones are having an educational advantage in their lives unknown to their elders of another generation. Where the films cater to the lower instincts or portray the abnormal in lurid light, innocence is lost as rapidly as the reels revolve. Will the lesson taught by the Government be learned by the interests that control the industry, and by State-boards of censorship that fail to censor?

Literature

BOOKS FROM SHADOW LAND

THOUGHTFUL readers of current literature must have noticed since the war began a regrettable recrudescence of "psychic" or Spiritistic books with spooks for their authors. Sir Oliver J. Lodge seems to have started the new literary fad by publishing "Raymond," a work which purports to be revelations from beyond the grave by his son, who was killed in battle early in the war. Other disembodied authors emulated "Raymond," for we now have such books as Elsa Barker's "Letters from a Living Dead Man," Mary Blount White's "Letters from Harry and Helen," C. Lewis Hind's "The Invisible Guide," and several books from the indefatigable "Patience Worth," while well-known men like Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, Dr. W. J. Crawford and Sir William F. Barrett have lately written serious books dealing with Spiritism. These eerie works seem to have a strong appeal for those who are now without faith in revealed religion, but in the bereavement the war has caused them turn for comfort to the superstitious practices of Spiritism.

Apropos of these spookish writers who are now enjoying such a vogue, Miss Agnes Repplier, our gifted Catholic essayist, contributes to the August Atlantic Monthly a paper on "Dead Authors," which is written in her happiest vein. She wittily observes:

> If we may judge by the recent and determined intrusion of spirits in authorship, heaven bids fair to be stacked with printing-presses. One of their number, indeed, the "Living Dead Man" . . . gives high praise to a ghostly library, well catalogued, and containing millions of books and records. With such resources at their command, with the universe for inspiration, and with the uncounted dead for readers, why should disembodied spirits force an entrance into our congested literary world, and compete with the living scribblers who ask their little day?

What alarms Miss Repplier most is the extraordinary literary fecundity of these phantom authors. Within the space of three years and a half the "archaic" Patience Worth, for example, dictated to her ouija-board typist some 900,000 words, covering nearly all the fields of literature: stories, essays, six-act dramas, short comedies, parables, voluminous verses and historical novels. It is Miss Repplier's belief that Patience "represents a spirit syndicate, and lends her name to a large coterie of literary wraiths," and the essayist finds the most discouraging feature of this exceedingly prolific spook's "performance is the possibility of its indefinite extension." For "being dead already, she cannot die, and the natural and kindly limit which is set to mortal endeavor does not exist for her."

Without question, every living author, actual or prospective, has a just grievance against these "literary wraiths" who have so unblushingly invaded the field of sublunary letters, and effective measures should at once be taken to keep the book-market from being glutted with their uncanny wares. If the output of these spookish authors were of extraordinary merit, their intrusion into our already overcrowded domain might perhaps be tolerated. But a perusal of the "post-liminal" works of distinguished authors who, though dead, persist in writing still, are invariably disappointing. "Jap Herron," for instance, the story Mark Twain is supposed to have written since he crossed "the great divide," no person of critical acumen could possibly attribute to the author of "Huckleberry Finn," and Cardinal Newman, on the rare occasions when he has graciously consented to transmit a message from beyond the bourne, uses English that was never heard from his Oxford pulpit. If Sir Walter Scott could send us over a novel equal to "Ivanhoe," Milton a poem like "Lycidas," or Shakespeare another "Hamlet," no one would complain of the protracted literary activities of those authors. But it is a significant fact that when the wraiths of departed authors of renown take up the pen again, they invariably write something that is far inferior in artistic value even to the weakest lines they indited in the days of their flesh.

As for those hitherto unknown authors who now laboriously compose their books through the clumsy medium of a moving table or the planchette, if Raymond's absurd communications regarding the humdrum post mortem life he is now leading and the banal nature of the "uplifting and helpful thoughts" he "projects" to "those on the earth plane" represent his finest posthumous work, if the silly letters "Harry and Helen" are sending "across" are fair specimens of post-liminal correspondence, and if Patience Worth's exceedingly "Sorry Tale," written in a language that never before was heard on sea or land, must be considered, as her veracious publicity man assures us, the ne plus ultra of spookish literary genius, then the humblest of our "living authors" may rest secure, for their hard-won laurels are in no danger whatever of being torn from their brows by the envious hand of a spectral rival.

If earthly scribes there be, however, who fear to compete in the book-market with these ghostly literateurs, laws should at once be passed to protect our living authors against the unjust encroachments of the dead. Perhaps an effective way of discouraging these shades' cacoethes scribendi would be the imposition of a scale of heavy taxes on the publishers of psychic and Spiritistic books. Patience Worth, for instance, because she writes so voluminously and unintelligibly, should be forced to pay in unmistakably palpable money a war tax of $10.00 or $15.00 a page. Any later "Letters from Harry and Helen" should not be delivered unless each one bears war stamps aggregating at least $50.00. Any new "Invisible Guides" that present themselves should be promptly drafted into the army, where they will doubtless prove of great service in reconnaissance work. As for further second-hand communications from spirit land, sponsored by such well-known men as Sir Oliver J. Lodge, Sir William F. Barrett, Sir Arthur Conan Doyle and Dr. W. J. Crawford, the adventitious credibility the weight of their authority seems to give the "facts" they publish, should net the Allied war-chest a comfortable sum, if the readers' tax is properly adjusted.

With the world brim full of excellent books that remain, for the most part, unread, the gullible public should be mercifully kept, as far as possible, from interesting themselves in the consummate trash that is supposed to flow from the pens of departed authors. When we have all learned to read with appreciation the works of genius left us by such masters as Shakespeare, Milton, Johnson, Scott, Wordsworth, Newman, Hawthorne and their peers, we can then peruse, if we are so inclined, the latest intelligence that has come via the ouija-board from shadow land. But any person of discernment who has learned to feel at ease in the company of the kings and queens of letters, is not likely to waste his time reading the vulgar absurdities, the "cryptic" platitudes, or the interminable and often unintelligible novels with disembodied spirits as their alleged authors, which enterprising publishers foist upon the credulous reading world.

The vogue such books enjoy nowadays is undoubtedly the nemesis that follows the loss of faith, for men who reject all belief in revealed religion often become the victims of silly superstitions. "There is a set of heads that can credit the relations of mariners, yet question the testimonies of St. Paul." If God has a new message from beyond the grave to communicate to the men of this generation, surely it is not the séance chamber with all its ridiculous and unsavory antecedents, that He will use for the purpose. Those "Spiritistic phenomena" which are not manifestly of hypnotic or telepathic origin are either plain vulgar frauds or else they emanate from the powers of darkness. It will be recalled that a request was made on a certain memorable occasion that an admonitory ghost be sent from the dead to the living. The petition, however, was sternly rejected. "They have Moses and the Prophets," the rich man in his torments was told. "Let them hear them." As the Christian world of today not only has Moses and the Prophets still, but an infallible Church besides which tells us all we need to know about the life beyond the grave, consequently those authors from shadow land who have lately been so lavish with their absurd "revelations" and jejune counsel really have no raison d'être at all.

THE DYING SOLDIER'S GUARDS

I hear the whispered words, "Absolvo te!"
I see the heavenly food brought nigh;
I sense Thy touch, I hold Thee for the way,—
Now watching angels sing on high
The melody,
"Well done, the victory is won."

I feel Him near me in this clinging night;
Soft whisperings as of mother's voice
I hear. Then singing of this closing fight,—
Sweet singing to the heart's own choice
The melody,
"Well done, the victory is won."

I hear Him whispering hope; the voices stay
Their song of sovereign victory near;
Exultant Michael hymns his martial lay,
And hosts of choiring angels hear
The melody,
"Well done, the victory is won."

Rest me, sweet voice that speeds the waning night,
And quits me of the battle's sting;
Lead thou, blest Mother, to the vision bright—
Lo, now I hear God's verdict ring
The melody,
"Well done, the victory is won!"

BOOK REVIEWS

Jacqueline. By JOHN AYSCOUGH. New York: P. J. Kenedy & Sons. $1.50.

The Rough Road. By WILLIAM J. LOCKE. New York: The John Lane Company. $1.50.

The Light Above the Crossroads. By MRS. VICTOR RICKARD. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co. $1.50.

These three books are excellent summer reading for those who like to find something more than stereotyped adventure in their novels. All three have a message, somewhat similar—namely, the working out of the nobility of the soul through much suffering, but developed in the characteristic style of the authors. All three are tinctured by the war spirit, and are strong, wholesome, and interesting.

In "Jacqueline," Mgr. Bickerstaffe-Drew, who first won his place in literature by his novels and recently secured it beyond dispute by his "French Windows," tells the story of an English girl, whose headstrong self-sufficiency leads her into various blunders, of which the crowning one is an ill-advised marriage with a German spy. Disaster crowds upon her, but instead of weeping amid the ruins of her life, she gathers her strength, shakes off her littleness and through self-sacrifice of a peculiarly harrowing kind, wins her way to moral greatness. The setting is the quiet English life with which the author is so familiar, the characters have a marked individuality, and all through the book runs that strain of gentle sympathy and appreciation for the greatness of little things which have put the author's pen-pictures of the war in a class apart.

"The Rough Road" represents Mr. Locke at his best, and, although quite different in treatment, is distinctly reminiscent of both "The Beloved Vagabond" and "Septimus." A young man, who has been brought up in cotton-wool, and is utterly dependent on the petty refinements of luxury for his enjoyment of life, finds himself forced by the outbreak of the war into conditions which call for the strength of vigorous manhood. He fails to qualify for his commission, but enlists as a private, and in the stern school of the trenches learns to reconstruct his theory of values, becomes a man among men, and wins the love of a charming French girl. Those who know Mr. Locke's work will not be disappointed in his latest novel.

"The Light Above the Crossroads" is a virile picture of a strong man who gives up everything, honor, country, friendship, love, in order to serve his native land. At the last, when his hopes of happiness have been apparently blasted beyond help, light comes out of the darkness, and he finds that his sacrifice has not been in vain, but on the contrary has won him esteem beyond price and unalterable love. There are a number of passages dealing with some delightful phases of Irish life.

Two Crowded Years. By Most Rev. GEORGE W. MUNDELEIN, D.D. Chicago: Extension Press.

This volume contains the pastorals, addresses and letters issued by the present Archbishop of Chicago during the two years that he has governed that see. Covering a wide field of subjects, and written in an easy direct style, the book will appeal to the general reader, interested in topics of the times, for the works of war and of peace, diocesan charities and world charities are treated in these pages. Archbishop Mundelein's wide sympathies, genuine patriotism, and practical leadership stand out strongly in all his utterances. In a public address, shortly after we had entered the war, the head of the Chicago archdiocese explained to his people the Catholic attitude in the great national crisis:

> On the afternoon of Good Friday our country formally entered the war . . . and now that it has begun none of us can tell how long it will last, what the cost in human life may be, and what sacrifices all of us must make. One thing is certain—and I speak for myself, for 800 priests, and 1,000,000 Catholics—the moment the President of the United States affixed his signature to the resolutions of Congress, all difference of opinion ceased. We stand solidly and seriously behind our President and Congress. . . . This is a government of the people and by the people. They are the elected representatives of the people. We have chosen them, and by their decision we must abide, otherwise we would prove unworthy of the blessings of a free democracy.

So in this hour of crisis I pledge the loyalty of our Catholic people to our flag, from the little drummer boy in the orphan asylum to the aged veteran in the old folks' home, the loyalty of every priest, Sister, adult and school child to our country and to our country's flag. . . . Soon many of our young men will leave home to enter the ranks of the army or the navy. The old Church that looked after them at home will follow them to the battlefield. God knows that we need priests sorely, but we will economize our forces here that they may go with our boys.

Not less noteworthy is Archbishop Mundelein's commendation of the Knights of Columbus war-drive. He observed: "The work they are doing in the camps is not for the benefit of their organization, but for the benefit of the Church in this country. The work they are doing is absolutely necessary for it means safeguarding the religion and the morals of these young men who are to be fathers of the families of the future." Monsignor Kelley in writing the foreword to "Two Crowded Years" pays a worthy tribute to the author, saying: "Already a consecrated bishop, he had experience as a pastor, as college director, as a chancellor, as a builder, an organizer, even a newspaper man; and out of this experience he had learned the great lesson, how to gain good-will, the first necessity if one is to find the things with which works are to be done." We look to the West as to a place where people "do things," and during the brief incumbency of the present Archbishop, Chicago Catholics have indeed done great things for God under his leadership.

Europe's Fateful Hour. By GUGLIELMO FERRERO. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co. $2.00.

The interpretation or the philosophy of history is a field of thought which even angels might fear to tread, but where fools often rush in. The Providence of God and the free-will of man are elements that must be reckoned with in any such endeavor. If this life is all, then materialism may philosophize and draw conclusions, but if it is not all, if above us and over us and superior to us there lies a heaven, unmeasured by space, unlimited by time, where reigns a God, in whose eyes the most gorgeous empire looms a mote, upon whom no rolling planet casts a shadow, if there is in each of us an immortal soul, and uncounted thousands have died to believe it so, then must materialism crash to its own ruin, overwhelmed by the darkness it has itself created, unhelped by the hand it sought to cut off. The Socialists, with their economic interpreation of history are essentially materialistic and so fail. Guglielmo Ferrero towers beside them, gigantic in truth beside their puny concept. He realizes with Wordsworth:

> God's most dreaded instrument,
> For working out a pure intent,
> Is man arrayed for mutual slaughter, and sees that from the present awful war some sure good will result. He first humbly acknowledges "Man must so often resign himself not to know" and then cautiously exposes his thesis of quantity versus quality, of the colossal as opposed to the great. The Middle Ages were the quality ages, "the Europe of 1317 was a paradise"; we are now living in the quantity phase of history, "during the last fifty years the mania for the colossal has infected all the nations of Europe and America to a greater or lesser degree, and unfortunately one of these ations has been completely carried away by it."

Rome and Greece at their supremest were quality ages; this quality connoted rules by which it was to be adjudged, hence, limits. Shelve the limits, you get limitlessness, the colossal. Rules in one domain of a nation disregarded, lead to the overthrow of other limits, of all limits. Signor Ferrero shows that Germany which we thought so ordered, was all disorder, that the Latin genius is the genius of order. Latinism now clashes with Teutonism; order or anarchy hangs upon the outcome. Man is free to choose which it shall be. "Man will be free in the future to resolve the problem, as he has been in the past, in deciding for one or other of the alternatives." The Allied soldiers are fighting to have quality prevail. "When, however, their work is finished, the task of scholars, philosophers and lawyers will begin, and we must only hope that their patience, tenacity and self-sacrifice will prove worthy of the soldiers." Scholar and philosopher, Guglielmo Ferrero is doing his share in this already and in doing so has written one of the most thoughtful books on the war. St. Thomas is approvingly quoted at least five times, and the book ends with this quotation from St. Augustine: "Esto ergo bellando pacificus ut quos expugnas, ad pacis utilitatem vincendo perducas."

General Foch: An Appreciation. By MAJOR ROBERT M. JOHNSTON, U. S. N. A. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co. $1.00.

Major Johnston has written a very readable appreciation of the General on whom the eyes of a world are now fixed. Briefly covering his early life the author lays greatest emphasis on Foch as a teacher and a leader in the field. In the Ecole de Guerre Foch held the chair of Military History and Theory, and one of his former pupils says of him at this time: "General Foch was an excellent teacher because he had a passion for teaching. He threw himself bodily into the task and made incredible efforts to convince his hearers. When directing a skeleton or map maneuver he put his officers through a veritable course of intellectual gymnastics." No one can read this chapter without realizing that Foch gave his pupils the best a teacher can give, example. At the outbreak of the present war Foch was in command at Nancy, and within six weeks he had played a prominent part in throwing back the German hordes. A story current in the French army illustrates the determination of Foch. In the terrible days of September, 1914, a corps commander informed Headquarters that he had withdrawn from the banks of the Aire in the face of German reinforcements. Foch's reply was: "You will immediately reoccupy the banks of the Aire; you will line them with your machine guns and artillery, you will hold the enemy there tomorrow, and when all your guns have been destroyed or captured you will report to Headquarters for further instructions." Major Johnston calls Foch "the typical French soldier," showing in his life the characteristics of all the great leaders in the history of France. The Catholic reader will miss the religious note in this appreciation. Its lack leaves the book incomplete, for no one can fully appreciate Foch who fails to understand what an important element in his character is his solid Catholic piety.

The Prisoner of War in Germany. By DANIEL J. MCCARTHY, M.D. New York: Moffat, Yard & Co.

In the general romance woven by the popular imagination around the subject of war, says Dr. McCarthy in the forefront of his splendid book, there is no more pathetic and appealing figure than that of the prisoner in the hands of the enemy; and while his treatment of his report is thoroughly scientific, a real historical report of a survey of the prisoner of war for the year 1916, it likewise touches at many points the high interest of romance, not fictional, but extremely realistic. Dr. McCarthy bases his large documentation of his subject partly upon his own notes, partly upon official reports published in the Parliamentary White Papers, and to a certain extent upon confidential letters accompanying these reports. The incidents which are related to illustrate some point he touches upon in criticism are also corroborated by documentary evidence. The thoroughness of his work, the carefulness with which he conducts his accountings and observations—a diplomatic cautiousness since America had not then entered the war—and the special interest in that subject now that America has prisoners of war in Germany, all this goes to make Dr. McCarthy's book an important one. The various camps, international law as applied to the prisoners of war, their internment in Switzerland, and a dozen other chapters are contributions done in painstaking regard of his great subject-matter. The psychology of the military organization is excellently analyzed by the author; and the many pictures scattered along the pages do a service for the revelations in the text. The public in general will follow this historical report with keen interest; and our special students upon such a subject will have even a keener appreciation for this important and skilful account of one great department in the war.

The U-Boat Hunters. By JAMES B. CONNOLLY. With Illustrations. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.50.

The subject-matter of this gifted writer's twelfth book is, for the most part, the life led by our sailor lads on board destroyers, all described so alluringly that the volume ought to win many a recruit for the navy. The chapter entitled "The Doctor Takes Charge" shows what a thoroughly nautical man even the surgeon must be nowadays. "The Sea Babies" describes the haunts and habits of the submarine. "The 543 Stays Up" is a thrilling account of a torpedo attack and from passages like the following in "The Unquenchable Destroyer Boys" it will be inferred that convoying transports across the Atlantic is a rather exciting occupation:

> Our destroyers are about 11½ times as long as they are wide; which does not mean that they cannot keep the sea. They can keep the sea. Put one of them stern-on to a ninety-mile breeze and all the sea to go with it, give her five or six knots an hour head of steam, and she will stay there till the ocean is blown dry. But they are engined out of all proportion to their tonnage, with their great weight of machinery deep down, which means that they roll. Oh, but they do roll! Whoopo—down and back like that! Most of them will make a complete roll inside of six seconds. Ours was a five-and-one-fourth-second one. When she got to rolling right, she would snap a careless sailor overboard as quickly as you could snap a bug off the end of a whale-bone cane. There is one over there which rolled seventy-three degrees—and came back.

As Mr. Connolly was granted leave by the Government to sail in a destroyer so he could witness with his own eyes the incidents he describes in this book, and as he had several pitched battles with the British censor to secure good "copy," "The U-Boat Hunters" is a very interesting book.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

Under the title "The New Book of Martyrs" (Doran, $1.35), George Duhamel, a French military doctor, depicts many a touching incident of heroic fortitude and charity. In a few bold strokes he pictures the graphic scenes of bravery and courage which daily came under his observation while caring for these twentieth-century "martyrs of liberty." The style of the book is vivid and crisp, the incidents well chosen, and the information all at first hand. There is, however, a noticeable lack of that religious atmosphere which one naturally associates with a French military hospital. Florence Simmonds has translated the book very well.——In "Eastern Windows" (Marshall Jones, Boston, $1.00), Sidney Williams has told in well-written English a long "short-story" about an American who took part in the Russian campaign against the Austrians and was wounded. The book is in a sort of letter form and describes the progress of his love for Grace Murray, "now no more."——"In the Midst of Life: Tales of Soldiers and Civilians" (Boni & Liveright, $1.50) is a reprint of the late Ambrose Bierce's tragic and gruesome short stories. He was a veteran of our Civil War and wrote as "creepingly" as he could about the battle horrors that the grim realities of the present war have made quite mild by comparison. "One of the Missing" is a strong psychological study of a doomed soldier and "The Boarded Window" mounts to an unexpected climax of horror. But the author is not the unrecognized genius the reviewers would have us think him.

"The Story of St. Patrick's Purgatory" (Herder, $0.50), by Shane Leslie, gives in eight charming little chapters some of the legendary lore attaching to Ireland's ancient shrine. In the author's words, "This little book gives a glimpse of a very legendary past." The first story is of the nature of an allegory, the second and third are gleaned from the spirit of old Celtic monasteries, "The Coming of the Danes" is a story told of many holy places at the time. The others are more historical, for the visions of Owen were in most libraries of the Middle Ages, and the expulsion of the Canons is remembered yet in the people's traditions. All are written in the author's best vein and most interestingly told.——In the pamphlet "Le Message de 1689 a-t-il été réellement abandoné?" (Bureau du Sous de la Presse Paris, 2 fr.), Abbé Marcault, after an examination of Blessed Margaret Mary's letters, concludes that the promise of the Sacred Heart to render the arms of Louis XIV victorious if the image of the Sacred Heart were emblazoned upon his banners was meant not for the King only, but for France. The author shows that the character of Louis XIV presented no difficulty, since God frequently employs unworthy instruments, and endeavors to prove that this promise was neither recalled by the Sacred Heart nor forgotten by Blessed Margaret Mary. The present war has witnessed a partial fulfilment of the Sacred Heart's desire, for, in August, 1917, the French Government granted permission to carry the banner of the Sacred Heart beside the national colors on the battlefield.

At first sight "Elementary General Science" (Hinds, Hayden & Eldredge, $1.50), by Daniel Russel Hodgson, hardly seems very well adapted to the needs of the classroom, as the mass of facts presented would have a tendency to bewilder and discourage the average pupil of the seventh and eighth grades, the first years of the high school or the junior high school, for whom the book is intended. However, as the author has wisely limited himself to the environment of the student and has designed what he terms "interest and fact lessons," closer perusal of the book banishes the first impressions. The nature of the subjects treated, the instructive diagrams and the pertinent questions based upon observation, will keep the students' attention from lagging.——"Laboratory Exercises in General Chemistry" (American Book Co., $0.44), by Roland H. Williams, A.M., and Walter G. Whitman, A.M., encompasses many of the most desirable features of an up-to-date laboratory manual. The authors' many years in the classroom have evidently led them to the conclusion that an abundance of material from which to choose is preferable to a minimum, which must be amplified. The experiments are well chosen, clearly worded and adapted to teaching the pupil to argue from effect to cause, and not simply designed for the accumulation of isolated facts.——"Great Inventors and Their Inventions" (American Book Co., $0.80), by Frank P. Bachman, contains a series of twelve short stories on the conception and realization of the steam-engine, steamboat, locomotive, cotton-gin, telephone and telegraph and other great factors in nineteenth-century industrial progress. Suitable illustrations add to the general information afforded. The book should prove an interesting and helpful supplement to elementary-history classes.

"Luther on the Eve of His Revolt" (Cathedral Library Association, New York. $0.75), is a little book from the pen of the celebrated French Dominican, Père Lagrange, and has been translated by the Rev. W. S. Reilly, S.S., professor of Sacred Scripture, in St. Mary's Seminary, Baltimore. The old view of Luther's rebellion made it spring from a real or alleged revolt from the practices connected with the preaching of Indulgences in 1517. Later researches, and particularly the discoveries of Johannes Ficker of Luther's Commentary on the Epistle of St. Paul to the Romans, delivered in lecture form in Wittenberg in the year 1515-1516, show conclusively that long before and entirely independent of the preaching by Tetzel, Luther had formulated the theories that must sooner or later have brought him into conflict with the traditional teaching of the Church. The Indulgence episode was merely the immediate occasion of Luther's outburst, but by no means its cause. Luther's Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, which furnished so much material for sledge-hammer blows from the righteously indignant if sometimes violent Austrian Dominican, Fr. Denifle, was in the pages of the Revue Biblique, 1914-1916, subjected to a close but restrained scrutiny by the French Scripture scholar, Père Lagrange, with a view first to examining Luther's exegetical method, secondly to studying his intellectual and moral dispositions in so far as they may be gathered from this commentary, and thirdly to indicating the new doctrine professedly derived from the Apostle and its real relation to St. Paul's teaching. In the main Père Lagrange echoes Denifle's judgments of Luther though in more temperate language except in regard to Luther's morality. Here he sides rather with Dr. Grisar in his more favorable opinion of Luther's private life. Fr. Reilly deserves praise for his translation of this admirable brochure.

EDUCATION

The Hyphenated Schools

IT is a time-tried saying, and worthy of all credence, that what is sauce for the goose may serve as sauce for the gander. To hold otherwise would be, in the opinion of M. Savarin and all his disciples, a denial of the laws of nature. They are right, these artists of the fiery range and ladle, and the truth of their contention is almost universal. It holds in many fields; for our present purpose, in the field of education, if that be a field and not a Times-Square subway maze. Enough to set the most phlegmatic a-marveling is it, to reflect that this day which has put in their true light the pedagogical fluff and tinsel, filched from Prussia with rare industry for half a century by our school authorities, should be the very time for the National Educational Association to propose the elements of a complete course in the Prussianization of the schools.

The Function of the State

LET it be clearly understood that Catholic philosophy allots the State its definite place and function in the work of education. But the parent comes first. His rights are prior in nature and time to any rights possessed or assumed by the State. The child is his own, and his is the right and duty to prepare this extension of himself to become a complete asset to the community, and a future citizen of the Kingdom of God. Short-sighted and usurping laws may limit or nullify his rights, but only to the ultimate harm of the State. Whatever attacks individual initiative, or destroys private rights, or weakens the authority of the head of the primal society, in the end derogates from the peace and prosperity of the State. An incubator is a fair substitute for a gallinaceous mother; but the State is a poor incubator, for men are not poultry. It is the duty of the State to provide for the citizen in those things only, in which the citizen cannot suitably provide for himself, and no part of the State's office to act as a common parent, relieving the individual from responsibilities which he should face, and duties which he can well bear. Only if he fails in his duty to his family, may the State interfere by punishment, or, better, by fulfilling the neglected functions. On broad principles of the common good, the State must encourage and protect education, and in given individual cases when the parent will not provide for the proper training of his child, assume the office of schoolmaster. But it may never claim education as its exclusive right. It may not divide the children into social groups and classes, prescribing for each, the kind and extent of training; above all, any interference with the child's religious education, is gross usurpation. For the parent comes first, and the State, last of all.

State Idolatry in the Schools

AS pointed out in these pages by a careful student, the Rev. F. P. Donnelly, S.J., the American Catholic school, partly because of lack of funds, but more because of a traditional conservatism, has always held back from the educational follies of the day. The vast majority of those follies were made, as we now see clearly, in Germany. In his "Democracy and the American School," Dr. C. H. Judd, of the University of Chicago, mournfully admits that we were far too hasty in looking upon Germany as the high hill from which all light and healing were to flow into our schoolrooms. The German schools "had a perfection of organization"; they "produced results"; they were "efficient." Since "efficiency" has long been the test by which we have measured all things, we admired the smooth working of the German machine, without troubling ourselves to examine whether or not the huge output was worth while. We did not seem even to suspect that it might be actually harmful. "The German school is a perfect organization," writes Dr. Judd, > but it is an organization developed to prevent the growth of democracy. The German schools are the instruments of aristocratic control built up systematically by a powerful State for the accomplishment of a definite political end.

While in the phrases to which attention is called, Dr. Judd touches upon the danger always to be feared from State-dominated schools, he does not, apparently, care to conduct his observation to its logical conclusion. A State-dominated school system in this country is at least as equally deplorable as a State-dominated system in Germany, and far more grotesque. It has no place in a republican government, and the day which introduces a Federal control of education is the day which future historians will assign as the beginning of the downfall of our republican institutions.

The Results of Prussianism

WRITING in the Boston Transcript, Dr. James L. McConaughy, Professor of Education at Dartmouth, shows clearly the evil results of the system in Germany. It made every teacher a petty State official, and every school a hothouse for the fostering of principles of State-idolatry, coined at Berlin. To control the political views and affiliations of the coming generation, it was Germany's care to establish a school-monopoly, administering it through teachers and officials, dependent upon governmental favor. The teacher, according to Dr. McConaughy, became in the completest sense "a civil servant," an apostle of kultur, as understood in official Prussia. All this was part of a well-defined plan, popular with a certain group of half-baked thinkers in this country before the war, to treat the child as a ward of the State, and nothing more, and the citizen as a mere pawn in the great game of domestic and international politics for the aggrandizement of a militaristic State.

> Decades before any other nation did so, Prussia put all of her schools under absolute government control. . . . Since the Government wishes all future citizens to think alike and to think as the Government dictates, private schools are, in effect, forbidden; no private school can be opened in Germany without governmental approval, and this is very seldom given. Bismarck, who built the foundation of the Germany of today, maintained that the Government's greatest hold upon the people could be secured through the schools, for "he who controls the schools, controls the future." The present Kaiser thinks likewise . . . gymnasium and volkschule alike were to be under the absolute dictatorship of the Government. So effective have the schools proved in extending the Government's domination over the people, that the same scheme has been tried for countries outside of Germany.

How well the system succeeded in Germany, this world-war and its effects bear witness. We want nothing of the sort in the United States. Freedom of education is essential to freedom, as freedom has been understood in this country for more than a century. Any plan to limit or harass that freedom is plainly stamped, "Made in Prussia."

Not Wanted in America

SINCE the adoption of the Constitution, the Federal Government has confined itself strictly to the exercise of the limited powers conferred upon it in the matter of public schools. Its attitude has never been one of control, but of encouragement of every worthy educational effort. The proposal of the National Educational Association to extend those powers, is a proposal to begin in this country a policy which contains in germ the Prussian system, and which will issue, as in Germany, in "dehumanized schools." Clearly, it is a reversal of the Federal relations toward public education, steadily and wisely maintained, from the beginning. The Association's plan, if adopted, will not only increase the local tax-rate, even now in many localities, pushed beyond the limit, but will also call for increased Federal taxes. At the same time, it will make the way of the private school, Catholic and non-Catholic, exceedingly difficult, if not impossible.

Yet, grave as they are, these are but secondary burdens. Federal financing of local schools, despite all loud clamor to the contrary, means in the end, Federal control of local schools. The man with the power is the man with the purse. And Federal control will mark the beginning of a dark age in which the children of a free country are made puppets of a tyrannical State. That age seems far away, but among the most excellent means of bringing it nearer, is the appropriation of Federal funds for local schools, provided these schools be utterly devoid of religion.

Distribution of War Labor

ONE sunny afternoon in early July twenty business men of Seymour, Iowa, closed their ledgers and locked their desks, with an air of grim determination, and motored out into the country. Not to some pleasant villa or the green golf links did they speed, but down the dusty road until they reached a farm where harvest help was needed. Only a moment, and their coats and collars ornamented the rustic fence around a waving oat-field. The rustling of the many tasseled heads came to them like a song of welcome, and without delay they set to work. Before the sun hung low on the horizon, and its large, red disk was sinking out of view, ten acres of the farmer's oats were cut and safely harvested. There were aching backs and bruised hands from the unaccustomed toil, but the twenty-five cents per acre, after a larger sum had been refused, were proudly turned over to the Red Cross fund before the men returned to their homes that night. It was a good half-day's vacation, and a lesson in patriotism from which we all can learn.

Fairly Distributing the Burden

SACRIFICE and cooperation are the special needs of the time. But it is not possible for the individual to know where he can bestow his energy to the best effect. Not all can motor on some sunny afternoon into the distant country and there put up the farmer's ripened harvest. Even if this were possible it would afford no adequate means of giving the needed assistance or distributing the burden of sacrifice. Hence the plan of a centralization which will not interfere with the rights of liberty or property, but coordinates both to the common good, without exceeding the real exigencies of the time. Some sacrifice and hardship there must be. Men cannot be secured for war work without withdrawing them from employers engaged in non-war work, so far as necessity requires. To this no one can reasonably object, provided the burden is equally distributed.

To protect any State or community from being drained unfairly, and to insure at the same time a just and full contribution from every section of the country, the United States Employment Service will begin by dividing the demand for unskilled labor into definite quotas. The total demand is first apportioned among all the States, and each State must then divide its allotted quota among all its various communities. These respective duties are performed for the States by the Employment Service, at Washington, and for the communities within each State by the local State director. As soon as the data concerning the demands have been received from practically all the war industries and are properly tabulated, the quotas can be announced. They will be based on the estimated requirements as they can be ascertained for two months in advance. Before the end of that period new developments may ensue and must be duly considered, with the result that new quotas will be apportioned as often as may be deemed necessary.

Principles of Labor Distribution

WHEN the necessary labor supply has been secured through the methods we are immediately to describe, the United States Employment Service will itself conduct the distribution. Each State director will be given sole charge of the movements of labor within his own State. The following principles are officially set down for his guidance:

(1) Local labor supplies will be used so far as adequate to meet local demands. (2) Where the local supply is not sufficient to meet the local demand, it will be distributed primarily among employers requiring smaller numbers of men, assigning to the larger demands the men brought from other States. (3) Movements of labor from one State to another will be conducted so as to secure the greatest economy in distance traveled.

Hence where the demand of a State for unskilled labor is greater than the quota of men to be contributed by it, the Washington office will authorize the local State director to draw from other States in which the quotas assigned are greater than the demands.

How Labor is Transported

THESE are doubtless wise regulations. The Government has shown itself no less careful in devising its methods of transportation. Movements of men are to be made in parties only, and each group is escorted by an officer of the employment service. Before leaving home the men are thoroughly examined by competent physicians, and the necessary requirements of health are announced and must be complied with. Physicians sent by any of the receiving employers may, if so desired, conduct this examination. Equally important, both for the men and the employers, is the previous examination made to ascertain the qualifications of the laborers, that none may be sent who are not adapted to the work they would undertake. This examination is conducted by the Employment Service examiners. Employers, however, may again offer the assistance of their own experts. The transportation is then paid out of the Revolving Fund of the Employment Service and collected from the concerns for whose benefit it has been advanced. Since the workman is moreover to be given in advance the most definite information regarding all the terms and conditions of employment, it would seem that there should be few instances where either the men or the employers can have reasonable cause for complaint.

Making Spiritual Provision

IN this particular it will be necessary on the part of Catholics to see that assurance can also be given to the men that they will have the opportunity of attending to their religious duties at the posts of labor to which they will be assigned. Since no laborer is compelled to accept any given position, it is possible to provide that every Catholic workman can be located in the vicinity of a Catholic church. We cannot begin too early to study this subject and to make the necessary provisions. It might be best if so important a matter were taken in hand by the National Catholic War Council, while local pastors also should see that due opportunities for the exercise of their religion are offered to the men who go forth from their communities. We cannot be too careful of the spiritual welfare of our men, nor can we perform any more patriotic duty than that implied in such a task. Strength of character and loftiness of civic ideals must be based upon religious principles. The same reasons that urge us to send chaplains should likewise prompt us to see that Catholic workmen are not deprived of spiritual ministrations, when a comparatively slight measure of attention can procure this blessing for them all. An excellent example, in this regard, has been set by General Pershing in his eagerness to supply chaplains to all the troops, both at the points of debarkation and at the front. Proselyting is another danger to be guarded against.

Securing Unskilled Labor

A LABOR board, consisting of three men—one representing the Employment Service, another the local employers, and a third the local employees—with the first acting as chairman—is organized in each community. Under the guidance of this local board the men needed for war work will be sought out by the paid officers of the Employment Service, the volunteer agents of the Public Service Reserve and by any other persons or organizations willing to cooperate towards this purpose. The methods of recruiting are entirely left to the determination of this board, provided it can secure the quota of men assigned to its community. Through the various agencies already enumerated the war needs of the Government will be brought to the notice of the laborers sought for, and the methods of application will be made clear to them. It is the duty of the community labor board, in cooperation with the local employers in non-war work, to see that the drain of labor will be fairly distributed among the latter. Here doubtless lies the greatest difficulty of the entire plan. The men themselves will ordinarily be recruited for particular employments, and the workers of each locality will, so far as possible, be assigned to the same specific plants or undertakings. It is finally urged upon employers, as a patriotic duty, to assure all their employees who respond to the country's call that they will be given preference in employment on their return.

How Workmen and Employers Should Proceed

INDIVIDUAL workmen, engaged in non-war work, who would answer the appeal made to them, are requested to do so only after consultation with their employer. They are further asked not to apply directly at any particular war plant, but to register at the nearest branch of the United States Employment Service. If none such exists in their community they can register with the local agent of the Public Service Reserve. The latter is the recruiting branch of the Employment Service, and its purpose is to secure the voluntary service, under Federal control, of patriotic citizens who wish to aid in the national war-labor mobilization.

Employers engaged in war work, are not forbidden to use their field recruiting forces, but they must be placed under the instruction of the Employment Service. With the authorization of the State director they may then be sent to the localities set aside for recruiting in behalf of such particular plants. Arrived at their destination, they must further follow the instructions of the State director and of the local community labor board. The use of such private field forces will in general be to assist the Employment Service in securing men for the particular needs of their employers and in arranging the details of mobilization and transportation.

Employers, partially or entirely engaged in war work, can arrange with the United States Employment Service for the men needed, and weekly or daily reports will be forwarded to them. Employers engaged in non-war work can likewise secure assistance from the same service. There is furthermore a special Skilled Labor Section of the Employment Service to which application can be made, while farm labor is provided for in its own way.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Steel Operatives' Minimum Wage

NEARLY all the contentions raised by the operatives of the Bethlehem Steel Works in the recent labor troubles were sustained by the Federal Labor Board in a decision rendered on August 4. A substantial increase of pay was ordered in many instances and a minimum hourly wage was secured for about 5,000 workmen. An interesting feature of the decision is the discouragement of bonuses as a means of increasing production. Labor leaders have been against the bonus plan for many years, although one of the reasons for the selection of Charles M. Schwab as the Director-General of the Emergency Fleet Corporation was the successful operation of the bonus plan at Bethlehem. The charge brought by workmen at Bethlehem that foremen and other officials of the company made improper use of the Selective Draft was referred to the Secretary of War. A provision secures for the workers compensation for overtime and double time on the basis of the President's proclamation of April 8, 1918, and the revision of earnings and wages made by the Labor Board is in no instance to operate for the reduction in the pay of any employee.

Titus Oates Again

FROM Sydney, Australia, comes a pamphlet on "curious oaths." They are four in number; the Jesuits, the Knights of Columbus, the Fenians and the Hibernians are the authors. Oft-refuted since the days of Titus Oates, these oaths that have their origin in the minds of slanderous bigots reappear in one section of the globe or in another. In Australia the present pamphlet is scattered broadcast by the Watchman, an Orange newspaper printed in Sydney. The Prime Minister of the colony has forbidden countless pamphlets since the outbreak of the war, yet no action has been taken in this instance where untold harm may be done to the Allied cause by allowing religious bigotry to run rampant at a time when the Empire is appealing for unity of action in the colonies.

Summary of Foodstuff Shipments

IN a letter to the President, Mr. Hoover gives a summary of foodstuff shipments from the United States to the Allied countries during the past fiscal year:

> The total value of these food shipments, which were in the main purchased through or with the collaboration of the Food Administration, amount to, roundly, $1,400,000,000 during the fiscal year. The shipments of meats and fats (includes meat products, dairy products, vegetable oils, etc.) to Allied destinations were as follows: 1916-17, 2,166,500,000 pounds; 1917-18, 3,011,100,000 pounds; increase, 844,600,000 pounds.
> In cereals and cereal products, reduced to terms of cereal bushels, our shipments to Allied destinations have been: 1916-17, 259,900,000 bushels; 1917-18, 340,800,000 bushels; increase, 80,900,000 bushels.
> Of these cereals our shipments of the prime breadstuffs in the fiscal year 1917-18 to Allied destinations were: wheat, 131,000,000 bushels, and rye, 13,900,000 bushels, a total of 144,900,000 bushels.

In assessing credit for these results the Food Administrator finds it difficult to distinguish between the different elements of our people. Rightfully he pays tribute to the part played by the women of America in food saving.

Catholic Education and American Patriotism

IN the opening address of the fifteenth annual convention of the Catholic Educational Association the Very Rev. James A. Burns, C.S.C., called attention in the following words to the special problem which the war has created for our Catholic institutions of learning:

> War conditions are beginning to press heavily upon us in our educational work. Our teachers in considerable numbers are going to the war as chaplains and officers. Our students are going into the army by thousands. Parents are compelled to economize and their ambitious hopes for the education of their children are being shortened correspondingly. Our colleges and universities, like the non-Catholic colleges and universities, are beginning to feel the strain. And as time goes on they are certain to feel it more, especially on the economic side. We need, therefore, to stand closely together. Coordination in our educational work, and cooperation in our educational organizations as such are the need of the hour.
> The Catholic Educational Association, I need scarcely say, stands squarely behind President Wilson for the prosecution to a triumphant issue of this war into which we were forced against our will and determination. From the highest to the lowest, our educational institutions are cooperating loyally and patriotically with the Government. And from the highest to the lowest they will continue to exert their utmost effort and influence to support the Government and its policies to the very end. At the same time we must leave nothing undone that is calculated to keep our educational system in the highest state of efficiency attainable under present conditions.

We can render no greater service to our country, as the speaker rightly concluded, than to promote Catholic education to the best of our ability. The principles of morality, obedience and patriotism, which this education instils, are necessary for America as never before and will become increasingly important for our country's welfare with the great problems of future reconstruction which the days of peace will bring.

An Example for Lord Curzon

THE Dublin Irish Catholic commends the action of the Washington Post in retracting two statements libeling the Catholic Church and urges Lord Curzon to take example from that paper. Rev. Paul R. Conniff, S.J., rector of St. Aloysius' Church, Washington, remonstrated with the editor of the Post, who replied defending the statements on the score of news. Thereupon a Catholic committee took up the matter and informed the editor that his answer was unsatisfactory. The Irish Catholic reprints his reply:

> I feel that I need hardly express assurance to your committee of my regret that any article appearing in the Post should have been the cause of criticism or disfavor. I have already conveyed my views in the matter to his Eminence Cardinal Gibbons, whose personal friendship I highly prize. You may rest assured that the managers of the Post will endeavor to avoid possibility of a repetition, and I will thank you for a prompt expression of opinion from your committee in the future.

Lord Curzon attacked the Irish Bishops and his statements were proven false by the official reply of the Irish Hierarchy. No apology has been issued by Lord Curzon, nor has the press in this country published anything but the Curzon calumny.

A Lesson in French

THE Stars and Stripes tells the following incident in connection with a sermon delivered by a French priest who took occasion to berate his parishioners for overcharging the Americans:

> On Sunday, in his church, filled one-half with his own congregation and the other half with les soldats Americains, he proceeded to read the former the riot act. In accents strong and French, he laid down the law. "Vous demandez cinq francs quand vous avez droit à un franc seulement!" was one of the points he laid stress on again and again by way of telling the Faithful that some of them were asking five times more than they had a right to.
> The Americans did not know much French, but they had been over here long enough to know "cinq francs" when they heard it. They heard it so often in the course of that sermon that they thought that was what the good man wanted from each and every one of them. So when M. le Curé started down the main aisle right after the beginning of the Credo to take up the collection he was fairly swamped with five-franc notes. Every O. D. blouse was unbuttoned and from every one came the little blue paper. By the time he had got down the main aisle and was going to turn up the side aisle, they had so exhausted the collection basket's capacity that he had to make an apron out of his cassock. And he couldn't understand it at all.

On learning the cause of the generous contribution, the curé explained to the regimental chaplain that he felt bound to return the soldiers' money. "No need," said the chaplain. "I told the boys all about it and they say the lesson in French was cheap at the price. Moreover your sermon hit home so hard that the soldiers have more than saved five francs apiece this last week in town."

Chronicle

The War.—During the past week the Allied offensive on the western front reached a phase that may be termed the battle for limited objectives. This phase followed the German retirement from Montdidier in the Picardy salient and just as the patrols of the Allies were reported near Chaulnes. The main body of the Allied troops had reached a point about half a mile from the junction of the Ham-Amiens road with the Roye-Chaulnes road. The junction of the road was made practically useless for the enemy as it was under continual artillery fire. The Allied line running just east of Lihons, Chilly, Fouquescourt, Damery, Villers-les-Roye, Dancourt, parallels the road from Roye to Chaulnes almost its entire length, so that it was especially dangerous for the heavy guns and supply transports of the enemy. Just before Roye the Allies had to halt. The French advanced along the Avre River, but were temporarily stopped by the German reserves. They then gave up any attempt at a general offensive and resumed their old tactics of nibbling at the enemy positions with the result that they slowly but gradually pressed close to the outskirts of the town. The battle for the possession of the town continued for several days. On August 18 it was officially reported that the Allies had reached Loges Wood south of Roye. Their line was thus only a mile from the town on two sides.

Bulletin, Aug. 12, p.m.-Aug. 19, a.m.

South of Roye the Allies made continuous attempts, all of minor extent but all successful, to clear out the enemy from the southern stretch of territory as far as the southern limit of the Oise bend, and put the Germans behind the Oise from Noyon to the east. In these operations they avoided all frontal attacks, but tried to outflank the enemy from the north, especially along the valley of the Divette River. Here their main efforts centered around the "massif" or heights and town of Lassigny. Lassigny has been called the keystone of the arch on which rests the German hold of their entire line now reaching from Albert to the Oise and passing just west of Bray, Chaulnes, Fresnoy-les-Roye and Lassigny. The French early in the week moved their lines close to the town and seized most of the "massif" around it. The town is practically invested and it does not seem likely that it can hold out much longer. If Lassigny and its surrounding territory are captured by the Allies, the line in the north will necessarily be affected and the enemy will have to fall back behind the Somme Canal from Nesle southward to the Oise.

Outside of the main field of the present operations, other successes were reported. On August 14 the Germans began the evacuation of a five-mile front north of Albert extending from Beaumont-Hamel northward through the villages of Serre and Puisieux-au-Mont to Bucquoy. In Lorraine the Americans in a successful raid which quickly developed into a larger attack captured the village of Frapelle five miles east of St. Dié and took some prisoners. On August 17, French troops advanced a mile on a four-mile front, midway between Soissons and Ribecourt and occupied the plateau north of Autrèches, southeast of Noyon, which dominates the ground between the Aisne and Oise Rivers.

The Czecho-Slovaks, who are reported to have gathered around them a Russian force of nearly 300,000 were active west of the Ural Mountains and occupied a long stretch of the Trans-Siberian Railway. They also hold a considerable length of the Volga River. In the extreme north American and Allied troops from Archangel and Onega are pursuing the Bolshevik forces and are heading for Kotlas 200 miles south of Archangel, on the Dvina River, with the purpose of getting in touch with the Czecho-Slovaks along the Volga. In the south Russia is again being opened by the Allies. A mysterious and unheralded British force coming from Bagdad on the Mesopotamian front fought its way over the mountains and marched to the Caspian Sea. It then crossed the Caspian to the great oil city of Baku and joined the Russians, who in this case are Bolsheviki, and Armenians who were defending the city against the Turks. It is expected that the Armenians and Georgians will rally to the Allied ranks. The Baku-Tiflis-Batum Railway is already partly under the control of the British and their friendly supporters and as it has connections with the Don territory, the Ukraine and Central Russia, it may prove of vital importance.

The Czecho-Slovak Front

Almost at the same moment when the British were seizing Baku, another mysterious British force coming from India through Beluchistan and skirting Afghanistan through Persia, reached Turkestan and there joined the tribes in revolt against the Bolsheviki. A considerable stretch of the Trans-Caspian Railroad is under its control.

In the meantime, the Don Cossacks having cleared the left bank of the Don River of Red troops are closing in on the important city of Zagarin and are reported to be negotiating with their Cossack allies of Kuban in the south and adjoining regions for a central government. To the north their troops entered the government of Veronesh. All these movements are slowly having the effect of organizing a sympathetic pro-Ally feeling in the territory of eastern and central Russia, from the Arctic Ocean to the Caucasus. This may prove a menace both to the Germans and their Turkish allies. Japanese troops joined the British and French forces at Vladivostok.

France.—In a letter sent to the French Episcopate on July 19, 1918, the Cardinals of France united in urging all France to join in national prayer for victory. The occasion of the appeal was the beginning of the fifth year of the war, and the day set for universal supplication was the fourth of August. After speaking of the anguish of the world, the mourning of widows and mothers, the cries of orphans, and the sufferings of the defenders of the nations, the letter continued:

Collective Letter of the Cardinals

To gain the victory, it is not enough to have capable leaders, valiant soldiers, improved armament and powerful alliances; there is need of the assistance of Him whose aid, in itself alone, is worth more than all the alliances and all the armaments, the help of God, the Sovereign Master of the destinies of peoples, who is pleased to call Himself the God of armies in order to make us understand that to Him alone it belongs to give victory or to inflict defeat.

The letter calls attention to the fact that early in the year 1915 the King of England invited the entire British Empire to keep a day of humble prayer and intercession to obtain God's blessing on the Allied armies; that the President of the United States on several occasions, especially on Memorial Day of the present year, summoned all God-fearing persons in the great Republic to have recourse to solemn supplication to invoke the guidance and help of the Almighty; and that the Supreme Pontiff, on many occasions, but particularly on the feast of Sts. Peter and Paul, asked the whole world to unite with him in prayer for the reestablishment of tranquillity and of true fraternity among the peoples. The letter goes on to deprecate the fact that the French Government was of the opinion that the strict letter of the law forbade official participation in the movement for public national prayer, and begged that the law should be modified so as to allow the leaders of France to put themselves at the head of the people in this powerful means of gaining the victory.

In the name, therefore, of our beloved soldiers who are sustaining, night and day, at the front, an heroic struggle, under a deluge of missiles, fire, poisoned gas, in order to check the invasion and to liberate the sacred soil of the country; in the name of our poor prisoners who are suffering hunger, cold and humiliations under the iron rod of a proud and cruel enemy, in the internment-camps and prisons of Germany; in the name of our unhappy brethren in the occupied territory who are groaning under the hard and galling yoke of the invader, forced to do the work of slaves, exposed to vexations, exactions and deportations; in the name of the unhappy families constrained to leave the invaded or war-ravaged regions and dispersed throughout France far from their own homes; in the name of France murdered and mutiliated, of France, which in spite of suffering still fights, we call all the Faithful to prayer at the commencement of the fifth year of the war, to ask God that this year may bring us peace with justice and honor, restore our soldiers to their families, our prisoners to their native land, our exiles to their hearths.

The appeal closed with the expression of the hope that the members of the Government would join at least in their private capacity the prayers of their fellow-citizens, and that all Frenchmen would emulate the example of the Americans, who had decided to cease from all occupation at midday and devote one minute to prayer, for their country, their Allies and for all those who fight. "The Catholics of France will take it to heart not to be surpassed by any one in the unanimity and fervor of their prayers."

Holland.—Following a recent general election in Holland, Mgr. Willem Hubert Nolens was asked by the Queen to form a Government. Mgr. Nolens was born in 1860 and ordained priest in 1887. For twenty-two years he has been a member of the Second Chamber. Already a Domestic Prelate to the Pope he was appointed Apostolic Prothonotary in 1916. He has shown remarkable skill in handling parliamentary situations, and gained great credit for his manner of dealing with the Workers' Insurance and the Limburg Mine questions. It is a unique event in history for a Catholic priest and prelate to have received the Premiership of a Protestant country. The elections resulted in a new alignment of parties in the Chamber: 25 Socialists in place of 15, 30 Catholics in place of 25, 9 Liberals in place of 22; the other parties remain practically as before the election. The Socialists, therefore, have gained ten seats and the Catholics five. The system in force is that of universal suffrage with proportional representation. Twenty-seven parties sent in lists of candidates. The success of the Catholics, while not so great as was hoped for, was considerable, and was due to the persistent efforts of the Episcopate and others of influence who persuaded individual parties to sink their personal interests in the common cause and to join their forces against Socialism, which is the present danger. Another reason was the fact that many people have come to see that the Socialist party was distributing its favors on strictly partisan lines.

A Prelate Premier

Ireland.—Colonel Arthur Lynch has issued an appeal to Irishmen to raise a brigade for the western front. Throughout Ireland a proclamation is posted in which Colonel Lynch makes his plea for recruits:

The Call for Volunteers

How many of you have not a brother, father, cousin or friend in that land of freedom which has extended welcome to our race for more than 150 years, and where countless Irish names are inseparably intertwined with the story of her greatness? It is almost incredible that Irishmen are found to hope to see the United States defeated; that Irishmen should rejoice to think that the Stars and Stripes, the sacred emblem beneath whose folds Irishmen have found protection and happiness should be dragged into the mire. But remember that to wish ill success to the Allies is to connive at the humiliation of the great Republic of the West. But if Irishmen now rally to the side of Old Glory, then once more their name will be held in honor in the immortal page of history. What I say of America is true of the great dominions of the Allies; they are all on the side of freedom and progress. Irishmen! You know it in your hearts. I appeal to you to declare it!

The plan is to muster into service 50,000 volunteers who will wear a distinctive uniform modeled on the old Irish costume.

On August 11 an address was presented to the American Embassy in London to be forwarded to President Wilson. The address is a reply to the Mansion House Statement sent to the President early in July. Sir Edward Carson, head of the War Aims Committee, and leader of the Unionist party, the Lord Mayor of Belfast, the President of the Belfast Chamber of Commerce and the heads of various Ulster organizations, have signed the address which reads in part:

The Ulsterites' Address to the President

At a time when all the free democracies of the world have accepted the burden of conscription as the only alternative to the destruction of free institutions and international justice, it is easily intelligible that those who maintain Ireland's right to solitary and privileged exemption from the same obligation should betray their consciousness that an apology is required to enable them to escape condemnation at the bar of civilized, and especially American, opinion.

The Ulsterites signing the address claim that the Mansion Mouse Statement does not represent the unanimous opinion of Irishmen, and that almost every assertion in it is a distortion or mispresentation of historical truth. The minority in Ireland comprising from one-fourth to one-third of the population dissents emphatically from the views of John Dillon and his associates, and has a keen sense of shame that their country has not submitted to an equality of sacrifice.

Ulstermen, forming the chief industrial community, are as devoted to democratic freedom as their forefathers, who supported the American War for Independence and the experience of a century has convinced them that the Irish people could not enjoy more complete liberty than under the present union with Great Britain. Ireland's political status is not that of a small nation oppressed by alien rule. Home Rule would have been settled in 1916 if the Nationalists had not opposed self-determination for Ulster. Most of the active opponents of conscription are men who twice were detected during the war in treasonable traffic with the enemy. Their most powerful support has been the ecclesiastics, who have not scrupled to employ the weapons of spiritual terrorism, which elsewhere in the civilized world have fallen out of political use since the Middle Ages.

The Mansion House Statement was chronicled in AMERICA, August 10. Neither the British nor the American papers carried the Statement. Speaking of the silence of the British press, the London Month for August says that the English papers which in the main support the Government cannot be trusted to tell the truth about Ireland:

What does the Times, for instance, publish about Ireland, except carefully selected items of news calculated to misdirect and inflame still further English public opinion? True patriotism and an honest desire for union would suggest that the Irish leaders should be invited to put their case before the British public, that it should be discussed on its merits, that a whole nation should not be condemned unheard. Yet occasion is taken of the treasonable practices of a few to lay the entire country under a press-interdict. Were it not for the Manchester Guardian, and one or two other papers, we should be in entire ignorance of how Ireland is being governed, of what progress is being made with recruiting, of what prospects there are of agreement. Sir Horace Plunkett, and other Irish leaders, write and speak, but no echo of their words reaches us here; an important statement of the Nationalist case is sent to President Wilson, which would show what America is asked to believe, but we are not allowed to see it. We are not told in any fullness how the Irish imbroglio affects America, although that knowledge so intimately concerns the fortunes of the war. Lord Curzon attacks some Irish priests on the score of treasonable and immoral utterances in the pulpit, which they unanimously and vigorously repudiate. The attack is printed, the replies left out. The Orange leader on the 12th tells his Belfast flock that the question put to the Irish Hierarchy was: "Is it right that a man should be made to defend his country?" an outrageous misstatement, which of course is reported without any correction.

The Holy Father, answering a letter sent him by the Irish Bishops on the occasion of Archbishop Plunkett's beatification, says that he recognizes the grave difficulties through which the Catholic Episcopate and clergy are passing. He expresses confidence, however, that, thanks to the Christian fortitude, wisdom, prudence, and moderation which the Apostolic Ministry demands, especially where the situation is most delicate and serious, they are able faithfully to fulfil their mission to prepare better times for the Church.

Mexico.—The official answer made by General Candido Aguilar, Mexican Minister of Foreign Affairs, to the protest of Great Britain against Mexico's decrees of February 27 and July 31 which imposed new taxes and restrictions upon the foreign owners and operators of oil properties in Mexico, so far from lessening the severity of the protested decree, has in reality made it more drastic. It will be remembered that Great Britain claimed that the decree was practically confiscatory. Mexico's late ruling denies the right of any foreign Government to enter such protests:

Objectionable Oil Decrees

In virtue of its freedom of fiscal legislation, it is opportune to declare that the Mexican Government does not recognize the right of any foreign country to protest against acts of this nature coming from the right to exercise interior sovereignty, and, in consequence, cannot accept the responsibility which it is pretended will be charged to its account as supposed damages as a consequence of this legislation. Such a decision is founded upon the equality that the Mexican Government desires should exist between Mexicans and foreigners regarding contributions decreed in its territory, because it is deemed that, conceding the preferences to which all diplomatic intervention tends, such a decision is fair to Mexico in its strictest terms.

Secretary Aguilar points out that the means of obtaining redress is to appeal to tribunals of justice, and that recourse to diplomatic intervention should be had only in the last instance. Changes of law with regard to property are held by him to be within the competence of the State, even though they contravene contracts previously made. The Mexican Government does not intend to accept diplomatic protests which would have the effect of giving English citizens unequal preference over Mexican nationals. At Washington it is held that the reply applies equally to the United States and that it works great hardship against American interests, as the new decree establishes a 100 per cent increase in the tax and other features which are practically confiscatory. The New York Times points out that the United States has always refused to allow such claims as are made by Secretary Aguilar.

Representations were made through diplomatic channels by Washington and London and also by a committee in behalf of the American producers. The American and British Governments were especially concerned, because the decrees threatened serious interference with the supply of crude oil for their warships. President Carranza averted the impending crisis by canceling the decrees, and it is thought that present negotiations will lead to a more equitable and satisfactory arrangement.

So far from heeding the protests of Mexican citizens against the arrest and banishment of Archbishop Orozco y Jiménez, the Mexican Government has made further arrests of distinguished citizens in addition to those already recorded. The latest dispatches, according to the Revista Católica of August 11, announce the arrest of 100 members of the clergy, and it is conjectured that their fate will be the same as that of the Archbishop. A delegation waited on S. Dieguez of Guadalajara to protest against the treatment of their beloved prelate. Dieguez replied that he would banish not only the Archbishop but all the Mexican clergy as enemies of the Government. The delegation proceeded to send a commission to the City of Mexico to enter a protest with Carranza himself.

Unheeded Protests

Russia.—Because of counter-revolutionary movement the Soviet Government in Petrograd has retired to Kronstadt according to reports that came via London the middle of last week. Premier Lenine, Leon Trotzky and M. Zinovieff have been empowered by the "Second Soviet Congress," it is said, "to take all measures necessary to gain victory in the fight of the Soviet Republic against its enemies." Soviet troops are reported to have begun evacuating Moscow, and the gold reserves have been removed from that city. A manifesto urging the suppression of all counter-revolutionaries has been issued by Lenine, who threatens that peasants retaining grain beyond their personal needs will be arraigned before revolutionary courts as enemies of the people. Capital punishment will be inflicted on illicit traders. The Moscow correspondent of the Berlin Tageblatt considers the position of the Soviet Government very serious as the Czecho-Slovak forces have increased from 7,500 to 300,000 and are being constantly strengthened. The British Government, following the example of France and Italy, has formally recognized the Czecho-Slovaks as an allied force regularly waging warfare against the Central Powers.

The Soviet Government Tottering

On June 29, Premier Lenine declared before an official gathering of the Soviet that a state of war existed between the Russian Republic and the Allied Powers. But Foreign Minister Tchitcherin told inquiring Consuls that the declaration was not to be taken literally, and wrote to De Witt C. Poole, the United States Consul at Moscow, that the Soviet Republic certainly did not consider itself at war with America.

It is reported that the Bolsheviki have been making wholesale arrests of suspected persons, a thousand officers being seized and sent to Kronstadt. The population of Petrograd is now 1,417,000 or a million less than it was eighteen months ago. There are said to be 20,000 cases of cholera in Petrograd, 1,100 deaths having occurred up to August 3. The authorities can do nothing to check the spread of the disease. The Soviet Republic is facing a food crisis that is even more disturbing than the constant uprisings that occur in various parts of the country. In Moscow even the mixture of straw, oat husks and black flour which is doled out as "bread" in quarter-pound allowances, cannot be had sometimes for several days.

Russia's Distress

"The class-shuffle" resulting from the revolution, reports Robert Crozier Long in the New York Evening Post, "has produced unheard of confusion, families being cut up and their components lost." He continues:

> Today nobody knows where any one else is. The rich people of the Sergeyevskaya Street district in East Petrograd have abandoned, or been driven from their homes, and are huddling in cheap suburbs. The Bolsheviki lately raided and practically forced the evacuation of the famous Zamoskvarietche district, the home of the queer "old Moscow merchant" type.
> The Moscow Commission for Evacuation of Overcrowded Cities decreed that all apartments above a certain size must take in homeless individuals and whole families, the families of Red Guards getting preference; the apartment owners were obliged to furnish all vacant rooms; and when the enforced tenants were connected with the Red Guard they had a right to free lighting and heating. Having no light, fuel, or money, the rich people, "eating daily half a pound of sodden black bread," says the Zhisn, preferred to abandon their homes. . . .

"Property has vanished," the President of the Soviet of Riazan boasted. "The bourgeois in Russia may take his part in the Socialist economic life or stay outside and starve."

More Midsummer Pope-Baiting

J. C. WALSH

AFTER watching the anti-Vatican campaign for a full year, what one is mainly impressed by is its elusiveness. Those who are engaged in it seem to persist mainly for the enjoyment they get out of it, and to be uninfluenced by fact, by argument, by authoritative denial, or by conditions patently not to be reconciled with their basic theory. There has been an answer, and a fair answer, to every accusation made against the Pope, but so far as the anti-Papal propagandists are concerned there might just about as well have been no answer at all. They leave out of consideration everything that has been said or done to disabuse them of error, and proceed just as if all their allegations had gone unchallenged and still held good. What in the world is to be done with such people?

Evidently they cannot be wholly ignored, for the entire tendency of their activity is to produce in this country a condition which ought not to be permitted to come into being. If they succeed in persuading the generality of non-Catholics that the Pope is a public enemy, they will lay all Catholics that much under suspicion. If at the same time they succeed in making Catholics angry at being treated as suspects, the other half of the harm will have been done. The spirit which guides them was convincingly revealed in a letter printed by the New York Journal of Commerce and Commercial Bulletin, for July 13, which began with four lines of approval of "the Cardinals in this country" and then in 120 lines of small type proceeded to rake up all the old charges against the Pope and priests and bishops that have been made during the past year, the moral being that "The Pope has disappointed the world and spread feelings of deep regret even amongst those who owe him allegiance." One might almost suspect the existence of a feeling of disappointment that "the Cardinals of this country" had not done something, or been accused of doing something, or said something that could be twisted out of its meaning, which would justify their being included in the general denunciation. Even as it is, the plain inference from such a letter as that printed in the Journal of Commerce is that people should hesitate about crediting the professions of the Cardinals.

One would think that if they really dreaded the influence of the Vatican upon American solidarity they would rejoice to find themselves mistaken. The contrary seems to be the case. One would think, if they have a real concern for the welfare of Italy, they would rejoice when an Italian military tribunal explicitly absolves the Vatican from responsibility for an offence against the national safety committed by an inmate of the Vatican. What they do is to reverse the finding of the military court, claiming that the Pope must be rated an accomplice of the man who was in charge of his wardrobe. So when the Italian Prime Minister, at the height of the crisis after Caporetto, paid eloquent tribute to the patriotism of the Catholic Bishops and clergy, people solicitous for Italy, and who know how deep-seated are the fundamentals of controversy in Italy, might have spread far and wide the good news such an assurance by the Prime Minister carried. Instead, they have studiously ignored what he said. If they can find one intemperate reference by a priest too obscure even to be named that is enough for them. They may have the proof before them that it was Socialist, and therefore anti-Catholic, propaganda that set Italy aflame in 1917. The fact counts for nothing when they want to blame the Pope. They may be aware that poor General Cadorna has been reduced in rank, and that Colonel Repington says the advance on Austria via Laibach invited precisely the military disaster that happened. No matter. The Pope knows the editors of Catholic papers and if some Catholic paper was impatient then it was the Pope who lost the Friuilian plain.

Do they want to set American Catholics and American Protestants by the ears, these people? Very possibly not. One is disposed rather to believe that there is a besetting stubbornness about them. Readers of Newman's "Apologia" will recognize the type. Kingsley, according to those who knew him, was a good sort of man, with sportsmanlike instincts in the main, but he just could not bring himself to admit that he was wrong in proclaiming the diabolical untruthfulness of the Catholic priest. He would have been lonely without that belief and would not surrender it. I recall also the amazement I felt, at a time when the name of Gladstone was on all men's lips, to hear an Englishman quite casually denounce him as the worst and most dangerous of his country's enemies, and with that confident assurance which made one feel that nothing could possibly influence the speaker to change his opinion.

Therefore, when we are told, as we always are told when these attacks on the Vatican run their full course, that "in every country where the power and the influence of the Papacy prevail the mighty forces of dogmatic religion are actively arrayed in opposition to the Allies," we can perhaps take it that the writer would have it so, all the more if it were not so, and we might conclude, in ordinary times, that it was just another harmless obsession. But these are not ordinary times. These are times when attacks on men's religion are outrages visited upon soldiers defending their country, the Protestants in it as well as the Catholics in it; outrages too upon those who wait at home for news. It is not a fair game, not fairly played. Protestants themselves, if they thought the thing all out, might be moved to put a stop to it. Unfortunately, few of them show any disposition, so Catholics must just go on honoring the Pope, reverencing their religion, and bearing their full citizen's responsibility quite as if they were being treated as their citizenship entitles them to be treated. It was the old Papal Zouaves whose banner bore the device, "Love God, go on your way."

Practical Aspects of Catholic Publicity

MICHAEL WILLIAMS

LET us keep the pot a-boiling! Besides the numerous letters sent to the editor of AMERICA discussing the subject of Catholic press activities and ideas, I have myself received letters or clippings from persons in Connecticut, Minnesota, New York, Florida, and California. And these utterances, together with some of the communications published in AMERICA, suggest a number of practical aspects of the great problem of Catholic publicity which deserve attention.

The letter from Florida, which was sent to me under the address "somewhere in California," begins by declaring that the Golden State, at least, does not need a Catholic daily paper, for the curious reason that once upon a time (according to my correspondent) there was a certain Catholic judge in California who ran for Governor on the single-tax platform and "who would have been elected only for the Pope. The Pope killed him" (I presume, politically killed him, but the letter-writer does not define his meaning). Continuing, my correspondent then rakes up the Dr. McGlynn case as an argument in favor of his belief that those "who favor autocracy in the Church" would control the proposed press bureau, or the proposed Catholic daily, and would see to it that Catholics "would be forbiden (sic) too (sic) read any other paper. Oh, how I despise hypocrasy! (sic)." But it is upon my suggestion that some at least of the expert, experienced employees which the bureau would require ought to be adequately remunerated, that my Florida critic pours forth the vials of his wrath in terms which suggest that despite his Celtic name he may vote for Governor Catts besides following in the grammatical jazz-steps of that great liberator. "Was Saint Paul as well paid as Goldstien?" he asks. "It makes me sick. Money, and plenty of Money, All for no other reason than to save Souls and the soul saviors (sic) should be well paid. Bosh!" Then he adds: "Poverty and the fear of it is the greatest cause of sin and crime. Use your talent to abolish poverty." Yet, when I suggest that the writers for the Catholic press should not be poverty-stricken, he loses his self-control completely.

But it is not to poke fun at my Florida correspondent and his ideas, that I quote him. In an important sense, his criticism of my suggestion as to the adequate payment of workers for a Catholic press bureau is quite sound and reasonable. It is true that the work should be done for love and not for money. It is true that the spirit of Paul and not the spirit of personal gain or advantage should guide and animate such work. Yet it is also true that if all workers for such a bureau, or the staff of a Catholic daily, should take the vow of poverty, they would be obliged to shut up shop. They would not be able to talk to the citizens of the world in a way to be even faintly understood. No. If the apostolate of the press is to be spread widely, and in a popular way, while its principles, and its ideas, and its methods should be unselfish, non-commercial, un-profitistic—if I may coin a word—in the purest degree, and while its management should be in the hands of the Hierarchy, or of men proud of being the loyal and obedient soldiers of our God-appointed leaders, nevertheless, in order to be practical it will require the services of experienced, professional journalists and writers, men and women both, who live in the world, have duties and obligations which keep them in the world, and who thereby understand the world. They must not, however, belong to the world, but to God and His Church; and their chief desire must be to serve Him in the ways of their own vocation. It is not a question of such men and women being paid huge salaries and making great fortunes out of the Catholic public: it is a question of paying them what their positions and obligations in life necessitate, and thereby enabling them to give all their time, and their devotion, and their talents, to this great cause. For those who desire to give all and take nothing, and for whom the road is open for such a noble course, well, there is nothing to forbid them doing so. But the whole point of the problem simply consists in this, namely, that the best and highest intentions and ideals unless linked with practical knowledge and experience will lead to nothing but splendid dreams and dismal failures in the attempt to realize the dreams.

If I may be permitted to say so in these pages, AMERICA is one example, while the Catholic World, the Ave Maria, and the Magnificat are other examples, of what excellent things may be accomplished in religious journalism under the editorship and direction of clergymen. And there are many very good diocesan weeklies, too, as I have often said before. Personally, I read AMERICA and the Catholic World, more eagerly and more thoroughly than any other of the periodicals I take. Those of my critics who suppose that I look askance upon our influential, inspiring and instructive Catholic papers, most strangely and widely miss the point. What I want—and what many others like me want—is to see their great work extended into the vast non-Catholic world, and made the well-springs at which writers, reporters and editors for the vaster press apostolate would derive their ideas, their knowledge, and their Catholic spirit. Of course, as I have said before, many of our Catholic papers may be bettered; they are continually saying so themselves, in the most commendable spirit of honest self-criticism; but with our hypothetical central press bureau in operation, their improvement would quickly come, and would be only one branch of the vast work of carrying Catholic truth and Catholic ideas, to the non-Catholic world, and of arousing a healthier interest in Catholicism among the great mass of nominal Catholics.

The able and experienced editor of one Catholic weekly writes to me saying that he endorses every word of these articles. He says so in his paper, too. The editor of the San Francisco Monitor writes in his journal that he is prepared to give $500 a year, or even $1,000 a year to support a really worth-while Catholic press bureau, and he strongly argues that in the great Encyclopedia Press, of New York, publishers of the Catholic Encyclopedia, experts in the collection of literary material, and in touch with 1,500 of the world's best Catholic writers, we possess the best possible central agency for the work. The Monitor declares that if fifty newspapers in the United States, Canada, and the British Isles, would contribute $500 each, yearly, the bureau would have $25,000 a year to start with, and its work made self-supporting from the start, and it "puts out of court" my suggestion of a church collection. But that suggestion was merely one of many others, and if the work can be made self-supporting through the active financial participation, from the beginning, on the part of the Catholic press, so much the better.

All I contend for is the idea that the work should not be stopped in case it did not prove self-supporting. There should be a contingency fund, or an available subsidy, to make good any deficiency in returns. If fifty Catholic papers of the enterprise and practical spirit of the San Francisco Monitor cannot be found at the outset, all ready to put down $500 or $1,000 a year each—and I confess I doubt if they can be found—let us get started, anyhow, with a fund sufficient to keep the thing going while the papers are being brought into line by means of the one thing which I believe will bring them into line, namely, actual, first-hand experience of the benefits produced by a high-class press bureau in operation. But how are papers that do not take the service to observe these benefits? I answer: through observing the improvement that will follow in the case of those that do take the service.

Another illustration of the manner in which a Catholic Press Bureau would be of practical service comes to hand as I finish this article. From a correspondent in the State of New York I have received a letter containing two newspaper clippings. Both relate to the death of Father Searle, C.S.P. One, taken from the pages of a paper which according to my correspondent is owned by a Protestant, is about half a column long, and contains a well-written and interesting account of the distinguished Paulist. The other, taken from a paper owned and edited by a Catholic, is a perfunctory, brief paragraph. Another paper in the same city also owned and edited by a Catholic printed nothing at all. Now, except in the most unlikely case that the two Catholic-owned and edited papers in this city are both hostile to the Church, or were prejudiced against Father Searle, or the Paulists, their neglect of this important piece of news can only be explained by supposing that they did not happen to have any information about the distinguished priest-astronomer, and did not bestir themselves to acquire information. But a Catholic press bureau, in such a case as this, would have automatically prevented this scandalous happening. As part of its work it would, of course, immediately upon the event, have supplied all the other news bureaus, and the leading newspapers in all cities where it had its sub-agents, with an authoritative, well-written "obituary," which, needless to say, it would have had all ready, in its "grave-yard," or "morgue," as newspaper slang terms the place where clippings and card-indexed articles and material are kept ready. For it would be the duty of such a bureau to be always "on the job," making up for the indifference of publishers and editors, both non-Catholics, and, alas, Catholic as well, to Catholic news and views. So, let us keep on, talking, and writing, and also praying, for the Catholic press bureau of the future—and not the distant future, either!

Parsis, the Vultures' Prey

NEIL BOYTON, S.J.

AN American, within the first hour of his arrival in Bombay, will begin to pick out from the picturesque, light-opera clad thousands, that swarm the roads, one striking class of people. His eye will be held by the sight of most arresting hats. These are shiny black, hoof-shaped affairs, that give a jovial touch to the serious, sallow-skinned, big-eyed men, who wear them. And he will notice that the handsome-featured women, who accompany these men, all wear a peculiar dress, a graceful, combination one-piece skirt, waist and shawl of butterfly hues, bordered with rich gold or silver. Naturally, the new arrival will ask who are these people and the answer will be they are the Parsis; the sect that permit the vultures to be their undertakers. The new arrival's interest in Parsis rises immediately one hundred per cent, and he wants to know more about them. This is what he learns:

They are a Persian people, who flew from Arabian persecution to India centuries ago. In those days the Hindus were lords of these shores, and they let the refugees live, but they made the males wear this distinctive hat; showing that the new-comers were under the dominion of the worshipers of the Cow. Somewhat similar to the history of "Yankee Doodle," that the Red Coats whistled in derision at the American Revolutionists, and later the Americans adopted as a minor national air, these Parsis accepted this hoof of a hat, the symbol of subjection, and made it an honored part of their highly characteristic dress.

Though they are of Persian stock, there must have been a Semitic strain added somewhere along the line, for today they are all wealthy. In fact, you never see a beggar Parsi, and this cannot be said to the credit of any other creed in Hindustan. The Parsis control a lion's share of Bombay's business, for it is here in the gateway of India that over ninety per cent of these people live. More than any other race in India they have taken up the externals of European civilization. They all speak English, they are famous for their liberality; Mr. Hoover has no control over their table; their women go about as freely as British women; they are familiar with all makes of motor-cars, and seem to prefer limousines of the latest and largest models; electricity in all its applied uses serves in their homes; and the Victrola is in evidence.

On the religious side there are the Reformed Parsis, an ultra-progressive wing that having taken to the inventions of Europe and America, have forgotten much of the faith of their fathers, and the orthodox majority, who still hold fast to Zarathustra's teachings. In the cool of the evening, when the sun is sinking into the warm Arabian Sea, the Parsis assemble on the beach of "Back Bay" to make salaams to the four elements, earth, air, fire, and water. Here they have their four sacred elements most visible, and it must be said they are edifyingly devout in their devotions to "these creatures of Ahura-Mazda."

There are only two castes among the Parsis; the people and the priests, and the priestly caste is distinctly lower, for they alone handle the dead; defilement unspeakable to a Parsi. It is in their ceremonies connected with their dead, that Parsis compel an interest from Europeans. When death is seen approaching, the priests come to the dying man's handsome home. He is brought to the ground floor, that, as he was born on the ground floor, he may depart from the same humble elevation. As soon as the Parsi is a corpse, even his nearest and dearest will not touch him, and the priests, whose costume is all white, take charge. A dog is brought in to have a last look at the late Parsi, for this is considered an infallible recipe for driving away evil spirits. The friends of the deceased are hastily summoned, for in hot India death and burial are but hours apart.

The friends come; prayers are said; his feminine kin bid good bye to the deceased; and the white-clad body is carried on a white bier on the shoulders of white-clad priests through the roads. Behind it come the mourners, dressed in white, the Parsi color of mourning. Even the hoof-hat is laid aside for a white miter. No women ever attend the funeral. The men walk two by two, holding a white handkerchief between them.

As they approach the Towers of Silence, maybe a sluggish vulture will fly ahead, for these repulsive birds know when a funeral draws near. The Towers of Silence are situated on Malabar Hill, the most fashionable part of Bombay, a fact which a Sahib, new to India, can never get through his head. Extensive and luxurious gardens surround them. Over the winding approach is the sign "Only Parsis may Enter Here." Non-Parsis may occasionally be allowed to enter in the non-funeral hours, however, provided a Parsi vouches for them.

When the snowy funeral party has come up the winding, shaded path, they halt at the Fire Temple, where the sacred flame is always kept burning. I believe it has been extinguished only once in 300 years. Here prayers are said for the departed, offerings made, and the corpse is seen for the last time. The mourners depart, and the priests of the Towers take charge. The body is stripped to the loin cloth and carried to the particular Tower, where it is to be exposed. There are five of these circular, open-topped structures, that look like medium-filled, whitewashed, gas-tanks, erected in a palm grove. There is one reserved for the members of a certain family that gave the plot of land; another for suicides; and the remaining three for the men, women and children of the Parsi faith.

Through a small iron door in the side of the Tower, which reminds one of the little black door of the death house at Sing Sing, the late Parsi is carried and left exposed, but completely hidden from every one's sight, though of late aviators have threatened this seclusion. The despised priests clamp the iron door close, and then the hideous, evil-smelling black lumps, that have been gathering and watching from the palm-tops, come sagging heavily down. An hour later the priests go back, and with iron tongs drag the stript bones to the center of the Tower of Silence, where, in a wide well, they are thrown indiscriminately for the tropic sun to complete the burial.

Parsis will tell you that there is never the faintest danger of being buried alive, for these vultures have an instinct that tells them if life has not completely departed, and they will refuse to proceed with the funeral. It has happened on several occasions, that a seemingly dead Parsi was exposed on the Tower, and when the priests returned after an hour, he lay intact, and later he was able to boast that he had been where living man, excepting always the priests of the Towers, had never been. As a young Parsi lad put it rather proudly: "And that's something, sir, that could not possibly happen to the Hindus, who cremate their dead."

They claim likewise that their burial rites are the most sanitary in the world, and they prove it to their own complete satisfaction, but hardly to an American's. Still there is a certain fascination, these future vultures' prey, exert over you, and all the time you are speaking to, or teaching, or seeing one, your imagination will revert to those grim Towers of Horror on beautiful Malabar Hill, and sometimes you come to the conclusion that it is almost natural to have a separate Tower for those who go to the birds by their own hands. But, personally, "six feet of earth" never had the protecting appeal that it had after a distant inspection of the Parsis' Towers of Silence.

A Little More Light on Christian Science

FRANCES BEATTIE

THE Church officers, so the divinely ordained "Church Manual" of the Christian Church directs, shall consist of the Pastor Emeritus, a Board of Directors, a President, a Clerk, a Treasurer, and two Readers. All shall be chosen with the consent of Mrs. Mary Baker Eddy, and the "Church Manual" thus fixes the salaries of the Board of Directors, Article 1, Section 9, page 29: "The salary of the members of the Board of Directors shall be at present two thousand five hundred dollars each annually." The Directors "shall fix the salaries of the Readers" (Section 4) and shall also provide (Section 7) "a suitable building for the publication of the Christian Science Journal, Christian Science Sentinel, Der Herold der Christian Science, and all other Christian Science literature published by the Christian Science Publishing Company." It is also provided that the Board shall "provide suitable rooms, conveniently and pleasantly located in the same building, for the publication and sale of the books of which Mary Baker Eddy is, or may be, the author, and of other literature connected therewith." Article XXXIII, Section 1, page 97, provides for the appointment of a committee on publication, "which shall consist of one loyal Christian Scientist who lives in Boston, and he shall be manager of the Committees on Publication throughout the United States, Canada, Great Britain and Ireland * * * and shall receive an annual salary, paid quarterly, of not less than four thousand dollars." Article XXIV, Section 9, page 79, provides for a "Committee on Business," to be appointed by the Board of Directors, such committee to consist of not less than three loyal members of the Mother Church, "who shall transact promptly and efficiently such business as Mrs. Eddy, the Directors, or the Committee on Publication shall commit to it. While the members of this committee are engaged in the transaction of the business assigned to them they shall be paid from the Church funds."

At present, there are, according to the "Church Manual," five members of the Board of Directors, whose salary is at least $2,500 a year each, a total of $12,500 per year for directing the Mother Church. Whether a divine voice has raised these salaries, in these days of increased cost of living, is not known. The Committee on Publication may easily have had his salary raised, as the "Manual" provides that his salary shall be not less than $4,000 a year. What salaries the Readers and other officials of the church receive, is not made clear in the otherwise perfect "Manual." We are told elsewhere, that the Readers shall be "well educated," but Article III, Section 6, page 32, explains that "They shall make no remarks explanatory of the Lesson-Sermon at any time, but they shall read all notices and remarks that may be printed in the Christian Science Quarterly," sold by the Publishing Society. "This By-Law applies to Readers in all the branch churches," adds this scientifically correct "Manual," in concluding Section 6.

Article VIII, Section 5, page 41, orders that "The prayers in Christian Science churches shall be offered for the congregation collectively and exclusively," and Section 6 adds that "It shall be the duty of every member of this church to defend himself against aggressive mental suggestion." Article VIII, Section 22, page 46, declares that the members "shall hold in sacred confidence all private communications made to them by their patients," and warns that a member shall not, "under pardonable circumstances, sue his patient for recovery of payment for said member's practice on penalty of discipline and liability to have his name removed from membership." The divine power, with keen and discerning vision, concludes this section with: "Also he shall reasonably reduce his price in chronic cases of recovery, and in cases where he has not effected a cure. A Christian Scientist is a humanitarian; he is benevolent, forgiving, long-suffering, and seeks to overcome evil with good." Section 23, page 47: "If a member of this church has a patient whom he does not heal, and whose case he cannot fully diagnose, he may consult with an M.D. on the anatomy involved. And it shall be the privilege of a Christian Scientist to confer with an M.D. on Ontology, or the Science of Being."

Section 28, the same Article, page 48, ordains that "Christian Scientists shall not report for publication the number of the members of the Mother Church, nor that of the branch churches. According to the Scripture they shall turn away from personality and numbering the people." This latter, however, must have been an afterthought of the Divine Inspiration, for time was when such lists were published by the Scientists. Section 30, page 49, orders that "A Scientist shall not endeavor to monopolize the healing work in any church or locality, to the exclusion of others, but all who understand the teachings of Christian Science are privileged to enter into this holy work, and 'by their fruits ye shall know them.'"

Article IX, Section 2, page 49, says that "If a member of the Mother Church shall decease suddenly, without previous injury or illness, and the cause thereof be unknown, an autopsy shall be made by qualified experts." No provision, however, is made for like conditions of error, in members of the branch churches—those who have not yet climbed the dizzy heights leading to the Mother Church. But the same section did what it could towards opening a new field of endeavor for women by adding: "When it is possible the body of a female shall be prepared for burial by one of her own sex," the italics those of the "Manual."

Violation of the By-Laws contained in the "Church

Manual," as Article XI, Section 2, page 51, directs, must be punished "in consonance with the Scriptural demand in Matthew XVIII:15-17," and only after the culprit neglects to accept such admonition, shall he be placed on probation, or, repeating the offense, have his name removed from the roll of church membership. Section 4 orders that "No church discipline shall ensue until the requirements according to the Scriptures, in Matthew XVIII:15-17, have been strictly obeyed, unless a By-Law governing the case provides for immediate action." Such By-Laws, it will be recalled, are numerous, in cases where the rights and privileges of Mother Eddy herself were concerned, all of which have been quoted in previous articles. A member might have the privilege of facing the church if he merely absconded with the funds, for example, but if he dared to "haunt Mrs. Eddy's drive," or refused to obey her call for menial help, or attempted "mental malpractice upon her," the "Church Manual" provided for instantaneous punishment and severance from the church.

Article XVII, Section 1, page 60, graciously concedes that "One meeting on Sunday during the months of July and August is sufficient," and Section 2 provides that "there shall be no special observances, festivities or gifts at the Easter season by members of the Mother Church." Article XVIII, Section 1, page 61, ordains that "The Mother Church of Christ, Scientist, shall observe no more Communion seasons," while Section 2 provides that "The Communion shall be observed in the branch churches on the second Sunday in January and July of each year, and at this service the Tenets of the Mother Church are to be read." Just why the oracle made sheep of one and goats of the other, is not explained. But he took care that there should be no high-strung soloist in the choir of the Mother Church, for Article XIX, Section 1, page 62, declares that "Music from the organ alone should continue about eight or nine minutes for the voluntary and six or seven minutes for the postlude, the offertory conforming to the time required to take the collection. The solo singer shall not neglect to sing any special hymn selected by the Board of Directors."

Article XX, Section 3, page 63, makes the children in the Sunday schools pay tribute to the Publishing Society, by decreeing that the Lord's Prayer, "and its spiritual Interpretation by Mary Baker Eddy," should be among the first lessons of the children, other lessons to be taken from the Christian Science Quarterly Lessons, read in the church service.

The Christian Science Church also maintains a Board of Lectureship, the members of which are elected annually, subject to the approval, of course, of the Pastor Emeritus. Article XXXI, Section 2, page 93, outlines the duty of these lecturers which is "to include in each lecture a true and just reply to public topics condemning Christian Science, and to bear testimony to the facts pertaining to the life of the Pastor Emeritus. Each member shall mail to the clerk of this church copies of his lectures before delivering them." The Board of Lectureship "is not allowed in any wise to meddle with nor to disrupt the organization of branch churches" (Section 3) and Section 5, page 94: "Upon the written request of Mrs. Eddy, the Mother Church shall appoint a Circuit Lecturer," to lecture in the United States, in Canada, in Great Britain and Ireland, and "a member shall neither resign nor transfer his sacred office."

When the need is apparent, the Board of Directors may call upon any member of this Board "to lecture at such places and at such times as the cause of Christian Science demands," Article XXXII, Section 1, page 95. Section 4 decrees that "The Mother Church and the branch churches shall call on the Board of Lectureship annually for one or more lectures"; Section 7, page 96: "The lecture fee shall be left to the discretion of the lecturer"; Section 8: "The lecturer's traveling expenses and the cost of hall shall be paid by the church that employs him"; and Section 9: "If a lecturer receives a call to lecture in a place where he sees there is special need, and the local church is unable to meet the expense, he is at liberty to supply that need and trust to contributions for his fee."

The services in the Mother Church and branch churches, every Sunday, include the Lord's Prayer, "with its spiritual interpretation," reading the explanatory note on the first leaf of the Quarterly, announcing the subject of the Lesson-Sermon—from the Quarterly—and the First Reader, makes the announcement: "As announced in the explanatory note, I shall now read correlative passages from the Christian Science textbook, Science and Health with Key to the Scriptures, by Mary Baker Eddy." This formula is outlined on page 121 of the "Church Manual." How any sane man or woman can swallow and digest all this, and "Scientists" usually take the hook with the bait, is "one of those things that no fellow can find out."

Now that the Rules and Regulations of the "Church Manual"—"impelled by a power not one's own"—have been reviewed, their "revelations" brought out into the light of day, I will show in another paper how the funds of that mammoth organization, that monumental pillar of hypocrisy, have been diverted to sinister uses. The Christian Science Monitor and its vicious anti-Catholic campaign will be the subject of my next article.

Soldiers in the Making

CHAPLAIN J. A. CAREY, 56TH PIONEER INFANTRY, U. S. A.

THEY were told to wear old clothes, and apparently all took the hint. In their present garb not one of them could break into a fashion-plate. After two days and two nights on the train they were hustled out at a siding, lined up in twos, and marched under a blistering Southern sun over four miles of dusty roads to the regiment of their assignment. Truly a motley crew; carrying boxes, bundles, valises, limping and slouching along, getting the laugh from the "seasoned veterans" of six months' service, to whom they look up with awe and reverence, as heroes of many campaigns, who swing along jauntily with their haversacks strapped to their backs and rifles on their shoulders.

And these city-bred weaklings just arriving who are fagged after a four-mile march are the men who are to measure their dash and daring and endurance with the German? Yes, and if you have any doubt about them just look at their brothers, who were the city-bred weaklings six months ago. The unfit have been sent back home, and the potentially fit have been made over in the military development camp, and now these boys swinging along are fit for fighting.

I took a stroll among the grimy crew that had arrived in the afternoon. Soap and water had done wonders with them. They seemed more like our own kith and kin again, and with the grime and dust was washed away the sense of shame they seemed to labor under. This contingent was from New York State, but represented "every tribe and tongue and people and nation." Uncle Sam's net had brought in all races and classes, all trades, occupations, and callings. The valet of a certain epicure in the metropolis is now scrubbing pans in the mess shack; a well-known vaudeville actor is doing work in the stables, while the vice-president of a bank is policing regimental streets. It is democracy at high speed. "We are in the army now" accounts for all things, and is quickly and vividly brought home to the embryo soldiers. The free and independent American youth, accustomed to follow his own sweet will, soon learns that he has given up his liberty in the cause of liberty. "That is the order" bears with it authority and finality. "Command and obey" is the law of his new life, and it is astonishing how quickly and easily he submits to the regulation.

The recruit is inspected inside and outside; undergoes all kinds of examinations—the heart, lungs, ears, eyes, teeth, and brains; everything but the examination of conscience. He is given injections, inoculations, and vaccinations, and finally is given a number. Even before he receives a uniform he is marched off to the drill field, and is doing "right dress," "left face," "squads right," and wonders how it is he had not learned to know better his right hand from his left; wonders, too, how he has so many clumsy feet; and just discovers that he never knew how to walk; never knew how to carry his backbone, his chest and his chin. They are all awkward squads in the beginning. Moreover, there is the badge of his inferiority: his civilian clothes. But at last comes the day when he is given a uniform, and what a change it makes! Nothing so speeds up the process of transforming him into a soldier. He feels he is more a soldier than he was yesterday; so he appears, and so he acts, and so he is. The cowl does not make the monk, nor the uniform the soldier; but in the one case and the other there is a symbolism, the expression of a relation between the interior mind and the external ceremony, that is real and potent. Man is not wholly spiritual. He is wrought on through the senses, a law of our being, which the Divinely wise Church has ever recognized.

Our military training has been called a melting pot, and so it is; and in the process the recruit finds his individuality being melted down. The aim and the purpose of the army life is to produce a great fighting machine. The individual is submerged; he becomes a cog in the machine. In the drilling he ceases to think, he hears and acts; he responds mechanically. Man becomes less, the machine more, with diminished individuality and personality is lessened his spirituality. Even apart from gross temptations, army life is deadening and dulling for the soul. Our boys realize this, and more than once have I heard them express it, and express, too, how thankful they were to discover a remedy for it in the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass, where at least once a week they can go up into the mountain with Our Lord, and bathe and steep their souls, so to speak, in the spiritual, Divine atmosphere. On Sundays I have gone into a regiment where there was no Catholic chaplain to offer the Holy Sacrifice. How the Catholic boys turned out! They seemed a whole army, as they thronged around the altar—out in the open—for there was no building large enough to hold them all. And after Mass many of them came up to tell me what a happy day it was for them. It was the cry of their famished souls, now nourished and replenished. In army life, as nowhere else, we see the wisdom of Our Lord in giving us the Sacraments, especially the Holy Eucharist and Penance. These soldier-boys are lifted out of the dulling, deadening influence of the military grind. They are reborn in the keen searching and cleansing of their conscience. They are exalted in that intimate Communion with their Divine Friend. Many times before they have tasted how sweet the Lord is, but never so sweetly as in the army life, where they feel the need of Him is greatest.

Contrary to accepted notions, it is the country boy rather than the city boy that is the first to reach the hospital. This is especially true in cases of measles, mumps, scarlet fever, and infections of the throat. In the past the city boy has been more subject to the germs and is now more immune. Of course, where there are large crowds banded together there is danger of contagion, but this is minimized in the army by the sanitary and hygienic rules of Spartan rigidity, and again because of the skilled surgeons and physicians now in the camps the death-rate is lower than in civil life. Uncle Sam has mobilized in his hospitals the best medical experts of the country, and the poor boy has now the services of specialists, that at one time were accessible only to the very wealthy. The best of the country's corps of nurses is likewise in the army hospitals, and those back home need have no worry as to the care their boys are receiving when in the hospitals. Nor is Uncle Sam neglecting the moral health of his soldier-boys. Never was a nation more solicitous for the morality of its army, and never did a nation take greater means to procure it. This is manifest in the increased number of chaplains, and the order that they be given every facility in their work, the stringent regulations protecting the boys within and without the camps, the various agencies encouraged by the Government, such as the K. C., Y. M. C. A., Jewish Welfare Workers and other commissions. Perhaps the best thing the country ever did for the army was to enact the law forbidding the selling of intoxicating liquors to soldiers. A determined stand has likewise been taken against more vicious evils. I believe there is less temptation to gross evils in the army than in civil life. Again let our Catholic people be reassured that their Catholic boys are receiving careful spiritual attention. The Catholic chaplain visits the hospital every day, and all dangerous cases are promptly reported to him.

In the hospital the Catholic chaplain finds his saddest, as well as his most consoling work. One day there was a Polish boy dying in one of the wards. With the aid of a polyglot manual I was able to hear his Confession. He was only a boy and had the marks of gentleness and refinement, made more gentle and refined by suffering patiently borne. He was not only alone among strangers, but his inability to speak or understand English cut him off completely from those about him. Their chatter only intensified his loneliness. But he understood the Sacraments, which spoke where words failed, and he could understand the silent language of Him who came to accompany him on his way. He closed his eyes as if shutting the door after his Guest had entered in; pain became as if it were not; light and sound were forgotten; all things of the world were obscured in His presence, and the happiness He brought with Him beamed on the face of the dying lad like light breaking through the clouds.

Entering a ward one day I asked the doctor in charge how the boys were. He answered that it all depended on the point of view. I told him my point of view particularly had regard to the long journey to eternity. "Do you know, sir," he replied, "I think it is a mighty impertinence for any man coming to die, to cry out to God for mercy!" I answered, "Doctor, I don't know but I would agree with you if he were calling for mercy to man, with his hard, cruel, unforgiving heart, but happily he is appealing to a God of love and mercy." "Perhaps you are right," he replied, "perhaps you are right."

There is another tale, I think worth recording: A Boston reporter was brought into the operating room, and there was a hurried call for the priest. This patient too, was only a boy. He had been promoted from his regiment to the camp surgeon's office, and was making his way to his new post, along the trolley tracks. An on-rushing car caught him on the trestle. He shouted and pulled out his handkerchief to signal, but it was too late. His left arm was all but severed from the body. He picked himself up, boarded the car, and ordered the conductor to turn back to the hospital. When from loss of blood he felt himself sinking, he said, "I am a Catholic. Send for a priest."

The first time I saw him after he had regained consciousness, I said, "Well Joe, how are you feeling?" He answered: "I am all right, Father. Nothing but the arm gone." This was not said in a spirit of bravado, but just in sincere thankfulness. He asked if he could go to Mass the next day, while all the while the doctors were afraid that death might ensue from loss of blood. I was telling this story to a group of officers, and one of them said, "What did you say his name is?" "Callahan," I replied. "Well, that explains it all, doesn't it?" he answered.

It is difficult to conceive how quickly our youths are transformed into disciplined soldiers. In a few months time these boys who did not know the difference between a holster and a trench mortar are drilling now with the "click," the standard of excellence that is demanded of them, and have shown a marksmanship which the enemy has already found altogether too accurate. The only homesickness they have now is for the battlefield. They are "bearcats" spoiling for a fight. They have the "punch" and the daring, that is bound to turn the tide of this world-war. They feel, however dimly, that the door of a glorious opportunity is open to them; they rejoice that they are alive in this era of the world's history, when they can go forth to fight, to suffer, if need be, to die in the cause of justice, righteousness, and liberty. They are young Davids, buoyant, confident, unafraid, going forth to smite the giant, the beast of militarism, that is devastating the earth.

French Prayer Books for American Soldiers

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In the Catholic book stores of two large cities I have made efforts for nearly six months to obtain a French prayer book. It is impossible, I am told, to obtain such books, either from American publishers or through importers. Here, it seems to me, is a wonderful opportunity neglected. Several millions of American men are, or will be shortly, in training camps in this country and in France, brought in contact, in a way never before possible under such favorable conditions, with the Church of their ancestors. Hundreds of thousands of these men, moreover, are, and will be, eager to make the most of any possible opportunity to learn the French language. Why cannot it be made possible to familiarize them with the prayers and liturgy of the Church at the same time that they are assisted to learn the language? What American soldier would not welcome at this time a prayer book which would at the same time help him to learn French, and enable him to understand the religious services of the soldiers of France with whom he hopes soon to fraternize? Is there not here a missionary opportunity worth serious consideration?

If some enterprising American Catholic publishing house cannot soon supply us with a good French prayer book for soldiers, with enough English to make it easy to study and read, and enough Latin to make the liturgy easy to follow, cannot the Knights of Columbus or some other Catholic fraternal Order undertake such a publication? Is there not some organization of Catholic women which would work with enthusiasm to put such a Catholic prayer book in the hands of every soldier?

A Disclaimer

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In AMERICA for July 27, you quote part of a paragraph from an address delivered by me at an Anti-Saloon convention. The quotation begins with the words "I want to make an assertion." You classify me with speakers whom you accuse of working for the Anti-Saloon League on a sliding scale of prices. The Anti-Saloon League has never paid me one dollar for such an address. So you see you have done me an injustice in the columns of a periodical that is read by many of my friends. Is it too much to ask you to make a correction by publishing this letter in AMERICA?

How Ireland Can Enter the War

To the Editor of AMERICA:

A letter appeared in your issue of August 10 in which John O'Neill Conroy expresses what he considers a solution of the Irish question. In it we find much that is admirable, yet there is an element of dissatisfaction. He says "The vast majority of Americans have two wishes with regard to Ireland, that she take her full part in the war, and that she be accorded her rightful independence." Now if Mr. Conroy had stated that Ireland should be given her independence and then allowed to decide for herself whether or not she would take part in the war, enough would have been said, for every good American will concede that Ireland owes something to America and that America owes much to Ireland. I need not go into detail regarding our debt of gratitude to Ireland. Your readers are acquainted with historical facts and know what a powerful factor Irishmen were in our wars for Independence and that for the emancipation of the slave. But that Ireland should take her part in the war is a matter that is outside the dictation of any man or any nation except Ireland. Mr. Conroy adds: Let England withdraw her troops, and the Irish will give them a God-speed and a royal send-off. That American troops should go over there to handle their affairs, as he suggests, is out of the question, however. The Irish are able to take care of themselves, as they have proved. The Americans should go where they are more needed.

The Passing of a Journalistic Landmark

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Under the above caption, Mr. Thomas F. Meehan, in AMERICA for August 10, refers to the financial misfortunes of that honored type of Catholic American journalism, the Freeman's Journal, in a way that makes plain Mr. Meehan's failure to understand the trend of the times as well as his lack of sympathy with a fundamental, if not dogmatically written principle of the universal Church, namely, the principle that made martyrs under Roman Emperors no less than under the rule of expediency which bids fair to ruin, as far as material things count, all those who stand for the finest ideals of democracy. Democracy, after all, stands for the rights of the people, all the people of the world, as opposed to the privileges of class; true democracy is what Christ taught and what His Church, despite the unhappy discords of little minds, has continued to teach.

After sketching the history of the Freeman's Journal in past years under editors whose ideas, supporting that vilest of human institutions, human slavery, find no echo in the soul and writings of its recent managers, the Fords, who stand for Ireland's freedom, Mr. Meehan concludes his narrow estimate with: "During the last municipal [New York] election it presented the abnormal spectacle of unblushingly supporting the Socialist candidate for mayor. The more recent formal questioning of its loyalty by the Government need not be detailed."

The first part of the above pronunciamento betrays utter unfamiliarity with the issues at stake last election in New York and an ignorance of the tendency of modern opinion, an ignorance which would indicate that the writer has ceased to mingle with the people, the common herd, of whom Lincoln said, "God must love them, for He made so many," for many a year. "De mortuis, nil nisi bonum" precludes definite reference to the career of a dead mayor. Access to the files of AMERICA can easily be had by the uninformed. There remained for choice to the electorate the candidate of an organization not usually associated with high ideals, or, a man of unblemished reputation, a scholar with whom the greatest living exponent of Catholic ideals felt honored to cross swords. This man, Morris Hillquit, stood for principles and ideals that do credit to the innate decency of man in a world almost drowned in hatred and blood. The Freeman's Journal supported Hillquit. As an exponent of the religion of Christ in practice, could it have done less?

The imputation against the Freeman's loyalty to American ideals made by Mr. Meehan is not supported by facts. The reason back of the Freeman's financial plight is the refusal of Postmaster Burleson to permit it the use of the mails. This refusal has never even been expressed formally. Everyone in New York, everyone in the United States who is familiar with public affairs, who has been living among the people, knows what is back of the failure of the Freeman's Journal. The Freeman stood for the universal application of President Wilson's principles of human rights. Must poor Ireland be forever an exception to the decrees of justice? Is God to be forever mocked?

Yes, the Freeman's Journal has been financially ruined, because its editor chose honor before the applause and approbation of those for whom honor and expediency are synonymous. And yet, there are thousands who believe and say that the editor of the Freeman's Journal is to be congratulated rather than pitied and one of these thousands is the writer of this letter.

New York. M. D.

[In a circular announcing the suspension of the Freeman's Journal the proprietors of that paper said:

> As we can neither belie, retract, evade nor compromise the truth, and as the mail, the only outlet of our word, has been refused to the main part of our three months' labor, we will not issue the Freeman's Journal until we can speak as Americans, as Christians, as free men.

There are in round numbers about eighty Catholic weeklies published in the United States. None of them, to get through the mails seems to have to "belie, retract, evade nor compromise the truth," as the publishers of the Freeman's Journal, in their circular, state was the price they would have to pay for a continuation of post-office facilities. The owners of the Freeman's Journal also publish the Monitor of Newark, N. J. It has not suspended publication. It is called "the official Catholic Weekly of New Jersey." Is the truth belied, retracted, evaded or compromised to enable it to go through the mails? Yet this must be the logical conclusion this Freeman's Journal statement provokes. And what a delightful portrait it also draws of the other Catholic editors throughout the country! Have they ceased to be entitled to "speak as Americans, as Christians, as free men"? There is no need of wasting AMERICA's space here concerning the eulogy of the Socialist leader Morris Hillquit's record and principles. They arraign themselves as did the Freeman's Journal's support of his political fortunes.—THOMAS F. MEEHAN.]

French School-Books

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In your issue of August 3 you give a translation of a letter written by the heroic Archbishop of Reims, Cardinal Luçon, to the eminent French novelist, René Bazin, expressing the hope that France might at last cease to be the only great nation that does not "officially implore the Divine assistance." You print also the refusal of the French Prime Minister to grant the request for a national prayer. Viviani, also, refused in 1914 the same appeal on the part of the Catholics of France. In view of this atheist opposition to official prayer, what a splendid example of Catholic fervor is given on August 4, by those who are faithful to God, and to that great country called the "fille aînée de l'Eglise"! Every church is filled to overflowing, and the French people unite their voices to the voices of England and America in one great Christian "Te Deum laudamus."

This would seem to be an appropriate moment for a request to be made to the Minister of Public Instruction to do away with the revised text-books of the French neutral schools, and put back the original editions which were in use throughout the Republic for thirty years prior to 1905. In January of that year a change was instituted which eliminated the name of God and all mention of prayer or of immortality. Space does not permit me to cite even a few among the hundreds of "corrections." Let two suffice: In the primer for little children of Larive and Fleury the first sentence used to be, "God is great," the revised edition declares: "Paris is great." A short history of France used to have a full-page illustration of the cathedral of Reims, the revised edition removed the cathedral, dedicated to the worship of a God, whose existence is denied, and substitutes for it a full-page map of Champagne!

Our Christian organizations, the Red Cross, Y. M. C. A. and K. C., should be able to exercise a great influence to help the French people to achieve the religious liberty of which our American nation is so justly proud. In view of the fact that many French war orphans will be educated in the Government schools, it is a matter of vital importance to the French people that the tyranny of an infidel minority shall end. We cannot imagine a like situation in the United States.

Saranac Lake. MARIA LONGWORTH STORER.

The Chaplain's Cross

To the Editor of AMERICA:

With regard to the Cross as the insignia of our army chaplains you published the news that the order which was issued directing that all chaplains wear the shepherd's crook has been recalled. The Christian chaplains will wear as their insignia the Cross, the Jewish chaplains an insignia yet to be decided upon.

The order changing the insignia to the shepherd's crook was a return to what had been the insignia of chaplains some fifteen years ago. In the petition made to the War Department, asking for the recall of the order, the Jews joined most heartily with the Catholics and the Protestants and the War Department at once answered us favorably. At a meeting of the Committee of Six, at Camp Zachary Taylor, Louisville, Ky., the official representatives of the Jews, Orthodox and Reformed, and of all national Jewish organizations, declared that the Jews were not only not against the Christian chaplains wearing the Cross, but decidedly were in favor of it. "The Cross is to millions of our men in army and navy the sign of salvation, the highest symbol and the greatest inspiration they have. We think it would be a national disaster to deprive its Christian chaplains of its use as their insignia."

I was present at the meeting and it was the unanimous agreement of Catholics, Protestants and Jews that led to the restoration of the Cross as the insignia of Christian chaplains.

"America" and the French War-Orphans

EVERY one who loves France, and especially the children of those heroic Frenchmen who have stemmed the onrush of tyranny by sacrifices too frightful to reckon, must have experienced a thrill of intense satisfaction on reading the engagement to which the Government of that country solemnly pledged itself on the occasion of its adoption of the first group of war-orphans. M. Jean Guiraud, the editor of La Croix, who has been throughout the long and often discouraging struggle their dauntless champion, declared himself satisfied and said that the Catholics had by their tireless efforts succeeded in eliminating the dangerous features of the Loi sur les Pupilles de la Nation. Nothing remains now but to watch over the application of the law and to see to it that it is applied in the spirit which the Government declared it would be applied. It does credit to the pitiless publicity furthered by the Catholic journalists of France, to the fearless fight for the right carried on by her Catholic statesmen, and to the patriotism of the members of the French Government, that the menace to the Faith of the children of the heroes who have died for France and the world should now be removed, and that the department of education should have given unequivocal assurances that no pressure will be put on the guardians of the children to force them into the neutral schools.

The same measures applied by the American officers and contributors to the "Fatherless Children of France," which is merely a development of L'Orphelinat des Armées, could doubtless remove the scandals connected with the administration of that fund, and force the French atheists to allow it to be distributed with the impartiality and respect for the religious convictions of the children involved, which is the earnest desire of those who have given to it in every section of the United States. As administered at present, however, the Fatherless Children of France must rest under suspicion. The following letter, written from France on July 22, 1918, and signed by a prominent member of the French Hierarchy, confirms what AMERICA has recently said on the subject:

RIGHT REVEREND AND DEAR MONSIGNOR:

I answer without any hesitation the question you put in regard to L'Orphelinat des Armées.

From the very beginning I refused my approval and patronage to that association because it did not give sufficient guarantee from the Catholic point of view. Since Mrs. Dick-May took up its direction, L'Orphelinat des Armées inspires still less confidence; this is sufficiently proved by the character of the men under whose patronage it has been placed. I believe, therefore that Catholics should not contribute to that work.

If it does not endeavor directly to destroy the Christian Faith of the children it assists, L'Orphelinat des Armées does not guarantee their religious education and consequently cannot have in the future but a pernicious influence in that matter.

The Editor of AMERICA is heart and soul in the movement to adopt French war-orphans. He has recommended and urged Catholics to take part in this benevolent work whenever occasion has presented itself. Associations founded for that purpose, other than the "Fatherless Children," have received his complete cooperation. He would be glad to give their names to all inquirers. He is ready to give even to the Fatherless Children every help in his power were that society removed from the sinister influences which are turning it from its benevolent object and could he honestly believe that it were not being made to play into the hands of the enemies of the Faith. As things are at present he can only re-echo the warning of the distinguished prelate, whose letter is quoted above. Let the officers of the association remove the bar which attaches to it and insure absolute impartiality in the administration of its funds.

Alabama's Lieutenant-Governor

THE Lieutenant-Governor of Alabama, Thomas E. Kilby, entering the race for Governor of his State, has opened his campaign by appealing to religious bigotry and ignorant prejudice. He has bravely declared himself against "all autocrats, be they kings, czars, kaisers, popes, princes or potentates of lesser estate." Having delivered himself of this patriotic utterance he lays down the main plank of his platform by declaring himself against Catholics holding office in Alabama:

> . . . I can answer emphatically that I do not favor Catholics controlling the offices of cities, State and counties, teaching in the public schools and generally attempting to dictate to our public officers. Separation of State and Church is just as important to our institutions as religious freedom, and when the Catholic church, or any church, attempts to exercise domination in public affairs it becomes dangerous.
> . . . So long as that hostility exists just so long should the adherents of that church be barred from positions that can well be filled by citizens who are in full sympathy with our institutions.

The Montgomery Advertiser commenting on this statement declares: "This is amazing. The motive behind it is amazing. It is amazing for its reckless misrepresentation." It certainly is amazing that Alabama should tolerate such action from an official of the State who is banking his chance for higher office on an appeal to religious prejudice. It must be more than amazing for the Catholic lad of Alabama who has bled on the fields of France beside his Protestant fellow-soldier to realize that he is fighting for the liberties of the world, but that he cannot enjoy the liberty of holding office in his native State or even of teaching school there, because he is a Catholic. With thousands of other Catholics up and down the land he rallied to the colors when the call came. Patriotism, his Church had taught him, meant more than singing the "Star Spangled Banner" on a fair day down in Alabama when the band was playing. It meant the trenches with their mud, and wounds, and suffering unto death. This was patriotism and he had lived it.

The day dawned when he came out of the valley of the dark shadow that had hovered over his hospital cot ever since the stretcher-bearers had brought him in from No Man's Land. He asked for news from home and this is what he read in his own home paper from old Alabama: "You can come back to your native State, but if a certain Thomas E. Kilby is Governor you cannot hold office and you cannot teach school, because you are a Catholic. For God and State you have given away your youth but you cannot have the rights of a citizen in the State you have bled for, because you are a Catholic."

The Montgomery Advertiser believes that the citizenship of the State will repudiate the Kilby platform, and defeat the man "who asks us to proscribe and distrust our neighbors whose sons are today fighting side by side with our sons in the red valley of the Marne." What Alabama will do no one knows. Incomplete returns indicate defeat at the primaries for Thomas E. Kilby. The Government at Washington should watch every politician who injects bigotry into his campaign for office. Such men bear watching for they are playing into the hands of our enemies.

"Lifting Up Scarred Hands"

GROWN to maturity, the children of that Catholic household had parted, east and west, and north, to achieve an honorable place in the world. Only one remained at home, but when the war came, he followed the gleam of the Stars and Stripes. "Jim hopes to go across soon," wrote his widowed mother. "Pray that he gets his chance, and that God may give me strength to bear the bitter separation." So the brave little mother, forced to take up anew life's heavier burdens in the autumn of her years, sent him away with a smile that hid the anguish in her heart, and went back home to watch and pray and work.

This is real sacrifice, as heroic as ever a Spartan mother was moved to make, and thousands of our American mothers offer it daily to God. "It's hard to give him up," wrote a mother of her only son. "But it would be far harder if he were a 'slacker.'" A nation which produces such mothers cannot be doomed to defeat. With the milk they gave to baby lips, they transmitted something of their courageous spirit to their sons who now fight for liberty. Daily do they lift up scarred hands to God in prayer, for with the prayer goes sacrifice. That and that alone, the spirit of generous giving, of giving until it hurts, is the spirit which will unfurl the flags of the Allied Powers in triumph under a free sky, in the hour when justice has crushed vaunting despotism, and the systematized brutality of Prussian autocracy has been banished forever from the face of the earth. No loyal American will reckon the cost when his country calls, or let one day pass without fervent prayer, that the God of nations may soon lead our armies to the longed-for day of complete victory. But the prayer that counts is the prayer that costs, the prayer that rises from a bruised and lowly heart, and "lifts up scarred hands to God."

Midsummer Madness and Mooney

PERSISTENT publicity clings to the Mooney trial as to no other criminal case of recent years. It has also given rise to an unusually grave epidemic of midsummer madness. A New York lawyer suggests that, "as a war measure," the President of the United States undo the work of the California courts, set aside the authority of the recalcitrant Governor of that State, and pardon Mr. Mooney. It is scarcely probable, however, that prior to this suggestion, Mr. W. Bourke Cockran consulted the families of the ten men who, as a result of Mr. Mooney's labors, are now in their graves. Mr. Dudley Field Malone, addressing an assemblage in Carnegie Hall, almost dissolved in tears as he pictured the tense anxiety over the Mooney case, "of the millions of men in the trenches." Yet they might rest assured, Mr. Malone quavered, that democracy was not dead in America, for "the millions of workingmen and women of the nation will not let Tom Mooney hang." The precise authority of these "millions of workingmen and women," to reverse the decision of the highest court in the State of California, was nowhere stated by Mr. Malone. A practised speaker, he well knows that it is impressive, with audiences of a certain type, to deal in large figures, and at times the oratorical machine must find a welcome for the meanest sort of grist. But the prize suggestion is that offered by Mr. Frank P. Walsh of Kansas City. The Associated Press is responsible for this gem, dug from a speech very fittingly made in the windy city of Chicago:

> Mr. Walsh, while predicting that the reprieve granted Mooney, Friday, by Governor Stephens, of California, would result in a pardon, demanded that the President send troops into California to free the prisoner in the event that the Governor does not pardon him.

Mooney may or may not have been an anti-Catholic "lecturer," an anarchist, or an I. W. W. These facts or accusations are beyond the question. The only question under review is his guilt, and that has been definitely answered by the California courts. The man may, conceivably, be innocent, but unless it can be proved that the courts, the prosecuting attorneys and the Governor of California are parties to a malicious conspiracy, the presumption is that Mooney is guilty.

Meanwhile it would be interesting to know upon what clause of the Constitution Mr. Walsh bases the President's right to send troops into California to overrule the action of the State in a purely domestic matter. Is California a mere "department" of the Federal Government? Is its Governor a "prefect sent from Washington" who must render decision in the light gleaming from thousands of Federal bayonets grouped beneath his window? Few persons acquainted with the law and the facts will take Messrs. Cockran, Malone and Walsh seriously. But it is decidedly unfortunate that this flood of cheap oratory is let loose upon "the millions of workingmen and women" in these critical times.

Are Nuns Patriots?

"WHAT I saved, I lost; what I gave, I have," reflected a thoughtful nun who had been profitably meditating on the grain of wheat dying, but subsequently bringing forth much fruit. She looked back without regret on the sacrifices she had made in embracing the religious life, for with the logic of Divine faith she now clearly saw that her power in prayer, her attractive love for the Sisters of the community, and her success in making better and holier the children committed to her care, all flowed from the joyful and whole-hearted renunciations she had made when she became a nun. "What a waste!" even some of her Catholic friends thought as they saw her take the veil. "With her charming personality and remarkable gifts she would have been an extraordinary power for good in her own circle, if she had not entered the convent. And alas! what an admirable wife and mother she would have made! But now she is burying herself in that community and will devote her life no doubt to teaching catechism to a lot of ungrateful, unruly children."

Arguments for or against the religious life, similar to those suggested by the foregoing reflections of the nun and her critics, are perhaps presenting themselves this summer to many a Catholic maiden who is eager to learn what God would have her do. The nobility and beauty of the consecrated life appeals to her strongly but the doubt comes up: "Is it also the most useful and patriotic one a woman can embrace today? It really does seem a waste." A waste? By no means. The religious life is, for those Divinely called to it, not only the noblest and most beautiful there is, but assuming generously and discharging faithfully its obligations is a practical expression of lofty patriotism and unselfish service. The better the Catholic, the better the patriot, for love of God and love of country go hand in hand. The saints, after all, were only men and women who succeeded perfectly in being good Catholics, and all religious strive to resemble as closely as possible God's Saints. The woman who in virtue of the three vows consecrates her life to relieving the spiritual and bodily needs of her neighbor does the State and does her country a service of high patriotism and great usefulness. The hundreds and hundreds of boys and girls who through the Sister's influence and training grow up to be uncompromising Catholics and stanch Americans will be so many living arguments for their teacher's love of country, while the successive flocks of orphans or foundlings that find new mothers in the loving nuns who bring them up will one day become, thanks to the Sisters, loyal citizens of the Republic. The religious, too, who devotes herself to nursing the insane, the sick or those wounded in battle, and thus relieves the State of their care, is likewise performing a patriotic work of the highest value. Every American maiden, therefore, whom God calls to the cloister this fall, far from "wasting" her life by entering the convent, is no less noble a patriot than her soldier-brother who is holding the line on the Marne.

Sly Beavers and Contemptuous Lobsters

LIKE many a great genius, Lewis Carroll often enunciates the most solemn and heart-searching truths in words which to the thoughtless and undiscerning seem trivial and nonsensical in the extreme. In the first canto of that deathless epic, "The Hunting of the Snark," for example, the concluding lines:

> Whenever the Butcher was by,
> The Beaver kept looking the opposite way,
> And appeared unaccountably shy.

provided their context is thoroughly understood, cannot but purify the passions like the climax of a Greek tragedy. The same striking truth is enshrined in the second stanza of the poem which Alice, at the Gryphon's command, recites about the vain Lobster:

> When the sands are all dry, he is gay as a lark,
> And will talk in contemptuous tones of the shark:
> But when the tide rises and sharks are around
> His voice has a timid and tremulous sound.

The Beaver and the Lobster, as is proved by the experience of every day, have human counterparts without number. Who has not met this summer at mountain or seaside resorts the malignant gossip, for instance, who tears to tatters behind her back the fair name of an envied social superior, but in her presence is all flattery, compliment and adulation? How like the sly Beaver, too, the extravagant spendthrift behaves when several of his long-suffering creditors chance to meet him as he is motoring with a merry party to an expensive country club. It has also been observed not infrequently that the hitherto "contemptuous tones" of a "brilliant young author" have, Lobster-like, suddenly become quite "timid and tremulous," when he unexpectedly finds himself in the company of the gray-haired journalist whose ideas and witticisms he appropriated, in the first of his complete works, wholly neglecting, however, to indicate in any way the source of his "inspiration." Again, the highly detached attitude of mind assumed by the shrinking Beaver, "Whenever the Butcher was nigh" strongly resembles that of certain pietistic persons who, being more addicted to "devotions" than to "devotion," do nothing but multiply their prayers whenever they see the poor and suffering standing at the door looking for relief. The voluble patriot too who in a voice trembling with emotion rises at an un-Hooverized banquet to pledge his sacred honor to the prosecution of the war, but takes good care that the "sacrifices" he makes do not lessen his income or deprive him of any of his accustomed comforts and luxuries, grows, like the Beaver, "unaccountably shy" when the draft, the war-tax or the turpitude of profiteering comes up for discussion. Without question the renowned Lobster and the no less famous Beaver have many human imitators nowadays, but what a dull world this would be if our fellow-pilgrims were quite free from all such follies and foibles.

Literature

BOSWELL'S "LIFE OF JOHNSON"

SOME critic or other once referred to Plutarch's "Lives" as "the pasturage of great minds"; and certainly if the dictionary is the most fascinating, biography is the most stimulating of all forms of reading. It remained for one book to unite both characteristics in a pre-eminent degree; so that ever since its appearance the general verdict of the readers of Boswell's "Johnson" has been that it marked a positive epoch in their intellectual lives. Let us inquire what conduced to the making of so memorable a book.

In the first place, the material was there for the working. Samuel Johnson had the indubitable marks of greatness: magnanimity, sagacity, tenderness, generosity, piety, patience, temperance, fortitude; all that congeries of noble and spirit-stirring qualities which go to make up the heroic character. Nothing base, nothing mean, nothing petty found place in his large composition; and if we had no other knowledge of him we should know that that man both morally and intellectually must have been far beyond the common who could dominate a company composed of Burke, Gibbon, Goldsmith, Reynolds, Percy, Garrick, Langton, Beauclerc, yes, and the incomparable "Bozzy" himself.

Moreover, Johnson not only had character; he was, as the saying is, a character. His personality was rich in all those accidental but colorful traits, those picturesque and gusty details, those racy singularities by which a man is distinguuished from his fellows. His mere physical bulk, his strongly marked countenance, his brusque manners, his rolling gait, his rusty attire, his haphazard wig, his puffings, his blowings, his mutterings, his convulsive starts were enough to mark him out as unusual, and to these were added equally bold spiritual peculiarities in his robust independence, his scorn of opinion, his contempt for opposition, his powerful judgment, his vigorous common-sense, his detestation of lying, his filial reverence, his respect for the past, his uncommon moral sense, his religious devotion, his amusing superstitions, his deeply rooted prejudices. But there was one characteristic whereby all these elements were gathered up and displayed in their fulness, and which for the purposes of biography was the most valuable of the lot. This was Johnson's insatiable desire for discussion, his consuming love of talk; and, as a conversationalist, it is improbable that the world has ever seen his equal.

Here then was the subject—and the competent hand was ready for the task. With regard to Boswell it has become a familiar trick of critical usage to fling off some such sentence as, "No man was ever more fortunate in his biographer than Johnson," and then to proceed with easy inconsequence to represent that biographer, on the one hand, as a light-minded coxcomb, an intellectual popinjay, and on the other as a mere tuft-hunter and most unconscionable toady. Now, while it might be sufficient to remark on the incongruity of ascribing to a weak or a commonplace mind one of the world's supreme literary performances, we prefer a more positive result and to seek out what were the real qualities of the man, James Boswell.

On this point the fullest and most trustworthy means of knowledge we have is the "Life of Johnson," and from that work it would appear that Boswell was a sound scholar, a capable lawyer, a wide reader, a wit, a humorist, an extensive and observant traveler, and from much converse with the world an accurate student of the humors, the follies and the characters of men. He had an exceedingly alert and inquisitive mind, a capacious and most retentive memory, and an unflagging persistence in acquiring the knowledge he sought. Moreover, looking to the mere execution of his great work we can hardly deny him the rank of a consummate artist, and when we say artist we have in mind the peculiar and essential excellence of the true artist—namely, that he is known not so much by what he gives as by what he omits. There are no superfluous lines in Boswell; he sets down only the vivid, the salient, the characteristic.

But the real sting of the accusation lies not so much on the mental as on the moral side, and we think it worth while here to endeavor to answer in some detail this charge of servility. We go back, then, to the writer who first gave wide currency to the legend, to the inventor of the opprobrious term, "Boswellism,"—the brilliant and superficial Macaulay. And going back to him we would call attention first to the circumstances of his writing; his connection with the magazines of the day and the consequent necessity he felt he was under of popular appeal, with all its concomitant evils of glaring contrasts, smashing and indiscriminate attack, downright assertion, and especially that habit of liberal exaggeration in which he indulged himself without stint. Secondly, of Macaulay it may be said that he never put pen to paper without being not merely partial, which every writer of conviction must necessarily be, but partisan, and he had the proper defect of his quality—narrowness of outlook and constriction of vision; add to this that Macaulay was a thorough-paced Whig, and Johnson an equally vigorous Tory, and it is easy to see what wild work was toward. Finally, coming to the most spiritual and possibly the deepest reason of all, Macaulay, if any author of repute ever did, represented the view-point of that vast and vague entity which religious writers designate as "the world"—and "the world" looks somewhat askance at anything in the nature of generous attachment or disinterested friendship.

Let us, however, examine the facts. In the year 1763 when Boswell first made the acquaintance of his hero, he was but twenty-two years of age, utterly unknown to the world, with the airs of his native Scotland still fresh upon him and an imagination, prone to hero-worship, dilated by several years' brooding on the awesome image of the maker of the Dictionary; while Johnson was then in his fifty-fourth year, famous wherever literature was known, the most celebrated figure of his age, and the undisputed dictator of literary opinion. When under these circumstances Johnson received the youth kindly, and almost at once placed him upon the basis of friendship, what, we may ask, would be the inevitable response of a nature nothing if not impulsive? Carlyle gives us the answer where with one of his characteristic flashes of insight he says something to the effect that it was morally impossible for Boswell not to be "attracted by that mass of manhood." "Mass of manhood"—what a phrase! The whole man rises up before us.

Thus began a friendship which lasted unbroken till Johnson's death twenty-one years later; and if on the one side there seemed at times too much of complacence, and on the other too much of adulation, the matter can only be rightly appraised in the light of the comparative positions of the two men. Furthermore, that Boswell was far from either a simpleton or a servile flatterer we should consider evident from the bare fact of Johnson's liking for him. The man who rejected the advances of Chesterfield, and whose most notable traits were masculine common-sense and acute discernment was not, we fancy, the person to take into his intimate friendship and affection a noddy and a mere instrument of acclaim. But in addition to this a priori disproof of Boswell's subservience we have the objective evidence of his book. Then as now the style of a celebrated writer was the mark both for praise and sedulous imitation; and yet nothing can be farther apart than the sprightly glancing sentences of Boswell and the ponderous periods of his chief. Nor does the difference end with their mere manners; and if divergence of opinion were sought it would, we think, be no difficult matter to collect a suufficient number of instances, ranging from the vexed question of the authenticity of "Ossian" to that of the poetry of Thomas Gray, to vindicate the biographer's claim to independence of judgment and of character.

In conclusion let us permit Boswell himself a word. In the "Dedication to Sir Joshua Reynolds'" of the original edition of the "Life," referring to his detractors, he has this to say: "It is related of the great Dr. Clarke that when in one of his leisure hours he was unbending himself with a few friends in the most playful and frolicsome manner; he observed Beau Nash approaching; upon which he suddenly stopped: 'My boys (said he), let us be grave. Here comes a fool.' The world, my friend, I have found to be a great fool." There is in this passage a note of smiling disillusionment, of mournful pleasantry, of half-humorous sadness. But Boswell's was not the first case, as it will not be the last, where the world's coarse thumb proved to be a poor measuring-rod; and, after all, he could have consoled himself with the reflection that to the right Boswellian he would need no defense, and as for the others,

"If of themselves they will not love,
Nothing can make 'em:
The devil take 'em!"

JOHN BUNKER.

CHATEAU-THIERRY

O God, how vast
The distance seems to loom
'Twixt these heroic men and me,
High Priests of Liberty!
Unarmed, but unafraid,
Alas, I have no part,
But thrust aside
With lacerated heart
I watch the tide,
Undaunted, undismayed
Go rushing past
Amid volcanic gloom
Unto their crimson Calvary,
To set their brothers free.

Acadie. Reconstitution d'Un Chapitre Nouveau de L'Histoire d'Amérique. Ouvrage Publié d'Après le Manuscript Original entièrement refondu, corrigé, annoté, etc. Par HENRI D'ARLES. 2 tomes. Boston. The Marlier Publishing Co.

The figure of Evangeline has made the name of Acadia dear to the American heart. Our children know the tragic story of the village of Grand Pré and have lovingly followed the Odyssey of the Acadian maid, of Gabriel Lajeunesse and Basil the blacksmith. It ought not then to be very difficult to interest American readers in the history of the sorrows of those Acadians who were so ruthlessly driven from their homes. That history has been admirably told in the "Acadie," the French text of which has been thoroughly revised and corrected by Henri d'Arles. As the editor himself admits, the original text of the historian, Edouard Richard, which for some time had been thought lost, needed revision, both in point of style and of historical accuracy, not so much as to facts and conclusions as to the exactness of Richard's references and excerpts.

Mr. d'Arles has done his editor's work with fine discrimination. Thanks to his labors, Richard's work stands out in its true proportions. Two large volumes of 400 pages each tell the affecting story in all its distressing details. At times the work would gain were it to be compressed within narrower limits. Richard does not always know how to throw into relief the main features of his story and loses himself in a multiplicity of details. But he has many of the gifts of the true historian. He is not satisfied in being a mere compiler. He is something better than a mere imitator. He has the instinct of the historian for the inner meaning of events and things. He looked for the truth. When he found it he was not afraid to write it down. For Lawrence the main author of the deportation of the innocent and peaceable Acadians he has severe words. No impartial-minded reader is likely to differ with him here, while on the other hand he seems willing to exculpate the Government from actual complicity in the odious deed, at least before the fact. In an appendix to the first volume, Dr. J. E. Prince, of the University of Laval, does not agree with Richard on this interesting point, and seems inclined to believe that here the historian is drawing distinctions of a rather tenuous and subtle nature. Nor does Parkman deserve all the strictures which are heaped upon him. English readers may follow all the moving incidents of the drama of Acadia in an English version of Richard's work by the Rev. Father Drummond, S.J., which has been before the public several years, long before the present recension of the French text by Mr. d'Arles. J. C. R.

The Desert Campaigns. By W. T. MASSEY. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, $1.50.

The Red Battle Flyer. By Captain MANFRED FREIHERR VON RICHTHOFEN. New York: Robert McBride, $1.25.

Out of the Jaws of Hunland. By FRED MCMULLEN and JACK EVANS. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, $1.50.

W. T. Massey, the official correspondent of the London newspapers with the Egyptian Expeditionary Force, gives an interesting record of the fighting that went on in the early part of the war in the region of the Suez and in Lybia. The army that has its deeds chronicled in "The Desert Campaigns" fought to protect the long stretch of the Suez Canal against the Turk. The main engagement of the campaign was fought at Romani in August, 1915, and the action is well described in two chapters of Mr. Massey's book. Then followed the victories at Maghdaba and Rafa, where the Turks were routed. The concluding chapters deal with the engagements against the Senussi, who came out of the Lybian wastes to oppose the British. The hardships endured by the soldiers of this army may be imagined when we realize that a six-mile march was considered splendid in a temperature that made the daily water supply insufficient to quench thirst for an hour.

Freiherr von Richthofen, the famous German aviator, was killed in April, 1918, after winning eighty victories in the air. His story is told in a diary that he wrote, which is now published under the caption of "The Red Battle Flyer." It is an account of exciting battles in the air, of daring acts by aviators of both sides. The German flying man has been given credit for a greater amount of chivalry than is accorded his brother soldier in the other branches of the German army. No reader of von Richthofen's account can doubt that he at least deserved the best an enemy could give. Of course the book has been censored, but not skilfully enough to conceal a great deal of interesting matter concerning the German forces. The book is translated by T. Ellis Barker, with no idea of glorifying German aerial achievement, but with the worthy purpose of giving English readers an insight into the enemy flyer's mind.

The stories of Corporal Fred McMullen and Private Jack Evans, Canadian soldiers, who were three times captured and finally escaped from German prison camps, are told in "Out of the Jaws of Hunland." The book is valuable for the facts it contains of existing conditions in Germany today. Its literary value is negligible. As to the attitude of the German people on the war the writers believe that so long as the army is fed and the people can struggle along with enough to keep body and soul together they will put up with their burden indefinitely. "As matters stood when we left, most of the people we talked with, even the soldiers, expected that matters would end on a fifty-fifty basis. They had given up hope of winning the war in any victorious fashion. Most of them did not care what the basis was so long as the end came soon. They were sick . . . of the whole terrible business." Yet these Canadian soldiers hold that without a determined leader and a band of fearless supporters around him, there is little hope of the people settling their war troubles by a revolution. The national character will have to change completely before that event becomes a possibility.

Aircraft and Submarines. The Story of the Invention, Development and Present-day Uses of War's Newest Weapons. By WILLIS J. ABBOT. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3.50.

As long ago as June 4, 1910, the readers of AMERICA were told how the "lazy" medieval monks had begun the solution of the problems that fettered the development of aircraft and submarines, the twin terrors of the world's greatest war. These creations of American genius loom large now as factors in the outcome of the contest, and everybody is interested in the details of their construction, progress and use. Mr. Abbot tells in the most entertaining way how the "dreams that men of many nations have dreamed throughout the centuries" have been realized in our own, and illustrates his text with more than a hundred realistic photographs and drawings. The world will not always be at war, and in the prolonged period of peace that awaits it what is to be the future of these two great accomplishments of modern science now so insanely devoted to ruin and death? The author thinks that there is no doubt that the airplane "will be the common carrier of all nations." Of the submarine he is not so certain, except that it will always be a potent weapon of war. He hopes, however, and in this he echoes the wish of all sane thinkers, that "perhaps it too will find its place in industry when awakened man shall be willing to spend as much treasure, as much genius, as much intelligent effort, and as much heroic self-sacrifice in organizing for the social good as in the last four years he has expended in its destruction."

The Unbroken Tradition. By NORA CONNOLLY. New York: Boni & Liveright. $1.25.

By the title she has chosen for her book, the author means "The Unbroken Tradition" of Ireland's 700-year struggle for freedom. Nora Connolly is the eldest daughter of James Connolly, "Commandant-General, Dublin Division, Army of the Irish Republic," who was executed as one of the leaders of the Easter Week revolt, and in this interesting book she tells the story of her share in the unsuccessful uprising. Nora was of great assistance to her father in carrying secret messages to Irish Volunteers outside of Dublin, and in promoting gun-running. This fearless girl successfully smuggled the expatriated Captain Mellowes back into Ireland, and in the hope of reaching the capital in time to take part in the revolt, patiently bore great perils and hardships on her journey from Belfast, traveling much of the way on foot, in order to evade the British authorities, and passing one night in an open field. She generally went heavily armed, and always speaks of rifles and ammunition as many girls speak of jewelry. The most moving passage in the book is the following description of her father's last hours:

> "Yes, Lillie," he said, "I fell asleep for the first time tonight and they wakened me at eleven and told me that I was to die at dawn." My mother broke down, laid her head on his bed and sobbed heartbreakingly. My father patted her head and said: "Don't cry, Lillie, you'll unman me." "But your beautiful life, James," my mother sobbed, "your beautiful life?" 'Well, Lillie,' he said, "hasn't it been a full life, and isn't this a good end?" My mother still wept. I was crying too. He turned to me at the other side of the bed and said: "Don't cry, Nora, there is nothing to cry about." I said: "I won't cry." He patted my hand and said: "That's my brave girl." . . .
> The officer then told us that we had only five minutes more. My mother was nearly overcome; we had to give her water. Papa tried to clasp her in his arms, but he could only lift his head and shoulders from the bed. The officer said: "Time is up." Papa turned to say "Good-by" to me. I could not speak. "Go to mother," he said. I tried to bring her away. I could not move her. She stood as if turned to stone. A nurse came forward and helped her away. I ran back and kissed my father again. "Nora, I'm proud of you," said my father. I kissed him again. Then the door was shut and we saw him no more.

Evading the vigilance of the prison authorities, the author managed to receive from her father and subsequently publish his well-known "last statement," and as he had wished, she left Ireland for America. "I applied for a passport," she writes, "and was given one. Not as the daughter of James Connolly, however," she adds significantly. She reached New York August 1, 1916.

Linnets of the Slums. By MARION PRYCE; Liadain and Curithir. By MOIREEN FOX; Out of the East. By VERA and MARGARET LARMINIE. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $0.90 each.

The "Adventurers All" series, to which these little books of verse belong, has grown by this time to the extent of a bookshelf. The three volumes here noted introduce, according to the front-page formula, "young poets unknown to fame." In the first-named book, Marion Pryce has caught in a thin mesh of melody some simple phases of life which justify the pretty title. Moireen Fox builds her volume out of her moods upon a Celtic duality of personalities—a representation of pre-Christian characterizations. The Larminies exhibit a deft sense for constructiveness, feeling that equals true passion at times, and observant faculties for the manifold gleams of the light that is on land and sea for poets' eyes. The burden of many of these fragmentary moods arises from troubled desires, and the unsatisfying remedies that nature and art apply to souls in deep distress; but there are other sources for alleviation, for courage and endurance, as in these stanzas entitled "In Extremis":

> Lift me higher. Fools! can nurses,
> Surgeons, serums, baffle death?
> Will you keep my soul in spirits,
> Or dissect my dying breath?
> Can you follow where I travel,
> With your bandages and tools?
> Can your sciences unravel
> The last riddle set to fools?
> Somewhere on my desk there's lying
> A Crucifix I bought in Rome;
> Its beauty pleased me living: dying,
> What else is there to guide me home?

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

"Khaki" (Macmillan, $1.25), Freeman Tilden's new novel, is an interesting account of how Tredick, a sleepy, pacifistic New England town "got into the war." Prudence Perkins, an elderly maiden of means, who went down with the Lusitania, while on her way to the front as a Red Cross nurse, was the first to wake up her native town, and not long after America declared war, everybody in Tredick was a burning patriot, the transformation worked in the Gilstar boys and in Sam Greenberg being particularly entertaining. The author evinces a most profound knowledge of slang.——The Rev. Edward A. Flynn, who is a chaplain at Camp Devens, Mass., is assured a prominent place among the authors of Catholic-boy fiction by his latest book, "The Story of Oswald Page, a Boy from Arizona" (Kenedy, $0.75). It is an interesting tale of school life and base-ball games so intermixed with plots against a gold mine and the machinations of a wily broker, that there are thrills and adventures enough to delight the heart of any boy. The hero, perfect in appearance as in conduct and manners, wears his greatness attractively, and will impress the boyish imagination deeply. The story is well constructed, is diversified by bright dialogue, and is told in an easy and pleasant manner.

The Catholic Mind for August 22 is an issue that all our Catholic teachers should have, for it contains the admirable paper on "The Feeling for Literature" which Brother Leo, F.S.C., L.H.D., Professor of English in St. Mary's College, Oakland, Cal., read at the Catholic Educational Convention last month. He shows that an enthusiastic love and a correct appreciation of the best books is of far more importance in a teacher of English than is a mastery of the "mechanics" of his branch. Brother Leo writes:

> Just as the crucial question concerning the teacher of politeness is, "Has he the spirit of courtesy, has he the feeling for etiquette?" and the crucial question concerning the teacher of religion is, "Has he the spirit of devotion, has he the feeling for religion?" so, it seems to me, the crucial question concerning the teacher of English is, "Has he the spirit of art, has he the feeling for literature?" Whether he has read books about books, has written a dry paper on how to secure interest, uses the dramatic method in his teaching, insists on word-analysis, believes in the efficiency of paraphrasing—such things are relatively unimportant. But, assuming that he has a grasp of three or four general principles that underlie all teaching, he is a good teacher of English, and he must be a successful teacher of English, if he knows and loves some of the really great books of the world.

Another excellent article in the current Catholic Mind is the stirring address on "Religion and Democracy" with which Archbishop Hanna opened the Catholic Educational Convention. The number ends with the continuation of Father Reville's list of "Books on Apologetics and Controversy."

Priests and seminarians will find "Eight Minute Sermons" (Benziger, $3.50), by the Rev. William Demouy, D.D., very helpful in their preparation for the pulpit, as the two volumes contain two sermons for each Sunday of the year. Although occupied in the many affairs of a busy parish the author found time to prepare carefully his sermons and instructions, and when ill-health forced him to retire from active duty, Father Demouy published these sermons in a Denver Catholic paper. The welcome they met with prompted the author to revise them and place them in book form at the disposal of a greater number of readers.——With material adapted from various sources, and original matter too, Father A. M. Skelly, O.P., presents the first of a series of "Doctrinal Discourses" (Aquinas Academy, Tacoma, Wash., $1.25), which will consist, when completed, of four volumes of sermons for the Sundays and chief festivals of the year. In commendation of them the Right Reverend Bishop of Victoria has been pleased to write: "I bear testimony to their great merit. Sound in learning, copious and varied in material, easy and flowing in style, your sermons are well adapted to instruct, to edify, and to please." Each discourse is preceded by a complete analysis, and developed so as to leave room for personal illustrations and local color.

"A History of the Christian Church" (Scribner, $3.00), by Williston Walker, Titus Street Professor of Ecclesiastical History in Yale University, shows by its title that the book is not for Catholics. According to modern terminology, the "Christian Church" is the monstrous mixture of all the heresies and sects that have set themselves up against the Catholic Church from the beginning. The Catholic Church cannot, of course, be left out of such a history, but when it appears it is evidently out of place. The author seems to rely a good deal on the labors of others. He manages to discuss Nestorianism and Eutychianism without any direct citations from the Councils of Ephesus and Chalcedon, though a certain "Ayer" appears continually in the footnotes. It is sad to see one who is supposed to be by profession a Christian teacher writing sympathetically of heretics; but saddest of all is it to see one who will have to stand at the judgment seat of Christ, using the little span of life to sit in judgment on the coming Judge, in a fine attitude of perfect detachment from Him on whom his eternity depends.

Eugène Duthoit, Professor of Political Economy at the Catholic University of Lille, has gotten out a pamphlet entitled "Le Droit International—Leçons du passé—Perspective d'avenir," and comprises two conferences which he gave at Laval University, Montreal (Extrait de la revue Trimestrielle Canadianne Bureaux de la Revue, 274 Côte Beaver Hall, Montreal, 1918). Its appearance at this time and on this continent is of real importance; for, as anyone can easily verify for himself, there is a veritable conspiracy of silence in progress among writers on international law in this country with regard to the unrivaled contributions from Catholic traditional thought in the past and the evil influences that were brought to bear upon the attempted solutions of the problem by Protestantism; owing to the religious bias of such men as Grotius, Wolff, Puffendorf and Kant. This last has been overlooked by M. Duthoit; but were he to do no more in the future than expand these two conferences into a book, he would be rendering inestimable service to the cause of truth and justice.——Rowland Estcout, in a pamphlet entitled "The Conflict of Tax Laws" (University of California Publications in Economics), exposes the present legal and economic conditions prevailing through the country with regard to taxation. He makes an urgent demand for greater coordination and standardization. He would seem, however, to lend his support to the dangerous tendency towards over-centralization that has been going on in this country for some years past and which, owing in large measure to German immigration, is particularly noticeable in the West.

One need not travel abroad to learn the sorrow, suffering and privations heroically borne by our friends across the ocean. "A Village in Picardy" (Dutton, $1.50), by Ruth Gaines, touchingly portrays all this, and the incidents related, though unimportant to the world at large, give the reader some idea of what the French peasantry are patiently suffering in the war zone. The book also shows what the American Red Cross can do and is doing to restore hope and happiness in the wake of destruction and despair.——"A General's Letters to His Son" (Houghton, Mifflin, $1.00), coming "less as from a father to a son than as from a senior officer to a young one," were written by one who has served no less than thirty-eight years in the British army. Readers would like to be able to identify the author, so that his authority might strengthen the high principles of morality, honor, self-sacrifice and bravery which are taught a young officer who is following his father's profession. Prominence is given to the power of discipline—what it has done in former wars and is accomplishing in the present crisis, and love is emphasized as the greatest factor in commanding a regiment.

"How Should I Take Exercise and Set Up?" (The Four Seas Company, Boston, $2.00), by Charles Delano, M.D., is a clearly expressed little volume which should prove of great value to the busy men and women who are "too busy to think of health." The author explains first the necessity of exercise, and recognizing several popular misconceptions as to its nature and functions, proceeds to redefine it. The rest of the book is a description in ordinary, easily grasped language of the natural effect of the exercise. Theory is discounted and practical results are sought. In an appendix there are thirty-five excellent illustrations of the exercises recommended.——It is almost a pity that so much that is inane appears within the covers of Dr. Alma C. Arnold's "The Triangle of Health" (Knopf, $1.25), because some sane and helpful things are to be found there also; but the two are so mixed up in an inextricable maze that it would be a task beyond the endurance of the average reader to disentangle them. The book purports to exploit the practice of drugless medicine, but goes so far in the other direction that it discards all theology, as well as therapeutics.

The present-day world would have to be far more deeply sunk in intellectual confusion than it actually is before it could derive any really valuable profit from either "Studies in Christianity" (Clutton), by A. Clutton Brock, or "The Experience of God in Modern Life" (Scribner), by Eugene W. Lyman. Both are Modernists, yet both furnish evidence of the unwitting but momentous tendency towards a great return to the past that is now taking place. What Mr. Brock has really fixed upon without being able to analyze it, is natural religion, and his confusion is all the greater for his having confounded it with positive Christianity. He denies the supernatural and considers his rediscovery of the natural, which Luther had rejected, as something entirely new. A brief study of Catholic ethics would easily undeceive him. Mr. Lyman, on the other hand, uses the word "experience" in a Protestant sense which would, if true, eliminate the power of our minds to attain objective truth. Newman's distinction between real and notional assent might possibly help him out of his difficulty (cf. "Grammar or Assent"). If not, then Joseph Gratry, though not himself entirely sound in all his conclusions, might still be of assistance (cf. his "Connaissance de Dieu" and B. Pointud-Guillemot's "Essai sur la Philosophie de Gratry"). What, however, may be even more surprising to the last-named author is the very important historical fact that his idea that man should be a co-worker with God in this world is not at all new, as he thinks. It is medieval pure and simple. Luther rejected it when he rejected good works, and if this statement is not sufficient guarantee Mr. Lyman need only consult, among other works, the interesting little book of Archdeacon W. Cunningham's on Christianity and economics.

Leonard E. F. contributes to the August Queen's Work these pretty stanzas, entitled "A Dowry of White and Blue":

White as mist is Our Lady's veil;
  Blue is her lovely gown—
And everything else that is blue and white
  She keeps for her very own.

Hers is the whole of the great blue sea,
  Where little white wave caps rise;
And hers are the tall white clouds that drift
  Beneath the fair blue skies.

Hers is the meek young violet,
  That lonely lives apart,
And hides within its thin blue leaves
  A little snow-white heart.

And lo! there are hundreds of little blue eyes,
  Where little white souls shine through:
'Twas God, dear Mother, who made them so,
  Because they were made for you!

EDUCATION

What School for Your Child?

THE Bureau of Education at Washington has recently issued a pamphlet under the caption, "Moral Values in Secondary Education." Prepared by Dr. Henry Neumann of the New York Ethical Culture School, this pamphlet represents the formal conclusions of a committee on the reorganization of secondary education, appointed by the National Educational Association. It may, therefore, be taken to represent fairly the kind and degree of morality which, in the opinion of non-Catholic educators, can be imparted through the agency of the school.

A Curious Pamphlet

THE pamphlet is both interesting and curious, and curious for several reasons. Moral values, Dr. Neumann explains, are to be found in student activities, in student initiative, and in group work. Under the prudent guidance of the instructor, "interpretation of experience" is said to lead the pupil to a variety of useful social and philanthropic works. Thus, the pupils of a school may be indirectly induced to raise money for a poor family, to enable the daughter to take courses in a technical school, instead of going to work; the proper conduct of student activities leads to enterprise, thrift, and some understanding of the difficult problem of how to govern.

Now much that is set down in this booklet is of real value, particularly when fused with principles of genuine morality. Dr. Neumann rightly holds that every subject in the curriculum will, either directly or indirectly, afford an opportunity of teaching moral values, and his suggestions are often exceedingly helpful. Some very good statements are made on the right understanding of liberty and equality, on respect for authority, and on what we lack very much as a people, a sympathetic appreciation of ideals other than our own. Man's ability to control his instincts, directing them in accordance with reason, is emphasized, and teacher and pupil alike are cautioned against the absurdities of the doctrine that might is right.

The Basis of Morality

YET, after all, the pamphlet draws to a close without assigning any real basis for morality, any palpable standard, according to which moral values may be assessed. This, in truth, is the main reason why the pamphlet may be, and has been, styled "curious." It is like a pretentious palace built upon quicksand. But little else could be expected from an author who hails from the Ethical Culture School, and who loses no opportunity of singing the praises of his master, Felix Adler. Praiseworthy as the purpose of the Ethical Culture Society may be, it is well to remember, in these critical times, that "ethical culture" is as nebulous as moonshine, and that the principles advocated by the School are practically worthless, because they are insufficient. We are prone to forget that "ethical culture" is but a by-product of erroneous German philosophy, being, in fact, a further extension of Kant's "self-sufficient philosophy." Sometimes passing under the name of "independent morality" and often, especially in France, of "lay morality," ethical culture is one of many modern attempts to establish a system of morality based upon the absolute exclusion of religion. According to the excellent article in the "Catholic Encyclopedia":

> Many members of the ethical societies are openly antagonistic to all religion, and would, therefore, do away with denominational schools, and supplant religious teaching by mere moral instruction. Even upon purely ethical considerations, such attempts must be unhesitatingly rejected. If it be true that even in the case of adults, moral instruction without religion, without any higher obligation or sanction, is a nonentity, a meaningless sham, how much more so is it in the case of the young? It is evident that, judged from the standpoint of Christianity, these efforts must meet with a still more decided condemnation. Christians are bound not only to observe the prescriptions of the natural law, but also the precepts given by Christ concerning faith, hope, love, Divine worship, and the imitation of Himself. The Christian, moreover, knows that without Divine grace, and, hence, without prayer and the frequent reception of the Sacraments, a morally good life for any considerable length of time is impossible. From their earliest years, therefore, the young must not only receive thorough instruction in all the Commandments, but be exercised and trained in the practical use of the means of grace. (V., 561.)

Religion, therefore, practical religion, with all that this implies, must be the basis and the support of sound morality.

The Lesson for Catholics

IF something of real value still inheres in the teaching and practice of ethical culture, it is due to the fact that this "culture" has not succeeded in divorcing itself absolutely from all idea of religion. Religion has so permeated our life and thought, often a debased religion it is true, that to well-meaning men, a perfect separation is, perhaps, impossible. In fact, in a very true sense, ethical culture as now propounded, is exceedingly sectarian, although, of course, decidedly un-Christian. Hence, it is not quite clear why the Bureau of Education, in endeavoring to give the teacher some idea of how to impart instruction in morality, should have hit upon a report which, in effect, is a plea for the sectarian Ethical Culture Society.

The purpose of this curious bulletin, as we are informed in the preface, is to stimulate teachers to discover their innumerable opportunities for quickening and clarifying the moral vision of their pupils. How far the effort will succeed, remains to be seen. Catholics, however, will find it a melancholy attempt. It shows very clearly how circumscribed the public schools are, in trying to teach a subject which is of vital importance, first to the individual, and ultimately to the State. Rejecting all supernatural, positive religious belief, they are forced to take refuge in the dim, misleading light of man-made morality. The school-year is about to begin. Where will the Catholic father place his children, those little ones, given into his care by the Author of Life Himself? To this question there can be but one answer. The only place for a Catholic child is the Catholic school. To secure this for him may mean a sacrifice, but the sacrifice will be richly repaid.

SOCIOLOGY

Remaking the Immigrant

WHAT makes the "Americanization" of the immigrant a problem of deep interest to Catholics is the un-American spirit prevalent among many who elect to undertake this work. The proselyter, the bigot, the Socialist and even the radical are all crying "Americanization," and all are sharpening their tools to operate upon the immigrant. Since a majority of immigrants are children of the Church, the force that is to protect them must come from their fellow-Catholics, and that protection can be most effectively given if Catholics themselves take in hand the perilous but necessary process of "Americanization." For we must face one great, appalling fact, the chief leakage is among the immigrant Catholics. Most of our pastors know this; not so many of our laymen, even those who devote themselves to social work.

A Case in Point

THERE is in this city of Chicago an Italian parish which, through force of circumstances, has no parochial school. A few years ago a Sunday school was conducted in this parish by lay-catechists. The maximum attendance, including all from the toddlers to the young men and women, was about 2,500. But this was at Christmas, when gifts were distributed. During the rest of the year the attendance did not reach half that number. Across the street from the church was a public school with an attendance of about 2,000 Italian children, and within the boundaries of the parish were several other public schools, each of which numbered about 1,000 Italians. All this is a powerful argument for the parochial school, but it is likewise a powerful argument for a determined Catholic Americanization movement. Back of the failure of the children to attend Sunday school was parental indifference, and back of this indifference, often changing into direct hostility to the Church, was the fact that the parents were being "Americanized" by anti-Catholic agencies.

Through the Immigrant's Eyes

IS there any need to picture the radically changed life and outlook on life that is met by the immigrant? There is possibly only one institution which he comes upon here which is identical with that in the land of his birth, the Catholic Church. It is as though the man were suddenly thrown into the midst of an ocean. He looks about and is delighted to see a sand-bank topping the waves. This appears to him a bit of the old firm mother-earth he was accustomed to tread. As he makes for it, another struggling wildly in the waters warns him that it is only quicksand. If one of us, who have found the sand-bank a safe refuge, does not call out to him, what will befall the poor unfortunate?

The immigrant is an heroic man. Not many of us would pull up our homes by the roots and transplant them to another city, not to mention another land, even though the inducement were great. The spirit of the immigrant is one of possibilities. If dulled and flattened by his experiences in this country, the fault is ours, not his. Immigration is a convulsion in life, and after the awakening there is only one old land-mark, the Catholic Church. This will be the only institution in the New World that will have the immigrant's full confidence at first. Here is our opportunity to aid him in his readjustment. The lures and traps that the present Americanizers set in the foreign colonies of the great cities are many. At first they lead to the Protestant Sunday school and the non-sectarian settlement; eventually, in nine out of ten cases, particularly among the men and young women, they lead to the Giordano Bruno society, the ward Socialist club and the I. W. W. headquarters. It is an old and frequently substantiated fact, that there is no half-way stopping place for the man who slips from Catholicism. He goes to the depths of sin or radicalism. It is not the hidden rock in the sea of religion that sinks the immigrants' barks. The trouble is in political, social and economic waters. Into these must we throw our life-savers in the rescue work. The trouble starts with wholly ridiculous conceptions of American ideals of democracy and liberty, of American wealth and life.

The Existing Agencies

"THE heroic is human, belonging to all lands; Washington and Lincoln have comrades in all countries where the people love liberty." This is a precept urged in the Americanization program of the Council of National Defense. It is a very safe embarkation point for any program of Americanization, and may well be brought home to the immigrant whose life is being adjusted to his new environment. But how?

My acquaintance with foreign-speaking parishes, though it is limited, convinces me that many are most admirably equipped for this work of Americanization. The societies, religious, social, fraternal, of the parishes are many. The parish plants usually include huge school buildings and auditoriums. Virtually, the class is gathered and seated, ready for the lesson. Who will be the instructor? Add to the burdens of the pastors? All appreciate that in the huge foreign parishes their duties are already staggering. If they feel able to assume these new duties, well and good; if not, there are others, efficient and willing. There is the young seminarian and the young aspirant to a profession. There is always the man of long residence in America, the trustee of the parish, possibly of the second generation, American reared, American educated, with an American outlook on life, but clinging to those who are of the blood of his fathers, serving the immigrants as lawyer, physician, banker, real-estate agent, editor, representative in council or legislature. Let him, in the tongue of the old country, bridge the chasm between Europe and America, and bring out the point that "the heroic is human, common to all lands." The lecture-platform and the soap-box are being used by those who are striving to un-Americanize the aliens. We, too, must use them, not sending before the classes dinner-coated, silk-hatted university professors, but their own leaders who in many instances will be found wholly capable of performing this duty.

The Personal Touch

IT would be endless to recount the subjects of the lessons in Americanization. Nor do they end when the political field has been covered. There are economic difficulties to be solved; counsel given to make the dollar stretch the farthest, thus staving off discontent; to make the living quarters more cheerful, thus warding off restlessness. All this is done, not with the turned-up nose of the disdainful society matron delving into the under-world, but with the kindly suggestion and the helpful smile of those who are inspired with a love for the children of God. The young girl needs many a word which her own mother is unable to give her. But the Sisters at the school, who might be willing occasionally to add an evening hour to their already hard day, can well give it. The immigrant is sailing in new waters for which he has no chart. There are pilots in plenty who offer their services to head the stranger's ship upon the rocks, whereon their own were ground to pieces. We know the entrance to the harbor and we must be more insistent than we have been in the offer of our services. The country is determined upon the Americanization of its foreign-born element. How this can possibly be accomplished by our usual cure-all, legislation, is a puzzle. Seemingly the program will be carried into execution in the old, disorganized, hap-hazard fashion, with only a doubling of the agencies and a tripling of the energy behind the work. Consequently the havoc wrought will be multiplied by many times ten.

Just what effective and sane Americanization will be done, how greatly the madness of the bigot, the proselyter, the radicalist and the merely stupid, will be checked, will depend upon us Catholics. How many immigrants struggling in new and deep waters will shun the bar of security, the Church, topping the highest waves, because another cries "quicksand," will be decided by the zeal of those of us with our feet on the firm ground. Americanization is a program of vast possibilities and consequences. As in the case of teaching English to the foreign-born, it is a dangerous program only in proportion to Catholic indifference.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Catholics and the Allied Cause

IN the opinion of the Catholic War News Bureau of London there is every prospect that France will resume diplomatic relations with the Holy See, following the example of Portugal and China. Indeed, it would seem that coming close upon the anti-Papal wave in the Allied press, a reaction has set in and Catholics are seen to be a vital influence for the success of the Allied cause:

> The solemn requiem Mass at Westminster Cathedral recently accentuated this fact. The official and diplomatic celebration of France's Day resolved itself into a most touching and solemn act of Catholic worship. And from the prayers offered at Westminster for the heroic dead of France, the Allied world looks to the living France herself, where it sees the fate of civilization and humanity in the hands of one man, the Commander of the Allied Armies, General Foch, that great French Catholic who before the Battle of the Marne said to one of the chaplains: "Father, we are to make our supreme effort in arms tomorrow. Do you also make a supreme effort in prayer. All my trust is in God."

The time may come when the French Government will officially acknowledge the propriety of calling on the nation that is Catholic to offer prayers for the success of French arms. The reason alleged by the President of the Republic for not making this national act of homage was the separation of Church and State. This reason did not prevent America's Chief Executive from calling on all citizens to pray for victory and peace.

Defaming the Pope

SOME time ago a woman working under the auspices of the American Red Cross in France wrote a letter containing an insulting reference to the Pope. With strange disregard for truth and patriotism, a small-town editor published the letter, which was copied by a number of Western papers. The Editor of America sent the letter to Mr. Henry P. Davison, Chairman of the Red Cross War Council, and received in reply the following:

> August 8, 1918.
> The Editor of America:
> Dear Sir:
> Your letter of August 3 to Mr. Davison enclosing clipping containing reference to the supposed statement of Miss Downie has been referred to me.
> Of course the Red Cross utterly repudiates responsibility for any such statement as that quoted in the clipping. Nothing is more objectionable from our point of view than such a publication. We are with your permission forwarding this letter to Paris for thorough investigation. In the meantime will ask you to accept our assurance that the matter will be dealt with aggressively.
> Very truly yours,
> [illegible]
> Assistant to Chairman Red Cross War Council.

It is gratifying to see the promptness and vigor with which the Red Cross authorities deal with protests like those to which the above letter is an answer.

The National Committee on Churches

THE National Committee on the Churches and the Moral Aims of the War announces that two British clergymen will tour this country in the fall to address American audiences on the moral aims of the war. The Rt. Rev. Charles Gore, Bishop of Oxford, one of the speakers, in replying to the invitation of the Committee, said:

> No one is more clear than I am as to the moral necessity of entering upon this awful war and of fighting it through; but I am exceedingly anxious that the moral aim in all this should be kept clearly to the front; and I fear that as the war goes on there is more and more necessity that great efforts should be made to secure this. The mere determination to beat Germany is apt to absorb all else. Whereas in fact we might defeat Germany and at the same time absorb so much of what is false in the spirit of the war as to defeat our professed aims in entering upon it. That is what makes me ready to do anything that lies in my power to keep the right moral principles of the war to the fore.

Fifty-five speakers traversed the country from Maine to California last spring addressing 270 conferences of clergymen and 211 popular mass-meetings in the interest of the National Committee. But no Catholic name was on the list of speakers.

The Northcliffe Press and Conscription

APROPOS of the London Times' veiled threat to revive the Penal Laws against Catholics, a writer in the June Catholic Magazine of South Africa, which lately arrived, remarks:

> Catholics in the British Empire will accept no toleration from the British Junkers of the Northcliffe type; but they will insist upon their rights, if necessary with their lives. If the Northcliffes wish to provoke a new Kulturkampf, they can, but they ought to remember Bismarck. It is certainly not patriotic on the part of Lord Northcliffe to remind Catholics of the Penal Laws, at a time when a Catholic has been made Chancellor of the German Empire.

The Irish Bishops have not interfered in any purely political question. They have intervened in a moral question of the gravest import, as they had a perfect right to do. The papers which applauded the intervention of Cardinal Mercier on behalf of his own people and their rights, suddenly discover a political flavor in the words of Cardinal Logue, when he takes action of an analogous kind. A grave injustice was proposed to be done to their people, and the Irish Bishops have not hesitated to speak words that could be clearly understood. They claim that the fundamental right of a nation to conscript its own citizens shall not be exercised by another nation in direct opposition to the wish of the Irish people.

The democratic voters of England must be grateful to Cardinal Logue for the stand which he has taken; and we should leave the matter willingly in their hands, if they were free to vote. We have heard much, since the war began, of the iniquity of making Bohemians fight for Austria and Poles for Germany; but what new version of the moral law for British benefit makes it lawful for us to force Irishmen to fight for a cause for which they do not desire to fight? If the self-determination of small nations has any meaning, it surely means that they themselves are to determine the causes for which they think it right to give their lives.

The writer is of the opinion that it is largely owing to the attitude of President Wilson and America that the Northcliffe press has been unable as yet to make the British Government enforce conscription in Ireland.

University of Santa Clara Military Department

THE University of Santa Clara received the following commendation in the report handed in by Major Pearce, after his inspection of the military department:

> The University of Santa Clara is the only institution of university standing in the Western Department whose cadets live in barracks and are under constant military discipline. The routine of the institution is patterned after the Virginia Military Institute and West Point so far as is practicable to do so. Captain Donovan, the Professor of Military Science and Tactics, is an able officer of wide experience and has been given a free hand by the faculty, with instructions to organize along the best military lines possible. The result of his work in the past few months is hard to praise too highly,—especially in view of the fact that the institution has received no equipment from the War Department, being armed with a motley collection of old pattern Springfield rifles of every conceivable model. However, they have been thoroughly cleaned by the students. It is earnestly recommended that this institution be given priority in issue of ordnance equipment in the Western Department, as it is in the poorest condition in that respect of any of the large institutions. Uniforms and other equipment would be very acceptable, but the ordnance is the crying need. The military spirit of the students is being developed and fostered in every way possible, and this institution will, in time, be a model of its class.
> E. H. PEARCE, Major, A. G., N. A.

On November 22, 1917, the University of Santa Clara was made a Reserve Officers' Training Corps by a special act of the War Department. The object of this department is to give the student four years' military training in preparation for a commission to lead and instruct untrained men.

Rural Telephones as Employment Agents

THE method adopted by the Federal Employment Service for ascertaining the needs of the farmers throughout the country is highly interesting and ingenious. Before the Government had taken over the various telephone lines arrangements were made with the rural telephone companies to link farm to farm by means of their service. No fewer than 7,600 companies were involved, and 2,000,000 farms could thus be reached, or practically the entire agricultural population of the United States. Every farmer subscriber to any rural telephone company is to be called up once a week by the local operator and questioned as to his labor requirements. The requests are then noted on special application forms of the Employment Service and forwarded to the nearest branch office from which the requisite help can be supplied. Every effort is being made to supply the farmers with all the assistance that will be needed to harvest the bumper crops of this year. It is of further interest to note here that many of the rural telephone lines were already cooperatively owned by the farmers themselves, showing how the spirit of self-help and cooperation is rapidly progressing among our farming population.

The Battles of Automatons

IT would appear from a recent correspondence of the Associated Press that the battles of the future may be fought with "automatic soldiers," as the latest device in modern warfare is called. The inventor is a Danish engineer and his apparatus is thus described:

> It consists of a steel cylinder normally within a larger cylinder, the whole being sunk into the ground vertically. By means of a mechanism operated by wireless the inner cylinder rises to a height of eighteen inches from the ground, and, simultaneously, an automatic rifle mounted on the inner cylinder fires four hundred shots in any given direction.
> These "automatic soldiers" can be controlled from a central position some four or five miles behind the line of defense, according to the inventor. They may be seen by the enemy only when they rise from the ground.

It is said that a few hundred of these steel soldiers can hold a position against an infantry attack, no matter how numerous their assailants may be. "They would blaze away their 400 shots without flinching and never retreat." If now an army of "automatics" can be invented to storm the positions thus defended, the millennium will be near at hand.

Resolutions of the Catholic Educational Convention

AMONG the resolutions passed last month by the Catholic Educational Convention, the following have special bearing on the present national crisis:

> The Association gives its whole-hearted support to the Chief Executive of our country, President Wilson, in this supreme moment of trial. It pledges unswerving fidelity and devotion to him in the prosecution of the war for the complete attainment of the high and moral ideals set forth by him.
> In a spirit of humility and gratitude we give thanks to God for the splendid patriotism displayed in this crisis by the graduates of Catholic colleges, who have rallied to the colors in surprisingly large numbers, in a spirit of entire devotion.
> The inculcation of obedience to God and to all lawful authority constitutes an essential aim of Catholic education. As America needs the loyal support and obedience of her citizens today as never before, we can render no more important service to our country at this time than to continue the work of our schools and colleges and to labor to make the work as fruitful as possible.

The Convention declared its opposition to the industrial-efficiency idea dominating educational methods:

> The modern efficiency expert in industrial life has too often driven the laborer to the limit of endurance. Moreover, the demand for efficiency in production has had an unwholesome influence on modern education. The economic producer regards the child merely as a future economic unit in the industrial system. Education based upon this principle prevents the proper unfolding of the capacity and the individuality of the child. It leads to the eliminating of initiative and enterprise, and stunts the power and capacity for thought.

A deserving tribute is paid to Mr. Hoover and the National Food Administration, and the cooperation of teachers in our schools is pledged to the work of the conservation of food.

Chronicle

The War.—On the western front the week was marked by important Allied gains all along the line running from the Lys salient and from Barleux-St. Marc, south of Arras, to Soissons. The British moved mainly in the north while the French carried on the fighting in the south. On August 19 the British advanced their lines in the apex of the Lys salient. They pushed forward on a 10,000-yard front to Merville. Almost at the same time the French, in the Lassigny region to the south, made substantial gains. Frenières, one of the outlying defenses of Lassigny, was captured as well as the villages of Pimprez, Nouvron-Vingre and Morsain. The French fighting forces at this moment stretched east and southeast of Lassigny on a fifteen-mile front. The following day, August 20, the French under General Mangin again struck the enemy on a front of fifteen and a half miles between the Oise and the Aisne, penetrating into the German positions to an average depth of two and a half miles, capturing several villages, taking 8,000 prisoners and a vast supply of military stores. West of the Oise the enemy made a desperate fight for Beauvraignes which was finally taken by the French. The latter on the same day were officially reported to have captured Vesaponin, to have reached the plateau east of Tartiers and to be moving towards Camelin. On the same date General Mangin's line ran from La Quenotierie, north of Bailly, close to the Oise to Champ de Merlier, to Petit Maupas, to Cuts, to Hill 160, to Vesaponin and to Valpriez Farm, five miles northwest of Soissons.

Bulletin, Aug. 19, p.m.-Aug. 26, a.m.

On August 21 while in the north Field Marshal Haig's troops, under the immediate command of General Byng, were attacking the Germans on a ten-mile front from the Ancre River to Moyenneville, driving them back at some points to a depth of two miles, capturing over 1,000 prisoners, and winning back several villages, the troops of General Mangin continued their forward movement in the territory northwest of Soissons. They took Lassigny after desperate fighting, advanced over a front of fifteen miles, and at some points pierced the enemy lines to a depth of five miles. The capture of Lassigny is of the greatest strategic value. Southeast of Lassigny, the French by gaining a footing in Plemont and Chiry-Ourscamps menaced the German hold on the valley of the Divette. Further east across the Oise General Mangin's forces reached the river from the south between Sempigny and Pontoise.

The next day the same "see-saw" tactics continued north and south. In the south the French under Mangin and Humbert steadily advanced from Lassigny to the region north of the Soissons. East of the Oise they pushed forward at some points seven miles, French detachments were reported to have crossed the Ailette. In their forward thrust they occupied the villages of St. Aubin, Selens, Bagneux, Epagny, Bieuxy, Vauxrezis and Pommiers. West of the Oise General Humbert's troops occupied the whole of the Thiescourt Massif and reached the Divette River from its mouth to Evricourt. This brought the French within two miles of Noyon, from the southwest. In the north the strategically important town of Albert on the Ancre, eighteen miles northeast of Amiens, was taken by the British together with 1,400 prisoners and a number of cannon. On a six-mile front, between Albert and Bray, on the Somme, the British heavily attacked the enemy and drove forward to a depth of two miles, gaining all their objectives. On August 23, General Byng advanced more than two miles on the six-mile front from southeast of Albert, to the neighborhood of Grandcourt. A few miles to the north the British took Achiet-le-Grand on the Arras-Albert Railroad. On the extreme left Gomiécourt and four other villages were carried by storm, several thousand prisoners were taken and heavy losses inflicted upon the enemy.

At the same time the French under Mangin and Humbert made important gains between the Matz River and the territory north of Soissons. West of the Oise General Humbert's troops crossed the Divette in the region of Evricourt, southeast of Soissons. Mangin's corps crossed the Oise River and the canal eight miles east of Noyon and reached the village of Morlincourt not quite two miles from Noyon station. By August 24 while no substantial change had taken place in the Noyon territory, on the northern Allied front, Bray, on the north bank of the Somme, five and a half miles southeast of Albert, was in British hands and the strong position of Thiepval, northeast of Albert, on the Ancre front, was carried in face of a murderous machine-gun and rifle fire. Miraumont, where the enemy made a desperate resistance, and ten other villages were captured on the same front. British troops reached the outskirts of Bapaume. In these operations more than 2,000 prisoners were taken. This brought the British captures since this offensive began up to 16,000. The official dispatches of August 26 reported that on the previous day the British continued their advance north of the Somme, and that they had pushed forward along an eighteen-mile front from Croiselles to Bray, at some points to a depth of four miles. They reached the Hindenburg line southeast of Arras, entered Bapaume and captured many villages and prisoners. Among the villages taken were Mametz, Martinpuich, Le Sars, La Barque, Pozières, Eaucourt, Contalmaison, Courcelette and Warencourt-Eaucourt.

In Albania the Austro-Bulgarian armies are moving along on a sixty-mile front from the mouth of the Semeni River to the heights overlooking the Tomorica River.

Canada.—On returning to France, M. François Veuillot, who had been sent to Canada by the Catholic Committee of French Propaganda, published a summary report of his investigations in the Bulletin de Propagande Française, reserving the detailed account of his mission for a volume to be published later. His first impression is one of astonishment at the growth of the French Canadians in the last century and a half: from 60,000 they have developed into 4,000,000, of whom 2,500,000 reside in Canada. The immense majority, he says, have clung to the practice of the Faith of their ancestors. This fidelity to Catholicism, joined with an intense attachment to the French tongue, has united them around the parish church, and has preserved, in spite of the dominance of a different nation, their French culture and perpetuated their love of France.

M. Veuillot's Report

M. Veuillot says that one of the reasons that led him to the shores of Canada was the desire to find out why, in view of these facts, "the trials of the land of their fathers had not awakened more widespread and more ringing echoes" among the French Canadians. He declares, moreover, that he has reached a satisfactory explanation. First of all he denies that the French Canadians have not taken part in the war; thousands have enlisted and have had a brilliant share in the fighting in Flanders, those subject to conscription have rallied to the standard with resolution and often with eagerness. He says that figures prove that the share taken in the war by the French-speaking population of Canada, during the period of voluntary enlistment, was inferior to that taken by the portion of the population that speaks English; but he declares that this numerical inferiority was not the result of lack of sympathy or of courage.

The people of Quebec, according to M. Veuillot, are, for the most part, attached to the soil, composed of large families, in which the father is dependent on the sons for assistance, many of whom are beyond military age. The English Canadians, on the contrary, are less attached to the soil, have small families, the children being engaged, by preference, in industrial pursuits and commerce.

To these general considerations M. Veuillot adds others more detailed. The English-speaking population of Canada failed to display a large spirit or much tact in dealing with the situation. Voluntary enlistments were not to be expected in very large numbers, when the French Canadians were summoned to volunteer in the name of imperialism, when the agency of a Methodist minister ignorant of the French language was used for recruiting and when those who did enlist were scattered in English regiments. A further tactical error was the revival of the old campaign against the teaching of French, a measure which accentuated racial antipathies. Both Quebec and Ontario are indisputably loyal to the British Government, but they are unquestionably inimical to the English people. M. Veuillot deplores this latter fact, and asserts that events which might have been used to make the old quarrel less bitter served only to intensify it. The ill-advised bitterness of the press campaign, which accused the French Canadians of indifference and even antipathy for the cause of the Allies, furnished pretexts for lamentable partizan controversy. He also lays a share of the blame on the French Government whose anti-clerical policy before the war was by no means calculated to win the sympathy of a people attached to its priests and its religion.

M. Veuillot concludes by expressing his affection for the French Canadians, and by declaring that no matter what judgment may be passed on their attitude toward voluntary enlistment, no one can question their loyal and courageous obedience to the law of conscription. He believes that it is the interest and duty of French Catholics, for both national and religious reasons, to extend a fraternal hand to the French Canadians, and in accord with the policy of France in the past, to give them every possible assistance in the struggle to develop and defend French and Catholic civilization in the northern part of the New World.

Ireland.—Quite a sensation was created in political circles both in Ireland and Great Britain by the declaration of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland in favor of Home Rule. At a luncheon given in honor of Col. Arthur Lynch, M.P., Sir James Campbell stated:

Sir James Campbell for Home Rule

> From the day the war broke out I determined, regardless of my commitments in the past and the views of my old political colleagues, that I should endeavor to the best of my ability to bring about a solution by consent of the Irish problem on the only lines which it seemed to me held any promise of success—I mean self-government for united Ireland.

Sir James Campbell was formerly the lieutenant of Sir Edward Carson in the anti-Home Rule movement, and his appointment as Lord Chancellor of Ireland some weeks ago was looked on as a challenge to the Irish Nationalists and all sympathizers with the cause of Home Rule. The Lord Chancellor's office carries with it the right of nomination to all the judicial and magisterial offices in Ireland. As evidence of the sincerity of Sir James Campbell's "conversion," the Marquise De Fontenoy writing to the New York Evening Sun, instances his appointment of James McMahon to the office of permanent Under-Secretary of Ireland, a "man who has always held aloof from the so-called Dublin Castle crowd and has never made any concealment of his strong sympathies with the Nationalist cause."

Commenting on the recent Belfast speech of Sir Edward Carson, in which he declared that the Battle of the Boyne was celebrated by Orangemen "not out of hostility to our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen but as a great mark in the advancement of civilization and Christianity," Sir Mark Sykes told the House of Commons that he could not imagine any statement calculated to arouse more bitter feeling in Ireland. "If the right honorable gentleman had read the history of Ireland by Lecky, his precedessor in the representation of Dublin University," said Sir Mark Sykes, "he would have known that the Battle of the Boyne was followed by eighty years of the most villainous persecution and rascality, not only towards the Catholics but also towards the Presbyterians of Ulster." Sir Edward Carson also stated that the acton of the Bishops on Conscription was an attempt "to get Ulster under their heel." Sir Mark Sykes made it clear that he was not giving a defense of the Irish Bishops, but such a statement from Carson was nothing less than an appeal to "fear and to religious passion, and as the right honorable gentleman was born and brought up in the South of Ireland, he must have known that the only motive of the Bishops' action was to avoid bloodshed." Commenting on Sir Mark Sykes' speech in which he declared that he did not believe "that the clergy collectively should interfere with politics any more than he believed that a Privy Councillor did well to organize a rebellion," the Dublin Irish Catholic reminds him that the question of conscription was not one of politics merely. "It was specifically declared by the united Episcopacy of Ireland to be one of morals and politics." The pronouncement of the Irish Bishops was based solely on the ground of morals.

Sir Mark Sykes and Sir Edward Carson

The Liverpool Catholic Times declares the present coercion policy introduced into Ireland ridiculous and doomed to failure, saying:

> If serious coercion can be killed by ridicule its fate under the present Irish régime is certain. The struggles of troops of soldiers and police running helter-skelter after boys in all parts of the country, arresting men and lads because they are playing football without a permit, or hurling, or singing Irish songs, or engaged in a game of cricket, and so on, are exhibitions which must provoke contemptuous laughter. But for the prisoners the arrests are no laughing matter. They are taken to coercion courts and receive heavy sentences. Eight boys, whose ages ranged from eleven to twenty years, were caught playing at the Magazine road and the Cricket Ground, Dublin, and were taken to jail in a military wagon. Football matches were broken up by the police. Even ladies who met to carry on sports were scattered. Meanwhile, lest it should be thought outsiders are free to land at any Irish port, or Irish folk at any British port, the Home Secretary has specified the only ports to which they can proceed and the only routes by which they can travel. Apparently there is no art that has ever been used in Prussia or in any reactionary land, ancient or modern, to curb liberty that will not in time be adopted by the British Government in Ireland.

Mr. Shortt, Chief Secretary for Ireland, in speaking of the coercion policy, denied that there was any attempt to suppress the Irish language. The police had misunderstood instructions in one or two cases, he maintained.

Japan.—According to an Associated Press dispatch violent food riots broke out in a number of the chief cities of Japan during the week of August 11. The uprising appeared to be anti-capitalistic in character, mobs composed of insufficiently paid workmen destroying the property of the wealthy and attacking the houses of those whom the war has enriched. In Tokio the mobs damaged buildings in the business and theater districts and sacked the rice stores of the naval station at Maizuru, and at Osaka, pillaged provision shops and set fire to theaters. A crowd of 5,000 marched to the retail-store section of the capital, raided hundreds of stores, restaurants and food depots and attacked the Ministry of the Interior. The riots were fomented by labor agitators and are said to be the first of the kind to occur since Japan was opened to western civilization. The situation was so serious indeed that a special meeting of the Cabinet was called and $5,000,000 was appropriated for the purchase and distributon of rice among the poor at a moderate price, and a number of millionaires have contributed large sums to a rice fund. There is said to be plenty of rice in Japan but it is held in storage by profiteers. On August 17 an imperial ordinance authorized the Government to requisition all stocks of rice and put them on the market. A great deal of property, particularly the residences of the rich, was destroyed throughout Japan during the week's disorders but the papers were forbidden to print news of the riot's progress. The editors, thereupon, protested, declaring the prohibition to be an arbitrary interference with the right to free speech granted by the Constitution. The Governor of Tokio ordered the theaters, stores and leading streets closed and urged the people to remain indoors at night.

Food Riots

Portugal.—The solemn proclamation of the resumption of diplomatic relations between Portugal and the Holy See was made by the President of the Republic, when Parliament opened on July 22, and was ratified by the members. Mgr. Locatelli, Titular Archbishop of Thessalonica, previously Nuncio at Brussels and Internuncio to Luxemburg, has been nominated by the Vatican to preside over the new Nunciature at Lisbon. Don José Feliciano da Costa, the Portuguese Ambassador at the Vatican, a fervent Catholic, was the military organizer of the recent Catholic action in Portugal, and was one of the three chiefs of the contra-revolution.

The New Government

The Etudes of Paris gives some interesting details of the new régime. After the coup de force which brought about the fall of the anti-Christian Government on December 6 and 7, 1917, a Provisional Government was set up consisting of a triumvirate, namely, Feliciano da Costa, Machado-Santos and Sidonio Paës, who at once permitted the exiled Bishops and religious to return to the possession of their churches, and to resume their former work. The next step of the Provisional Government was to do away on February 22, 1918, with the tyrannical articles of the law of 1911, and to substitute for them decrees based on equity and good-sense, which completed the national conciliation of Portugal with the Church and finally restored religious peace.

Elections were held on April 28, 1918. Sidonio Paës, to whom had been accorded the first place, both in honor and in authority, in the Provisional Government, was elected almost unanimously. Although not a professed Catholic, he is openly in favor of complete religious liberty. The Senate is composed almost exclusively of his partizans. The Chamber of Deputies is also made up, with few exceptions, of his supporters, of whom fifteen belong to the Catholic party, thirty-nine to the Royalist group, and 105 to the Moderate Republicans. The Opposition counts only six Republican-Democrats and Freemasons. The present form of government is thought likely by some to be permanent, others regard it as an intermediate step in a movement back to monarchical institutions, but all are agreed that it is extremely conservative and hostile to anti-religious tendencies.

The first notice of the negotiations which resulted in the reestablishment of diplomatic relations with the Holy See was given to the Portuguese in an official note published by the Government on June 30, 1918, announcing that the President had given an audience to Mgr. Francisco Ragonesi, Titular Archbishop of Myra and Apostolic Nuncio at Madrid, who had been sent to Lisbon by the Pope on a special mission. During the interview both sides expressed a strong desire for a complete reconciliation between Portugal and the Vatican, as a result of which steps were taken to effect that end. The Pope, in turn, announced in an official note, dated July 7, 1918, the resumption of diplomatic relations, and the accomplished fact was ratified by acclamation by the Portuguese Parliament at its first session.

Rome.—The anti-clerical press in Italy continues to be very credulous. The Corriere della Sera recently published an interview which Baron Denys Cochin was declared to have had with a reporter of the Gaulois, and in which it was stated that the Baron during his recent visit to Rome had a number of long conversations with Mgr. Ratti. The fact is that Mgr. Ratti had departed from Rome for Warsaw, on an important diplomatic mission, a month and a half before Baron Denys arrived in Rome. The report of the same interview goes on to say that Cardinal Gasparri had given the Baron to understand that the rights of France in China would be respected. This is so obviously true, so clearly borne out by all the dealings of the Holy See that it needs no comment.

Methods of the Anti-Clerical Press

The Corriere proceeded to give its own color to the statement by adding that the report that the Holy See intended to send a Papal Nuncio to China had caused great disturbance in certain French circles, because of the injury to the French protectorate implied in the establishment of a Nunciature at Peking. The Osservatore Romano professes ignorance as to the alleged fact that certain circles are disturbed but proceeds to point out that the disturbance if it exists is quite groundless. The establishment of the Nunciature at Peking so far from contravening the efficacy of the French protectorate over Catholics would in reality increase its influence. The advantage accruing to the Holy See, aside from the permanence and authoritative position of its representative, would be confined practically to an increased authority in spiritual matters and the right to attend diplomatic conferences in place of requesting, as at present, private audiences. France could only gain, by the assistance and coöperation of the Nuncio, in extending its protection to Catholics.

The Giornale d'Italia, in reporting another interview granted by Baron Cochin, gives a new object-lesson regarding the insidious way in which the anti-clerical Italian press contrives to distort the things favorable to the Holy See. The point of the interview was that Baron Cochin had returned from his meeting with the Holy Father quite satisfied and very grateful with the reception he had received. The correspondent of the Giornale in his interpretation of this plain statement contrived to convey the impression that the French Academician had found it necessary to have this meeting, in order to clear up certain doubts as to the attitude of the Vatican concerning certain questions relating to Germany. The fact is that M. Denys Cochin had written to Cardinal Gasparri almost five months earlier to acknowledge that he had been very much mistaken on this very matter, and with reason, for the Pope in a public document, reported throughout the world, had made his attitude on the matter in question, namely, his protection of those cruelly oppressed by the Central Powers, lucidly clear as early as the beginning of the year 1916.

Has the Pope "Talked Too Much"?

J. HARDING FISHER, S.J.

IMMEDIATELY after his arrival in the United States, whither with a number of other editors of Italian papers he has come for the purpose of promoting a better understanding between the peoples of both countries, S. Antonio Agresti, the editor of La Tribuna, proceeded to assail the Pope. Among other objectionable and false statements he remarked that "The Pope has talked altogether too much, not openly but secretly." The subtlety of this statement is patent. If the Papal talk has been secret, obviously no one can ask for its publication. How very simple! The precaution taken by the editor of La Tribuna is quite in accord with the methods used by his paper in Italy. Clever misrepresentation, odious insinuation, misstatements so clothed that it is difficult to meet them squarely are known to be the staples of the anti-clerical Italian press, of which La Tribuna is so conspicuous an example.

This alleged excessive talk of the Pope is simply nonexistent. If S. Agresti knows of such talk let him produce it publicly. We in the United States have a right to know it, for it is too much to expect that a people so eminent for their love of fair-play should accept dark and sinister hints as facts, especially when they come from a man whose paper is synonymous with anti-clerical prejudice. As a nation, we are thoroughly in sympathy with the part Italy is taking in the world-struggle for liberty; but right-minded men are disgusted with S. Agresti's attempt to import anti-clericalism into the United States. His reference to the Church and the Pope, injected into his first public utterance without any other reason save his anti-clerical animosity, is gratuitous and unsupported, and in the absence of evidence may be confidently regarded as false. The secret talk of the Pope to which he darkly refers is a myth. But the Pope's public talk has not been a myth; it is on record for any one who cares to read; and even S. Agresti is not tempted to characterize it as excessive.

The Papal "conversations" with the belligerent Powers in behalf of prisoners of war, incapacitated by wounds or disease from further military service, which resulted in the return of 8.868 Frenchmen to their native land between the months of March and November in the year 1915, and has since that time been responsible for the steady stream of such men back to the bosoms of their families, were certainly not excessive. Neither will any one say that the Pope talked too much when he persuaded the Powers to consent to an exchange of interned civilians, by which more than 3,000 Belgians have been restored to their homes, and more than 20,000 Frenchmen were permitted to pass into France during the space of a single month. It was as a consequence of the talk of the Pope that Switzerland and other neutral countries were enabled to offer medical care, comfort and hospitality to many thousands of sick and wounded soldiers belonging to the nations at war; and that the treaty of Berne was effected in May, 1918, which provides for the exchange, return to their own country, or internment in Switzerland of prisoners who are fathers of four children. The "Papal train," which almost every week brings back to Italy Italian prisoners suffering from tuberculosis and other diseases grew out of the Papal negotiations.

The Pope talked with the German Government and hundreds of thousands of Belgians and Frenchmen were permitted to get word from their relatives; he talked with the Austrian Government and letters from the Serbians began to reach their families; he talked again with the same Government and news of the Italians in the territory occupied by Austria was forwarded to their refugee relatives; he talked with the Bishop of Tripoli, and Italians, torn with anxiety about their dear ones who were either captured or dispersed in Libya, received detailed information in answer to their inquiries.

It was through the initiative of the Holy Father that prisoners in Austria-Hungary, Belgium, England, France, Italy, Russia and Turkey were allowed to rest from work on Sunday, and that the Ottoman Government gave assurance to the bereaved relatives of those who had fallen in the Dardanelles, that the last resting-places of the buried soldiers would be kept intact, religiously cared for, and marked with distinctive signs, and that photographs were sent to the various countries of the different cemeteries, thus enabling the identification of individual graves. Even S. Agresti would not dare say that in negotiating these acts of gentle kindness, the Pope talked too much.

Benedict XV by his intervention secured the reprieve, commutation, and pardon of many condemned to death; he secured mitigation of punishment for many others under lesser sentences, for others he obtained liberty, permission to return to their native lands, or the alternative of being interned in Switzerland. Nor did his beneficence stop with the living, he asked and was granted the favor of having the remains of the dead honorably buried in zinc, to be later transferred to Italy.

He interested himself actively in behalf of the destitute populations in Belgium; he acceded to the request of many influential persons in Poland to come to the aid of that unhappy country and after long efforts succeeded in getting from the Governments concerned the necessary permissions; the transport of food to the starving civil population of Montenegro was made possible by the unremitting endeavors of the Holy Father. The Italians in the portions of Italy occupied by Austria were furnished with the necessaries of life not only through concessions granted at his request but out of his own private purse. From the German Government he obtained permission for the French prisoners, and the inhabitants of the occupied parts of France, both individually and collectively, to receive food sent in from outside the German lines. Again and again he sent money to Belgium, and at the request of Mr. Hoover, he appealed to the American children to help the children of that country, with the result that thanks to the generosity of Americans and the Pope's request many a little one's life was saved. He sent pecuniary aid in surprisingly large amounts to the destitute people of France, Luxemburg, Poland, Lithuania, Ruthenia, Serbia, and Montenegro. He had presents, food, clothes, and books sent to the prisoners of war of every nation without distinction of nationality or religion. He dispatched medicine and garments to the Italian prisoners in Austria, and donated a most bountiful sum to the relief of the Italian war-orphans. He persuaded the rectors of a number of colleges in Rome and practically every seminary in Italy to put their establishments at the disposal of the Government for use as hospitals.

His solicitude for Belgium is one of the most persistent of all the Pope's war-activities. When the rest of the world was either silent or powerless to aid that afflicted country, the Holy Father wrote letter after letter to Cardinal Mercier, and sent large sums of money for the alleviation of the sad lot of the Belgian people. He appealed to the Catholics of the entire world to follow his example, and especially to the Catholics of the United States. His intervention secured religious services throughout the country and sacerdotal ministrations for the wounded soldiers in the hospitals. He obtained passports for the Belgians, and after the sack of Louvain procured the immediate liberation of the priests, religious and citizens who had been arrested en masse and transferred to Brussels. His mediation had a large share in obtaining for the Belgians who had been transported to Germany, release from prison, mitigation of suffering, and even the restoration of liberty.

His protest against the invasion of Belgium was forceful and unmistakable, but when some pretended to misunderstand it, he made it doubly clear in explicit language that his condemnation which had been expressed in general terms had been directed against Germany's unjustifiable violation of Belgium's neutrality. He protested likewise against the attacks made by German troops on the priests and civilians of Louvain, and to his efforts was due the liberation of the rector and faculty of the University. He protested also against the shooting of Father Dupiereux, of Father Hohlet and other priests. He defended the Jesuits against unfounded charges, expressed disbelief in accusations made in proclamations posted in Brussels, demanded protection for Belgian priests and religious and that pastors should be allowed to return to their parishes, prevailed on the German Government to exempt priests from the oath which that Government tried to impose on them, and saved them from being condemned to hard labor. He extended his protection to many Englishmen and had them liberated from prison.

He protested against the burning of buildings in Louvain and demanded that sentinels be posted to save them from ruin, and that libraries and institutes of learning should not be destroyed. He insisted on the evacuation of convents occupied by German troops, and obtained from the German Governor a promise that works of art should be safeguarded, and that public buildings dedicated to civic and religious purposes should not be harmed. These are only a few of the instances of the Pope's benefactions towards Belgium. The full account of them may be read in the recent volume just published by M. l'Abbé Octave Misonne at 40, rue Copernic, Paris.

It would appear from all this that the Pope has indeed spoken much, much to the purpose, much in the interest of the Allies. S. Agresti must have been aware of the character of the public negotiations of the Pope, for a résumé of them was published and freely circulated in Rome in the form of an appeal to facts as against the calumnies of anti-clericalism, prior to his departure for the United States. No doubt the existence of this circular, every statement of which is based on a document to which explicit reference is made, made him shrink from complaining of the Pope's public utterances. The foregoing catalogue of what the Holy Father has done, which might be almost indefinitely prolonged from the sources published by the Civiltà Cattolica amply suffices to discredit strictures on the Papacy made by La Tribuna's editor.

Catholic Publicity and the Individual

RICHARD A. MUTTKOWSKI, Ph.D.

THE recognized agencies of publicity are the press, the pulpit, the classroom, the rostrum, and the individual. For their ultimate success all of these depend on the last-named, the individual. Hence the failure of Catholic publicity can be ascribed directly to the individual Catholic because of his "indifference and supineness," excoriated in recent articles in AMERICA. In the main the average Catholic does not realize that outside agencies, that is, non-Catholic agencies, are hostile, unsympathetic, or indifferent to Catholicism. His inactivity seems to me to be founded on a combination of pride and timidity, on excessive self-consciousness and fear of his fellow-men, and a tendency to be interested solely in "his daily bread."

The average Catholic is inordinately proud of his Church. Is she not the oldest, the greatest of all? Has she not played a bigger role in history than any other creed? Kings and conquerors have bowed to her, and yet has not her power been always wielded for the benefit of democracy? Oh yes, they are proud. But their pride in their heritage is of the sort that the novelist stigmatizes in "Pandora's Box": "The dog that saves a child is never so satisfied with himself as the peacock that inherits feathers." Now, the weakness of pride is self-satisfaction. It is content to remain inactive and to rest on its laurels. That a Catholic should be impressed with the greatness of his Faith is natural. That he should feel proud of it is also natural. But his error lies in the fact that he believes that others are similarly impressed. He permits his pride to hamper his perceptions and his activities.

Secondly, the average Catholic is timid and fears opposition, especially since opposition has nothing but chaos, intellectual and physical, to offer. Now the informed Catholic knows that Catholicism is constructive, that the Church stands as the foremost representative of order, of order in creed, in thought, in action. Why then should he fear opposition? For opposition can only mean an attack on order and on justice. For despite periodical upheaval and chaos order is the chief law of the world. No, present-day opposition is not positive. It is of a negative quality. It consists of careful disregard of Catholic rights and Catholic credit. It is prompted by that same psychological twist which honors God by the refusal to play cards on Sunday, but will not worship him in the appointed churches; which considers beer and wine as "drinks of Babylon"; which holds dancing as the "devil's amusement," but which indulges in patent nostrums and strong-voiced gossip. Maybe it is the reaction against this spirit of "your fellow's business" that makes Catholics crawl into their shells. Too many Catholics are trying to live in the same trustful spirit of pre-Lutheran days. It is not possible, but like the Bolsheviki they are convinced by their will to believe. Catholics of this country are recruited primarily from countries and districts which have been wholly Catholic, and to be mixed helter-skelter with several dozen denominations, some of them pronouncedly intolerant of anything Catholic, alarms them unduly. They get into a panic and withdraw their feelers, instead of exposing them. They forget about the Church Militant. They are supersensitive, but do not resent interference. They lie supine, inert, and go to sleep to dream that "All's well with the world." It is a beautiful narcotic dream from which it seems pitiful to arouse them. Yet arouse them we must. Why should Catholics be afraid to mix? Their non-Catholic neighbors can do no more than bite. What of it? Bite back! If the other has fangs, we have tusks to strike back. Facts, arguments—the Catholic has a million of them, all powerful and convincing. Why not use them?

But the average Catholic fears prejudice. He fears that he will be regarded as "intolerant," and "narrow," if he voices a protest or correction. A delicious pamphlet, entitled "Prejudice," by an anonymous author, has come to my desk recently. The author scores the apologetic attitude of certain self-appointed Catholic "leaders" in his Canadian home, and recounts their genuine amazement and panic when a Catholic candidate was suggested for political office. Scurrying and apologies on the part of the "leaders," astonishment and hesitation on the part of non-Catholics. "It isn't done, you know." "Why not?" asked the Catholics. "Give us a trial." And it was done.

A certain Missouri town had been in the habit of enjoying frequent visitations by "run-away nuns," unfrocked priests, etc. Someone conceived the brilliant notion that the local K. C. council should give a banquet to which all the notables of the city would be invited. The plan was carried out. Results: a general good time, a discovery of Catholics by the non-Catholics as estimable and prominent citizens, and subsequently a ceasing of the "visitations."

Finally the average Catholic does not like to be accused of cockiness. "You Catholics," said Mr. Well-wisher, "are always carrying a chip on your shoulders." "To be sure," said Mr. Catholic thoughtfully. "Only a chip when we ought to be carrying a whole cross." Perhaps a little cockiness.

A few years ago someone started a discussion of "Second-class citizenship" which vexed us exceedingly. There was much indignation, much protest, much discussion. I forget how it started. Maybe it was AMERICA that began it. AMERICA has a penchant for provoking discussions. But the fact is that Catholics are constantly treated as "second-class" and tacitly acknowledge the treatment and condone it by their inactivity.

The results of inaction and apathy are twofold, affecting the Church and the individual Catholic. For the Church there is a general loss of prestige. For the individual there is a growing callousness and insusceptibility. After repeated inaction in the face of criticism he reaches a point where he no longer responds to the stimulus of opposition, even of a pronounced type. The shock must be very intense indeed to arouse him. There follows a general loosening of his principles until from the standpoint of practical religion he is an incubus and not an asset. This type of Catholic is responsible for the Protestant idea of Catholicism summarized so excellently in the aforementioned pamphlet on "prejudice":

> The strange truth is, that the majority of upright Protestants are fully persuaded, though they have only second-hand knowledge, that their notion of Catholic rights, demands, and grievances is the correct one, and that, in general, the Catholics themselves have a one-sided, unintelligent version of their place in the community and their constitutional share in the responsibility and management of the country.

The war has shown how untrue this assumption is. And it has furthermore given the opportunity to Catholics to press home the fact. We cannot do much to change the present, but the future is ours to shape. This shaping is as much the business of the individual as of the leaders, or of the agencies reaching a greater number at one time.

It is easy enough to outline the place of the individual in the publicity campaign. First of all, without his support the others are nil. Therefore, let him support the regular agencies, such as the press, the pulpit, and schools. Subscribe to the Catholic journals and read them, too. Secondly, preach Catholicism by practising it and be ready to speak a word in defense or offense. A Catholic life is a most powerful sermon, and better than a sermon, it is a fact. Words speak, actions shout. But do not leave the speaking to the press and pulpit, and do not transmit your opinions to Catholics alone.

The argument is for a Catholic press of influential weeklies and dailies. Without our own press we are dependent on the good-nature of others. We are, in effect, supplicants. Does a workman build efficiently with strange tools? Remember, not until we have a press capable of exerting influence on the Catholic body, can we expect its influence to extend beyond Catholic spheres. If we do not recognize our own, can we expect recognition from others? The goal of Catholic publicity is to extend Catholic influence and Catholic prestige until it occupies the position of leadership which is the Catholic birthright. It is up to the individual to help prepare the way.

Joyce Kilmer—The Man

JOHN BUNKER

WHEN early in January, 1917, I came on to New York from the West to engage in literary work, I carried with me a letter of introduction to a man whose career I had been following for several years with much interest. I knew he was a convert and I knew he was a poet, and furthermore a young poet, and his name was Joyce Kilmer. But there my knowledge of him began and ended. Friendship, however, is a peculiar thing and results in diverse ways: it may be the slow growth of years, or it may spring up almost on the instant; and after my first few meetings with Kilmer I knew there was a strong bond forming between us. It therefore came as a great pleasure to me when some few months later, after numerous meetings with him both at his home and elsewhere, he asked me to become his secretary—or rather, perhaps, for it very quickly developed into that, his literary associate. Thenceforth we worked—and played—together daily; so that I think it is no exaggeration to say that during his last year in America I was in closer and more intimate contact with him than possibly anyone else outside his immediate family.

I put forth these facts rather diffidently; but the personal note is sometimes necessary, and even valuable, and if I tell these things, it is merely to show in what position I stood to Kilmer and to give weight to what I shall have to say of him and his personality. For it will be his personality of which I shall speak and not his work; since besides the fact that it is yet too early to give him his due artistic rank, I feel from the circumstances of the case somewhat disqualified for the office of appraising his literary achievement. I was too close to him to have the proper perspective.

What, then, to speak colloquially, was Joyce Kilmer like? How did he look? How did he act? What manner of man was he? Such questions as these we are forever asking about people in whom we are interested. We hear a name, and at once we form a mental picture of the person who bears it. And particularly is this the case with respect to literary people. From his writings we always construct some sort of portrait of the writer; and most of us have passed through the disillusioning process of finding that the author in actual life seldom measures up to that idea, or ideal, of him which his book had created. To this rule Joyce Kilmer was a decided exception. Not that he was precisely the fanciful figure which his books might generate; it was simply that his was the happy case of a writer who was greater than any, or all, of his works.

When I first met Kilmer he had just passed his thirtieth year, but he gave me the impression of being somewhat older. I afterwards spoke of this to him, and it was his theory that newspaper work had served to age him. The truth was that it was due not merely to his newspaper work, but generally to the incessant and intense mental activity, the extraordinary and flaming energy, whereby he crowded into ten years the experiences of several ordinary lifetimes.

As to his physical aspect, he was stockily built and about the medium height, and his habit of body was what I should call plump, though later, under the stress of military drill, he changed somewhat in this last respect. I noted at once that he had a remarkable head—well-rounded, with broad and high forehead and a very pronounced bulge at the back, covered thickly with dark, reddish-brown hair. But his eyes were his most remarkable feature. They were of the unusual color of red, and they had a most peculiar quality which I can only inadequately suggest by saying that they literally glowed. It actually seemed as if there were a fire behind them, not a leaping and blazing fire, but a steady and unquenchable flame which appeared to suffuse the whole eye-ball with a brooding light. This characteristic was so striking that I cannot help dilating on it. And I observed later on that this glow, this brooding and somewhat somber light, never left his eyes even in his most weary or most care-free moments, so that they gave the impression of what I believe was the fact,—the impression of a brain behind them which was working intensely and perhaps even feverishly every hour of the waking day.

In manner Kilmer was apt to give strangers on their first meeting the impression of being somewhat too dignified; for so young a man, of being in fact just a trifle pompous but this was due partly to his physical appearance, and also, insofar as it had any basis in reality, to that protective instinct which quickly teaches a sensitive and imaginative spirit to cast a veil between itself and the outer world.

Beneath this wholly superficial and infrequent aspect, however, he was all bubbling good humor and frank and hearty, and even at times boisterous, fellowship. In talk his humor more often than not took the characteristic American turn of monumental exaggeration, and it was always a most amusing and delightful experience for me to watch him build up some fantastic edifice or other on a really small basis of reality.

On his intellectual side nothing struck me so forcibly as his readiness and facility—the marvelous faculty he had for composing at any time and in all sorts of circumstances. He seemed to have his brain always at instant command. I have known him to be interrupted a dozen times by importunate and not infrequently dull visitors, and yet as soon as they were gone—and he treated them all with what I sometimes considered an unnecessary degree of forbearance—he would resume the dictation of an article or an address as if nothing had intervened. Most of his work was dictated, and dictated rapidly, and most of it appeared just as he originally gave it forth. Whether in the turmoil of a newspaper office or on a train he was equally ready, and I remember a wild ride in a taxi-cab with him, on what I believe was his last night in New York, when he dictated to me a number of important documents which subsequently went forth with absolutely no change. I have known him to set forth for another city to deliver a commencement address with not a word of it written, and later would discover he had put together on his way a really brilliant piece of work. And a friend of his tells me that he wrote his "Lusitania" poem in two sittings—half of it in the morning, and then, having gone out for lunch, over which he sat chatting an hour or two with his companions, he returned and finished it in the afternoon. For him to turn out a poem or an essay or an oration seemed always a perfectly casual and effortless affair. Under the most disconcerting conditions the wheels always ran smoothly and well.

All this, however, is on the surface and rather remote perhaps from that part of a man which we denominate his character. In Kilmer's character there was one predominant quality, and beside this in the last few years of his life by the course of events a second came to take a prominent stand. The one was his spirituality, his deep sense of religion, and the other, to which he has just given the final and supreme expression, his patriotism. Of neither of these did he have much to say even in intimate talk; and yet these, particularly the first, were the profoundest part of his nature and colored his whole outlook. Not that we did not have discussion on religious matters; indeed these were many and interesting, and he was constantly surprising me by his minute knowledge of pious customs and practices of which a life-long Catholic might easily be ignorant. It was only with respect to religion as particularized in himself that he kept silent. For instance, he would never discuss the steps that led to his conversion, simply dismissing the subject by saying "I like to feel that I have always been a Catholic"; and it was only by chance that I discovered he was a daily communicant. But though he did not talk of these things, their presence is written large in all his work, and nowhere more so than in his last volume of poems.

Just what effect the war would have had on Kilmer had he been spared is of course an entirely elusive topic; but from the tone of his letters I should judge he felt the emphasis of the war on his spiritual rather than on his artistic side. In a letter to a friend, a priest, one of the last he wrote, the following pathetic paragraphs occur:

"I have written very little—two prose sketches and two poems—since I left the States, but I have a rich store of memories. Not that what I write matters—I have discovered, since some unforgettable experiences, that writing is not the tremendously important thing I once considered it. You will find me less a bookman when you next see me, and more, I hope, a man." And he ends with these touching and characteristic words: "Pray for me, my dear Father, that I may love God more and that I may be unceasingly conscious of Him—that is the greatest desire I have."

Throughout this paper I have endeavored to present a few aids towards the envisagement of the man as he was, quite simply and without grandiloquence and exaggeration. For he himself looked with disdain on anything in the nature of puffery or posturing, and I have often heard him lash out fiercely against certain prominent litérateurs who he thought indulged themselves too liberally in affectation and the facile arts of humbug. For the professional Bohemian and artistic poseur he had the most sovereign contempt, and he stood like flint against the pernicious doctrine that the artist is free of those restraints which bind the common run of men.

As may be judged from his work, Kilmer in actual life was a delightfully gay and generous spirit, impulsive, ardent, and swift to respond to the noble appeal. Intellectually and even physically he impressed one as being driven by an abounding and sleepless energy, a flaming and irresistible enthusiasm for life; so that it will be hard for his friends to realize that all that vibrant power and vitality are now at last still. But even in life there was in him, though unsuspected by most, an inner sanctuary of quiet, a serene and spiritual chamber whither he often withdrew from the noise and bustle of the world. Here he was his essential self, and it is under this aspect that I like now to think of him—not troubled, not laboring, but at peace.

The Nursing Sisters of France

BARBARA DE COURSON

IN a previous article, it was my privilege to say something of the excellent attitude of the French nuns, who, for the last four years have ministered to our fighting men, disabled by the war. The part that circumstances allotted to some of them called forth powers beyond those of mere nursing nuns. Sister Julie at Gerbéviller, Sister Gabrielle at Clermont en Argonne, the nuns of Arras and Baupaume, had to face death in order to protect their helpless charges against the enemy's violence. When the war is over, we shall probably hear that the nuns who remained in the provinces now held by the Germans did the same and we imagine that in many places the much-tried people rallied round a white cornette or a black veil with the instinct of frightened children clinging to a mother's hand. There is an element of motherhood about every nun that makes her the French soldier's confidant and friend, when maimed and helpless, he lies on a hospital bed. Quite naturally, and often without any religious motive, he prefers nuns to "dames." Their impersonal attitude gives him a feeling that the nun is there only for him, that nothing matters to her but his condition, that she is not distracted by the thought of husband and children from her daily task. To this somewhat selfish feeling is added an hereditary respect for "les bonnes Sœurs," noticeable among peasant soldiers especially. Then, it sometimes happens, that our men have been nursed in hospitals where the secular nurses were lacking in proper reserve and dignity, where they were giddy and frivolous and, said one soldier, "looking as if they had dressed up and played at being nurses." Being generally men of the people they do not always discriminate between lay women whose devotion to the maimed soldiers is simply heroic, whose high sense of duty and deep religious faith are on a level with their professional skill, and other women wearing the uniform but lacking the true spirit of the genuine nurse.

The nun's habit and training inspire the wounded men with confidence and together with their motherliness there is about nuns in general an element of youthfulness surviving middle age, combined with much practical experience in dealing with the working classes. In the hospital that I know best this is very remarkable.

This hospital has been more or less filled with wounded soldiers since October, 1914. It stands in a Paris suburb and was, before the war, the novitiate of a Congregation whose members are, in a literal sense, the servants of the poor. The Little Sisters of the Assumption were founded, some fifty years ago, for this object. Where the mother of a family is laid up, it is they who, after nursing the sick woman, wash and dress the children, sweep the room and cook the dinner.

The Congregation spread rapidly, for it filled up a social want and seemed, in some measure, to solve the much talked of social question. By bringing order, comfort and sometimes religion into the poor homes, the Sisters drive away the bitterness that breeds hatred and jealousy of those whom fortune has favored. They know their clients thoroughly and are better informed of their rights and wrongs than many theorists who have studied the subject from books only.

Owing to their past experiences they are particularly qualified to deal with men who are mostly peasants or workmen. The atmosphere of a hospital directed by nuns is singularly peaceful; in this particular one the Sisters are the directing spirits and, being certificated sick nurses, it is they who deal with the grave cases. The Red Cross ladies who work with them are their friends and helpers, but the responsibility, fatigue, and heavy work rest on the nuns. It is curious to notice how the roughest soldiers soon become gentle and docile under their rule, or rather how they fall in naturally with the spirit of the place. In a hospital where religious women form the majority of the nurses there is a groundwork of disciplined habits that it is difficult to find elsewhere and this, in itself, entails peace and order. Then, the nun's experience in dealing with their clients in the crowded suburb has taught them to avoid undue pressure and indiscreet zeal in religious matters. My personal knowledge acquired during four years enables me to speak highly of the Sisters' tact in this respect and the remark applies to nuns in general. They know more than we do of the evil influences that have been at work for more than a quarter of a century among the French working people; how the godless schools, the law in favor of divorce, the evil pamphlets and papers, added to the pressure exercised by Government under the control of French Freemasonry have contributed, slowly but surely, to destroy religious convictions and habits. Hence their prudence and pity, their wise, careful avoidance of anything resembling pressure, their feeling that every conversion should be the result of enlightened convictions, not of mere sentiment. The neophyte's instruction must, of course, be proportioned to his intellect, but in all converts, even in the most ignorant, it is necessary to build up religious practice on reasonable foundations.

Volumes might be written on the manner in which the nuns of France have tended our fighting men for the last four years. Some have done so under fire, like the heroines we mentioned in another paper, but if the part played by Sister Julie at Gerbéviller and by the Sisters of Arras, Béthune, Reims, Amiens and of many martyred towns is more brilliant, because more dangerous, the obscure work done by thousands of others is none the less worthy of praise. Their skill in nursing these terribly wounded men has done away with the prejudice that because they were nuns they were old-fashioned in their methods and opposed to the progress of modern science, but, besides caring for the soldiers' bodies, they have in other ways helped to build up a new France.

The after-war problems are complex, but there is no doubt that one of the most pressing is the religious ignorance that prevails among the people. It comes from the lack of religious instruction in the public elementary schools, whence the name of God is banished, from the impossibility of the overworked priests in large towns to supply this want and from the carelessness of parents, who are themselves too ignorant to teach what they have forgotten. It must be remembered that the expulsion of the nuns from the elementary schools is now an old story. The Sisters, who so deftly and devotedly nurse the wounded soldier back to life, are the natural instruments that God uses to awaken his hereditary faith; without preaching or scolding, their mere dress and attitude remind him of old habits of religion long set aside, of childhood's lessons long forgotten. If the man is a "born heathen"—and this sometimes happens in Paris—he is more at his ease to confess his condition to a Sister than to a secular. The Sister is, by right Divine of her vocation, the natural friend of the poor, the ignorant and the wicked. Her quiet eyes have looked on depths of iniquity without losing their childlike clearness, and the men feel that, whatever may be their condition, she will judge them leniently.

The hospital to which I refer has witnessed many wonderful cures that the surgeons and doctors attribute to the patience, skill and careful nursing of the Sisters, but it has also been the scene of illuminating conversions, brought about by their silent influence. The little chapel framed in trees, where on certain days, when the fate of France seemed trembling in the balance, prayers and cantiques rose like a strong cry to Heaven, has been the scene of innumerable Baptisms, Marriages and Confirmations; the officiating priest being a wounded soldier-priest or a militarized Bishop and the happy neophyte a blue soldier, who from negligence rather than prejudice, lived outside the Church. It is thus that the nursing Sisters of France are serving their country; they are building up the France of tomorrow by healing our soldiers' bodies and often their souls. No statistics can be drawn up of their services, and only those who witness, day after day, their quiet self-devotion realize what it implies and the far-reaching results that it has brought about among men to whom the war, in spite of its terrible suffering, will have been a blessing in disguise.

Insects as Enemies and Friends

ALBERT BIEVER, S.J.

ENTOMOLOGISTS and physicians have of late given much attention to certain groups of insects, because many of them are suspected and some have been proved to be strong factors in the transmission of diseases. The cistern mosquito, for instance, is a carrier of yellow fever; the swamp mosquito transmits malaria; the bubonic plague comes to us through the medium of infected fleas, and the house-fly spreads the germs of cholera and typhoid fever. As early as the Civil War the army surgeons began to suspect certain little midgets to be instrumental in the spread of a disease known as "pink eye:" it is well known that the African tsetse-fly is often fatal to animals. I am inclined to believe that the mourning horse-fly is more to be dreaded in the transmission of anthrax than the carrion-crow, which has been outlawed by most of the Southern states. Lice, moreover, are said to transmit the much-dreaded typhus, and bed-bugs are accused of communicating leprosy and the bubonic plague.

In the light of the present-day germ theory, all insects that sting or bite may be dangerous companions that need watching. But, just as in the mineral and vegetable kingdom, there are certain salts and plants salubrious and injurious, useful and hurtful; so in the realms of insect life we find what is helpful and what is injurious. Spiders, for example, have shown us how to build suspension bridges, and mason wasps have taught us the science of tunneling. Yellow-jackets and hornets blazed the way to the manufacture of paper from wood-pulp, whilst the lithe dragon-fly suggested the shape of the modern airplane. Some insects, too, supply us in lavish abundance with wholesome food. The bees gather for us the nectar of the flowers and manufacture it into delicious honey. Locusts are a favorite item in the bill of fare of the Bedouins, who strip them of their legs and wings, bake them and then grind them between two stones. With the meal thus obtained and mixed with honey, these wanderers of the East make a most palatable cake. St. John the Baptist lived, as we know, on honey and locusts in the desert, and even Moses did not ban all locusts from his food-code. "But of flying things whatsoever hath four feet only shall be an abomination to you" (Levit. XI:23).

The delicate red color with which the confectioner tints his candies and crimsons the sugar roses on his cakes is extracted from little insects known under the name of cochineal, and the stick-lac of commerce, from which shellac is prepared, is a resinous substance excreted by a species of the same family. Then think of the thousands of tons of wax secreted by the busy bees for the use of man! Among the ancients the use of wax was well known, for the Latins and the Greeks wrote with a stylus on wax-covered tablets; to preserve the bodies of their dead they covered them with a coating of wax; our ancestors impressed their seals upon wax tablets and used wax as an illuminant in the shape of candles; boats were caulked with wax mixed with tar, and holes in trees were filled with the same compound to arrest the progress of decay. Wax is now extensively used to polish furniture and floors, while in the manufacture of artificial flowers, fruits and models wax is the means of a wonderful art that reproduces with startling reality the life-size figures of illustrious men and women and the varied shapes and colors of fruit and flower. The silk worm, as we all know, has given rise to the important industry of silk manufacture, in which hundreds of millions of dollars are invested and hundreds of thousands of men find a lucrative occupation.

To the farmer who is not in touch with the Weather Bureau service insects have not infrequently been unerring guides. At the approach of frost, for instance, they hide themselves in the earth or retire into decaying stumps of trees. The sharp drill of the dog-day harvest-fly or lyreman proclaims the presence of midsummer; when bees rush madly home and ants hurriedly transfer their cocoons to the lower quarters of the nursery, and when the house-fly becomes impertinent and persistent, the observant husbandman prepares for a heavy shower or a sudden storm. Many insects, moreover, are untiring scavengers of the air which we breathe and of the soil on which we live.

The Argentine ants, introduced along the avenues of commerce into the Southern States, have waged a war of extermination on chinches in the homes of the untidy and have rid our parks and lawns of the pest of irritating red bugs, and they may yet render a substantial service to the cotton planter in his warfare against the boll-weevil, for there is still some hope that these rapacious and restless marauders imported from South America may in the course of time learn how to pierce the cotton squares and drag out the boll-weevil larvæ and add them to their winter stores. They destroy all termites in territories invaded by them and are not averse to cockroach diet, either. Their services, however, it must be owned, are a very small compensation for the harm they do in other ways.

Insects' therapeutic qualities, though now discarded and ignored, were much valued by the physicians of old. But recently the heart of the world rejoiced at the announcement that wax placed over the mangled faces of poor soldiers soothed them instantly and healed them quickly. This remedy, heralded as a new discovery, was thus used as early as 1752. ("Theologie des Insectes," by Lesser, published in 1752.) We also know that corns on hands and feet can be softened and extracted by the application of wax mixed with turpentine. Even now wax is the basis of many salves and ointments. Honey, because of its soothing and healing influence, was a common remedy in lung and kidney troubles, and it affords instant relief in pain from the stings of insects. Formic acid injected by the sting of a bee or an ant, is still considered an effective remedy for rheumatism, nor have our doctors altogether discarded the good old blister-plasters made from the crushed bodies of dried blister-beetles and applied to the skin like a mustard-plaster to produce a counter-irritant. Cockroach tea is another remedy that was given as a specific in severe cases of lockjaw, and an infusion of millipedes or thousand-legged worms was used as a powerful diuretic. Grave men rubbed their bald heads with crushed bees or house-flies to conjure up a second growth of hair long vanished, and poor lepers sought a cure and relief in the external application of an infusion of red ants and table salt (Lesser's "Theologie des Insectes"). So we see that every creature, no matter how tiny, has its Providential purpose in helping man in the attainment of temporal prosperity and of his eternal destiny.

Why Do Catholics Lack "Prestige"?

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have read Mr. Richard A. Muttkowski's "Why Do Catholics Lack 'Prestige'?" with great attention and in a very respectful attitude of mind, but I must confess it puzzles me. What has Catholicism to do with the achievement in business of Mr. Schwab, Mr. Ryan, Mr. Stettinius, or perhaps the most distinguished of all, Mr. Farrell, of the Steel Corporation? These men are clever men, good citizens, and let us hope good Catholics; but the estimate in which the world holds them has nothing to do with their religion. Religion is not a measure of earthly success. The Church does not canonize people for it, though legitimate worldly success is no bar to canonization or to saint-hood without official canonization.

It is quite true that the part of the world which looks on life from a point of view not of the Faithful is frankly not interested in works of literature that teach dogmas long "outworn," that paint the realities of the spiritual life in symbols not understood of the very modern Modernist or the old-fashioned agnostic—but Dante is read by everybody who pretends to read; or, at least, he is quoted. I have known hundreds of the "moderns" who loved "The Following of Christ." If I offer a magazine an article defending the infallibility of the Pope, on the ground that he is infallible in faith and morals à propos de rien, it will be rejected; but when I offered "Everybody's St. Francis," with pictures by the greatest living illustrator, Boulet de Monvel, it was eagerly accepted. If I had ready my book on "Everybody's Saint Vincent," with illustrations by the greatest of all living illustrators, Frank Brangwyn, a half-dozen non-Catholic magazines and publishers would be ready to take it. I have been away from my own country nearly ten years, and Mr. Muttkowski may well see that as reason for my slight lack of understanding of his article, but with all apologies to him I have in my time seen no distinguished thing done by a Catholic neglected by the world because he was a Catholic. One of the best of short-story writers is Mary Synon. I do not hear Catholics speak of her, but the intelligenti outside the Church do. There is Agnes Repplier. Has she suffered in public estimation because she is a Catholic? There was "The Cardinal's Snuff-Box." There was John Boyle's statue. There is Elgar; there is John McCormack.

If Mr. Muttkowski means Catholics lack "social prestige," that in this country they are not, with perhaps four or five thousand exceptions, considered "smart," that is probably true; that Harvard is considered "smarter" than Georgetown and Yale than Notre Dame—but there is hope, Citizen Bolshevik will change all that. Catholics are, as a rule, not held to be "smart," hinc illæ lachrymæ.

When I was young and Catholic journalistic methods were more crude we tried to remedy this: "Lady Gay Spanker, daughter of the Earl of Blunderbuss has entered the Church, after some hesitation because of the refusal of the eminent Mgr. B—— to permit her to confess the sins of her husband," or: "The coiffure of Madame de X à la Sainte Claire; how evident it is that the influence of the Church is growing in Republican circles in France. It was noticed, too, that her daughter, Mademoiselle Gambella de X wore a mantle à la François d'Assisi."

We made for other kinds of prestige, too, in those days: "We record with edification that John L. Sullivan always makes the Sign of the Cross before he goes into the ring." "The stage-hands at Daly's report that Miss Cecilia Tiptoes, who leads the dance in "As You Like It," always kisses a small statue of St. Anthony before her appearance."

We know how to give ourselves prestige in these days! To be serious, the kind of prestige we need is a well-founded belief on the part of compatriots that we love God with all our hearts and our neighbors as ourselves.

Mountain Lake Park, Md. MAURICE FRANCIS EGAN.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In his article in AMERICA for August 17, under the caption, "Why Do Catholics Lack 'Prestige'?" Richard A. Muttkowski says:

> To a Catholic his creed is of paramount influence in his life. But newspaper biographies of men like Schwab, Ryan and Stettinius, carefully omit such mention, although I feel certain that they would proclaim their Masonic affinities if they possessed such.

When Mr. Muttkowski says that he "feels certain" that the newspapers would proclaim the Masonic affinities of Schwab, Ryan and Stettinius if they possessed such, he shows how little he knows of the rules of metropolitan journalism. If the United States calls a man to a post of honor and responsibility there is absolutely no news or importance attached to the fact that that man is a Catholic or a Methodist, a Mason or a Knight of Columbus. Charles M. Schwab, for instance, would be the last man in the world to proclaim his Catholicism from the housetops. Why, then, should the newspapers do it for him?

If John Smith, a prominent citizen, is given the thirty-third degree in Masonry, it is probable that the local papers in John Smith's home town will announce the fact, although they will not get unduly excited about it. If John Smith, a Catholic, makes a gift of $2,000,000 to his alma mater, say St. Francis Seminary, Loretta, Pa., the newspapers will regard that as an item of news and they will print it; print it, perhaps, on the first page, print it because it is news; because it is matter of interest to a wide number of readers.

In the published accounts of big events involving the life and progress of the Church, the daily newspapers, almost without exception, are lavish in their praise and space. This is done, not because the editor has an extraordinary affection for the Church, but rather because the trained mind of the newspaper man puts a real news value on such events and handles them accordingly.

The foregoing assertions are based on a knowledge gained during a period of twenty years of active service in various offices of metropolitan newspapers. During those twenty years I never saw a managing editor, a city editor or any executive attempt to minimize the importance of an item of Catholic news. In fact, it usually was the "other way around." Mr. Muttkowski's charge that the press "has an insidious way of relegating Catholic news to obscure pages and neglected corners" is groundless. I wonder what newspapers he reads?

Ireland's Volunteers

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In AMERICA for August 13, Mr. J. O'Neill Conroy says, among other things: "We may as well admit that, whatever her achievements in the early days of the war, Ireland is not at the present time taking her full part in the conflict." As a "Yankee," with no Irish blood to bias me, but with nearly three centuries of inherited American love of fair play, I should like to know what would be Ireland's "full part in the conflict"? It is a known fact that, up to January of this year, the Irish had given 58.1 per cent volunteers as her quota to the army. It would require five million volunteers of our United States' boys to equal that proportion of the Irish, available for military service.

By drafting the Irish, how large a number would be added to the man-power of the British forces? Any more than are at present guarding Ireland as a rebellious country? I should really like to know, for many condemn the Irish, and I fancy few Americans realize that, so far, the Irish have outstripped them by large proportions. I have twice tried to have these facts published in local papers in New England, but failed entirely.

Statistics of Catholics

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Replying to your Fall River, Massachusetts, correspondent who asks in AMERICA for August 17 as to how the 17,000,000 Catholics in the United States are divided according to birth or ancestry, let me say that no such statistics are available. We have, on several occasions, been asked to make up a table showing the number of Polish Catholics, Irish Catholics, German Catholics, Italian Catholics, etc., but we have always said that it would be impossible to gather these figures accurately.

Estimates or guesses as to the number of Catholics of any given nationality vary by the million. For example, we saw one estimate which said that there were 5,000,000 Catholics of German ancestry in this country, while another statement said there were 6,000,000 of these Catholics. One person with whom we consulted told us there were a little over 4,000,000 Polish Catholics in the United States, while another authority on the Polish question said that 3,000,000 would be about the right figure. As to the Italians, the estimates vary from two to four million.

Perhaps few of your readers realize how difficult it is to obtain data of any kind and we hope that you will allow us to use this opportunity respectfully to ask the reverend pastors and religious who are readers of AMERICA to make prompt returns on the Directory information blanks which are sent to all pastors and to all institutions and which are to be returned to the various chancery offices. There is a great deal of negligence in this matter, and Right Reverend Bishops as well as chancery officials have informed us that it is most difficult to secure returns from all parishes and institutions even after two and three requests have been sent. If the clergy and religious do not make prompt returns to the chancery offices, the reverend officials in the chanceries cannot make a satisfactory report for the diocese in question. All our information blanks are sent out, postage prepaid, and a stamped and addressed envelope is also enclosed.

First-Aid to Travelers

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The communication of J. J. D. in AMERICA for July 13 touches a point of vital interest to travelers, and everything noted in the letter has come under my personal observation, rather acutely at the cost of much inconvenience. I would suggest as a partial remedy for the difficulty which travelers experience in finding the location of Catholic churches and the hours of Mass, that members of the Holy Name Society and the Knights of Columbus wear their pins on the lapel of the coat every Sunday morning. Repeatedly I have had trouble in finding out where and when I could hear Mass in strange towns. The hotels did not have the information and only too often those whom I asked either could give me no information whatever or else misdirected me. The pin of the Holy Name Society or of the K. C. would enable one to know where to seek proper directions.

For the Belgian Soldiers

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I am a Belgian and have been in various departments of service ever since the war began. Some time ago I asked a friend of mine in the United States to send me an American Catholic paper. He subscribed for AMERICA, and its coming has been a constantly renewed pleasure. I have passed on my copy to others and they have found in it the same enjoyment as I do. It would be a source of great good if many of our Belgian soldiers could read it every week. Accordingly I have written to the editor of a Flemish paper to ask him to appeal to his readers to subscribe for AMERICA in behalf of our boys in the trenches. Would you be good enough to print a similar appeal to your readers? I will send you names and addresses to which you may send AMERICA, should you succeed in getting subscriptions for the Belgian soldiers.

The reading of your paper has the same effect on our men as the example of the English-speaking Catholics whom we meet. English-speaking Catholics, whether they be Australian, American, English or Irish, have profound convictions on matters of the Faith, they are without human respect, they pray very devoutly, and they have no reluctance whatever to let it be known that they are Catholics. Their example has done us much good. We wish to know more about our Catholic brethren in other lands. Reading AMERICA would help us to a better knowledge of those of our Faith in the United States. Our soldiers are anxious to read it. Surely there are some of your readers, and especially among the Belgians in your country, who would subscribe for their brothers in the trenches. America is heart and soul in the war and is working hard. My suggestions point out a way to give very real assistance and much pleasure.

United Effort

THE great results obtained by the agencies engaged in helping the men behind the guns are attributed to united effort. From the front-line trenches to the camps at home a chorus of approval has greeted the work done by the different organizations occupied in soldier and sailor welfare-work. All have labored together as one man. The first menace to this splendid union has come with the announcement that there are to be two separate drives for funds to finance the work of the different organizations. According to the press notices from Washington the reason given for separate drives is due to different financial-year periods. This is all the more surprising, as the fiscal-year difficulty was not mentioned at the recent meeting of the representatives of all the organizations in Washington when the Knights of Columbus put themselves on record as favoring a joint drive at such time as seemed best to the Government.

At this meeting, Dr. John R. Mott, speaking for the Y. M. C. A. and the Y. W. C. A., declared that these organizations were opposed to a joint drive, because those who supported the Y. M. C. A. and the public to whom the Y. M. C. A. looked for its support after the war were unwilling to enter a combined drive in which two of the organizations engaged in war-work were included. At another meeting of the war-work agencies a nation-wide joint drive was again discussed, and Dr. Mott was asked if there had been any change in the attitude of his organization. He answered that he could report no change.

This official protest against two drives has been entered by Bishop Hayes and Bishop Muldoon in the name of the National Catholic War Council, the body that directs all Catholic war-work in America:

> We most sincerely hope that the announcement of the divided drive does not reflect the final judgment of the Government. For unity, economy and Americanization let us have only one drive which, without doubt, would be an immense success from every viewpoint. One drive prevents any possible misinterpretation.

The Supreme Knight of the Knights of Columbus has also voiced the opinion of the Order deprecating the separate-drive proposal in a telegram to the Secretary of War:

> I earnestly trust that the rumor that you are to order two joint drives for recreation funds—one for the Catholics and Jews and the other for the Y. M. C. A. and three other agencies—is not true. This would be drawing a religious line in time of war that cannot fail to cause great criticism and disturbance throughout the country. I am sending a copy of this wire to Chairman Fosdick.

Catholic, Protestant and Jew have worked shoulder to shoulder for the welfare of our soldiers and sailors in the camps in this country and overseas. One great nation-wide drive would strengthen that cordiality and bring better financial results with less strain on the people of the country, who are asked to contribute generously to the great cause. It is a pity in these days of stress to draw religious lines, and to draw them in a manner that is unquestionably unfair to the Knights of Columbus, the Jewish Welfare Board, and the Salvation Army. For with a Liberty Loan drive in October, the Y. M. C. A. drive in November, followed by a campaign for Red Cross membership in December, there is little but the leavings assigned to the organizations that will make their appeal in January, if the arrangements for separate drives are adhered to. The Knights are already in nearly 400 war-chests throughout the country, managed by business men who have assigned the quotas to the different organizations with resultant harmony and satisfaction. Boards of Trade throughout the country are almost unanimously in favor of one joint war-chest for all activities, excepting the Red Cross, which is quite different than the others, and which should stand alone in its appeal for its special and sacred apostolate. United effort by all other agencies, strengthened and secured by a united drive for funds, is what is needed. The separate drive as now proposed is both un-American and unjust.

The President and the Provincial

NOT every American will be asked to lay down his life for his country, but there is not one among us who will not gladly give all that is in him to serve his country. To give, and to give cheerfully, is the plain duty of every American; to hold back, is the mark of a grudging patriotism, little short of constructive treason. It is, therefore, in a spirit of simple gratitude, and not with boastfulness, or any desire to assume a patriotism which is not the possession of every loyal American, that AMERICA ventures to reprint the following letter addressed by the President of the United States to the Reverend Joseph H. Rockwell, Provincial of the Maryland-New York Province of the Society of Jesus. For, however small, yet some share may be claimed by AMERICA in the work to which the President so gracefully refers:

The White House,
Washington.

My dear Father Rockwell:

May I not express the very great and sincere gratification caused me by your letter of August 4th, offering to the Government your personal allegiance, and that of the Province entrusted to your care. It is evident from your letter that you and those associated with you, are finding many and very effective ways of serving the common interest in the present crisis, and I write to say how glad I shall be to keep in mind your generous letter, in case any specific occasion should offer for availing myself of your services, either directly or indirectly.

Cordially and sincerely yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

There is but one great task before us: Through a victory beyond question to secure for ourselves and for our children a just and lasting peace. To the fulfilment of that task, every American citizen, worthy of the name, has consecrated his life and his fortunes. Grateful for the appreciation expressed by the President of the United States, the Editors of AMERICA pledge themselves to a continuation of the policy which, in the past, found "many and very effective ways of serving the common interest." They could do no less; they hope to do more.

Sublime Idealism

FROM one end of Europe to the other the United States, her President, her Secretaries of War and the Navy, her colossal shipbuilding efforts, her generosity, her military organization, her brave soldiers and her dauntless boys at sea, are receiving from high and low hearty commendation. The promise of assistance spoken more than a year ago has very rapidly, faster indeed than any one thought possible, materialized into fact, hearts that were fainting have renewed their strength, arms that were weary have grown strong once more. America has risen in her might, and with every transport that arrives in Europe, the hope of victory shines brighter and brighter. Even our enemies, who once laughed in their folly at our high resolves and counted them for empty words, are taking us seriously, and in their growing respect, are paying us, perhaps, the highest compliment of all. We have been a little intoxicated by all this laudation, and have sounded our own praises perhaps a little too fulsomely. More reticence with regard to our achievements would be more becoming. Nevertheless, it cannot be denied that it is pleasant to read compliments like that paid us recently by Lord Reading:

> Too many in the past have been inclined to think Americans materialists, whereas Americans are ready to sacrifice everything for an idea, provided the cause is noble and just.

We know this is true. Our part in the war is perhaps more altruistic than that of any nation. Channel ports, Alsace-Lorraine, "legitimate aspirations," world-empire or self-preservation, loom large in the thoughts of others, but liberty enlightening the world is our sole inspiration. To extend to all peoples the freedom which was cradled on our shores, to stifle oppression at its very source, and so to make an end of the necessity of any people seeking sanctuary among strangers, this is the motive that is gradually assuming larger proportions in the official and popular mind.

Lord Reading says that we are idealists, and so we are, but not dreamers. Our idealism is intensely practical; we have been fond of comfort, over-fond of it, but we love honor more. One and all, men and women, the old and the young, have shaken it off; we shall doubtless go back to it when the trial is over and the fight has been won, but for the present it is a thing we scorn when the world is in the crucible. We know, but we are not counting, the cost. Enthusiasm has given place to stern resolve. Our cause is pre-eminently "noble and just"; we are dominated by an idea that is sublime, we are launched on a career of universal self-sacrifice; already we are giving until it hurts, but we all know that we have only begun, we shall not stop until our purpose is accomplished and the world is made free for the poor no less than the rich, for the weak no less than the strong.

Catholic Practice and the Press

EVERY now and then Catholic readers are astonished to read in the daily paper some item dealing with the practice or teaching of their Faith that is remarkable for its inaccuracy or its falsehood. The writer as a rule is neither a bigot nor a fanatic and has no wish to give offence to any class of readers. He merely wishes to write something that he considers "good copy," and without taking the trouble to inform himself on doctrinal points that may enter into his article he succeeds in attaining the ridiculous while endeavoring to reach the sublime. Less than a month ago a Paris correspondent writing to a New York paper told how much was being done for the moral welfare of the soldiers, and very gravely mentioned the special "Mass in English that was read for the American troops." More recently announcement was made in some of our dailies that "the War Department had dispensed the forces in the field from Friday abstinence during the period of the war." On the feast of the Assumption the New York Sun, after noting that the day was a holy day of obligation, seriously informed its readers that "It was also a day on which many of the faithful visit the beaches and enter the water as a preparation for religious duties. This form of ablution is practised in many countries. It is believed that the Blessed Virgin releases many souls from Purgatory on this day besides granting favors to her clients."

The logical connection between the visit to the beach, the souls in purgatory and the Blessed Mother is rather difficult to find. If it were not for the mention of the Church of Our Lady of Solace and Coney Island that occurs in the next paragraph the Catholic reader would indeed be puzzled, and the ill-informed non-Catholic would have another newspaper argument against Catholic practice and devotions. The real point of the article is Coney Island. Any item bearing on that well-known city by the sea makes "good copy" for a New York paper. So when the feast of the Assumption comes around in the yearly calendar, as there is a pilgrimage to the church and the church is at Coney Island, the public must be informed that "thousands of Catholics are entering the water in observance of an old custom in celebration of the feast."

Some day the wielders of pens in the upper stories of newspaper row may realize the fact that there is a great deal to learn about Catholic devotion and Catholic doctrine. When that day dawns there will be some shred of accuracy in the details of a newspaper item that has to do with a holy day or a pilgrimage, and even when Coney Island is in question we shall no longer be informed "that mothers may be seen at the beach leading their children to the water while beseeching in silent prayer some special favor." In the meanwhile a penny catechism would be a most appropriate gift to the editorial sanctum of our daily papers, or else space writers might be induced to consult a pupil in the fifth grade of the near-by parochial school for a sensible explanation of Catholic practice.

"The Golden Hour"

"NEXT to the possession of our holy Faith and participation in the life of the Church," asks Brother Leo, F. S. C., in a charmingly written paper on "The Feeling for Literature" which is published in the current Catholic Mind, "where can we find for our boys and girls a more real, a more satisfying means of happiness than in the love of books?" Those fortunate children who leave school with their minds trained to discern and enjoy what is best in literature have undoubtedly received from their teachers a key of gold that will open in after years many a rich treasure house of intellectual enjoyment and make them the proud heirs of that priceless literary heritage which the world's greatest minds have bequeathed only to those favored ones who know good books and love them. But no one, of course, can fire the hearts of others with a discerning love for what is best in literature unless he himself is an enthusiastic reader of good books. Just as saints, as a rule, can teach religion most effectively, and gentlemen, politeness, none but those who have themselves acquired "the feeling for literature" can successfully impart it to their pupils.

With the object of getting our Catholic teachers to make themselves thoroughly capable of filling with an unquenchable thirst for good literature the boys and girls committed to their care, Brother Leo earnestly recommends to our Sisters the daily observance of the "Golden Hour," a highly profitable exercise which he thus describes:

> Every day reserve one hour composed preferably of sixty consecutive minutes—for reading in one of the world's great books. It may be good old Thomas à Kempis or that Saint who truly had the feeling of literature, Augustine of Hippo; it may be a lyric of Keats or a novel of Thackeray, a play of Shakespeare or an essay of Ruskin; it may be a heart-cry from Sophocles or a chuckle from Lamb. But read it, live it, enjoy it, ponder it, caress it, absorb it. And presently as the days roll into weeks you will find yourself turning to the Golden Hour and taking refuge in its depths with something of the happy anticipation and tenderness that are yours when the bell calls you to the holy places, and as the weeks cluster into months you will find new power and new beauty in every-day words and learn the way of them in written speech and relish the savor of them on the tongue, their music in the ear; and as the months fall into the procession of the years you will find your vision of life deepened and broadened and sweetened, and your philosophy of life more sympathetic and more sure; and as the years pass in serried order over your aging head you will find more of God's love and God's beauty in the work of your hands and that work itself more fruitful, more profitable, and more pleasing. From time to time little birds of rumor will perch for a fleeting second on your shoulder and whisper in your ear of difficulties you have unconsciously dissipated, of blessings you have unwittingly bestowed; of little thoughts of yours flung idly out that have taken root in aching hearts and blossomed as the rose, of tired eyes that meeting yours saw something there that kindled anew the glow of gladness and the light of God's own Face. And then, mayhap, as your wearied limbs bear you down the sunset-crimsoned hill that leads into the valley of peace, you may sing of the feeling for literature as Petrarca sang of the voice of his beloved Laura:
> Let us but hear once more that breath of day
> Sound in my ears as in my soul it sounds;
> Singing, it surely wounds
> And slays wrath and disdain; its brooding note
> Quells all things vile and dark; like frightened hounds,
> Before that liquid gold they fly away.

Blessed is the Catholic teacher of whom the foregoing beautiful passage is true. For when she at last says her Nunc Dimittis, she will surely be comforted by the reflection that every pupil whom she has taught to like good books will always find in them a safeguard in temptation, a solace in sorrow, and a perennial fountain of innocent enjoyment.

Children in Wartime

THE Bureau of Junior Membership of the Red Cross and the Educational Division of the National War Savings Committee have issued a timely warning against the exploitation of children in the drives that are made for war funds. Inculcating patriotism and service in the child mind is the aim of both committees. "Where the children of the country are concerned this aim is far more important than the material results of their service in money or supplies. The reversal of this policy would endanger the future which these children hold in their hands." In recent war-relief campaigns, schoolchildren have undertaken street speaking, collecting and selling, and while these works have originated in the commendable patriotic zeal of the youngsters or those responsible for them, the committees believe that such activities by children of school age should be discouraged. Saving and economizing for War Savings Stamps and for the Red Cross and other relief agencies will effectually teach the lesson of thrift to young America, and eliminate the danger of overstimulation that is bound to follow the policy of turning the youngsters loose on a soliciting campaign, pitting school against school or class against class.

The Government is awake to the need of safeguarding our children in these days of national strain. Weaken or injure the children of today and you cripple the citizenship of the morrow. Our selective draft findings revealed the startling fact that there was a surprisingly large degree of physical disability to measure up to the rigors of war conditions among the young men of the nation. Rejections by army surgeons in the majority of cases revealed weakness in the young man that could have been prevented by proper care in the days of his childhood. The lesson should not go unheeded. Day by day we are facing problems that rise out of the welter of war. Their complete solution lies in the future, and the future is our children's to make or mar. Our vision must be broad and far-reaching enough to secure the welfare of the children of the land. No war work is of sufficient importance to justify the injury of a single child in America.

THE PASSING OF A CATHOLIC SOLDIER-POET

"KILMER—Sergeant Joyce Kilmer, One Hundred and Sixty-Fifth Regiment, Infantry, thirty-one years old, killed in action August 1, 1918, on Ourcq, France, husband of Aline Kilmer, son of Annie Kilburn and Frederick Kilmer." In those words the papers' "roll of honor" lately recorded the passing of an American Catholic soldier-poet. The news of Sergeant Kilmer's death which reached New York August 17, brought deep sorrow to the hearts of thousands of his friends and admirers. In less than three weeks after his country entered the war he enlisted as a private in the Seventh Infantry and the following August, in the hope of reaching the battle-line sooner, he had himself transferred to the One Hundred and Sixty-Fifth Infantry, formerly the "fighting Sixty-Ninth." Some time after arriving in France he was made a sergeant in the Regimental Intelligence Section which he found, as he wrote home, "the most fascinating work possible—more thrills in it than in any other branch except possibly aviation." In a letter dated before the Allied offensive began he told his wife, Mrs. Aline Kilmer, whose charming poems have delighted AMERICA'S readers:

> If you get a cablegram soon saying I am dangerously wounded, don't worry, because our Lieutenant is just back from the hospital—he has a little touch of trench fever—and he says that when he was in the hospital he was fed strawberries and cream. But perhaps that does not sound as exciting to you as to me.

Once Marshal Foch's advance began, Sergeant Kilmer seems to have been constantly in the thick of the fighting. In the Evening Sun of August 8 a correspondent tells how a party composed of Major Donovan, Joyce Kilmer and John Kayes advanced to the edge of Coics Wood and captured a German dressed in an American uniform. In the Times for August 22 Sergeant Major Lemist Esler thus describes his comrade's heroic death:

> Being attached to the Intelligence Department, it was the duty of Kilmer to precede the battalion and discover the possible location of enemy guns and enemy units. The last time I saw him alive was on that morning, after he had crept forth alone into No Man's Land, and had come back on a brief errand into the village. He was full of enthusiasm and eager to rush back into the woods, where he and others had suddenly discovered enemy machine guns. A party of us moved out with him—the battalion slowly following. Then the commander sent forth a patrol with Kilmer in the lead to establish the exact location of the machine guns which were bunched in the woods. I lost sight of Kilmer, and a couple of hours later the battalion advanced into the woods to clear the spot of the enemy. In the course of this advance I suddenly caught sight of Kilmer lying on his stomach on a bit of sloping ground, his eyes just peering over the top of what appeared to be a natural trench. Several of us ran toward him, thinking he was alive and merely lying there with his attention fixed on the enemy. We called to him, but received no answer. Then I ran up and turned him on his back, only to find that he was dead with a bullet through his brain.

Though it is not customary to bury enlisted men along with officers, an exception was made for Sergeant Kilmer owing to the respect and admiration both officers and men had for him as a soldier. The commander of the regiment gave orders that the dead sergeant should be buried just where he fell and that his grave should be dug next to that of a brave lieutenant who had just fallen near him. Paying an enthusiastic tribute to Kilmer's character, Sergeant Esler said:

> Joyce Kilmer left an impression upon his comrades which can never be erased. On our arrival in France, he was constantly on the lookout for something to do. The front was his goal, and one could see that he would never be happy until he was right on the firing line doing his duty with the men who were in the thick of it. At first he was attached to the Regimental Adjutant's Office, doing statistical work. But he fretted under the task. He bent all his efforts toward being transferred, and he finally had himself moved to the Intelligence Department. It was in that department that he was elevated to the rank of sergeant. I was supply sergeant at the time, and Joyce Kilmer was a perfect trial to me. He would always be doing more than his orders called for—that is, getting much nearer to the enemy's positions than any officer would ever be inclined to send him. Night after night he would lie out in No Man's Land, crawling through barbed wires, in an effort to locate enemy positions and enemy guns, and tearing his clothes to shreds. On the following day he would come to me for a new uniform.

The soldier who thus devoted himself whole-heartedly to the service of his country and died a hero's death on the frontier of freedom was born in New Brunswick, N. J., December 6, 1886. He was graduated from Rutgers College in 1904 and received his A.B. from Columbia in 1906. After teaching Latin at the Morristown high school, he joined the staff of the "Standard Dictionary" and subsequently became literary editor of the Churchman. In 1913, along with his wife, Aline Murray, whom he had married five years before, he became a Catholic and from that period until he entered the army, Sergeant Kilmer was a very active literary worker, being a member of the New York Times Sunday magazine staff, editor of the Literary Digest's poetry department, contributor to many periodicals and the author of several books. He had been president of the Dickens Fellowship Club and was a member of the Poetry Society of America, the Authors' Club, the Vagabonds, etc. During the year prior to our entrance into the war Sergeant Kilmer taught the technique of verse in the New York University School of Journalism, and enjoyed a wide vogue as a lecturer on literary subjects.

Sergeant Kilmer's first book, "Summer of Love" (Long out of print), a little volume of poetry, appeared in 1911, "Trees and Other Poems" (Doran), reviewed by Father James J. Daly, S.J., in AMERICA for November 7, 1914, however, was what made the discerning realize that we had in the author a man with the Wordsworthian gift of transfiguring in his poems the every-day objects of modern life. His verse was described as "simple and direct, yet not without subtle magic; it seems to be artlessly naive, yet it possesses deep undercurrents of masculine and forceful thought; it is ethical in its seriousness, and yet as playful and light-hearted as sunlight and shadows under summer oaks." Sergeant Kilmer's next book was "The Circus and Other Essays" (Gomme), favorably reviewed in AMERICA for December 30, 1916, and it was followed by "Main Street and Other Poems" (Doran), a volume which the author's admirers found quite equal to "Trees." It was noticed in our issue for November 3, 1917. "Literature in the Making" (Harper), reviewed in the May 26, 1917, AMERICA, is a collection of interviews with contemporary authors. After he had enlisted, Sergeant Kilmer's admirable anthology of Catholic poets "Dreams and Images" (Boni & Liveright) came out. It was appraised in our March 9 issue, last spring.

The subject of this sketch has also contributed several excellent literary papers to AMERICA: "The Bear That Walks Like a Man" (November 20, 1915), "Rabindranath Tagore" (July 17, 1915) and "Suppose Dickens Returned" (October 21, 1916). In that last-mentioned number, under the pen-name "Sinclair Barry," he also made a strong plea for Catholic colleges in an article entitled "The Education of Boys." Sergeant Kilmer is reported to have had in preparation a soldier-journalist's description of his days with the Sixty-Ninth, but he subsequently abandoned the project in the hope of writing later a more serious and enduring work portraying the American soldier's soul under the stress of war. Sergeant Kilmer's unpublished literary remains, it is said, are to be gathered together soon. Let us hope that among them will be found some chapters from the last work he planned.

The tributes paid by the press to the memory of the dead soldier-poet are remarkably heart-felt and enthusiastic. The New York Sun in an editorial headed "Joyce Kilmer" that appeared August 20 observed:

> Those familiar with Kilmer's work were not surprised to learn that he took the first opportunity to get to France after his country went to war. He was much the crusader, in poetry, in prose, in life itself. But this was not the whole of him, nor the part of him that will be most tenderly remembered. The grace and music of his lyrics, particularly the briefer ones in his volume "Trees and Other Poems," bespeak a mind as sensitive to beauty as it was to the wrongs to which he gave battle.
> American poetry has lost a pleasing and distinctive voice. Not many writing today had the delicacy of fancy and expression that was everywhere present in Kilmer's poems. At a time when much of contemporary verse is so blatant and "virile," this delicacy and the nice reticence that is at once good taste and good art invested his poems with a rare charm.

The Brooklyn Eagle for August 19 remarked that: "America has a thousand verse-writers, few poets. Joyce Kilmer was one of the few. If his lyre is silent he has become an inspiration immensely valuable in an age that needs it sadly." In the Eagle's opinion he has left to his wife and four children "a memory the nation will keep green."

Nor have fine poetical testimonies to Sergeant Kilmer's worth been wanting. In the New York Times of August 19 appeared this sonnet by Joseph Bernard Rethy:

He loved the songs of nature and of art;
  He heard enchanting voices everywhere;
  The sight of trees against the sunlit air,
And fields of flowers, filled with joy his heart.
He knew the romance of the busy mart,
  The magic of Manhattan's throbbing life,
  And sensed the glory of the poor man's strife,
And humbly walked with Jesus Christ apart.
All kindly things were brother to his soul;
  Evil he scorned and hated every wrong;
    Gentle—another's wounds oft wounded him.
But when his country called the freedmen's roll,
  Forthwith he laid aside some wondrous song,
    And joined in Flanders God's own Cherubim.

and in the August Bookman, Mr. John Bunker who contributes the paper on "Joyce Kilmer—The Man" to this number of AMERICA, has the following stanzas "On Bidding Farewell to a Poet Gone to the Wars," the poet in question being none other than Sergeant Kilmer:

You didn't pose, self-conscious of your lot,
  Or speak of what might be or might have been;
You always thought heroics simply rot,
  And so you merely wore your old-time grin.

Whether you had a vision in your eyes,
  Or bore a splendid dream within your heart,
I couldn't tell; such things come with surprise
  And cannot be forecast by any art.

Of those high secrets I can say no word,
  Nor why on this grim business you were bent;
What dreams, what visions in your bosom stirred
  Will doubtless be made clear by the event.

I know but this, that 'mid the manifold din
  Of breaking camp we said good-by, we two,
And you looked at me with your old-time grin,—
  And that is all I can report of you.

In Sergeant Kilmer's "Main Street and Other Poems," there is a ringing lyric called "The Proud Poet," which admirably describes the high company to which the subject of our paper now belongs forever. His answer to a "devil" who tempted him to give over writing poetry was:

When you say of the making of ballads and songs that it is woman's work,
  You forget all the fighting poets that have been in every land.
There was Byron who left all his lady-loves to fight against the Turk,
  And David, the Singing King of the Jews, who was born with a sword in his hand.
It was yesterday that Rupert Brooke went out to the Wars and died,
  And Sir Philip Sidney's lyric voice was as sweet as his arm was strong;
And Sir Walter Raleigh met the axe as a lover meets his bride,
  Because he carried in his soul the courage of his song.

And in his "Apology," in the same volume, the poet practically tells us why he laid down his pen, bade his wife and little ones farewell, and, though he could easily have secured an officer's commission, preferred to carry a rifle in the ranks of the Sixty-Ninth and fight valiantly there to make the world a safe place to live in.

Happily, we have in the September Scribner's another beautiful and remarkably characteristic poem by Sergeant Kilmer. The lines, which are entitled "Rouge Bouquet," were inspired, it is clear, by what he saw and experienced at the front. The stanzas admirably portray the stanch Catholic soul of this brave soldier-poet and now that their lamented author has heroically given his life for his country, they read like his own devout and courageous "Farewell!" to all who knew and loved him:

In a wood they call the Rouge Bouquet
There is a new-made grave today,
Built by never a spade nor pick
Yet covered with earth, ten meters thick.
There lie many fighting men,
  Dead in their youthful prime,
Never to laugh nor love again
  Nor taste the summertime.
For death came flying through the air
And stopped his flight at the dugout stair,
Touched his prey and left them there,
  Clay to clay.
He hid their bodies stealthily
In the soil of the land they fought to free
  And fled away.
Now over the grave abrupt and clear
  Three volleys ring;
And perhaps their brave young spirits hear
  The bugle sing:
"Go to sleep!
Go to sleep!
Slumber well where the shell screamed and fell.
Let your rifles rest on the muddy floor,
You will not need them any more.
Danger's past;
Now at last,

Go to sleep!"

There is on earth no worthier grave
To hold the bodies of the brave
Than this place of pain and pride
Where they nobly fought and nobly died.
Never fear but in the skies
Saints and angels stand
Smiling with their holy eyes
  On this new-come band.
St. Michael's sword darts through the air
And touches the aureole on his hair
And he sees them stand saluting there,
  His stalwart sons;
And Patrick, Brigid, Columkill
Rejoice that in veins of warriors still
  The Gael's blood runs.
And up to Heaven's doorway floats,
  From the wood called Rouge Bouquet,
A delicate cloud of buglenotes
  That softly say:
"Farewell!
Farewell!
Comrades true, born anew, peace to you!
Your souls shall be where the heroes are
And your memory shine like the morning-star.
Brave and dear,
Shield us here.
Farewell!"

TO SERGEANT JOYCE KILMER

Dead on the Field of Honor

Tho' it were the mouth of hell,
Honor's field was where you fell.
Bayard and Loyola, too,
More than kinship had in you
Who without reproach or fear,
Laid aside your singing-gear,
And full eagerly did go
Khaki-clad to face the foe,
Seeking with insistent grace,
Like your Lord, the lowest place,
And wherever danger shone,
Claiming that post for your own.
To the honors that you wore
Sword or bars could add no more,
For your brow the only crown
Was the wound that smote you down,
With your still undaunted face
Foe-wards turned in duty's place.
For that your head low doth lie
Many heads are carried high,
Many hearts exultant thrill
For that your heart lies so still,
Your heart that was all dedicate
To God, your lady and the great
And secret lore that lies
Outspread to saints' and poets' eyes.

REVIEWS

Illinois Catholic Historical Review, July, 1918. Chicago: Illinois Catholic Historical Society. $0.50.

This is the first number of the quarterly published by the Illinois Catholic Historical Society, which was organized in Chicago last February. It is a most creditable production and shows what can be done for the preservation of our Catholic records when the work is undertaken in a practical, up-to-date manner. The centennial of the admission of the State of Illinois into the Union is being commemorated this year and appropriately the first issue of this Review is largely devoted to a chronicle of the important part Catholics took in the early settlements on which the later prosperity of this great State is founded. The editor, Mr. Joseph J. Thompson, writes of "The Illinois Missions" and "Illinois' First Citizen—Pierre Gibaut"; the Rev. Gilbert J. Garraghan, S.J., tells of "Early Catholicity in Chicago"; the Rev. Frederick Beuckman of "Civil and Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction in Illinois"; the Rev. J. B. Culemans of "The Illinois Historical Collections." Catherine Schaefer has compiled a useful "Chronology of Missions and Churches in Illinois"; Kate Meade, "A Calendar of Historical Dates and Events," and Clarence W. Alvord, "The Sources of Catholic History in Illinois." There are a number of other minor contributions filling the 143 attractively printed pages. The "critical" historian can find no fault with the manner in which the writers present their topics. The material they have collected insures the proper place in the roll of fame during the Illinois celebration for Marquette, Allouez, Gravier and the other Jesuit missionaries and the Catholic pioneers. The older Catholic historical societies of the East will have to look to their laurels. This first effort of the newest organization sets a standard that will require extra diligence in competition. The initial number of the Illinois Review is certainly a splendid augury for awakened zeal for the safeguarding of Catholic historical records that the few veteran workers in this field have so long and so ardently hoped for.

A Short History of France: From Cæsar's Invasion to the Battle of Waterloo. By MARY DUCLAUX (A. Mary F. Robinson.) With Maps. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50.

The author of this volume remarks that in writing it she had in view "neither schoolboys nor historians," but the "class of cultivated and ignorant men and women," to which she herself belongs. "I have tried above all for unity," she writes, "and to give a complete impression. . . . So far as it goes, I hope it is accurate." On the whole Madame Duclaux has succeeded pretty well in attaining her object, for she has a striking way of putting things, emphasizes what is most picturesque in France's history, and gives the Church due credit, as a rule, for its civilizing and uplifting influence. Writing of feudal society, for instance, the author well remarks:

> Fortunately in face of these feudal barons the Church existed. And the Church was mindful of the poor. In the last years of the tenth century she obtained from the military nobles the constitution of a "Truce of God." . . . The Church had done much for the defenseless; priests, pilgrims, monks and nuns, children, laboring people were no longer exposed to unending ravage. The serf was safe who laid his hands on the stilt of his plough—the plough, like the altar, was a sanctuary. And the Church did more than this. By the institution of chivalry, a new soul was breathed into the still barbaric body of feudal society.

But when the author asserts that "the insidious dissolving element of saintly enthusiasm was doubtless one cause of the final undoing of the Roman Empire," the penetration that the preceding quotation displays seems to desert her. For it was Rome's inner corruption, of course, that was the chief cause of her fall, and Catholicism, particularly as it lived and energized in the early Saints and Martyrs, was the one leaven which preserved whatever elements in Roman civilization that were worth keeping. Like most "popular" histories that are also "short," Madame Duclaux's book suffers considerably from the necessity the author lies under of painting scenes with broad strokes and omitting illuminating details. The best chapters of the volume are the later ones, those describing the fall of Louis XVI, the Revolution, the Napoleonic era, etc., for they are filled with vivid pen-pictures which give the reader a good idea of those turbulent times.

W. D.

Handbook of Moral Theology. By ANTONY KOCH, D.D. Adapted and edited by ARTHUR PREUSS. Vol. I. St. Louis: B. Herder Book Co. $1.50.

A Commentary on the New Code of Canon Law. Vol. I. By Rev. P. CHAS. AUGUSTINE, O.S.B., D.D. St. Louis: B. Herder Book Co. $1.25.

The Laws of Marriage. By JOSEPH M. O'HARA. Philadelphia: Peter Reilly. $0.50.

The first of these books begins a five-volume series, which, when completed, will cover the entire field of moral theology. The learned author ably treats, in the present volume, the definition, scope, object, sources, methods, history and literature of moral theology. The introduction, containing the history and literature of moral theology, is particularly interesting, while the topics under discussion in the second division are treated in so clear and simple a manner as to be intelligible even to the layman unused to the technical phrases of the schoolmen. Throughout the book is generously annotated with references to more diffuse authorities on the subjects under consideration, and citations from the works of the doctors and ascetic writers of the Church are very numerous.

The author of the second book named above is a former professor of Canon Law at the Benedictine University in Rome, and here offers to those interested in the study of ecclesiastical law a scholarly commentary on the New Code, as brief as the subject will permit. The first part of this initial volume contains the history of the sources and literature of Canon Law, embracing the early, the spurious, the medieval and the post-Tridentine sources. In the second part are contained the commentaries and texts from Canon One to Canon Eighty-six. The Canon itself is first cited, followed by a verbal or at least substantially faithful translation in English. Then follows the commentary itself, interpreting the sense and meaning of the Canon in a clear, concise manner.

Father O'Hara's plain and simple explanation of the laws of marriage according to the New Code should receive a warm welcome from all those who are anxious to have a correct knowledge of the teachings of the Church concerning Matrimony and of what she requires of all who enter this holy state. The little book should also prove of interest to those not of the Faith who are desirous of learning what the Catholic Church holds on this important subject. S. J. R.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

"Christ's Life in Pictures" (Extension Press, $1.50), by George A. Keith, S.J., is literally what it professes to be. It carries one from the inception to the completion of Our Lord's life on earth, from Our Lady's espousal to the descent of the Holy Ghost, and all without words, except the Scriptural titles which give the key to the pictures. Father Keith has searched the art-treasures of all countries and assembled the very best from the galleries of the world, and his selection commends itself both for its artistic sureness and especially because it has sought in every instance that subtle spiritual atmosphere that speaks not only of the Child of Mary but also, and principally, of the Son of God. The book has the distinguished commendation of our three Cardinals, but even apart from their words of praise, it is its own best recommendation.

"Minninglen" (Appleton, $1.50), by Agnes and Egerton Castle, is a story whose scene is laid mainly in Scotland, and which is permeated through and through with the rugged spirit of the highlands. Although the plot is not quite convincing, the development is both careful and clever, and the expression is as felicitous as anything these gifted authors have done. The war, as is the vogue nowadays, straightens out the entanglements, and two great hearts find happiness through tears.——The author of "The Little Girl Who Couldn't-Get-Over-It" (Dutton, $1.50), Alfred Scott Barry, is equipped with a rich imagination—which, however, is not yet sufficiently discriminative—and possesses, moreover, the ability to portray sympathetically his leading characters. He has given a somewhat romantic setting to a discussion of the world-old question: What is the secret of happiness? In the solution which his heroine, "The Princess," discovers, the life of the supernatural with its sublime motives and its inexhaustible power to satisfy the highest aspirations of the soul, is distressingly absent. Whether the answer, viewed merely from the standpoint of a national religion, and making due allowance for the inadequacy that the limitations of a novel almost inevitably entail, will commend itself to many readers, it is hard to say. ——To listen to Theodore Dreiser tell the eleven tales which make up "Free, and Other Stories" (Boni & Liveright, $1.50), is like listening to a grimy raconteur who has a bad cold in his head. Sneezes and similar explosions, from time to time, thicken the utterance, and one does not catch what the story is about.

For students undertaking an intimate study of Greek grammar, there is no text-book, in the writer's opinion, more serviceable than H. W. Smyth's "Greek Grammar for Schools and Colleges" (American Book Co., $1.50). The introductory chapter, on fundamentals, is particularly thorough, and the syntax is arranged with more than usual clearness and completeness. There are few, if any, queries occurring to a student for which he may not find an answer here; and this is more than can be said for most other grammars. The format of the book is also an improvement on many now in use. But for students who desire a working knowledge of Greek grammar and no more, a text-book is still lacking. We look for a writer who will have the courage to dispense with philological processes and present in succinct form the essential facts and forms of Greek, as is done for Latin and the modern languages. Such a text-book will not supersede Smyth's "Greek Grammar," but will fill a place that Smyth's work fails to fill.——An ultra-modern edition of an ancient text is "Caesar's Commentaries. The Gaelic War Books I-IV, with Selections from Books V-VII, and from the Civil War" (Allyn & Bacon, $1.50), edited by Francis W. Kelsey, of the University of Michigan. Caesar's sieges and methods of warfare are compared in a very interesting introduction to modern ones in the world-war. The book is bulky and will lead to the temptation on the boys' part to leave it behind in school, unless it be the only Latin book to be used, in which case it has advantages, for it contains themes, grammar, vocabulary, etc. The notes at the bottom of the page will meet with the approval of youth, though teachers may deprecate the fact that such aids are so close to hand in the students' "repetitions." The book is exhaustive in its erudition concerning Caesar's campaigns. Every teacher of Caesar ought to see it.

"There is no God. If there had been He would not have given me such a father" is the lame and impotent conclusion reached by Isabel Blake, the heroine of "Love Eternal" (Longmans, $1.50), H. Rider Haggard's latest novel. Her lover, Godfrey Knight, is a dreamy Spiritualist, and the other characters in the book do not behave, as a rule, like normal men and women. The author should go back to Africa for his themes.——No doubt there are persons who are willing to look upon Henri Barbusse's "The Inferno" (Boni & Liveright, $1.50) as a literary masterpiece and a psychological study of incalculable value. It is neither. The writer "pierces a hole in the wall of a boarding-house room, and watches what is going on in the next room." Individuals who like to pry upon privacy, and listen at key-holes, will probably be delighted with this treasure-trove, gathered by Edward J. O'Brien from M. Barbusse's muckheap.——"Marie Grubbe" (Boni & Liveright, $1.25), by Jens Peter Jacobsen, is a translation from the Danish. The translator is a person of remarkable patience and energy.——"What Men Live By" (Stratford Co., $0.25), by Leo Tolstoi, the third volume of the Stratford Universal Library, contains, besides the title-story, three other characteristic Tolstoi tales.

EDUCATION

The War and the Schools

FOUR years ago when the war swept down upon England, the schools stood out in the forefront of patriotism. In the ranks of the "First Hundred Thousand" were found men and boys from every grade in the scholastic life of the nation. There was no mistaking the patriotism of those who gave "their merry youth away for country and for God." Then came the settling-down period after Kitchener surprised the country by announcing that the war would last at least three years. A big army was needed, and men of intelligence were required to officer it. The big problem then was to get officers, as some of the best talent had been killed off in the ranks that stopped the first German onrush. It is a plain fact, in these days when the whole power of a nation is thrown into conflict, that greater good would have resulted, had the English Government discouraged the college man and the schoolboy from enlisting. President Wilson saw England's mistake, and when we were drawn into the war, he did not want America to make the same costly error, and sacrifice, unnecessarily, her brain power in the first wave of war-enthusiasm that swept over the land in April, 1917. From time to time, he has made it clear to the people that not merely service, but the best kind of service is true patriotism. We could easily fill the ranks from our colleges and high schools, but we would be guilty of needless waste in so doing, and ultimately defeat our own best interests. Writing to Secretary Lane, in support of the Bureau of Education's plan for an educational campaign during the summer and fall, President Wilson declared:

> I am pleased to know that despite the unusual burdens imposed upon our people by the war they have maintained their schools and other agencies of education so nearly at their normal efficiency. That this should be continued throughout the war and that, in so far as the Draft Law will permit, there should be no falling off in attendance in elementary schools, high schools or colleges is a matter of the very greatest importance, affecting both our strength in war and our national welfare and efficiency when the war is over. . . . I would therefore urge that the people continue to give generous support to their schools of all grades and that the schools adjust themselves as wisely as possible to the new conditions to the end that no boy or girl shall have less opportunity for education because of the war and that the nation may be strengthened as it can only be through the right education of all its people.

Clearly, this program rejects all unnecessary weakening of our educational forces.

A Newer Problem

WITH the lowering of the draft age to eighteen years, college faculties and students are anxious to know what the mind of the Government is in the matter of college education, and questions are pouring into Washington from all over the country bearing upon the selection of college students for military service. After registering under the Draft Law, how long a time will elapse before college students will be called into active military service? Will they be permitted to complete their education, if at present enrolled in universities, colleges and technical schools? Where will the colleges get their new students if the boys between eighteen and nineteen are called to the colors? It is a matter that affects not only the college boy and his parents, but it also very seriously concerns every educational institution in the land that has not a permanent endowment. There is under consideration at the War Department, a plan to meet the situation of the schools in the present national crisis. Its details as yet have not been made public. What has been decided definitely is the establishment of the Students' Army Training Corps.

The Bureau of Education in announcing the plan of the Students' Army Training Corps calls attention to the need of training our young men and profiting from the experience of France and England. All who possibly can must be encouraged, even at a sacrifice in these days of sacrifices, to attend college or university so that the nation may have a body of trained leaders and specialists who both during and after the war, may meet the country's needs. "If we send all our young men to France, we cripple our future, for the young men of today have to guide the destinies of our country in the strenuous fight for commercial development that will follow the war. Moreover the Administration realizes the value of college trained men for officers. More than eighty per cent of officers today are college men and the colleges cannot graduate men quickly enough to meet the Government's demand for officers."

The Training Corps

BRIEFLY the plan of the Students' Army Training Corps means:

> A student enlisted in the Students' Army Training Corps is in military service of the United States. Because he does not receive pay he is classed as on inactive service, but in a national emergency the President may call him at any time to active service. He is called to active service each summer when he attends camp for six weeks and receives the pay of a private. Any student so enlisted, though in the military service of the United States, is technically on inactive duty, and therefore must register after he has reached draft age and upon notice by the President. Upon stating in his questionnaire that he is already in the military service of the United States, he will be placed automatically by his local draft board in class 5-B, as provided by the Selective Service regulations. The draft board will not call him for induction so long as he remains a member of the Students' Army Training Corps.

The Catholic colleges of the country, whose patriotism is manifest by the large percentage of graduates and old students in the fighting forces of the United States, have been prompt to cooperate with the Government plan in establishing the Students' Army Training Corps.

A Practical Example

GEORGETOWN UNIVERSITY, for instance, has notified its alumni and friends of the detailed schedule of the military department to be followed during the scholastic year that is approaching. The courses in the military department are open to the students of all departments of the University, and include military science and tactics under the direction of a regular army officer, navigation under the Director of the Georgetown University Astronomical Observatory, fundamentals of aviation, radio-telegraphy, the mathematics of artillery and military French. The course in navigation was attended by eighty officers and enlisted men of the United States navy during the year just past. In a telegram to the President of the University, dated August 12, the Adjutant-General of the army in authorizing the formation of the Training Corps at Georgetown made the following provisions:

> If the student fails to improve his college opportunities he may be dismissed from college by action of the college authorities and discharged from military service by the military authorities. He would then be subject to the operation of the draft. But if he meets the college and military requirements, it is agreed that, when the day arrives on which, according to his order number he would have been drafted had he not already volunteered, this fact is reported to the President of the College and to the Commanding Officer at the College. The President of the College and the Commanding Officer will then report to the Committee on Education and Special Training of the War Department for what form of military service the individual in their judgment is best qualified. They will recommend either the student should continue his studies to prepare for work in medicine, engineering, chemistry, psychology, economics, etc., or that he should go at once to an officers' training camp to prepare for an officer's commission in infantry, artillery, etc., or that he should be assigned to work in the ordnance, quartermaster or other Staff Corps or sent immediately to a division at one of the camps. Colonel

Rees, Commander of the entire Students Corps, has authority to dispose his men in the way best suited to meet the emergencies of the military and national situation at the time.

It is further proposed to add other courses as conditions may demand.

Practical Patriotism

TO all young men over eighteen the War Department says: "Enter college if you are fitted to do so, or return to college if you are already enrolled, and there enlist in the Students' Army Training Corps." Georgetown University by virtue of the authority of the Adjutant General calls on all students of the department of arts and sciences to return to college. Regularly matriculated medical and dental students are called in due order by the Surgeon-General, inducted into the Medical and Dental Reserve Corps and allowed to finish their education. Later they will be transferred to the S. A. T. C.

Until the new Draft Law is on the statute books, it is impossible to surmise how the college boy of eighteen will be affected in the details of his college life. How long he will be permitted to continue at college, whether he will be withdrawn after one year, or whether a certain student quota will be called into service every half-term, or every quarter-term, will depend on developments in the military situation. If students are withdrawn by the War Department, their places will be taken by boys of eighteen selected from the various National Army detachments, and the Government will contract with the colleges for subsistence and tuition, according to the present plan. Congress will have to settle many questions arising from the new Draft Law, and its application to the boy in college. In the meantime it is the patriotic duty of every college student to return to college and follow the directions of the faculty and the War Department, and for every high-school graduate to matriculate for college, with a view to entering the Students' Army Training Corps.

ECONOMICS

A Problem in Industry

THE first, the immediate economic result of the machine has been the displacement of man. Without questioning the truth that the machine can do huge work which the man cannot do, the proposition holds for the general industry of the world that the machine does the work of man. The best recommendation for a machine may be that it can do the work of five or ten or fifteen men. The displacement of man is an inevitable consequence of the activity of the machine.

There are going to be more and more machines. Each one is to have its inevitable consequence. To avert this we should have to suppress the machine. But the machine is here to stay. It is irremovable. It has created a vital social need for its existence. To suppress the machine would mean quick starvation for half the human race.

The Vanished "Craftsman"

THERE has been a sequel to the invasion of the machine. The sequel is the disappearance of the craftsman of sixty years ago. The "trade" as it was once known has become a rare thing. After the passing of three generations, the skilled artisan who used to "make things" is hard to find. His grandson or his great-grandson tends a machine, watches a machine. A machine has always been a costly thing. Consequently, from the start, the effective machine became the property of the man who had the money. Perhaps he had been a prosperous craftsman himself. Perhaps he had not. The machine enabled him to make things though he knew nothing about the trade. Men ceased to learn trades; and as they could not own machines, they ran machines or fed machines for the owners.

He whose grandfather could become an independent craftsman had to submit his genius to a schedule. He was put on a wage that was fixed by other men. They decided in January what was to be his income for December. He was cut off from the possibility of building up a business. To live, he had to stand beside the machine. The machine was not his. He had no prospect of getting one like it. The machine represented the money of the owner. His interest was what remained to him after deducting taxes and insurance, the cost of material and marketing and upkeep, and the wage of the man. If the demand for goods fell off, or the price of material advanced, the only way to secure the interest was to make a cut in the wage. As machines multiplied so did the cases of this economy in operation. But it met all along with an antagonism inseparable from humanity. The antagonism lay in this that human nature calls for at least the opportunity of development. Man needs hope. The life at the machine seemed to cut out opportunity.

For example: The youth of eighteen took his place in the factory. At twenty-five, in normal conditions, it was time for him to think of marrying and founding a home. He did so. His needs began to grow. His expenses were greater every year. He soon reached the limit of his wage as fixed by the "system" of the factory. He might economize in the home, so as to keep his boy at school. Or he might make this reduction on the boy's schooling by sending him out to earn a little to help tide over the winter. He had no contract with the market whether to buy or sell, whether for the cost of material used or for the price of the things which the machine produced. He might be told that the market was dull and that there must be a cut in the wage to keep the machine going at all. He could not rise out of his condition of simple guardian of the machine. He began to contrast his fixed condition with that of the days when a man had a full trade and his own tools, and could go out and seek his own market. Where was opportunity? To stay where he was meant to adopt the fixed status. Should he leave? He was past the time when he might begin life over again in pursuits where there were at least avenues to advancement. The road to advancement was closed. The factory was built across it.

Growth of Antagonism

IN the example, we are putting our finger upon the starting point of the wage-earner's unrest. There are those who tell us that "there is always room at the top." Let them go into the factory and see how many "tops" there are. They give us the names of illustrious men who "began at the bottom." If these illustrious personages began as youths in the factory, they did not stay there long. Multiplying the typical case we may cease to wonder that the man tied to a machine by a wage should hearken to those who spoke of being class-conscious. He was conscious of the fixed condition of his toil which had no relieving features. The tendency of progress was to increase the strain. Where a given work could not be done by one machine, the problem was set to the designer of tools and mechanisms to find out how that work might be done by two or five or ten machines. We have seen how the process in the making of nearly everything has been divided and sub-divided, each separate simple component being committed to a separate machine. The scope of a man's genius was thus limited to obedient waiting on the simple movement of one machine in a set. Each machine in the set was a costly thing, a patented thing. To manufacture, it was necessary to have them all and to have a building to hold them. Less and less skill being needed for manufacture, the factories multiplied. Competition between factories became acute. Factories combined to avoid "cutting one another's throat." A wage condition for fractional work of no educational value became more fixed.

Now, all along, whilst this condition was growing, the antagonism was spreading. By reason of comradeship it was deepening, becoming more intense. The antagonism organized. There was a magic rise of "unions" as we know them, springing up as stars of hope upon a darkening horizon. These unions were not as the gilds of the master-craftsmen of the Middle Ages. The men of the gilds had power in their skill, and could not be replaced in a day or a year. They fixed prices according to the need of living, with a suitable provision for age and illness and the growth of the family and the rainy day. They were artists in the plainest trades. We still look with wonder at the product of their skill which has stood for five, six, seven centuries and more. Professional artistic designers of today study their handwork, and copy patterns which in those old days were executed in metal and wood and stone by the local artisans of the little towns.

"Industrial War"

BUT what could our new unions do? The men were without skill. They were without money and hence without equipment, material and machines. So what could they do? They proposed to stand as one body under the wage in an effort first to keep it from being put down, and secondly, to push it up where there might be pressing need or even a prospect of raising it. When arguments failed and demands were refused, there was but one resource, the strike. This means that the machine is deserted, contracts are delayed, the man goes idle and his wages stop. There are conferences. If at length the wages are raised the system, as a system, remains. In the meantime unions formed in every kind of service. Unions combined for the sympathetic strike to stir the community. When it is settled, the system remains. The outcome has been called industrial war.

We are not condemning the man who invents a machine nor the man who invests his money in a set of machines. We are looking at a single factor in an established system of operating the machine. There are wages and wages. Every payment for service has the character of a wage: the discount of the banker, the profit of the shop-keeper, the commission of the broker. Even the fee for professional advice is in recognition of the years of labor that made the service possible. But in the wage of the servant of the machine there is something different from every other wage. The boy who carries water to the gang has a chance. He can observe and think and plan. The boy who drives the grocery wagon can study human nature. Amid the wheels of the metropolis and the many scoldings he has a training in initiative. The boy who goes into a factory to stand beside a machine must be as any cog or belt that obeys the piston and the driving wheel. He becomes a section in a huge tool, a section provided without outlay and renewed without cost. His advancement has an absolute limit and he reaches that limit at the moment when life's needs and responsibilities enter on a period of accumulation. If the cases were few and scattered they could be dealt with singly. But being counted by millions and being resolved into a system that is taken as part of a fixed basis for the agreements that govern the commerce of the world they make a social problem. It is the root problem of industrial opportunity. The solution of it would mean the loosening up of a thousand entanglements.

Two Economics

THERE are two economics. In the one that has been built up with the progress of the machine, man is taken very widely as a mechanical factor. In the true economy man is a moral, intelligent, progressive being. The repression involved in the new economy is something that cannot last. We have seen the reaction of human nature. "Nil violentum durum." This is a very old principle. It means that "Nothing violent is lasting," that a strain cannot be permanent. This principle is invoked in all physical science, in medical science, in ethics, in theology, in the spiritual life of the Saints. The condition of which we are speaking is one that does violence to human aspirations in civilized society. What is to be the character of the release? Socialism? Profit sharing? Minimum wage? Cooperation?

NOTE AND COMMENT

The Fourth Liberty Loan

ON September 28 the Fourth Liberty Loan campaign will begin and no American who realizes the increased interest in Government bonds with each succeeding campaign can doubt of its success. The first issue was for $2,000,000,000 and brought an oversubscription of over fifty per cent. Nine million subscribers answered the second call of the Government with an oversubscription of fifty-four per cent. Labor and fraternal organizations, and the fighting forces of the nation, subscribed largely to this loan, and the women of the country did much to further its success. Seventeen million people subscribed to the Third Liberty Loan, which totaled $4,170,019,650. It was more widely distributed among the people than the previous loans and the country districts made up their quotas more rapidly than the cities. A little more than a year ago there were 300,000 Government bondholders, while today there are between 20,000,000 and 25,000,000. The effect of the Loan campaigns has been to cultivate the saving habit in the people at home and to make them realize that their savings are contributing to the winning of the war as really as guns and men in the first-line trenches.

Religious Conditions in Filipino Schools

THE following extract is taken from an article by a student in one of our Filipino State schools, which originally appeared in the Philippine Free Press of Manila. It is the testimony of one who has lost sympathy not merely with the methods of the Catholic Spanish schools, but with the Faith of his forefathers. It is therefore open to no suspicion of any prejudice, except against the Church itself. He writes:

Possibly the most interesting phase in the development of the Filipino student under the new conditions brought about by the American advent, is found in his religious life. The religion of the English-speaking students of Manila might almost be termed "multitudinous as the sands," and sometimes it is a queer conglomeration of a number of ill-assorted dogmas and creeds. Catholicism, Protestantism, atheism, agnosticism, and several other "isms" jostle each other, now one and now the other dictating belief and action. If at the start the student was a rigid and orthodox Catholic, then he is so no longer. For with his knowledge gained in physics, metaphysics, biology, philosophy and what not; and by reading Darwin, Huxley, Schopenhauer, Nietzche, Kant, Haeckel and Leibnitz and others of that class, his immature mind is left in a whirling chaos of uncertainty and agnosticism or "know-nothingism." He no longer has faith in the simple doctrine of his fathers and what he was taught at his mother's knee, and he looks on priests and preachers as so many impostors, either blind and benevolent or knowing and hypocritical. That such a condition should exist in the student's mind is lamentable, especially that he should lose faith in what his parents believe, for he is apt to look down upon them and disregard all their teachings, thus bringing about a loosening of the bonds of parental authority. He may even mock at their efforts to guide him. Analyzing this state of irreligion or no-religion, it would seem that the student who has lost his early faith becomes not only a free-thinker, but even something of a nihilist. Constantly he is besieged by doubts and skepticism and mysteries, and his mind too often revolves in a maelstrom of gloomy materialism, in which it appears that might and not right, a blank, unreasoning force, governs the world.

However, if the student has been studying at the Silliman Institute or some other Protestant institution erected by Americans—and they are becoming fairly numerous in Manila and in the provinces—then usually he becomes a Protestant or holds Protestant views, even though born and raised a Catholic. He knows his Bible well and can recite long passages, sometimes going through his chapters and "versicles" without an error. Many such students are Biblical encyclopedias, especially if they are training for the ministry or missionary work.

If the student belongs to the public schools, such as the Normal or the Manila High School, or to the University, all the probabilities are, as already indicated, that at least he is very liberal in his religious views and, if he attends church, that it is largely as a matter of habit, because of the attraction of the crowd, or of the ritual, or of the fair sex, or perhaps of all three.

Coming now to the Spanish-speaking student we find an entirely different state of affairs. Taught by Catholic priests and with a guard kept on his studies, his reading, and even almost on his thoughts, the Spanish-speaking student may usually be counted upon to be strongly religious, at least in so far as outward observance goes. He may be looked upon as a "dyed-in-the-wool" member of the Catholic fold and as likely to cling trustingly to his creed, feeling quite satisfied and harassed by no uneasy doubts. He goes to church regularly, Confession often, and receives Holy Communion. Good examples of such students are found in the Ateneo or the Letran College, where religious duties are obligatory. Such students believe absolutely and implicitly in the existence of God, and so deeply and firmly are their religious beliefs rooted in their minds that though they mingle with Protestants, Masons, atheists, free-thinkers, and any others, they never show the slightest wavering or departure from the dogmas in which they have been trained. In this respect possibly they are much better off than those who have been robbed of their religious belief, and, if this is their conviction, they ought to give thanks to those priests, whether of Spanish or other nationalities, who have been instrumental in grounding them so thoroughly in the Faith.

Nothing needs to be added to this picture. It tells the entire story, sad and terrible as it is, of the immeasurable harm that has been inflicted by us upon the Filipino people.

The Espionage Act and the Red Cross

A DECISION rendered by Judge Evans of Chicago at the trial of Louis B. Nagler makes it clear that under the term "military and naval forces" the relief organizations working for the troops are included:

> No other conclusion would be logical in a republican form of government, like ours, with war conducted as it is today, there should and can be no refined or limited definition of the term "military or naval forces." The forces that actually fight on the battlefield and the forces that produce the food and arms and munitions at home, are so related and interdependent that it is impossible to say one belongs to the military forces and the other does not.

The defendant had attacked the Y. M. C. A. and the Red Cross during one of the Red Cross drives, at the same time denouncing the Government. He was Assistant Secretary of State for Wisconsin. Under the ruling of the court the Espionage Act is violated when one speaks falsely or with bad intent not only of the Government, but of the Red Cross, the Y. M. C. A., the Knights of Columbus, the Salvation Army or the Jewish Relief Organization.

Convention of I. F. C. A.

THE International Federation of Catholic Alumnæ announces its third biennial convention, which is to take place at the Planters' Hotel, St. Louis, from October 16 to 20 inclusive. Careful preparations are now being made and the convention promises to be an event of signal importance to Catholic interests. While it is to be hoped that all the alumnae associations will be represented, unaffiliated alumnae, eligible to membership, are cordially invited to join the Federation.

> In this crisis of the world's history the counsel of wisdom which comes from interchange of ideas of many minds is imperatively necessary. The influence of the Federation in stimulating continued advancement and growth in Catholic education cannot be measured. Through the horrors of war as in the blessings of peace the necessity and value of uninterrupted teachings of Catholic schools, convents and colleges must be incontestably demonstrated. In this, the International Federation of Catholic Alumnæ must be a potent factor.

The Federation is particularly to be commended for requesting that the spirit of self-denial be not forgotten and that consequently evening dress be not worn at any of the evening events of the convention. Since the chief aim of the International Federation of Catholic Alumnæ is to uphold the ideals of Catholic womanhood and "whereas the styles that fashion decrees are only too often a contradiction of these ideals," the association has taken the laudable and Christian resolution of counteracting the evils of modern dress by the good example of its own members. It is to be hoped that the convention will meet with an unprecedented success. There is great need of a union of educated Catholic women to champion, in their own way, the interests of the Church in general, and of Catholic education in particular.

Magazines for Soldiers

THE Post Office Department while acknowledging the patriotic response on the part of the public to the appeal for reading matter for soldiers and sailors in the forces overseas, calls attention to the fact that the camps in this country should not be neglected and that additional magazines could be used to advantage among our forces in this country. The magazines should be of current or of comparatively recent issues and contain articles of general interest. In this connection it is imperative that the K. C. huts at the camps should be well supplied with Catholic magazines. Catholics anxious to help the Catholic soldier and sailor can exercise a worthy apostolate by subscribing to current Catholic magazines in the name of the K. C. building in the camp near their homes. Catholic editors are doing their bit by forwarding free copies to the camps but they cannot meet the demands by sending one copy of their paper. The cry is for more and still more. Unless our Catholic people rally to the support of the Catholic press and broaden its field in the camps where there are so many Catholic soldiers one of the greatest opportunities for good in the present crisis will be neglected. The soldiers are reading. Why not give them a chance to read the best Catholic literature?

International Labor Congress

IN the August number of the Federationist President Gompers thus discusses the proposed meeting of the International Labor Congress to be held in November at Laredo, Texas:

> A meeting of the minds and wills of the masses of two countries represents a new conception of international diplomacy and a new era in international relations and organizations. The Mexican revolution has brought new opportunities by increasing our community of interests. The Mexican revolution represented an aspiration of our neighbors to the south that leveled the boundary line barrier between the liberty-loving people of the United States and those of Mexico. Mexico became a neighbor in spirit and purpose as well as in physical fact.
> The interests of the concessionaires were identified with the old regime, the cientificos of Mexico. They antagonized the revolution. They have tried to force United States intervention in Mexico. Wage earners have learned that their interests are furthered by cooperation rather than competition. When the revolution finally came it gave Mexican wage earners the right to organize and assured an agency by which the masses of both countries could cooperate. It was through this agency that in 1916 when war with Mexico seemed unavertible, that mutual confidence was restored and the border terrorists repulsed. When the war clouds were dark representatives of organized labor of Yucatan and of the City of Mexico met with the executive council of the American Federation of Labor, and the foundation was laid for an international labor movement of the two nations.

The Mexican revolutionists have benefited Mexico in the same way that the Bolsheviki have benefited Russia. "Liberty" in both countries means license, loot and lust. The present condition of affairs is pleasing to the Government at Berlin.

The War.—Steady and important gains were made last week against the retreating Germans by French, British and American troops all along the western front, from Mt. Kemmel in the Lys salient, from the northern hinge of the Hindenburg line, where the Canadians pushed across that line north of Bullecourt to the neighborhood of Fismes, east of Soissons. By August 26, the British, on a thirty-mile front from the River Scarpe at a point east of Arras, to Lihons, south of the Somme, had crossed the Hindenburg line, and further south Bapaume was practically encircled, while the French took Fresnoy to the north, and St. Mard, to the west of Roye. The next day the British again made substantial gains southeast of Arras, and on both sides of the Somme approaching within six miles of Péronne. At the same time the French under General Debeney took Roye, the German base on the Avre, and the Americans were heavily engaged by the enemy at Bazochs, three miles west of Fismes. On August 28, the British continued their forward movement, their most solid gain being north of Bapaume, at Croisilles, which was finally captured by a flanking movement. The reports of the same day stated officially that the French were driving the enemy before them on the front from Chaulnes to the Oise, that Chaulnes was taken and that their patrols were at the gates of Noyon. On the right of General Mangin's troops which crossed the Oise between Pontoise and Quierzy, an American division took Juvigny. Immediately after these successes, the British took Bapaume and pressed still closer to Péronne, while the French under General Humbert took Noyon, the German stronghold at the apex of the Oise-Canal du Nord salient, and pushed on to the south slopes of Mt. St. Siméon, while General Mangin forced the crossings of the Oise at Morlincourt. This success was followed by an advance of the Franco-American troops north of Soissons, where they captured Chavigny and Cuffies and moved their lines west of Crouy. By August 31 the heaviest fighting fell to the Australians who stormed Mont St. Quentin and Feuillaucourt, north of Péronne. On the same date Marshal Haig reported that the British had reoccupied Mt. Kemmel, and on September 2 Péronne fell into their hands. The famous Quéant-Drocourt "switch line" on a front of about six miles was carried by English, Scottish and Canadian troops, while Franco-American troops after five days' fighting reached Terney-Sorny and the Soissons-St. Quentin highway.

Bulletin, Aug. 26, p.m.-Sept. 3, a.m.

Without the formality of a roll call the Senate on August 29 passed the Prohibition amendment to the Food Stimulation bill. The Senate accepted the Sheppard substitute which proposes to make the whole country "dry" after June 30 next. January 1 had been formerly intended as the date for Prohibition, and Senator Trammell of Florida tried to have that date restored, but the Senate refused its assent. President Wilson had already asked Senator Sheppard of Texas to defer the date until June 30, as more than $1,000,000,000 revenue expected to be raised by the $8,000,000,000 War Tax bill is based upon the liquor tax. The main provisions adopted in the amendment are:

The Senate Passes the Dry Law

> That after June 30, 1919, until the end of the war and during demobilization, no distilled spirits shall be sold for beverage purposes or taken out of bond except for export; that after May 1, 1919, and during the period indicated, no foodstuffs shall be used in the manufacture of beer or wine; that after June 30, 1919, and during the same period stated, no beer or wine shall be sold for beverage purposes except for export; that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall regulate the sale of wine for sacramental, medicinal and special uses; that after approval of the act, no beer, wine or other intoxicants may be imported; that any person violating the law may be imprisoned for a year, fined $1,000, or both; that the President may establish Prohibition zones about coal mines, munition plants, shipyards and other war works.

On September 1 President Wilson sent a Labor Day message to organized labor and to all the people of the country urging them to bring the war quickly to a victorious end.

The conference report on the new Man Power bill was adopted by the Senate on August 30. Full assurance was also given that the War Department's program for the calling out of all men between the ages of 18 and 45 would be almost immediately signed by the Speaker of the House and placed before the President. With this certainty in view the Provost Marshal General's office took the final steps in the preparing for the registering and the classification of the 13,000,000 or more men who will be affected. It was stated unofficially that President Wilson on signing the bill would issue a proclamation and that he would then set Thursday, September 12, as the day of registration. While this date had not been definitely selected it was generally believed that it would fit in with the plans of the Provost Marshal General and that by that time he would be able to have complete instructions in the hands of all the registration boards. The Department of Justice has also taken up the question of the draft. It is cooperating with the office of Provost Marshal General in the fight against any means which may be adopted by those who try to evade the provisions of the new draft. The agents of the department throughout the country have been warned to hold themselves in readiness to give every possible aid.

Ireland.—At the request of John Dillon, leader of the Irish Nationalists, T. P. O'Connor has sent a reply to the recent address forwarded to President Wilson by Sir Edward Carson. After taking issue with Carson on several historical points mentioned in the Ulster statement forwarded to the President, T. P. O'Connor reminds the Ulster leader that while he laid great stress on several alleged pro-German plots due to Sinn Feinism in Ireland, he did not tell the American President that the Ulsterites before the war in newspapers and speeches declared that they would prefer the rule of the German Emperor to Home Rule, and that they were supplied from Germany with 50,000 rifles which "they still hold now as before the war, for the purpose of making war on an act of the British Parliament." It was the Ulster rebel movement that precipitated the war by creating in the German mind the idea that Great Britain would be so embarrassed by the trouble in Ulster that she would not enter the world-conflict. Moreover, Carson's action in blocking Home Rule, preaching rebellion and accepting a place in the Cabinet was the cause of Ireland's present attitude towards the war. In conclusion T. P. O'Connor stated:

T. P. O'Connor and Sir Edward Carson

> In every avenue leading to peace the formidable figure of Sir Edward Carson stands blocking the way. When Sir Edward Grey tried to persuade Germany to desist from loosing the dams that have deluged the world in blood, the shadow of Carson promising a distracted and impotent England haunted and deranged the Kaiser's judgment. When the British people, in election and after election, signified their desire to give Ireland and England peace, Sir Edward Carson blocked the way. When the House of Commons twice carried Home Rule, Carson blocked the way. When Premier Lloyd George wanted to carry Home Rule, Carson blocked the way. Every time our great Ambassador at Washington seeks to bridge over the gulf between his country and the millions of the Irish race in America by statesmanship and tact, Carson blocks the way. When a greater than these, in the person of the President of the United States, the true leader of the world's democracy today, makes his constant and consistent appeal for the rights and liberties of small nations, Sir Edward Carson blocks the way. There is a Carson administration in Ireland today. There is, as far as its Irish policy is concerned, a Carson administration in Downing Street. So long as Carson controls the whole policy of England in Ireland it will be as hopeful to expect Ireland to return to her old enthusiasm for England's fight for the world's freedom as to expect the Czecho-Slovaks to fight for Austria or the Alsatians to fight for Germany, while the spirit of both these countries is embodied in von Hindenburg and von Tirpitz.

The Irish papers, alive to their opportunity, are reprinting the story of Carson's disgraceful intrigue with the Kaiser. Not only are they retelling the history of the ship, Fanny, which in April, 1914, sailed into Larne with 50,000 rifles loaded in Hamburg, but they are publishing such items as the following: "Baron von Kuhlmann, then Secretary to the German Embassy, was an honored guest at the great review of Carson's army, which was held in Ulster during Easter, 1914"; "Sir E. Carson had the honor of receiving an invitation to lunch with the Kaiser last week at Hamburg."—Belfast Evening Telegraph, August 27, 1913; "It may not be known to the rank and file of Unionists that we have the offer of aid from a powerful Continental monarch, who, if Home Rule is forced on the Protestants of Ireland, is prepared to send an army sufficient to release England from any further trouble in Ireland."—The Irish Churchman, November 14, 1913.

To the prevalent political unrest is added the discontent of the workmen who, infected by the example of the British laborer, are beginning to quit work in various places.

Recently the London Daily News printed a long and interesting article on Dublin's housing conditions. The substance of the article, which was reprinted by the New York World, is of value in that it bears out the contentions made by Irish observers years ago. The World synopsizes the paper as follows:

Dublin's Slums

> There [the north side of the city] 28,639 men and women are living in tenement houses which either "are unfit for human habitation and incapable of being rendered fit," or else are "so decayed as to be on, or fast approaching, the border line of being unfit." Of these 28,639 dwellers, 4,144 live, eat and sleep two in a room, 3,424 three in a room, 3,472 four in a room, 2,550 five in a room, 1,308 six in a room, 595 seven in a room, 248 eight in a room, and 108 nine in a room. All these one-room tenements are in houses practically unfit for human habitation. Cowan describes the task of curing these conditions as collossal. The cost he estimates at not less than $40,000,000. At least 16,500 new houses are absolutely necessary, while 3,800 old tenements must be reconstructed.

The writer in the Daily News declares "that rather more than half the people of Dublin have homes which hardly give them a chance of being or becoming good citizens."

In a recent statement Sir Horace Plunkett, who was chairman of the Irish Convention, stresses the need of settling the Irish question at once. The average Englishman desires a settlement as an obligation of honor, and because he is convinced that Ireland's "admitted political grievance stands in the way of her cooperation in the war." In Liberal and Labor circles there is a growing conviction that the influence of England at the Peace Conference will be seriously weakened "if our small nationality is knocking at the door demanding the application to itself of the principles for which the Allies profess to be fighting." Even those who are not converted to the "big schemes of evolution now coming to be recognized as an essential part of reconstruction after the war," are unwilling that an unsettled Irish question should stand in the way of democratic legislation. An analysis of British opinion might reveal a great variety of views upon the details of a settlement, but it would reveal "an almost unanimous determination that this blot on British statesmanship shall be immediately removed." Sir Horace Plunkett continues:

Sir Horace Plunkett's Statement

> Coming to outside opinion upon the Irish question, I shall speak only of that which I know—the opinion of the United States. It is not true that, since the American people came into the war, they have ceased to care about Home Rule. The only change I can discover in their opinion about Ireland is that they now condemn utterly those Irish extremists who have ever since 1911 been made the tools of Prussian intrigue I know also that a large body of American opinion holds it to be Ireland's duty—and incidentally the best way to insure the concession of what Americans regard as her democratic rights—to fight wholeheartedly on the side of the Allies, no matter what grievances against Britain she may have or may remember. But neither the war nor Ireland's attitude thereto is held to justify the postponement of Home Rule.

The conclusion of Sir Horace Plunkett is that while the average outsider may know very little about the details of the much-discussed Irish question, he can realize that some form of Home Rule is the only solution, and he is puzzled at the procrastinating policy that the Government is following.

Mexico.—Once again the Carranzistas have been at their old game of murdering Americans. The story of last week's outrage is so like that of the dozen or more outrages which have occurred off and on during the past four years that it is unnecessary to relate it. There were the same unreasonable attacks by the Mexicans, the death of American soldiers and the usual diplomatic apology. The event is interesting, because it draws attention to conditions in Mexico itself. As usual, unrest and murder and worse prevail in the interior. The subjoined letter descriptive of events in Gaudalajara is instructive:

Unrest and Blood

> At last our beloved Archbishop has been captured and exiled. Captured, I say, but note how it took place. By permission of the Governor he publicly celebrated Mass in one of the towns; he was unmolested all day long, but at midnight the soldiers swooped down on him with many a flourish. He was locked in a cattle-car and sent off without food or drink, under guard of soldiers and, as usual, he was subjected to indignities. However, he was fortunate to have escaped with his life. The death-decree was written and signed by perjured witnesses. This, despite the fact that he was told there was no charge against him. A higher power, probably friendly intervention, saved him from bandit-bullets, no doubt. The whole affair was most dramatic. When the people heard of the arrest they placarded their houses in protest: forthwith the Governor ordered the signs down, declaring that disobedience would be followed by confiscation of property. The signs remained where they were, and there was no official theft of property either. But a decree was issued, stating that priests were government employees, that there could be only one priest for every 5,000 people, that none save married priests, or else those over fifty years of age, would be tolerated. A committee of prominent people protested against this tyranny: the Governor ignored them and then there was a great but orderly demonstration. About 30,000 people gathered around the executive mansion, demanding an audience. The Governor finally appeared and listened to a speech requesting the return of the Archbishop. He refused, saying: "Are these priests Mexicans?" On being told that they were, he replied: "Let them obey the Mexican law, then." He was told that a democratic people were appealing for a repeal of his unjust decree. He refused to listen further, and as the people were dispersing quietly he ordered the soldiers to charge them. The Vicar-General has put the city under an interdict, beginning August 1. On July 31 the churches were thronged with men and women approaching the Sacraments. Confessions were heard till three o'clock of the morning of August 1. Since that day no Sacraments have been administered: women have put on mourning and many men have done the same: people are keeping to their houses as far as possible, and the street cars are quite deserted. Catholics and anti-Catholics—the latter are in the minority—are divided into opposing camps, and the Governor is angry and stubborn. The protest is extending through the country and altogether life here is unpleasant. . . .

Later on AMERICA will publish some interesting documents bearing on this case.

Russia.—Mr. James Keeley, who has recently returned from Europe where he has been investigating conditions under the auspices of the Committee on Public Information, reports that Russia this coming winter is sure to be "the world's most awful graveyard." He thus describes the situation there:

Black Prospects

> Famine is a certainty, today an actuality. Pestilence is reaping the first crop of a gigantic harvest. According to my information from a quarter to one-third of the inhabitants must die before next Summer. There is neither work nor food to support the population, and today the working people are simply predestined victims of hunger and disease. Productive labor has been annihilated and no nation can live without it.
> All financial system has vanished. Debts have been repudiated, banks abolished, and the gold reserve of the nation largely stolen. The printing press is the monetary right arm of the Bolshevist Government. Three months ago the Trotzkyites had turned out 28,000,000,000 rubles of the old pattern notes. The postal service having gone to the scrap heap, communities finding it difficult to secure supplies of this fiat currency took to manufacturing their own notes, which are not accepted outside their own districts or towns.
> Railroad and inland water-travel is almost a thing of the past. Fuel is the crux of this situation. The available supply has disappeared. The unburned oil fields are not working, and the Bolshevist mind conceiving the idea that the plutocrats could not create wealth without coal, flooded the mines. Administrative staffs of railroads also were creatures of the money devil, so they were dismissed. As a result, rolling stock and tracks are rapidly going to pot. Some few railroads are operating, but as private concerns in the hands of enterprising bandits. Each station has its own tariff for passengers and freight.

Manufacturing is at a standstill, nine-tenths of the factories having been shut down. Many are heaps of ruins, because they were the property of the "criminal bourgeois." Cotton fabricating practically is a memory, for this reason: It was the custom in Russia for banks to buy and hold cotton for their patrons. So, the leaders of the New Ideal, believing the cotton belonged to the money devil, struck a blow at capitalism by burning all the cotton they could get their hands on.

Only twenty per cent of the tillable lands of European Russia were put into crops this year. As far back as the spring of 1917 the teachings of the Social Revolutionists led to the burning and destruction of many of the large agricultural estates. Live stock and implements were appropriated. Equitable division of the loot often caused trouble.

Commerce, even from the standpoint of 1917, does not exist. All the big firms have suspended because of the lack of coal, the impossibility of getting raw materials, and because their factories have been destroyed. Retail dealers have vanished for the simple reason that their stocks were confiscated and they cannot get any more. Such commerce as exists is in the hands of acquisitive soldiers who have stolen goods and army transport trucks. These peripatetic merchants travel the land, buying at forced sales or stealing when the latter seems more desirable.

Mr. Keeley predicts that a German-made Czar who will promise to avert the threatening famine is likely to be offered the starving peasants who are now turning en masse to the Orthodox Church to protect them from the horrors caused by the Bolsheviki. In the New York Evening Post, R. C. Long writes thus of the religious condition of Russia, and the revolt of the pious peasants against the rationalistic propaganda of the Bolsheviki:

The reaction toward orthodoxy began a year ago, when the Ecumenical Congress, the first for two centuries, met at Moscow; but it took big dimensions only after the Bolshevist revolution of November brought church disestablishment, followed by aggressive; somewhat forcible, measures to "eradicate superstition." The Izvestiva, organ of the Soviets, lately complained of the depravity of peasants in Samara who burned a Soviet headquarters in retaliation for the burning by Bolsheviki of a church. The peasants showed that they preferred the church to free land, and even preferred local Lutheran Germans to the irreligious Bolsheviki.

That this religious revival is associated with nationalism is plain from the fact that the peasants in many districts are opposing the new civil marriage and birth registration as "the ungodly Berlin system," and even, it appears from the Dielo Naroda, imagine that civil birth registration was imposed by the Brest-Litovsk Treaty (presumably as a device for securing future German cannon fodder). . . . .

In violation of religious liberty proclaimed in the first days of the revolution and nominally maintained after the Bolshevist revolt, the local Soviets make war on these ["superstitious"] practices, dividing them into suyeverie or common superstition, and izuverstvo or criminal, fanatical superstition, both a peril to the Socialist-Rationalist cause, and therefore counter-revolutionary. In this movement history repeats itself. The strongest religious, anti-foreign and anti-Bolshevist feeling is in the forests and northeast of Petrograd, which just two centuries ago were the refuge and stronghold of holy men who resented Peter the Great's European reforms and his subjection of the Church to the State.

Uruguay.—A recent issue of the Montevideo Times prints the text of the new law which quite lately legislated out of existence private schools and religious instruction. As reported in the Times the iniquitous measure reads as follows:

The Education Law

Art. 1—Primary Education is public or private. The public is that paid for and given in the State schools. Private is that given in schools not supported by the State, and established in accord with the present law. Art. 2—No private educational institution may be established without first obtaining written permission from the inspector of private education in the department of Montevideo, or the departmental inspectors of primary education elsewhere. Art. 3—Any one applying for this authorization must specify the exact situation where the school is to be installed, its hygienic and sanitary conditions, size of the class rooms and the number of pupils to be placed in each. The authority granting the permission shall verify these data by inspection. Art. 4—The private schools already established in the republic shall apply for and obtain the necessary authorization within three months from the promulgation of this law. Art. 5—In order to teach in a private school it is necessary to hold a teacher's diploma issued by the scholastic authorities in accord with the law of common education. Art. 6—Those persons at present teaching in primary private schools must obtain their diplomas within a year from the promulgation of this law. After that period and during another two years the director general of primary education may issue provisional authorizations with a maximum duration of a year to those proving their competence in the manner the said director may determine. Art. 7—Teachers of languages, drawing, gymnastics, and dressmaking or cutting are excepted from the above requirement. Art 8— When private primary schools do not adopt the programs and textbooks used in the public schools, they must submit their own for approval by the director general of primary instruction. Art. 9—Members of the clergy or priests of any religion may not teach in private schools, even when fulfilling the conditions of Articles 5 and 6. This shall be obligatory within a year from the promulgation of this law. Art. 10—It is absolutely prohibited to receive boarders in colleges controlled by religious associations or by members of the same, whatever the religion they profess. Art. 11—The scholastic authorities have the right of inspection and vigilance over all private primary schools, which shall be exercised in accord with the regulations to be issued. Art. 12—Failure to comply with any of the dispositions of this law shall be punished by the immediate closing of the establishment, after proof given in brief and summary form before the justice of the peace of the section where the school is situated. In such cases the representation of the scholastic authorities shall be exercised by the inspectors of private teaching, the departmental inspectors of primary instruction, or the person appointed by the national inspector. Repetition of the offence shall be punished with a fine of $100 to $200, or the equivalent imprisonment. Art. 13—The following item is hereby incorporated in Schedule 9 assigned by the budget to the director general of primary instruction; 2 sub-inspectors, $1,920, traveling expenses for the same, $480. Art. 14—All laws opposed to the fulfillment of the present are repealed. Art. 15—The Executive shall issue the regulations (by-laws) of this law.

To this the Times appends the following editorial note:

It would be interesting to know, with regard to Article 12, how the offence can be repeated after the establishment has been closed. The closure, for a first and possibly slight infringement of the law, is an exceedingly severe penalty, and in fact much severer than the penalty proposed for a repetition of the offence.

Apparently the same power is at work in Italy, France and South America, for the education laws in all three places bear a striking similarity to one another.

Is a New Anti-Catholic Drive Imminent?

J. C. WALSH

THE feelings of Catholics with regard to the continuous anti-Papal propaganda might be difficult to define. Every Catholic begins with the assumption that the Pope has a full sense of his responsibility, and so is apt to dismiss lightly statements which convey the idea that the Vatican has acted weakly, or thoughtlessly, or been made the instrument of this or that influence. Many Catholics, however, have enough concern when they see a statement derogatory to the credit of the Holy See, to desire that the facts be made known, and indeed it has happened in every case that as soon as such a statement has appeared the case for the Vatican has been promptly stated. What causes impatience is that when the facts have been stated, and the position as to the particular accusation has been made clear, no attention is paid, the criticism being continued just as though there had been no answer whatever.

Sometimes slight concessions are made, but invariably a new attack is substituted for the old one. They will begin by saying the Pope is not neutral; then they will admit that the Pope has been neutral as between belligerents, but will argue that he ought not to be, as there can be no neutrality as between right and wrong. Or they will proclaim that the Pope did not denounce any of the outrages perpetrated in the name of military necessity, and when it is shown that the Pope, and the Pope alone among neutrals, did denounce one outrage after another, they will find some incident which did not call forth a Papal pronouncement and accuse the Pope of culpable omission. Or they will affirm that the Pope left Belgium to her fate, and when confronted with documents proving the contrary they will shift the attack to some other quarter. They assert that it is the Pope's interest to be pro-German, and then calmly ignore the complaints of the German press that the Vatican is over-friendly to the Allies. They denounce the Pope's peace terms as pro-German, shutting their eyes to the fact that President Wilson discussed the subject in language scarcely to be distinguished from that of the Pope. They make the machinations of Mgr. Gerlach the basis of an attack on the Pope, and then when the finding of the Italian military tribunal handsomely exonerates the Vatican they protest that the Pope did not institute any process against the man who had betrayed the Pontiff who trusted him, who had fled from Rome, and who was condemned in his absence to penal servitude for life by the very tribunal which expressly exonerated the Vatican of any cognizance of his doings. When they have gone through the whole list, if they concede that perhaps "too much has been said about the attitude of the Pope and the Vatican," it is only that they may add that "too little has been said about the open enmity and subterranean plotting of the Church as a whole against the Allies;" that "what the Pope is saying or thinking is infinitely less important than what the priests and their flocks are doing;" and that "wherever the power and influence of the Papacy prevails, the mighty forces of dogmatic religion are actively arrayed in opposition to the Allies." At this stage of the controversy Catholics are justified if they are a little more than impatient.

When this position has been reached, indeed, something more than impatience is called for. It then becomes obvious that the ultimate design is to call into question the political trustworthiness of the whole Catholic body, and to cause non-Catholics to assume, as a thing not open to dispute, that the Catholic community, with some notable exceptions, perhaps, is an enemy within the gates. From this to an underground campaign against Catholics is a short step, and after that phase has been well established it is a relatively simple matter, in a time of general political excitement, to subordinate all other platform issues to open attacks upon Catholics and the Catholic Church. The Catholic who stands up to the attacks is very certain to be accused of preaching sedition. There is nothing fanciful in this picture. The thing has happened once and twice in Canada, it has happened in Australia, they seem to be all ready for the final onset in England, and the signs are plentiful that the process is fairly well advanced in the United States. The excellent influence exerted by the positive action of the whole Catholic body since the country entered the war is being undermined, and by no other agency so effectively as by this anti-Vatican propaganda, translatable at will into denunciation of "the open enmity and subterranean plotting of the Church as a whole against the Allies." One would like to know how far this anti-Papal propaganda influenced the hostility of Y. M. C. A. people all over the country to official Washington's sane proposal for a single financial drive in which the Catholics should be included.

The question now is whether anything can be done to stop the progress of the movement before the more disagreeable stages have been reached. Catholics, certainly, have no desire to see it proceed, but, conscious of the rectitude of their own consciences, they are not likely to exert themselves, even if their exertions seemed likely to be fruitful. There are others, however, with an equal or perhaps a greater interest in preventing what is threatened. There are great secular agencies which have it in their power to prevent the spread of the evil. While the answer to attacks on the Pope are cynically disregarded by the anti-Vatican propagandists, a useful purpose surely could be served by putting into form convenient for reference, and making readily available to those who might seek it, the information pertinent to each item of the attack. Cardinal Gasparri, Cardinal Gibbons, Cardinal Bourne, and several others who can speak with authority, not excluding Italian statesmen, Belgian writers or French publicity bureaus, have done much towards letting the truth be known. Perhaps an effort should be made to see that their intervention does not fail of its full effect for want of a wider diffusion of the evidence they have adduced.

A difficulty is that those who would make the universal priest a universal enemy carry the war into many distant fields. "Side-show" campaigns have no terrors for them. They say, for example, that in Ireland, "Poverty, squalor, sloth and ignorance rule over a people sinking to decay, that Rome's empire may be maintained intact;" that the priest in Ireland is regarded as "a sort of wizard, a medicine man with miraculous endowments," and that "Everywhere the individual cowers before the ecclesiastical terror." After all, serious discussion of the military situation produced by what Mr. Lloyd George called the "stupidities and malignities" of the War Office cannot be confined within the compass of an answer to that. Neither is any conclusive argument to be drawn from the equal rejection of conscription by Protestant South Africa and by Australia, where Archbishop Mannix declined to be cowed by Mr. Hughes. Neither can the public policy of Spain or the Argentine be intelligently debated in terms of the differences of view of prelates and priests of the same Church, all "controlled by the Holy See." There must be some boundaries to the fires within which the action of the Holy See can be held to have been manifested since the war began. We know, indeed, that that action has been very largely confined to the initiation and development of works of mercy, to the assuaging of passions excited by the war, to the alleviation of suffering, and to a search for the means of ending the blood-bath of Europe on terms which would offer some hopeful prospect of preventing a resumption of the slaughter.

The Pope mourns because in every country, as Pericles said of Athens "the year has lost its spring," and the Pope labors to the end that the adolescent generation may not forever be cast living into the maw of Moloch. Within the circle of his acts and his inhibitions, of his praise and his protests, of his counsels and his denunciations, of his strivings and, so far, his failure, there are the materials from which some day the story of his reign will be written. We need not suffer ourselves to be drawn too far afield, but it would be useful, it would be comforting, and in the end it would be an inspiration, if the materials which are already available could be brought together under one cover. If the attacks are to continue, and there is no sign of abatement, resort to such an arsenal will become increasingly necessary.

Musings of a Palaeontologist

J. B. Culemans

EVOLUTION is an incontrovertible fact. No scientist dare deny it without putting himself outside the pale of recognized research and scholarship. The theoretical primitive plant-animal which all evolutionism must perforce postulate, has never been discovered among fossil remains, nor has it ever been produced in the laboratory. But it must be confidently assumed as the basic fact and corner-stone of the whole edifice. This being granted, the doctrine of the survival of the fittest, together with that of the ceaseless urge of the life-impulse adapting itself to the environment, account for the gradual unfolding of living things in the course of untold ages. And man is too closely related to the lower animals to permit him to think for a moment that he is an exception to the rule, and exempt from the workings of evolutionary law. If the idea of duty, duty owed to himself, to his neighbor, to his God, seems to diversify him from other creatures, it is but another indication of his long struggle upward through geologic ages, when this thought was persistently nurtured in all his progenitors, as a cursory glance at his development plainly shows.

From the day of the trilobites, in the Paleozoic era, there was a constant purpose adhered to, if more or less falteringly, in the struggle toward a higher existence, giving rise first of all to animals with backbone and spine. In the following or Mezozoic era the successors, the saurians, were no longer content with their terrestrial possessions; they sent down to the sea an expeditionary force recruited from several different families which quickly gained dominion there, as they transformed their limbs into paddles, resistlessly urged on in their search for subsistence, to appropriate the whole vast expanse of water.

A little later, driven by the same blind ineluctable internal push, they tried their fortune in the air, and flying dragons became realities. It was the time when dinosaurs flourished everywhere, their bodies weighing twenty tons, and their brains perhaps twenty ounces. But very early the saurian class was split into two general divisions, one of them giving rise to diminutive mammals, who carried the pulse of life up to the higher animals of the present time. With no hope of ever rivaling the dinosaurs in massiveness or armament, they were forced by the adversity of their environment to develop along the lines of mental ability. Slowly, as a suitable food supply of cereals, grasses, nuts and fruits became available, the higher mammals appeared in great numbers. The triumph of intelligence, agility and brain power over the brute strength and the sluggish mentality of the dinosaurs was complete. The latter were outwitted and outfought, and disappeared from the scene.

But a still higher plane of development awaited. During the middle of the Cenozoic era, or the Age of Mammals, somewhere between 1,000,000 and 10,000,000 years ago, there lived in the well-forested lowlands of Southern Asia small arboreal anthropoids, which were the common ancestors of the chimpanzee, the gorilla and man. They subsisted largely on fruits, nuts and herbs. But gigantic crustal deformations of the earth occurred; mountain-making forces slowly uplifted the Himalayan mass; the climate of the world became progressively cooler; immense forests disappeared. A fierce contest ensued once more between the clawed carnivores and the anthropoids deprived of their arboreal habitat. The latter were forced to ward off starvation by competing with the former powerful food-hunting creatures. Under the compulsion of such an adverse physical and biologic environment, the long-tailed, strong-armed anthropoids evolved into tailless semi-erect bipeds, and at length developed into primitive man, the men of the Old Stone Age.

These are in their truly child-like simplicity, the diverting musings of a professor of Queen's University, Kingston, Ontario, in the July issue of the Atlantic Monthly. Only the professor takes himself and his pretended science very seriously, however much the demands he makes upon our imagination and faith surpass anything the oft-derided preachers and theologians ever set forth. Not having one single authenticated fact to support it, this theory of the descent of man could appeal only to a dreamy-eyed don who has abdicated all critical sense and set himself up as the infallible interpreter of past ages and the master-teacher of future generations. Yet he is but one of several scores of evolutionists who for nearly a century have freely indoctrinated the youth who sat at their feet with the principle that man owes his place in the sun to brute strength as manifested in the survival of the fittest among his thousands of animal progenitors; that duty and cunning are identical and are the only means in later geologic ages for his less powerful simian ancestors to overcome their stronger neighbors; that man could rise only through slaughter and annihilation to his present plane.

In the days of yore when, notwithstanding a deep-rooted faith, scholars speculated with great thoroughness on the origin, the nature and the end of man, they made it abundantly clear by the light of reason that man came from the hand of an omnipotent Maker, who constituted him from the beginning the king of this earthly domain. Far from being the descendant of predacious carnivores and arboreal simians, he was their master, and they his absolute servants. The savants of today insist on exhibiting all the links in their animal lineage, and point with pride to the powerful monsters of the sea, the air and the forest that were their ancestors. Dismissing with a mild contempt the discredited speculations of medieval science and philosophy, and the empty verbiage in which they strutted forth, they proceed to spin out hypotheses which for wild flights of fancy and uncouth terminology, surpass by far anything that even a decadent scholasticism can boast of. Where evolutionists demand apodictic proofs of others, they bring not the shadow of a proof themselves beyond the ipse dixit of Darwin or Spencer or Bergson. They believe devoutly in the warfare between science and theology; sneer covertly at the Virgin Birth and Resurrection from the dead, and look upon those and kindred doctrines as inoffensive dogmas that hold weak minds in their grip. No dogmas are worthy of belief except their own and these they assert with autocratic finality.

However, in the lurid light of present world-events, any defense of evolution is but a desperate and futile attempt to rescue it from the wreck and ruin of war. If evolution is true, the present struggle must be viewed as a repetition of the age-old conflict between the weak and the strong for the mastery of the world; as a new exhibition of the primal impulses that have convulsed the earth for ages, irrespective of any moral principles. For these are non-existent; they also are subject to flux, conditioned by the needs of each evolutionary stage and changing with the changing environment. Love never played a part in it: the law of tooth and claw was supreme. If evolutionism is true the democracies of the world not only deserve but are bound to go down in the struggle for existence; if might was right in the primeval jungle and led to the making of man, might must be right today. The survival of the fittest through power and cunning will leave our adversaries in command of a world they have won by superior strength.

Thus in the final analysis the doctrine of the survival of the fittest is diametrically opposed to the conception of the brotherhood of man. Evolution according to Darwin and Weismann and De Vries is the antithesis of Christianity according to Christ and John and Paul. A merciless materialism that leads us to despair of the future of man's world is the ethical fruit of evolution, for which the palaeontologist makes himself responsible when he lays aside his fossil shells and petrified bones to trespass on the precincts of the philosopher and preacher.

But evolution as an all-sufficient explanation of the universe and man is a myth, a dream, a ghastly nightmare, from which the world is awakening with a rude shock. To many it has been the only religion they professed, and that religion is finding an inglorious grave in the trenches of Picardy and Flanders, where humanity is emancipating itself from greed and selfishness and animalism. The next generation, studying present events in calm retrospect, will have ample reason to be ashamed of the mythical gods set up in a recent past by irresponsible university professors; of the tyrannical yoke these gods imposed in the name of science; of the dismal prospect they held out and finally realized on gory battlefields. If ethical standards of liberty and morality are to be restored to the world, the world must never again be allowed to find its inspiration and its motives for action among the brutes that once ruled the deap sea and the impenetrable forest, but learn anew that fidelity to moral obligations is based on belief in a personal Deity to whom man is accountable.

The "Scientists'" Campaign of Calumny

FRANCES BEATTIE

IT has been proved that the Christian Science Publishing Society is a valuable cash asset of Christian Science. Under the rules of the "Church Manual," all the net profits of this publishing society, are turned over semi-annually to the Treasurer of the Mother Church, subject to the order of the Christian Science Board of Directors, which is authorized to order its disposition in accordance with the By-Laws of the "Church Manual." It has also been demonstrated that the "Church Manual" provides for a Committee on Business, to be elected by the Board of Directors, to transact the business of the Mother Church and attend to such other business as the Committee on Publication shall commit to it. This business committee, while engaged in the transaction of the business assigned them, shall be paid from the Church funds which opens the way to the spending of millions of dollars.

The Committee on Publication, for the United States, Canada, Great Britain and Ireland, it has been shown, consists of one member, whose salary shall be not less than $4,000 a year. At present, Judge Clifford P. Smith, of Boston, holds this position. In each State, the readers of the three largest branch-churches annually elect and appoint a Committee on Publication, to serve in their localities. In New York State, at the present time, Albert F. Gilmore, 52 Vanderbilt Avenue, holds the position. This committee corrects all "incorrect" matter published concerning Christian Science, and its latitude is wide.

Frederick Dixon, at present editor of the Christian Science Monitor, was formerly the District Manager for the Committee on Publication, for Great Britain and Ireland, as well as the Publication Committee for the counties in which London, England, is situated. This position is an appointive one, controlled by the Christian Science Board of Directors. Mr. Dixon also looked after the London News Bureau and otherwise made himself useful before coming to our shores.

For many months the Christian Science Monitor, that examplar of light, has been conducting a campaign of calumny against the Catholic Church, insidiously spreading its wares across the continent, evidently with the approval of the Committee on Publication, and of the Science Board of Directors. When an unusually vicious editorial appears in the Monitor, forthwith it is marked and sent to the editors of the country, to school-teachers and to molders of public opinion. In this way, "the powers that be" follow the command of the founder of "Science," to spend the church funds to further the cause. That the message may reach the greater number of people, and be read by them, the untruthful editorials are marked and carefully labeled. For this purpose, is the Christian Science Church pouring its funds into the Monitor today.

The Monitor is extremely English in tone. Its foreign editor and chief oracle, Frederick Dixon, an undiluted product of "Mother England," was imported into this country from London, three or four years ago, to man the Science ship. Previously, he had made frequent trips to this country, though he has never evinced a desire to forswear his allegiance to the Union Jack and come under the Stars and Stripes. In fact, so keen are his views on the subject, that an attaché of the Christian Science Publishing Society, at its offices in Boston, proudly declared that Mr. Dixon "was very partial to his own country, and would not consider giving it up." The Monitor, particularly under the guidance of Mr. Dixon, is extremely English in tone, and reading it, one wonders whether it is an English publication masquerading under an American name. It is said, in Science circles, that the sheet has a greater circulation in London, England, than it has in New York. Just what else Mr. Dixon brought over from England is uncertain, but there is no question, but that the gentleman brought over a heavy consignment of anti-Catholic hatred and bigotry, born and bred in England.

According to the 1917 newspaper directory, the Christian Science Monitor has a circulation of 72,536. Whether this includes the sample and marked copies sent so regularly through the country, is not known, but presumably, it includes such copies. The subscription rate is $9.00 per year, and while the receipts are large, the expenses likewise are enormous. News bureaus are maintained in the large cities, and the Monitor is, in reality, endowed by the Mother Church of Boston. Mrs. Eddy took care of this by empowering the Board of Trustees to "conduct the business of the Christian Science Publishing Society on a strictly Christian basis, for the promotion of the interests of Christian Science." (Article XXV, Section 1, page 80.)

The better to promote these interests, the Monitor indulges in a carefully-laid and well-financed plan of attack. Mr. Frederick Dixon evidently had a keen eye to business when he decided to permit himself to be temporarily transplanted to our shores, with a free hand to malign Catholicism.

> Remember [said his secretary], we are not attacking any one's religion. We don't care how many Catholics there are in this country, or in the world, but we do not want them in politics. It is only when the Catholic Church, through its foreign potentate, enters into the politics of this country, that we throw the brick-bats! Confidentially, I may say that the action of the Catholic Bishops and authorities in the conscription matter, has been the same in Australia, in Canada, and in Ireland, which shows that their orders came direct from Rome. If you will look up the editorials in the Monitor, from March 16 to March 25, you will find some interesting reading concerning this Catholic activity in the politics of this country. And, I may say, if you will watch the Monitor carefully, you will see a lot more along these lines, in the future!

The anti-Catholic editorials which were so firmly fixed in the mind of this underling, appeared in the Monitor for March 21, 23 and 25. They were entitled: "The Collar Black and Chestnut Wig," "Religion and Politics," and "Mr. Murphy's Refutation Refuted." They were bitter, false, without warrant or excuse and can only be explained by the inborn bigotry of Mr. Frederick Dixon.

The "Church Manual," with the By-Laws of the Mother Church, which, though written by Mrs. Mary Baker Eddy, was, she tells us in the preface, "impelled by a power not one's own." Upon this "Manual," the Science rule of faith sinks or swims. Mrs. Eddy always religiously maintained that she had no quarrel with any religion, but as was to be expected of one divinely appointed for the purpose, was interested solely in the furthering of the interests of the cause of Christian Science. She has laid down, in Article VIII, Section 3, page 41:

> However despitefully used and misrepresented by the churches or the press, in return employ no violent invective, and do good unto your enemies when the opportunity occurs. A departure from this rule disqualifies a member for office in the Church or on the Board of Lectureship, and renders this member liable to discipline, and possibly, dismissal from the Mother Church.

Again, Article I, Section 9, page 28:

> If an officer fails to fulfil all the obligations of his office, the Board of Directors shall immediately call a meeting and notify this officer either to resign his place or to perform his office faithfully; then failing to do either, said officer shall be dismissed from this Church, and his dismissal written on the church records.

If the Board of Directors of the Christian Science Church have not cast this "Church Manual" into the discard, the time is at hand when Mr. Dixon should be called to account for his anti-Catholic activity, and for his false accusations. But the Science headquarters are so steeped in anti-Catholic bigotry that nothing of the kind is likely to happen.

Mr. Dixon, in the editorial: "The Collar Black and the Chestnut Wig"—how delightfully English!—printed in the Christian Science Monitor, March 21 last, in answering the charge against the Monitor of promoting an anti-Catholic campaign in Canada, admits that "One member of the staff of this paper has periodically visited Ottawa, and may even do so again." He denies that shortly after the appearance of this English gentleman, known to "Sir Robert Borden for some time," there followed "another body of conspirators" who traveled to Ottawa to hold a council of war. Mr. Dixon asks the names of these conspirators. It were idle to name names, but the fact that the gentlemen did arrive in Ottawa, and hailed from Boston, will be shown in another article. And the fact must not be lost sight of that when attending to "church business," the Business Committee of the Mother Church are paid for their trouble out of the same funds which are now being diverted to the general anti-Catholic campaign of the Christian Science Monitor.

The Woman Worker

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S. J.

SIDE by side with man, woman is pictured walking with uplifted head towards the dawn of economic independence. To some this is an inspiring sight. To others, not so. Naturally Catholics turn to the Church to find her attitude towards this important subject. No one has been so consistently devoted to the unfolding of woman's powers and the promotion of her temporal and spiritual welfare as the Catholic Church. We need but point to the brilliant galaxy of learned women who flourished in the cloisters of the Middle Ages or to the marvelous activities displayed by such great Catholic heroines as St. Catherine of Siena, Blessed Joan of Arc or St. Teresa to whom even the non-Catholic world turns for inspiration and encouragement. The Church is no less interested in the women of our day, and particularly in the millions whom economic circumstances have driven from the home into the open mart, the busy shop and factory.

That woman, no less than man, should be devoted to a useful occupation is a first principle of Christianity. Even in the literature of the Jewish Talmud there is a wise saying that if a woman has a hundred servants, it should not dispense her from personal work. Idleness is the mother of vice, and the proverb holds as true of woman as of man. There is no reason and no excuse for an existence of mere leisure and social functions. The woman who lives but to be served, whose time is given to pleasure and "society," whose sole ambition is to be a thing of useless preciousness, envied or admired, is a human parasite who thrives upon the toil and blood of others.

How dignified and noble by the side of this scented creature, whose only worth is in her silks and satins, her lap dogs and her limousines, is the true Christian working girl! In her Christ lives again. Her soul is pure from the taint of sin. Beneath her drawn and tired features, wearied after the long day's toil, is hidden, though not all concealed, the presence of the Living God who tabernacles in her breast. Who that has learned to know her does not honor and respect her? Yet what power has been able thus to uphold her dignity and preserve her purity amid the world's allurements but that of the Catholic Church which is her comfort, her glory and her joy; within whose sanctuary she can find her truest rest and at whose altar she partakes of the Bread of Life?

But if the Church acknowledges the need of woman's work, both within and without the home, and has no blame to cast upon the Christian woman worker, whom she ever fosters and protects, it does not therefore follow that she approves of the condition of society in which millions of women, married and unmarried, are driven forth into the field of the world's industrial competition. Much less does the Church consider this an ideal state. Such indeed is the fallacy of that typical Socialist philosophy which would constrain all alike, irrespective of sex, to take their place at the wheel of industry or in the booth of commerce. It is in a measure likewise the error of that modern feminism which demands for every woman complete economic independence, while denying to man the Divinely-assigned headship of the family. Both these systems are equally repugnant to Christianity and to the Catholic Church which will safeguard, at every cost, the right and dignity of womankind.

The Church has not failed to understand the economic exigencies of our time, both as they apply to the legions of women who must earn their livelihood in industry or commerce, and to the commonwealth which may stand in special need of their service in times of national crisis. Yet neither does she ever lose sight of woman's normal purpose in life. Spiritually it is the same as that of man, but in the material order it differs from his in many respects, even as in structure, function, character and aptitude woman was created different from man: "For woman is not undeveloped man, but diverse." Neither training nor education can ever make her the same as man, nor ever should strive to do so. There is an ideal of womanliness and an ideal of manliness, and both are perfect in their way; but there is no sadder spectacle for angels and for men in this sublunary world than the womanlike man or the manlike woman.

"Male and female he created them," the Scripture tells us. This difference is again brought home to us in the consequences of the Fall. To man God said: "Cursed is the earth in thy work; with labor and toil shalt thou eat thereof all the days of thy life." But to woman He said: "In sorrow shalt thou bring forth thy children." Here therefore are clearly defined the normal occupations of both sexes for which the Almighty has especially fitted them. The hard and burdensome toil of the outer world is, so far as possible, to be the portion of man, while the gentler, but even more heroic sacrifices of home and motherhood fall to the part of woman. Hence in his great Encyclical on "The Condition of Labor" Pope Leo XIII has this to say of woman, which briefly sums up the entire doctrine of the Church on the important question of woman labor:

> Women are not suited for certain occupations; a woman is by nature fitted for home-work, and it is that which is best adapted to preserve her modesty and to promote the good upbringing of children and the well-being of the family.

Yet of the women who are engaged in wage-earning occupations outside of the home many have not made the choice of their own heart. Others have freely chosen the state of virginity to preserve their purity for God alone, and are working out their salvation in the world rather than within convent walls. Both classes may be doing God's will according to their best lights and both classes must seek to earn their livelihood as best they can. A. E. Mahuteaux in the Liverpool Catholic Times thus summarizes the problem.

> Many women fortunately will always find their happiness in receiving shelter and comfort from a father's or a husband's love. No one wants to change that. It is both the normal and the ideal. But what must happen to the large number of women who have neither father nor husband? From whose kindness and solicitude will they receive the necessary means of subsistence? And if in honor a woman may not receive them from any other, how can she procure them except by her own skill and effort? And how, in the present state of our social economy, can that skill and effort be exercised except in competition with her fellow-beings, men and women alike?

Woman's place, therefore, as the writer observes, is wherever Providence has given her duties to perform; for no woman's hands may be idle, whether she labors for herself or for others. Some have their duties in their own home or in the home of others, and some have their duties in hospital, workshop, school or office. There are certain classes of work which should be restricted to men, and there are others which woman can perform as well or perhaps far better. The domestic sphere is hers by nature. For the rest it matters not what we do, provided we do well what God's Providence assigns us. It is the love of Him that gives to every act its highest value and it is this alone that can raise to a fine white flame of devotion these little lives of ours, whether they burn in cloister, home or workshop. Nothing of all this conflicts with the Holy Father's teaching, that woman is by nature fitted for home-work and that it is this which is best adapted to preserve her modesty and prepare her for her normal duty as wife and mother. It is in the latter function that she can render to society her greatest service, unless indeed she choose for her sole Spouse Christ the Lord, that she may become the spiritual mother of souls.

Clearly, then, it is the duty of the State to provide, so far as possible, that woman shall be enabled to follow her primal vocation of motherhood. If already a mother she must be given the opportunity to devote to her children all that attention and care which make industrial occupations in shop or factory impossible. Her place is now in the home, with her little ones. This, as we cannot too frequently repeat, is one of the most urgent reasons obliging the State to secure an adequate family wage for every adult male laborer. Thus will he be able, in the early years of his manhood, to offer a home to the woman of his choice where she can happily perform the duties of a Christian mother, undisturbed by the struggle for existence whose weight should rightly fall upon the husband's shoulders. Her own duties, if conscientiously performed, may far more than balance this burden, while the claims of charity will leave no moments idle on her hands.

Both statistics and experience show conclusively that, in general, married women will gladly withdraw from industrial and commercial life if a suitable family wage is paid their husbands. Their withdrawal, like the prevention of child labor, will in turn react favorably upon the labor situation, will lessen unemployment and tend to raise the wages of the men.

But there is a duty likewise imposed upon the individual man and woman. It is the duty of thrift and moderation, and unless this is better observed by all classes there can be no solution of our problem. We are living in an age of extravagant expenditure. The rich by the neglect of their stewardship, using their surplus wealth as if it stood at their free disposal and were not intended for the common good, are setting an example of lavish living which the poor are imitating in their own degree. The spendthrift young man cannot hope to support a wife, even though an adequate wage be secured for him, while the earnest and ambitious worker will wisely fear to marry a girl whose extravagance of dress and amusement forebodes disaster to his limited earnings. "I will not be hard to keep," was the assuring remark made by a simply yet faultlessly dressed American girl to the happy young man whose heart and hand she had accepted. There was no thought of narrow parsimony, but of that wisdom which builds a successful home and that motherliness which provides for the little ones who are to be the joy of the parents' youthful days and the glory of their declining years.

Until, therefore, every man is assured a family wage, and rich and poor alike return to the simplicity of Christian life, it will be futile to hope for a satisfactory solution of this particular phase of the problem of the woman worker. The wage-labor of countless women is to a great extent unnatural, because unnecessarily enforced upon them through capitalistic greed, through inadequate legislation and through personal habits of thriftlessness and excess. The luxury of the rich is even far more culpable in the example that it sets. At present we must not base our judgment upon the abnormal conditions existing in time of war, but prepare for a future reconstruction in which woman will be given ampler opportunities to promote both her own happiness and that of the race.

Echoes from the Catholic Press Convention

L. F. Happel, M.A.

THE eighth annual convention of the Catholic Press Association of America has convened and adjourned. The three business sessions stretched over long hours, and every moment of these was crowded to the last second with matters of primary concern to the Catholic press. The editors and the publishers have gone back to their desks, unanimous in their opinion that the Chicago convention was the best of the eight. Perhaps though, it would be impossible to secure an agreement as to the exact measure of benefit that will accrue to the Catholic press as the fruit of these latest deliberations. This is but testimony that the strengthening of this first defense of the Church in America was the only object sought in the convention.

Loyalty to country and devotion to Church were two bugle blasts sounded at every meeting, business or social. Furthermore, it became constantly more clear in the development of the proceedings that the Catholic press of America is a very determined, purposeful program, with the soundest reasons for its existence and possessed of a clear-cut mission of enormous magnitude and first importance; that the Catholic press is sponsored by men who are inspired by the possibilities of their profession and who possess a proper appreciation of the responsibility they carry; men who are the more fit for their posts because they themselves have made sacrifices to occupy their chairs and to increase their fitness; self-made editors if you will, for the Catholic editorial sanctum is the only true school of Catholic journalism, but possessing that vim and ruggedness, that persistence and unpretentiousness that crown the successful self-made man in most lines.

Of the resolutions adopted two will serve to summarize the entire convention discussions. They are stated here without comment:

> Resolved, that the officers of the Catholic Press Association be directed at their earliest convenience to memorialize the Hierarchy in behalf of the establishment of a Catholic Press Sunday.
> Resolved, that special committees of three be appointed by the chair to take up the following activities, organized with chairman, secretary and treasurer at the present meeting, to begin work at once and to continue during the ensuing year and to report to the next convention:
> A Committee on Survey to look into the present conditions in Catholic publishing, consider possibilities of cooperation and make suggestions for further activities and improvements in the Association and for the individual publications, to be acted on at the next convention.
> Committee on Endowment to determine the precise objects of an endowment, prepare a plan and suggest what measures, if any, are practicable towards raising an endowment fund. This committee is also to consider ways and means of establishing a bureau of publicity, which will include a refutation of slanders against the Church in the secular press. This committee is empowered to spend an amount up to $500 for preliminary work.

These two resolutions contain virtually everything in the official business transacted by the convention that will be of general interest. Still, during the discussions that filled the majority of the convention hours, there were heard facts and arguments which should be gathered, sorted and condensed, and which constitute the most vital story that can go out of the convention to the Catholic populace. We all meet in life certain conditions and exigencies upon which we can exert but the minimum of influence and which, to be overcome and remedied, call for action mainly by others. This fact is not always borne in mind when our own labor is judged and consequently we are charged with shortcomings which rightly are those of another. The Catholic editors face this condition in one respect. This, too, must be considered when judgment is passed upon their work and should temper many a harsh criticism that from time to time is leveled against them.

If a man who has vitiated his physical system by sniffing cocaine, so that without his dose of this drug he is a pitiful, stuttering, staring maniac, were offered, as a substitute for the poison some finely pulverized salt, would you be surprised if he thrust your offer aside, even though you were volunteering an essential of life? While this example if developed to extremes may be found wanting, within the limits we need go it serves very admirably. In spiritual concerns the Catholic paper may well be contrasted with salt. Nor is it too great an exaggeration to put the daily newspaper on a par with the life-destroying drug. Granting the service which the secular press is rendering in making us a more united and intelligent nation and consequently a more effective unit in our great purpose, there is no denying that the daily press has had a degrading influence because of its attention, particularly in pre-war times, to the morally depraved and vicious circles of society and their floundcrings through our courts, because of its offerings of pictures that are not within the limits of decency, if they are within the law, and because of fiction pages that see plot-possibilities only in marital unhappiness and infidelity. It stands to reason that a person, particularly of mental limitations, and all of us come to some degree under such classification, who habitually chooses for his reading the daily issues of a paper which dwells upon and dissects every detail of horrid crimes that should be whispered only within the walls of the confessional, will hardly have his interest held when he is offered the pages of a Catholic publication. Yet the ordinary critic of the Catholic press, who is always wishing that "we had a live diocesan weekly and a modern Catholic monthly" and never doing anything to secure either, comes within this class. He damns that with which he has no acquaintance or which he cannot appreciate because of his own vitiated tastes. No reference is made here to kind and conservative criticism which every Catholic editor is delighted to receive.

It must be conceded that the cure of the drug fiend is rather a hopeless undertaking. It is the old story of the golden weight of preventive measures contrasted with the lead of remedy. The majority of men may be surrounded with habit-forming, life-sapping drugs and not touch them. They have been warned of the danger that lurks under the death's-head label. They have been given a taste for the things that are the salt of life. In newspaperdom, though, we sell poison unbranded and take little care that the youth is warned and, what is far more vital, instructed in the use of the life-preserving essentials. The Catholic press today is paying the price of indifference toward the Catholic press a decade or more ago. In the coming years the Catholic press must pay the price for our present indifference. This, fortunately, is not quite as complete as heretofore and is constantly growing less so. Actually we are commencing to lay a foundation for the Catholic press of a future day. Truly it is slow work, but we may conclude from this the magnitude of the structure which will eventually rest upon it.

At the convention the question was pointedly asked: What good would a million-dollar endowment be to the Catholic press, what good would be the editorial excellence such an endowment would make possible, if there is no reading class to appreciate that ideal paper? The Catholic periodical is, withal, a commodity and subject to the very ordinary law of supply and demand. The Catholic press today is proportionate with the demand for it. The same will be true tomorrow. In all frankness let us confess that we have not exerted and are not exerting ourselves to a dangerously exhausting degree in creating such a demand.

I will risk the charge of triteness. Much we call trite is wise. The youth of today is the man of tomorrow, the youthful reader of the Catholic papers today is the full-grown reader of the Catholic press tomorrow.

I stood in a photographic gallery with a young Catholic boy. He was about to be graduated from one of our very excellent schools and was arranging for a portrait to be inserted in the college journal. On the walls of the gallery was a life-size photograph of the auxiliary of the diocese, with his name on a plate beneath. The boy said: "Bishop ——— is an Anglican, isn't he? It's a wonder they wouldn't hang a picture of our Catholic Bishop." Had that lad read a single issue of the diocesan weekly, he would surely have become acquainted with the Catholic prelates of his own diocese. His school has an excellent reading room and library. The former is supplied with local and national Catholic publications. But the latter has shelves filled with the books of Father Finn and Father Copus, and more, with the adventure stories of Alger, Henty, Castlemon and Optic. And these had been a stronger lure to the boy than the Catholic periodicals with little influence exerted to hold them from absorbing his entire reading hours.

How many of us would ever have read a line of Milton or Shakespeare, or possibly even of Scott or Thackeray, had we not been gradually trained to an appreciation of such literature by patient instructors during long hours of classroom reading. Here and there among us may have been one whose natural inclination would have led him to what is best among the books of all ages. But the vast majority of us without the careful development and guidance which we receive in our college days, would now find our reading taste fully satisfied by the ten best-sellers.

I see every possibility of man attaining the purpose of his creation without an acquaintance with "Paradise Lost." While I hesitate to number the Catholic press as an essential to a pious hermit's life, I think it may be safely stated that it is a stanch and steadying staff for us to have in grasp when we walk the roughly cobbled city streets and even the stony country ways of today. The knowledge of what constituted news was once the first lessons the cub of newspaperdom had to know. Today that identical old-fashioned knowledge is necessary for the man and woman who would read newspapers. The very unrefined tastes of the masses for what is broadly called "news" in the present editorial offices has debased newspapers. Only a refinement of that taste can wipe out the moral decadence of the modern press. It is wholly ridiculous to say to the child: "This and that on the library shelf you must not touch, and this and that you should read" and then let the child's unchained inclination make its own choice in newspapers. The devil does not mind very much whether he rides into the human heart through the satiny finish of highly enameled book-paper or on the rough sheets of the daily press. He never was particular about ways and means. He sees only the end. If we are ever to have a presentable and widely circulated Catholic monthly or weekly press, diocesan or national, if we are ever to have a Catholic daily, we must first create the demand for these. The taste for such reading can hardly be formed in the man of thirty or forty. But it can be created in the young man or woman when they are still in our classrooms.

One of the plans, laid before the Catholic Press convention, for securing the million-dollar endowment fund for the Catholic press was startlingly simple. A really determined effort could raise that amount in very few years. But what good is the million-dollar press without the ten million readers? But securing the readers and creating the demand that alone can make the million-dollar Catholic press a reality, cannot be done in a few years. A decade would be an extremely conservative estimate of the time necessary. A quarter of a century is a more reasonable period. The Catholic press Sunday is good. If we could have a Catholic press Sunday monthly for a number of years, it would be most excellent. In that time we could most assuredly train our Catholics to read Catholic publications. But it happens that there are a few other exhortations that must be delivered from the Catholic pulpits occasionally. An interested Catholic pastor will tell you that the Sunday he speaks upon the Catholic press the sale of papers at the church door is very large. A slight falling off is noticeable the following Sunday. A month later the drop in circulation is startling. But that weekly lesson, which will eventually develop a keen appreciation of the Catholic press, can be given in the classroom of the Catholic schools. This explains the writer's earlier statement that the Catholic editors are facing difficulties and exigencies which they cannot overcome and remedy alone. Only the heartiest cooperation of the Sisters and priests of the Catholic parochial schools, academies and colleges the country over can create the demand for a better Catholic press than we have today. When that demand has been created, Catholic papers that satisfy its smallest exaction will be fresh from the printing presses. I realize full well that we credit the excellence of our Catholic schools to the fact that we have barred from them all fads. But the Catholic press hour every week, at least every fortnight, is the farthest thing from a fad. Even now many of our schools are spending an hour weekly reading one of the small school papers that are published. Is it an unreasonable demand to ask that these be thrown out and Catholic papers substituted?

It is so prepossessing a subject to propose the raising of a million-dollar fund for the Catholic press. Yet in execution it will be found to be a very simple matter to secure an endowment, if not of a million dollars, of all that is now needed. The development of noble and necessary Catholic projects have seldom been hindered to any great extent by lack of financial support. Against this is the fact that so simple and commonplace a suggestion, that every Catholic school spend one hour weekly reading Catholic publications, their news, features and editorials, is going to be an enormously difficult result to obtain. But upon it depends almost entirely the demand for a Catholic press that will flourish tomorrow when today's students shall have been graduated. On that demand depends the future Catholic press of America.

COMMUNICATIONS

Letters as a rule should not exceed six-hundred words.

A Congressman and Freemasonry

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Mr. James Thomas Heflin, a member of Congress from Alabama, has inserted in the Congressional Record for July 1, 1918, a speech which he delivered at the laying of the corner-stone of a new Federal building in Birmingham, Alabama, on May 15, 1918. He seems to have done this in order that he might circulate the speech at little expense to himself and at the cost of the public. It began as follows:

> I think it very fitting and appropriate, Grand Master, that these ceremonies should be held under the auspices of the Masonic fraternity, the oldest fraternity in all the world. [Applause.] Not only is the Masonic fraternity the oldest fraternity in all the world, but it is the first organized effort to dignify labor and exalt the laboring man [applause], the first secret society to minister to the poor and needy, first to worship at the shrine of truth, and first to champion the cause of liberty. [Applause.]
> Fellow citizens: Opposition to the union of Church and State was in existence before Jefferson wrote the first statute of religious freedom that ever adorned the history of the world. Freemasonry has combated the creeds of popes and potentates who have favored the union of Church and State, and today, on the dividing line between Church and State, Freemasonry stands, with flaming sword, sublime and immovable. [Applause.]

Mr. Heflin is conspicuous for his ignorance, as the above passage from his speech proves. Certainly it is against justice that he should be permitted to spread this evidence of his ignorance at public expense. The Congressional Record should not be used to give wide currency to false statements in eulogy of an oath-bound, international, un-American, anti-Christian, revolutionary secret society.

Discourteous Neglect

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The letter of Mr. J. H. Meier, editor of the "Catholic Directory," mildly hinting that some of the clergy are occasionally slow in forwarding parish statistics, awakens an echoing chord within my bosom. Why is it that we priests are so remiss in answering letters? In the days when to send a letter any distance meant a considerable financial outlay it was laudable in persons vowed to evangelical poverty to write very few letters, and I can readily see the incongruity of a contemplative maintaining a large correspondence. But today to write a letter is not an expensive proceeding, nor are we priests, engaged in the active ministry, contemplatives. On the contrary, in a very true sense we are semi-public officials, from whom even the general public, rationabiliter petens, has a right to ask and receive information.

"Perhaps few of your readers," writes Mr. Meier, "realize how difficult it is to obtain data of any kind." I am one of the few, and hence I know that even our Catholic brethren, not to speak of others, have reason to complain of much remissness. If my memory is not at fault, Dr. Kirby, after several years of effort, was forced to abandon his projected "Directory of Catholic Charities," for the simple and sufficient reason that the great majority of the institutions paid no heed whatever to his inquiries. A similar effort of my own, projected on a local scale, came to grief for the same reason, nor was that my sole experience. Last winter, for instance, it was important that I learn the name and locality of the Catholic church nearest to a certain small city, which was without a church. I wrote to the pastor in what I took to be the nearest parish, then to another pastor in the neighborhood, and finally to a diocesan authority. After six weeks of waiting, the net result was the loss of my time, my enclosed stamped envelopes, and my patience. Addressing myself finally to the school-book department of a secular New York publishing house, the information was forwarded "with many kind wishes, etc.," by return mail. Of course, all the clergymen to whom I wrote may have been dead or following the army as chaplains, but the contrast seems instructive. I sometimes wonder if what we rage at occasionally, as "a studied neglect of Catholic matters," to quote one of your recent contributors, is not due to our gross discourtesy in neglecting to answer legitimate inquiries. Why, for instance, did so few Catholic colleges figure under the caption "What the Colleges Are Doing in the War," recently published in the New York Sun? Is it just to set down the writer of the article as a "bigot"? It is at least possible that the secretaries of certain Catholic colleges have not as yet learned that it is quite as discourteous to refuse to answer a letter as it is to refuse to answer a legitimate question put by word of mouth.

The Priest and the Laborer

To the Editor of AMERICA:

An old Pittsburgher once asked Andrew Carnegie, who was the most important person in the mill, the man of strength, of brains or of money? The canny Scot answered by asking which is the most important leg on a three-legged stool? Today the really influential man around our flaming steel plants is the priest, pastor of foreign laborers. Self-interest forces "speeding-up" general managers to heed those who, by every law of humanity and priestly charity, should use consecrated force to help the lowly sadly exploited by greed. Mexicans and negroes swarm around our mines and smoke-stacks making conditions worse. If these priests but realized their power to get decent living quarters for men on whom depend our bullets and battleships! The frightful infant-mortality in steel towns "where wealth accumulates and men decay" could be prevented by decent housing. In the clutter of boarders and bottles the poor babies lose their lives.

I know big men in the steel business with big hearts and brains who deplore these barbarous conditions. Properly urged, they would build homes as they helped build imposing churches in squalid streets. After the war, many of these "wretches born to work and weep" will return to Europe to the agricultural life they left, where their blood was not dried in their veins by the heat of furnaces.

Father Keating and Prohibition

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Father Keating's justification of moderate drinking (Catholic Mind, August 8, 1918) would be more satisfactory if he would make it on the ground that enjoyment in life is necessary for health, that where pleasure is sought as in food, drink, hunting, etc., it is not for its own sake, but in view of its aid to the higher good health, and that it is not necessarily to be avoided because often accidental, unexpected evil may ensue. That it is lawful to sacrifice health or life for a higher good of the soul or mind is no argument for sacrificing it for pleasure, as pleasure, which is a lower good. As Father Keating puts it the world would change its popular libel against the Jesuits into the charge that their theology allows us to do good that evil may result!

Religion and Americanization

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Brains, brawn and bullion make steel. In 1917, with Pittsburgh in the lead, steel tonnage reaching 40,000,000 broke all records. Unloading ore, charging flaming furnaces, Catholic laborers mostly from Southeastern Europe furnished the brawn, and plant managers and production engineers testify to their fidelity and worth. Into tired ears the boss cries Liberty Bonds and they buy. Uncle Sam asks flesh and blood, and their strong boys go to war without a murmur. These noble people love God and their many little children, who throng the parochial schools of this cosmopolitan diocese, where the Gospel is preached in sixteen different languages. Already the omnipresent Y. M. C. A. is arranging a plan of campaign for the mills, but our watchful, far-seeing Bishop whom certain soggarths say is too much interested in foreigners, will defeat efforts at Americanization minus religion. With admiration, Pittsburghers testify to the truth in the splendid, inspiring article of Mr. Happel, who would appreciate the real Americanization and religion being taught by lay people in remote villages and mining towns, by our active "Confraternity of Christian Doctrine."

Vassar and Catholicism

To the Editor of AMERICA:

A public high-school teacher, who recently had the pleasure of listening to an address by the head of the French department at Vassar, writes in a private letter of a later experience, which tells its own story:

> The other evening a Vassar girl (a non-Catholic), who has had this man as her French teacher for two years, was calling on me, and when I spoke of his talk told me that he took two periods last year, while the class was studying Les Misérables, to discourse about the narrowness, the opposition to progress in all lines, particularly in science; the domination over individual thought of the Catholic Church, to all of which he added a few remarks on his opinion as to the evils of celibacy amongst the clergy.
> "Utterly uncalled for," said my friend. The Vassar student continued:
> I was so indignant—particularly when he turned to a girl who is specializing in science, and said: "For instance, Miss X, if you were a Catholic, you could never have taken all the science you have so enjoyed,"—that I showed plainly my resentment of his attitude. At the close of the period he asked me to remain, and said: "Evidently you were not in sympathy with my remarks?"
> "Indeed, no!" she replied. "I cannot speak knowingly about the days of Victor Hugo, but I can say that conditions today are not like that, and you made sweeping statements which included the present. I have many Catholic friends and I regard them as the most truly broad, most progressive, most earnest seekers of the truth of all my acquaintances."

The professor replied: "I'd be glad to lend you some books upholding my views, which are the result of years of investigation on my part."

"Thank you, no!" my friend answered. To me she said: "Wasn't it woful that those other girls, who drank in eagerly every word he said and who knew no different, should have been subjected to that and have their views of Catholics distorted—perhaps for all time?"

Woful, indeed; is it not? No wonder the world is torn by conflict! And in spite of all the talk we hear about "unity" and "return to religion" and the like, I fear that questions of unity, of fair play even, are going to be harder than ever to settle after the war is over.

August 4th at Notre Dame

To the Editor of AMERICA:

A French statesman has given the following description of the celebration in Paris on August 4:

> The French Cardinals in a joint letter set aside today for public prayers for France and for the dead. A Mass was said at Notre Dame this morning at eleven o'clock, to which were invited the Government officials, the Diplomatic Corps, etc., etc.
> To the painful consternation of—I may say—everyone, our Government refused to be present. It also declined to be officially represented. Only a handful of Senators and Deputies were there to show for our elective bodies. A chief of staff represented Maréchal Joffre. In a long row stood the foreign Ambassadors, Sharp, Lord Derby, the Ambassadors of Italy, of Japan, the Ministers Plenipotentiary of the Allied nations. Even Prince Charoon, Minister of the King of Siam, answered Cardinal Amette's invitation.
> I can't say how mortified I was as regards these foreigners, most of whom I know, at the wilful absence of every member of our Government, and especially so in these terrible days, when battles rage on our invaded territory, when most people are stricken in their affections, and when prayer is more than ever necessary to give strength, and to console. It seems so evident that the leaders of the nation should have seen that it was their paramount duty to be present, if only out of consideration for the countless bereaved ones.
> In the immensity of the building, where the multitude could hardly be contained, the contrast was striking. The people prayed without regard to their ill-thinking Government. It was amazing! The spirit of the Resurrection was there strikingly visible, and seemed to raise the afflicted masses. One felt as if the powerful words of the Easter morning Gospel, "He is risen: He is not here," were in every mind, lifting all wounded hearts in a Divine ascension.

What a contrast between the Government and the people.

K. C. Hospital Work in France

To the Editor of AMERICA:

It may interest the readers of AMERICA to learn at first hand what the Knights of Columbus are doing for the wounded who are in an A. E. F. hospital in France. Almost any afternoon a man may appear in the wards with the familiar "K. C." on his collar and we all knew what that means. He goes about to each patient and gives everyone a few cigarettes, the most coveted of all gifts. One patient may have asked the day before for a pipe, some smoking tobacco or even some chewing tobacco. Our K. C. man is so anxious to do all in his power for the boys, that sure enough, he has come around with the coveted packages. Another day he brings besides the cigarettes, American chewing gum. A third afternoon he may come around with a basket of cherries or strawberries, the last being a great treat this year, fruit is so scarce and its price is so high. Then too I have seen real American candy being distributed in our ward. He even manages to procure ice-cream, though, as the use of milk and sugar is restricted, ice-cream is not to be had at all now even in the most expensive and fashionable Parisian hotels. But our boys are always treated better, thanks to their friends in America, than are the rich civilians. So one hot afternoon of the week our K. C. man appeared in the A. E. F. hospital, accompanied by two ladies, bringing a regular American ice-cream freezer, with saucers and spoons. To add to the patients' pleasure, some fine strawberries were also discovered.

But the treats furnished by the K. C. are not limited to the kind described. A graphophone with all the latest disks is brought into the ward, a charming lady comes with her guitar, and sings for the wounded soldiers, or some one just arrived from America, delights by telling the news from home and how all there are working in union with those at the front.

Some of the boys have lost their right arm; others have fractured or temporarily useless arms; so some kind lady connected with the Red Cross comes and writes letters home for them. Visitors are a great factor in the hospital life, and make up, in a small degree, for the absence of the loved members of each patient's family. Constantly one hears such remarks as: "It does a fellow good to see how much interest they take in us over there." "It makes up for home as much as possible." "It does one good to get back among people who show us such affection, and want us to enjoy ourselves and forget we are suffering." This part of our activities is helping win the war almost as much as artillery and aeroplanes for it keeps our boys' mental condition excellent.

Regarding the still more important subject of the spiritual welfare of our boys that is by no means neglected. A K. C. chaplain visits the hospital constantly and regularly and the boys have every opportunity given them for receiving the Sacraments and, when they are able, of assisting at Mass, as there is a chapel in the hospital where the Blessed Sacrament is reserved. Most of the boys profit by these advantages, and are only too glad to do so. We had the First Communion the other day of a boy confined to his bed. He knew his religion quite well and the K. C. chaplain completed his instruction, heard his first Confession and then gave him his First Communion. Though it was all very simple, there was a little fête however. Some who knew about the event, after supplying the first communicant with all necessary religious articles, brought him a basket of good things. Another boy wanted to make his First Communion too but he was sent away too soon to receive the necessary instructions, so he left with a letter from our chaplain to the one at the hospital to which the boy was sent. An older man, a wounded soldier, called to the nurse when he saw her distributing rosaries and said he was anxious to return to his religious practices, which he had left off years before. I think few Catholics, if any, leave the hospital without a rosary, a scapular medal and prayer book. Most of them lost everything when wounded and consequently have no longer many of the things they brought from home, but the K. C. supply these articles of piety and the nurses distribute them, and if our boys are called upon to make the supreme sacrifice, they always receive the Last Sacraments betimes.

Nurse in Red Cross Military Hospital.

Greek Catholics

To the Editor of AMERICA:

There is a valuable and widespread pamphlet of the Irish Messenger series, entitled "Vocations," by Rev. William Doyle, S.J., now in its fourth edition. On page 2 the author speaks of 270,000,000 Protestants and Greek Catholics to be brought into the true "Church." The expression "Greek Catholics" is not a happy one I am sure that Father Doyle had in mind, not the Greek Catholics who belong to the true Church, but the schismatics. We know that there are about 180,000,000 Protestants. According to Father Doyle, therefore, there are some 90,000,000 "Greek Catholics." Of course they are not united with Rome, as the total of Catholics of other rites than the Latin is 5,536,000 (Cf. Sandalgi, "The Uniate Oriental Churches," in the Ecclesiastical Review, February, 1918). In this article the total of "Non-Catholics in the Oriental Churches" is said to be 130,420,000. It is not, however, the incorrect statistics, but the expression "Greek Catholics" which concerns us.

"Greek Catholics" is, at least, an ambiguous term, and if not restricted, offends the Greek Catholic Uniates. It is true, that Russian schismatics like to style themselves Greek Catholics, but usually they call themselves Orthodox. But they are not Catholics in the strict sense, and today, at least, even in a material sense, they are not orthodox. Adrian Fortescue, recognized authority on the question of the Oriental Churches, does not call the Greek Catholic Uniates "Greek Catholics" but simply Uniates. (Cf. Dublin Review, 1917, "The Uniate Churches in Russia and Poland"). He suggests that we call the Ruthenians (Little Russians) Ukrainians as a nation, and reserve the word Ruthenian for their rite. But that will hardly do. If, as Father Fortescue says, Ruthenian, Ruthenus, Russus, is properly the same as Russian, and this expresses a nationality, why should we call the rite of the Ukrainians, the "Ruthenian rite"?

In the "Catholic Encyclopedia," Vol. VI, p. 744, Mr. Andrew J. Shipman, an authority of great weight on the Oriental question starts his article, "Greek Catholics in America," by saying: "The Uniate Churches of the Byzantine or Greek rite, etc.," reserving the expression Greek Catholic for the Uniates. The schismatic churches are called in the "Encyclopedia" "Greek churches" but not "Greek Catholic churches." But this concerns only the Byzantine branch. What became of the Armenian and Antiochian-Syrian branch and Alexandrian (Coptics and Abyssinians) branch? There are both schismatics and Uniates among them. Hence would it not be better to call the schismatics simply schismatics and add "of the Byzantine, or the Armenian or the Antiochian-Syrian, etc., rite"?

And why should we not call the Uniates simply Catholics of this and that rite? So, for instance, we might say of the Ukrainians in the United States that the Americans of Ukrainian descent are Catholics of the Greek Slavonian rite.

I waive the question, whether we should call ourselves Roman Catholics or simply Catholics. Some Episcopalians call themselves American Catholics, but they are certainly not Catholics, only Protestants. But if we call ourselves Roman Catholics, the word "Roman" does not mean the Latin rite, but refers to the head of the true Church of Christ, the Bishop of Rome, the Pope. In this sense the Uniates among the Ukrainians, or Armenians, or Syrians, etc., are certainly as good Roman Catholics as the readers of the Irish Messenger. Our good Ukrainian Uniates in the United States and elsewhere are ambitious enough to be considered "Catholics" and their splendid Greek-Slavonian rite is a bridge between the Greek-Slavonian schismatics and Rome, the head of the Catholic Church, but not a bridge to the Latin rite. The martyrology of the Ukrainian Catholics places them on the most glorious pages in the history of the One, Holy, Catholic and Apostolic Church.

Gatherer's Wise Prayer

THOSE who use the Breviary were reading last month in the responsories to the lessons of Matins the beautiful prayer which Gatherer, in the thirtieth chapter of the Book of Proverbs, offers to God: "Two things I have asked of Thee," declared this "most foolish of men" as he humbly styles himself, "deny them not to me before I die. Remove far from me vanity and lying words. Give me neither beggary nor riches; give me only the necessaries of life, lest perhaps being filled, I should be tempted to deny, and say, who is the Lord? or being compelled by poverty, I should steal and forswear the name of my God."

As the wise Gatherer prayed in days of old, so are thousands of courageous and clean-hearted youths and maidens praying today. On reaching the age when they can think for themselves, many young people are given to see, by light from heaven, the emptiness and deceitfulness of the world's promises, and looking about them they note what a menace wealth often proves to the faith and morals of those who possess it, and they likewise observe how destitution, on the other hand, frequently drives those suffering from it to the commission of crimes. If these young men and women also have the wit to perceive that whatever is best and most precious in life, such as love, faith, purity, honor, reverence and kindness, all endure when material things pass away, they will perhaps be seized with a desire to embrace a state of life that will not only remove them as far as possible from the world's "vanity and lying words," that will not only provide them all their days with "the necessaries of life," and safeguard them from the perils both of wealth and of poverty, but will also richly endow their souls with those fair possessions which will remain theirs forever.

Such longings in the hearts of youths and maidens often mark the beginning of a Divine call to the religious life and should be seriously heeded. For in approving and blessing those Orders and Congregations in which men or women, by taking the three vows, bind themselves to observe the evangelical counsels, the Church, like a loving mother, aims to satisfy as fully as it can be satisfied in this world, the longing of the human heart for peace and security in the midst of turbulence and change and to provide within the walls of the cloister a fertile garden for the cultivation of all those virtues that give human life its greatest dignity and beauty.

Essential Employment

THE Priorities Committee of the War Industries Board has classed the moving-picture industry among the "essentials" in the present national crisis. In giving its decision the Board imposed the following regulations:

Each member of the industry will pledge himself to discontinue all non-essential production and eliminate all wasteful methods. Old film must be scrapped and reclaimed and returned to the manufacturers for use in the manufacture of new film.

Only wholesome pictures are to be produced. To save chemicals used in the production of explosives, only one negative of a single picture will be made unless the picture is for export, when two will be permitted.

The clause calling for wholesome pictures only, is among the best of the regulations. Moreover, no new theaters or new equipment will be allowed during the war, and manufacturers are advised to repair existing machines rather than to purchase new ones. The manufacture of new iron and tin containers for films will be discontinued and substitutes will be used in order to conserve these metals.

In contrast to this decision on essential industries a most surprising verdict was given by the local Council of Defense, of McIntosh, South Dakota, in the following letter to Father Joseph P. Halpin:

REV. JOSEPH P. HALPIN

Dear Sir:

Under the instructions as laid down by the State Council of Defense, acting on behalf of the Government, it has been decided by the local Council of Defense that it is better for you to register as coming under the requirements of those employed in non-essential callings. . . . We cannot see where this will do you any harm, and if your case is not justly classified you will be excused. . . . C. H. BELKNAPP.

It is not stated by what authority this local Board classifies so airily industries and callings. It purports to act in behalf of the Government that has called hundreds of priests into the Chaplains' Corps to exercise their ministry among our fighting men, while hundreds of others, anxious to serve with the forces on land and sea, must stay with the second line of defense at home, heartening and consoling by their ministrations those who have sent their loved ones into the fiery field of battle. If the local board in South Dakota can class the priesthood among non-essential callings then all the efforts of the Washington Government for the moral welfare of soldier and civilian during these days of national stress are just so much waste energy. And if any local board can determine what is an essential calling there is no sense of having a Priorities Committee of the War Industries Board or in fact any general Board in Washington at all.

A Catholic Publicity Bureau

THE August number of the Macon Catholic brings further interesting details concerning the Catholic Laymen's Association of Georgia. For the Association and its benefits, the Catholics of Georgia must thank their opponents in their native State. Indirectly, at least, it owes its existence to the attacks and slanders directed against the Faith. For several years in Georgia the dogmas, the practices, the Sacraments, the history and priesthood of the Catholic Church had been the butt of calumny and ridicule. The writings of an unprincipled pamphleteer, master of the coarsest arts of invective and jibe, had poisoned the minds of the people. They had done incalculable harm. When the attack was more than usually vile and indecent, spasmodic efforts had been made to offset its influence. Not until the iniquitous Convent Inspection bill, the outcome of anti-Catholic prejudice fostered by this coarse-minded agitator, had been passed by the State Legislature and signed by the Governor, did the Catholics of Georgia decide that the un-American and odious campaign so systematically carried on must be offset by a vigorous counter-offensive. Widespread publicity had been given to the charges against the Church. Publicity just as widespread must be given to the defense and the refutation. A lie travels fast. It is proverbially hard to run down. The Catholics of Georgia have proved that it can be done. Their Catholic Laymen's Association organized a publicity bureau to fight in the cause of truth and fair play.

The press, the pamphlet, the booklet had been used to poison the minds of Georgians against the Church. The same means were turned to account to tell them what she really is. A permanent publicity bureau in Augusta carefully watches the Georgia press and its attitude towards the Catholic Church. The bureau is eminently practical in its methods. It supplies the press of the State with Catholic news. It refutes the charges which still crop up against the Faith. It secures space in the leading papers for the exposition of Catholic doctrine. If an editor says "something nice" about Catholics or the Church in true southern style, he is thanked for his courtesy. If he has erred as to his facts or his conclusions, he is calmly and judiciously shown the error of his ways.

Conditions in Georgia are not the same as in New York or Illinois. Local conditions, the bureau realized, must be met. Arguments and matter must be used that will suit Georgians living on the banks of the Savannah, Ocmulgee and Chattahooche Rivers. The educated classes had to be reached first. So 20,000 Georgians of influence, education and social standing were selected and to them the Association sent such pamphlets as would at least clear the way for a better understanding. One was "A Plea for Peace," a dispassionate appeal for harmony between citizens of the same State. Others were "Catholics in Georgia," "Catholics and the Confederacy," etc. The bureau also makes it one of its chief duties to answer all questions on Catholic faith and practice. The answers dissipated many a misconception on such subjects as the Oath of the Knights of Columbus, the Jesuits, the Catholic Church and the Bible, the Ne Temere Decree, the Spanish Inquisition, the Catholics and the American Government, and the Massacre of St. Bartholomew.

The Association has not yet done away with anti-Catholic prejudice in Georgia. But it has met an evil in a very practical way. It is fighting the enemy with his own weapons and gradually diminishing the number and the violence of his attacks. The Catholics of Georgia have every reason to be proud of what they have done. The Catholic Laymen's Association has the hearty approval and blessing of the Bishop. The official report of the Knights of Columbus Religious Prejudice Commission pays it a well-deserved tribute and holds up the Georgia plan as a model for every other State in the union. The Bishop of Natchez says that the work it is doing is of "great importance to every Catholic living in the South." The Georgia plan is practical and effective. It ought not to be confined to the limits of a single State. It should become national in scope and influence.

"Non-Essential" Novels

THOSE who recall what a deplorable welter of erotic and pornographic fiction was flooding Europe and America during the years just before the war, will also remember, no doubt, that one good result of the sudden call to arms was to make people much less interested than formerly in that kind of literature. Realizing that the world's freedom was gravely menaced by Prussia's ruthless militarism, both the publishers and readers of salacious fiction turned instead to books bearing on the war. The general cessation of interest in sex-novels heightened, without question, the morale of the civil population of all the belligerent countries, and particularly France, from which the finest books on the war have been steadily coming.

But during the past year a reaction seems to have set in. Both at home and abroad a lamentable recrudescence of the sex-novel's vogue can be observed. A New York publisher who exercises, as a rule, considerable care regarding the character of the books he brings out, has unfortunately seen fit to offer an English "war-novel" so-called, which, notwithstanding the chorus of praise greeting the book from such papers as the Boston Evening Transcript, a courageous reviewer in the Book News Monthly called in unmistakable terms, > a plain, unvarnished tale of a courtesan . . . the flattering character that he [the author] bestows upon this woman of the streets does not do justice to any ideal of womanhood. The woman who preys on men exists, of course, but need we bother to study so deeply her psychology? Or can we think favorably of the man who protects her and permits her to ply her trade? Mr. Bennett makes a strange muddle of religion and immorality that is not even vastly entertaining. In the midst of the great war it would seem that a man like Bennett might spend his time to better purpose than in writing something that is little above the standards of trash.

"Here [in England]," wrote the author to his American publisher, > a few of the lower-class papers have gone for it rather heavily as being pornographic and unsuitable for war-time, etc., etc. The higher-class papers, however, with the exception of the Star, have treated it very well indeed, and I expect that next week it will have reached a sale of 20,000 copies at least.

In the opinion of the London Catholic Book Notes the objectionable book "calls for a protest, not only on Catholic grounds but on those of morality, and such protest has been made, both by the Catholic Truth Society and by the Westminster Catholic Federation."

The salacious English novel under stricture seems to have its counterpart in a highly "psychological" piece of eroticism recently "translated from the 100th French edition" and "already in its second edition" over here. Several of our little American story-writers, too, out of an ambition, perhaps, to emulate their more capable fellow-craftsmen of Europe, have lately written flamboyantly advertised "sex-novels" which are little better than crude appeals to the reader's basest passions and are quite unrelieved by any notable literary excellence whatever.

There is much discussion just now regarding "essential" and "non-essential" industries. Whatever difference of opinion may prevail as to the "military value" of films, victrolas, and limousines, no sensible person, surely, will hold that the publication of novels like those above described is an "essential" industry. It is anything but that. The printing of such books in large editions not only wastes labor and material better devoted to some useful kind of war-work, but the wide diffusion of erotic novels practically gives aid and comfort to the enemy by weakening the moral stamina of their readers. If we are to win the war self-sacrifice and endurance are just as necessary for our civilians as for our soldiers. But the reading of erotic fiction will ruin the vigor of both those important virtues. Let the publication of salacious novels therefore be declared a "non-essential" industry.

The Florida Schools and the Governor

THE Tampa Morning Tribune prints some interesting letters that passed between the Governor of Florida and the Superintendent of Public Instruction, of Dade City, Florida.. The Chief Executive on reading in a Florida paper that Sisters were teaching in the public schools of Dade City reminded the superintendent that "one of the principles on which I was elected was that I would have no Catholics teaching in our public schools." The superintendent's reply was as follows:

DADE CITY, FLA., August 9, 1918.

HON. S. J. CATTS, Governor, Tallahassee, Florida.

DEAR GOVERNOR CATTS.—I am in receipt of your letter of the seventh instant, with which you enclose advertisement of John S. Flanagan, clipped from the Florida Grower. I am satisfied that the statement in that advertisement is true; for, while I do not remember to have made inquiry as to the church affiliations of any of the teachers of Pasco County, I do know that some of the teachers employed wore the distinctive garb usually worn by the Catholic Sisters; and especially was this true at San Antonio, where nearly all of the patrons of, and children attending, the public school are Catholics. However, these teachers held valid certificates granted to them under the laws of the State, which certificates had never been revoked, and, so far as I knew, there was no good reason why they should not be employed.

As to whether there will be Catholic teachers employed in this county for the ensuing school year, I cannot say. The only strongly Catholic communities in this county are those in the San Antonio and St. Joseph districts, and, so far as I am informed, no Catholic Sister has ever taught in the county except in these districts. The teachers nominated by the trustees of these two districts for the coming term have already been rejected by the county board. I do not think the members of the county board would want to say openly, or in writing, that their reason for rejecting these teachers is that they are Catholic Sisters, for I am informed that a mandamus suit is about to be instituted, in which it will be alleged that the ground of their rejection was that they are Catholic Sisters.

The selection of school teachers in this State is the function of the board of public instruction, and not that of the superintendent. It is true, that after a teacher has been appointed by the board, the contract is executed for the board by the superintendent, but I do not know of any authority vested in me as superintendent to refuse to execute such a contract after I have been directed to do so by the board. However, in deference to your wishes and the "principles upon which you were elected," if the law gives me the authority—and I assume that you would not have me transgress the law—to inquire of prospective teachers as to their religious convictions or church affiliations, I shall be glad to exercise that authority. But I would like to be able to quote to them the law upholding my acts, and I will appreciate it if you will give me any citations of law on that point.

With kind personal regards, I am,

J. W. SANDERS.

The letter was not at all satisfying to Governor Catts who sent the subjoined answer:

TALLAHASSEE, FLA., August 15, 1918.

MR. J. W. SANDERS, Dade City, Fla.:

DEAR SIR.—I have your letter of recent date in regards to the articles of the Florida Grower. I have your letter in which you explain conditions as they exist at San Antonio. I do not think that your explanations are satisfactory, and I ask you to go carefully into this matter as far as the school contracts are concerned for another year, for I was elected on the proviso that no Catholics taught in the public schools of this State, and I intend to carry that out to the letter, and if any Catholics are employed in the public schools in San Antonio or any other place in your county next year, I shall certainly hold it to your charge and to the charge of the county commissioners or school trustees of your county. You will, therefore, read this letter to the trustees of your county and notify them that they must put Protestants in the public schools of Pasco County. With best wishes, I am, yours very truly,

SIDNEY J. CATTS, Governor.

The county school authorities are face to face with a serious problem, as Regulation Ten of the State School Board reads:

> The State Board of Education earnestly admonishes county boards of public instruction to exercise great caution in the employment of teachers, that they may not subject themselves to the charge of being influenced by personal or political favoritism, sectarianism, or by ties of relationship.

Section Six of the bill of rights, as embodied in the State Constitution, forbids that preference be given by law to any religious sect or denomination.

If the Governor's wish prevails the bill of rights in the State Constitution will become a mere scrap of paper. The Florida problem is of interest to thinking people throughout this nation which is pledged to shatter a despotism that threatens the world's safety. What of the safety of our democratic institutions, if despotism sits securely in a Governor's chair?

THE CARDINAL FLOWER

COMING into bloom when the midsummer vegetation is growing dusty, this plant fills the eye with the richness of its dark green leafage toned into perfect accord with the glowing hue of its flowers—their color a truly royal one, of unusual depth as well as brilliancy. There is no other wild flower which approaches it in color, so vivid is the peculiarly formed blossom. The poets have hit upon the happy likeness of a flame:

The cardinal, warming the frost with her blaze.—Alice Cary.

Cardinals, flashing crimson fire.—Lucy Larcom.

When fades the cardinal-flower, whose heat-red bloom
Glows like a living coal upon the green
Of the midsummer meadows.—Richard Watson Gilder.

When the cardinal, fiery red,
Passion-weary, droops his head.—Julia A. Wolcott.

Although their color is more appropriately described as flame-like, Lucy Larcom speaks of "cardinal flowers blooming red as blood," and William Ellery Channing in "Autumn" sings:

The petals of the cardinal
  Fleck with their crimson drops the stream,
As spots of blood the banquet hall
  In some young knight's romantic dream.

This species (lobelia cardinalis) is a native American species of the genus lobelia, named from M. Lobel, botanist and physician to King James I. There are about 225 species of this genus, widely distributed, and some of which are cultivated, such as the great blue lobelia, often called high belia; with about twenty-nine other genera. Lobelia forms a family of about 600 species, which abound particularly in the Hawaiian Islands. One member of the family, Indian tobacco, lobelia inflata, has medicinal fame, but the plant we know best is the cardinal flower:

The red lobelia lit a fire, and flung
The embers all around a shady dell.—Edith M. Thomas.

In July, the blossoms begin to appear, and in August the plant is in its prime, while in October it will still be found warming many a cosy nook in the forest dells, on the edge of pastures where the partial shade of the neighboring woods relieves the bright red in a startling contrast:

Underneath the pine's tall spire
Cardinal-blossoms burn like fire.—Lucy Larcom.

It prefers a light shade, and is usually found in low moist ground and along the margin of small streams. So frequently is it seen beside a pool of water that Dr. Holmes' verse exactly describes its environment:

The cardinal, and the blood-red spots
  Its double in the stream;
As if some wounded eagle's breast
  Slow throbbing o'er the plain
Had left its airy path impressed
  In drops of scarlet rain.

This glorious flower, with its widely flaring flanges, has reminded one poet of swaying bells: "And cardinals ring out a richer chime," says John H. Thomson, writing of "Late Autumn," while they as fittingly remind Whittier of banners:

And the tall pennons of the cardinal-flowers
Hang motionless upon their upright staves.

The long corolla tube, with a touch of yellow at its tip, adds the necessary dash of color to this autumnal blossom to make it a sunset in epitome, rounding off the summer's closing:

Whence is yonder flower so strangely bright?
  Would the sunset's last reflected shine
Flame so red from that dead flush of light?
  Dark with passion is its lifted line,
Hot, alive, amid the failing night.—Dora Read Goodale.

An unknown poet, "E. S. F.," some years ago, devoted a sonnet entitled "The Cardinal Flower," to this blossom, which being native to this country, is quite aptly compared with two other strictly American products:

No purer joy the glad midsummer holds
  For those who love to seek in secret nooks
  Of wood or mead, or by the marge of brooks,
The hidden treasures she for love unfolds,
Than on a morn when skies are perfect blue
  And clouds are far and fleecy, loitering slow,
  To follow some wild streamlet's wayward flow
And spy afar, O flower of matchless hue,
Thy wondrous brightness flashing through the green
  As if a flock of red birds stooped to drink
  In airy flutter at the brooklet's brink,
Or as a troop of Indian girls half seen,
Half hid, were wading in the crystal stream
While through the leaves their scarlet broideries gleam.

The early French Canadians were so struck with its beauty that they sent the plant to France as a specimen of what the wilds of the New World could yield. Perhaps at that time it received its English name which likens it to the gorgeously attired dignitaries of the Church. It should not be gathered ruthlessly, lest it be exterminated, an ever-present danger to many of our native plants, particularly if beautiful. It is found in the Catskills; is common in the Berkshires, and grows here and there over the country in a latitude, generally speaking, not north of Albany. But though quite widely distributed, it is not common enough to endure wholesale gathering and uprooting. It has been cultivated from the seed with considerable success, and so brightens many a home garden; its long, narrow corolla tube makes it a humming-bird blossom, and such plants in a garden will be found to attract the glowing ruby-throat, who, balancing himself before the slender tube, easily licks out all the honey which the bees found inaccessible. In the language of flowers, this plant stands for "distinction," and quite appropriately, since as "M. B. A." writes:

They seem in their calm beauty to uprear
  Their haughty heads and blush with conscious pride;
As if the mosses, ferns and all things near
  Were but as slaves and vassals at their side.

HARRIETTE WILBUR.

REVIEWS

Fighting France. By STEPHANE LAUZANNE. With an introduction by JAMES M. BECK, LL.D. Translated by JOHN L. B. WILLIAMS, A.M. New York: D. Appleton & Co. $1.50.

This book, by the powerful editor of Le Matin, Paris, will at once attract a large circle of readers by the interest attaching to the author. Editor of Le Matin since 1898, he became Lieutenant in the Territorial Infantry under the obligation of universal service, taking part in the first battle of the Marne and later before Verdun. In 1916 he was recalled to serve the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and in October of that year came to the United States as head of the Official Bureau of French Information, where he has remained up to the present, an unofficial Ambassador of France.

The opening chapters are descriptive of early mobilization days. The author emphasizes the absence of hysteria on the part of the people of Paris, the predominance of moral force at the battle of the Marne over mere material resources contrasted with the German lack of it under the temptation of wine too easily obtained and the delusion that there was no French army to put a stop to their pillaging and burning.

Aptly chosen stories and letters portray the supreme spirit of sacrifice everywhere exhibited, on the field and behind the lines, by the mothers and sisters of soldiers, as well as the heroes themselves—Catholics, Protestants and Jews—who, with a prayer in their hearts and on their lips, wrote of their longing to die for France on the field of honor. A vivid description is given of the superb courage of a young orphan girl, Marcelle Semer. By opening a drawbridge she stopped a whole army corps for twenty-four hours, later assisting in the escape of sixteen prisoners, for which she was condemned to death, to be saved at the last moment from the fate of Edith Cavell by the re-entrance of the French into the village. Today she wears the Croix de Guerre and the medal of the Legion of Honor.

The third chapter gives a complete refutation of the oft-repeated statement that France was "bled white." The army in the field today is compared with the numbers of 1914; statistics are given of the long list of munitions supplied to the Allied armies up to January, 1918; the present satisfactory condition of the French Colonial empire is contrasted with the disappearance of the German; finally there is a detailed account of the splendid response made by France to Serbia's call for assistance, which prompted M. Vesnitch, Serbian Minister to France, to say that "Serbia's heart will remain attached through all the centuries to France."

An important contribution is made in the last chapter relative to the German claims on Alsace-Lorraine and several appendices deal with the questions of the origin of the war, Germany's methods of warfare, her treatment of occupied territory and her understanding of future peace.

An Ethical Philosophy of Life Presented in Its Main Outlines. By FELIX ADLER. New York: D. Appleton & Co. $3.00.

This book is a theory of ethics, with the history of the system in the shape of an autobiographical introduction, forming at once its most interesting and intelligible part.

To the scholastic philosopher, certain things in the book stand out almost immediately as defects: First, a haziness of definition. For instance, the author after throwing over in succession the tenets of the Hebrew religion, after delving into Emerson and other philosophers, in search of a guide of life, and after examining and rejecting the claims of Christianity, has found at length, satisfaction in the nebulousness of the following "first principles of ethics": (a) Act as a member of the ethical manifold. (b) Act so as to achieve uniqueness. (c) Act so as to elicit in another the unique quality characteristic of him as a fellow-member of the infinite whole. Secondly: Arbitrary redefining of old terms; viz., "Dogma is the conviction of one man forced authoritatively on another." Thirdly: A confusion between philosophy and revealed religion which led the writer to approach the study of Christianity in a rationalistic and hence impotent frame of mind. Fourthly: Statements as curious as this one: "It is believed that others may find the practical suggestions as to conduct of life . . . helpful . . . without . . . adopting the philosophy from which the precepts are derived."

The theory itself in so far as it is gleanable, is an expansion of the "inviolability of the human personality." The writer fathers this principle with much evident pride and does not seem aware of the fact that it is a commonplace among scholastic ethicians; "inviolability" however, not in the extreme Kantian sense which Dr. Adler ultimately, though unwittingly, accepts, i.e. "Man is an end in se," but in the far more rational sense that one man may not use another purely as a means because both are coordinately related in the scheme of things to a common last end. In other words man is an end per se, as far as any other man is concerned, but he is not existing in and for himself alone. The two doctrines are neighbors with tremendous and irreconcilable differences. And in the fact that Dr. Adler was so near the truth after a persistent and enduring search and yet went so wide of it, there is pathos; especially, as is clear, from the tonal sincerity of the style no one can doubt but that the truth alone has been his constant care, through ways devious and long.

Sea Power and Freedom. A Historical Study. By GERARD FIENNES. With an Introduction by BRADLEY ALLEN FISKE, Rear Admiral, U. S. N. Illustrated. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3.50.

"He that commands the sea, hath great liberty to take as much or as little of the war as he will" were Bacon's words. The full import of this sentence is realized when the reader has closed Gerard Fiennes' very readable volume which reviews naval history prior to 1660 and subsequent to 1783, the limiting dates of Admiral Mahan's well-known works. As the great war goes on it becomes more and more evident to the observant mind that on sea power rests the hope of victory, for if the turning point of the struggle is to be forced by American arms, it is only by dint of sea power that American arms can deliver the blow 3,000 miles from American soil. We have had the lesson brought home to us in no uncertain terms that at all times security and prosperity as really as victory in war, depend upon the power to use the sea.

In these pages the author outlines the general development of sea power in the ancient world, and the process by which maritime supremacy crystallized around the British Isles. It is his contention that since Britain has held the first place as a naval power she has saved more wars than she has fought, and has been the instrument of peace and liberty, keeping open the highway of the deep for seafaring men of every clime. Mr. Fiennes' conclusion is that this war will not end war. Human passions will survive and when the bleeding nations of Europe have recovered from their wounds, national ambitions and jealousies will follow fast upon recovery. Internal troubles are ahead of us, for our ambition, the author believes will be to turn earth into heaven by social and political changes. Real permanent peace will depend on the use of sea power by the freedom-loving nations of the globe. To them can be committed the maintenance of true freedom of the seas.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

When Blessed Edmund Campion was at Dublin University about the year 1570 he wrote for the students a Latin essay entitled "Homo Academicus" or "The Model Student," which he subsequently revised and delivered as an oration to the seminarians at Douay. The excellent translation of this little masterpiece which Father John F. Quirk made some years ago is reprinted in the September 8 issue of the Catholic Mind along with a glowing eulogy of Campion, whom Father Quirk proposes as the pattern and patron of our Catholic students, and a sketch of his heroic career. Describing the "Homo Academicus" the translator remarks:

The picture drawn of the model student is always engaging and attractive, sometimes stimulating, now and then eloquent with the eloquence of deeds. The lessons taught by the plan of education advocated are solid, and there is no effort at disguise of the plea of the author, which is for an education that places the righteous man of action before the man of mere ideas and aims at rounding off the whole man and his faculties by training them, not one but all, and training them harmoniously. The sketch of the model student is merely a means to an end; the real purpose beyond is to set forth the need and urge the plea for a full and even education of youth.

The pamphlet is just the thing to put into the hands of boys and youths entering high school or college this fall.

The Holy See has lately granted a remarkable privilege to the well-known Catholic publishing house of P. J. Kenedy & Sons, in giving them leave to bring out in this country the new "Missale Romanum" and the complete annotated edition of the "Codex Juris Canonici," as works of this kind have always been published hitherto only in Europe. The Code will be out this month. Two other books Kenedy will publish before long are "The World Problem, Capital, Labor and the Church," by Father Husslein of AMERICA's staff, and "The Hand of God, Theology for the People," by Father Scott. The Yale University Press announces a translation of Henri Bordeaux's biography of Georges Guynemer, the French "Ace of Aces," which will appear this fall. Dodd, Mead will bring out Henri Fabre's "The Sacred Beetle and Others"; John Lane will publish Chesterton's "The Superstition of Divorce," and Helen Parry Eden's new book of poems, "Coal and Candlelight." Benziger's coming publications include "His Luckiest Year," another of Father Finn's "Lucky Bob" stories; "Your Soul's Salvation," by Father Garesché; the Rev. F. X. Lasance's "Manna of the Soul" and "The Prisoner of Love"; "Outline Meditations," by Madame Cecilia and the useful "Catholic Home Annual for 1919."

Mr. Paul Bewsher is a pious British flying officer who writes these stanzas on "The Dawn Patrol":

The fresh, cold wind of dawn blows on my face
As in the sun's raw heart I swiftly fly,
  And watch the seas glide by.
Scarce human seem I, moving through the skies,
And far removed from warlike enterprise—
  Like some great gull on high
Whose white and gleaming wings beat on through space.
Then do I feel with God quite, quite alone,

High in the virgin morn, so white and still
  And free from human ill:
My prayers transcend my feeble earthbound plaints—
As though I sang among the happy Saints
  With many a holy thrill—
As though the glowing sun were God's bright Throne.

"The Pilgrimage of Life" (Herder, $1.00), by the Rev. Albert Muntsch, S.J., is a volume of ascetical essays. The author treats of almost all the spiritual ills to which the soul is heir and shows how each malady may be alleviated or cured. The thoughts in general are familiar, but their presentation is rather unique. The essays, sixty-three in number, are short and the truths taught are illustrated by quotations from the poets, illustrations from every-day life and citations from the modern newspaper, the New York Times, displacing "The Spiritual Meadow," and Lord Tennyson, the Abbot Moses. The Holy Scriptures and the writings of Catholic ascetics, however, are by no means neglected.——In his excellent pamphlet, "Une preuve facile de l'Existence de Dieu: l'ordre du Monde" (Paris, Beauchesne), Père Tonquédec sets forth as clearly and as fully as is possible in the compass of a few pages the argument drawn from the order of the world to establish the existence of God. In his exposition of this popular proof the author bases his conclusions on the data afforded by a biological study of the heart and the stomach. A detailed refutation of the objections urged by the evolutionists and by those who would ascribe intelligence to all things is then subjoined. The concluding section, that aims at showing how the apparent disorders of the world, or the dysteleologics, as they are sometimes called, are really only another manifestation of design, has been particularly well written.

There are several good poems in Paul Scott Mowrer's "Hours of France in Peace and War" (Dutton. $1.00). The shorter poems in the quiet strain are perhaps the best, their simple, personal note striking home with a deep meaning, but the touch of realism in some of the war verses is overdone. "A Wind That Blows from Picardy," which runs as follows, perhaps deserves a place amongst the poems of the great war:

Dark-eyed girl in the garden close,
  Hemming the sheet so fine and white,
Why do you start when falls a rose?
  The full-blown rose was his delight.

Brown-haired woman, quiet and wan,
  Pressing a babe to the heavy breast—
The breast he loved to slumber on—
  Why do you stir with strange unrest?

Gray-haired mother, kneeling alone,
  Plucking the weeds from the pansy-bed—
The gentle flowers he called his own—
  Why do you pause and lift your head?

A wind that blows from Picardy—
  From Picardy, where lie the slain—
A wind that blows from Picardy
  Is breathing low beside the lane.

SOCIOLOGY

"Votes for Women"

FAR be it from me to refer with discourtesy to "votes for women." With Sydney Smith, I should as soon speak disrespectfully of the equator. Both are said to be facts, and to heap opprobrium upon a fact, even were I so minded, is a bootless proceeding. For, as Quintilian tells us in his "Institutes," a fact is ever an awkward opponent in a dispute, and is no more altered by what I think about it than the binominal theorem is altered by the weather. In New York, as in other of the sovereign commonwealths of this Union, the weaker vessel has been entrusted with the vote. My best policy, therefore, is to make the best of what many consider a bad lot. I can hardly conceive that women can make a worse use of the vote than many self-styled lords of creation have done, and I sincerely hope, first, that they will teach men to vote wisely but not too often, and next, that the Elysium which they have promised as the result of votes for women may be speedily realized. That is the highest point to which I can screw my optimism, and I do not see that it can be higher.

Miss Christabel Pankhurst

BUT, putting aside the debates that may now be assigned to ancient history, it is surely permissible to state, especially when requested by a gloating lady-voter, an opinion of certain grounds upon which the extension of the electorate to women has been sought. A lady who evinces her wisdom by residing in the remote West, far removed from the haunts and littleness of man, sends a menacing bundle containing a current monthly magazine, a page from the Suffragette, and a dozen newspaper clippings, most of which deal crudely with the topic of crime. Thus at one fell blow am I put in possession of an armory. Place aux dames is an excellent rule, and although I am tempted to begin with Richard Le Gallienne's "Woman's Fight for Freedom," I resist the lure and turn to an article by the redoubtable Miss Christabel Pankhurst.

The precise bearing of Miss Pankhurst's reflections upon the desirability of votes for women is not clear. The Suffragette, it seems, has been publishing a series of papers on a subject which engages the attention of physicians, moralists and legislators, but which is decidedly out of place in a periodical intended for general circulation. As far as can be gathered from the arguments presented by Miss Pankhurst, it appears that the New York Police Department intervened to prevent the sale of this publication; a course of action which will commend itself to any citizen endowed with the rudiments of common-sense. But it did not commend itself to Miss Pankhurst. Quoting from Kneeland's earlier survey, as if it referred to the time in question (October, 1913), Miss Pankhurst more than intimates that the Suffragette was suppressed because it came between the police and their graft, and interfered with "the traffic in white slaves." It might follow from this relation that the vote should be taken from the men whose apathy makes possible a corrupt police force; but in condemning the police for suppressing improper literature, it does not seem that Miss Pankhurst presents a convincing argument in favor of votes for women. If all women thought and wrote like Miss Pankhurst, the opposite conclusion might well be drawn.

Le Gallienne, Bebel, and St. Paul

NOR does Mr. Le Gallienne argue more convincingly. His thesis seems to be that woman is a slave whose only emancipation lies through the vote. No confirmed misogynist ever said a worse thing against our mothers and sisters. We are content, most of us, to believe that the vote would have added little to the qualities which made us love them. But a poet has no kinship with deep political problems, and, delicately perceiving the inconguity, Le Gallienne contents himself with paraphrasing that bitter enemy of Christianity, the German Socialist, Bebel. With a cocksureness which would be offensive even in one reciting the multiplication table, the poet denounces celibacy as an "unsavory mental disease," opposition to divorce as "insulting nonsense," and finds in St. Paul a superstitious fanatic. Carefully thumbing his Bebel, Mr. Le Gallienne discovers that the Apostle of the Gentiles "made it scripturally unlawful for woman to develop her own intellect."

Now it is easier to find courtesy in a subway guard than historical accuracy in Bebel, and Mr. Le Gallienne, although an expert in trochees and dactyls, cannot rise higher than his source. From the first century of the Christian era down to the present time, if one thing is clear, it is that women have persistently disregarded St. Paul's alleged prohibition. Worse, in this shocking conduct, they have been aided, abetted, approved and applauded by the Catholic Church. And the Catholic Church has ever been held a stickler for St. Paul's opinions on the proper subjection of man as well as woman to the due order of things. If St. Paul forbade woman to "develop her own intellect," how can we explain St. Thecla, the Apostle's own convert, skilled in science and philosophy, and commended by one of the Fathers for her "eloquence, and the ease, strength, sweetness and learning of her discourse"? It was Lois and Eunice who taught the Scriptures to Timothy, St. Paul's great disciple. A work of love and piety was this, but in the doing these good women perforce developed their own intellects, nor do they seem to have drawn upon themselves the anathema of the Apostle. This is fair testimony from St. Paul's own time.

Ignorant Women and Voteless

IGNORANCE has never been accounted a virtue by the Catholic Church. Despite the alleged prohibition of St. Paul, Catherine of Alexandria is famous for learning as well as sanctity, and neither was infused from on high. She worked for both. St. Macrina taught St. Basil and St. Gregory of Nyssa. St. Fulgentius was educated by his mother, who, to safeguard the purity of the boy's diction, taught him Homer and Menander before allowing him to undertake Latin. St. Jerome notes with admiration the accuracy with which St. Eustochium spoke and wrote Hebrew. Evidently these holy women, although they knew St. Paul well, were unaware that he had forbidden them to develop their intellects.

Something of the depth of Mr. Le Gallienne's fatuity may be plumbed by taking up such standard works as those of Montalembert and Mother Theodosia Drane. These writers would tell him how the nuns of the seventh and eighth centuries were accustomed to study the Scriptures, the Fathers, and the profane authors. It was a woman who introduced the study of Greek into the famous monastery of St. Gall, and St. Gertrude who translated the Scriptures into that language. So highly was the learning of St. Hilda esteemed, that on many occasions the holy abbess was asked to assist at the deliberations of the bishops gathered in council or synod. Editha, wife of Edward the Confessor, taught grammar and logic, but, unfortunately, Mr. Le Gallienne was not numbered among her pupils. Hroswitha, a tenth-century nun, was familiar with classical literature, a fact proved by her extant Latin writings, and in the twelfth century the Abbess Hervada undertook to write an encyclopedia "containing all the science known in her day."

Made Ignorant by St. Paul

COMING to later days, we find Vittoria Colonna, who received her education in a convent; Prosperizia de Rossi, the sculptor; Sister Plautilla, the Dominican painter, together with her sister artists, Marietta Tintoretto and Elizabeth Sirani; Plautilla Brizio, who built the chapel and palace of St. Benedict at Rome; Victoria Delfini, Christina Roccati, Laura Bassi, Anna Mazzolina and Maria Agnesi, professors in the Papal University of Bologna. None of these good Catholic women seem to have been aware that St. Paul had forbidden them to develop their intellects, nor does the Catholic Church, to the devotion of whose monastic children the world, humanly speaking, owes the Holy Scriptures, seem ever to have found or promulgated this prohibition. To extend the list would be easy, but to copy a long roll of names is no task for a hot day. Libraries are plentiful today, and readily accessible.

I do not think any will deny that St. Catherine of Siena, an orator, diplomat and scholar as well as a Saint; or St. Theresa, one of Spain's greatest prose writers, developed their respective intellects to a level equal, we will say, to that attained by Mr. Le Gallienne himself. But to come to modern instances, to what purpose does Mr. Le Gallienne consider that our hundreds of Catholic schools, academies and colleges for girls, are put?

Woman's True Mission

"YOU canot argue with a man who praises Ezra Pound and condemns Tennyson," Joyce Kilmer once wrote in America. "You merely pass on to the next drollery." Here it is, and for its perpetration Mr. Le Gallienne deserves an immortal cap and bells. During Christian times, he expounds, through the chains forged by St. Paul, woman's slavery was made complete. The sanctity of the home, so characteristic of pre-Christian Roman and Egyptian communities, was destroyed. Yet, although a slave, one thing was permitted woman. "She has been allowed," sneers Bebel's echo, "to be a Saint and to practise good works."

These words recall the old woman of the nursery rhyme who had nothing to live upon but victuals and drink. What higher destiny could woman have than to become a Saint? To practise good works, to adorn one's soul with every manner of supernatural virtue, to fulfil one's duty perfectly to God and to one's neighbor, is to be a Saint, and is man's highest mission as well as woman's. Mr. Le Gallienne, on the contrary, appears to argue that the culmination of womanly perfection is not sanctity, but the possession of a vote and a seat in the Board of Aldermen.

After all, this is not a specimen of what Joyce Kilmer meant by "drollery." It is, in all its foulness, a manifestation of the anti-Christian temper which, unfortunataely, has dominated many phases of the "votes for women" movement. God's Saints, as Newman wrote, are the world's true reformers, and what God wants from every woman everywhere is, first of all, sanctity. We enshrine the mother, we look upon the cloistered nun as a thing enskeyed and sainted, we bow with reverence before the girl, forced by hard circumstances, to make her way alone in the world. But woman's place is not necessarily in the home, the cloister, or the world. Her place is where God wishes her to be. and there alone is her field of usefulness.

Today a world that is battling for the things that are just and pure looks for strength and inspiration to that blessed maiden, Joan of Arc, upon whose banner were inscribed the sacred names of Jesus and Mary. "The most womanly of all women who ever lived" was she, save one, the little Maid of Nazareth, the Mother of Our Saviour. Only in the eyes of pseudo-reformers is woman a parasite, a thing of peril to the world, redeemable only by her participation in public life. In the Catholic ideal, whether she votes or never looks upon a ballot, whether she leads armies or raises up children to God, whether she heads a political campaign or sings God's praises cloistered from the world, woman fulfils her function most perfectly the more nearly she approaches to God. Paul L. Blakely, S.J.

EDUCATION

Give Him a Chance

WE were riding on a local in the new subway. "Well, my boy, I suppose you'll be starting high school work in a couple of weeks learning to decline causa, and factor '$x^2 + 2xy + y^2$' I'm sure you'll like it all because the studies will be new to you and ——" "Well, Father, I don't think I'll go to high school, at least not this year. You see I got a pretty good job when school closed, and just now I'm getting twelve a week and the boss promises me more in January. I like the work and there's a good chance for advancement. There are four other boys in my department, and we've all made up our minds not to let this opportunity slip by, just for the sake of learning a little Latin and Greek. Besides, I intend to go to night school three times a week, and I feel that by diligent work, I can learn almost as much there as I could by attending high school."

And so the conversation ran on. Another instance from a thousand similar ones, of the lamentable lack of appreciation of a thorough mental training, in a day when education is all but thrust upon us. For never more than today, were there so many golden opportunities for mental improvement, and never, in many instances at least, were they less appreciated.

The Delusions of Youth

SHADES of our struggling parents! Poor foreigners, mostly, who appreciated education so highly because their own had been so meager. Men and women, were they, whose lives were a daily holocaust on the altars of self-sacrifice and privation, that son or daughter might have "a better bringing up than his had been, or hers." The next generation, but one removed from the shovel and the scrubbing brush, disdains these hard-earned opportunities which its sires purchased by the sweat of their brows. Almost every avenue can boast of its high school, and borough of its college, and yet according to statistics, of every one hundred graduating from grammar school but forty go to high school and of that forty but eight continue till graduation.

What is the cause of this lamentable lack of appreciation, this almost loathing, of even secondary education, in a day when mental training is so essential for success in almost every path of life? It is the same old story, the penny-wise and pound-foolish policy, gathering rosebuds while we may, instead of waiting till these same buds blossom forth into fragrant flowers. We chop down one tree to gather the fruit or, at least, shake down the apples while green, for fear the other fellow may pluck them, if we wait till they ripen. And what good are rosebuds and green apples anyway? We do not stop to think. Only in later years, when our foolish neighbor is garnering the fruit of patience and sacrifice, do we realize to our sorrow that we have been trying to "force nature," that our harvests have been premature, our rosebuds have but little fragrance, and our green apples bring on a mental colic, which the paregoric self-instruction, and the sweet spirits of night school have but little power to allay.

Of course the delusion of the youth of fourteen can be readily explained by present-day conditions. There is the great shortage of adult labor and the consequent employment of boys and girls, as soon as they can get their "working papers," to fill the vacancies left by those at the front. Hence the boy or girl in the early teens, blinded by the glitter of present day "big wages," and delighted with the pleasant change from schoolroom to office or store, can only see the present good. They cannot wait for the flower to blossom or the fruit to ripen. And who can blame them? Did you ever know a boy who could pass a green apple tree in summer resignedly waiting for the full fruited harvest of fall?

Room at the Top

ONLY the other day another proof of "early gathering" was forcibly brought to the writer's notice. Two young friends were chatting together, the one a professional man, holding a position of distinction and remuneration, the other, equally clever, employed in honorable work, but such as required little or no education. They had been old chums at school, and when the conversation was over, the "early gatherer" of the two turned to the writer, and said, rather sadly, "Just think: I used to do his mathematics for him at school." There was no need of comment. The young man who had gathered too early realized to his sorrow that it was all too late. The fruit couldn't be put back on the tree. An education is a gift which death alone can take away. When wealth is gone, it is the true talisman to new fortunes, the open sesame to the halls of opportunity. There's always room at the ladder's top, but only for those who have climbed the tedious rungs of mental discipline. The educated man does not have to seek employment, for employment seeks him. The world wears a foot-path to his door, sits at his feet, begs him to take its gold and silver in exchange for a few ounces of his garnered knowledge.

Who then are to blame for this present-day lack of appreciation of mental training? Economic conditions, partly, employers, partly, youth least, and parents most of all. For, strange as it may seem, the choice is frequently left to the immature judgment of the boy himself.

Give him a chance. Protect him against himself. The boy of fourteen does not know what is best for him. With his very limited knowledge of the world he is incapable of knowing when he has sufficient mental training to battle with the difficulties that are before him. Give the boy a chance. Don't trepan him in infancy. Teach him the lesson of Lincoln, the boy who from a log-cabin in Kentucky followed the rays of his rush light till it led him to the steps of the White House in Washington, the boy, who, before library and high school adorned almost every avenue, kept murmuring to himself "I will study hard, and perhaps my chance will come." True, your boy has probably little or no chance to become President of these United States, but he has a chance to be president of his own career, a ruler of his own destiny, a power among his own companions. But you must not merely give him but make him take a chance.

Advantages and Handicaps

TRUE, the technical training of the business house, factory or store will give the impatient youth a temporary advantage. But it will give him a decided handicap in the long run. It will teach him a host of facts, and useful statistics, and cram his head with technical information, but it will not educate him. It will give him a full and unlimited knowledge of some one branch, perhaps, but it will not give him the broad comprehensive ability to grasp and master any subject, which is the prerogative of the trained intellect. In the final heat, although the educated boy be handicapped and lapped by a field of "flying starters," he will close in upon, pass, draw away from, and leave far behind, the field of untrained competitors who start early, but finish late.

Of what practical use, you say, are Latin, Greek and algebra to the future business man? What relation exists between these studies and the vocational career the boy wishes to follow out? Let me ask of what value is fertilizer to the future wheat crop? What is the use of scattering lime on land from which one hopes to reap shocks of corn? Why not plant the seed at once? The answer is apparent. The field, like the mind, must first be enriched and cultivated. Something must be put in before anything can be gotten out. It is nature's own law that a hasty, impoverished sowing means a lean and meager harvest. The despised "dead languages" still have their uses, in fertilizing and enriching mental soil for newer and richer harvests. The early gatherer reaps the first harvest, but not the richest one.

Like the medicine-ball or Indian club, though perhaps of no practical or rather actual use in the contest of life, these studies show their worth and effect in the sustained effort of the trained contestant. In the grasping get-rich-quick world of today it is true as ever before, that "the early bird catches the worm" and at times but little more than the worm, leaving the fruit to the patient gatherer who follows after.

Local or Express

NIGHT schools in one sense are a blessing, in another, a curse. They are good enough for those who unfortunately cannot obtain an education in any other manner, for a half-loaf is better than none. But they do not, and cannot take the place of the day schools. A boy cannot learn as much in three nights of two hours each, as he can in five days of five hours each, especially at the fag end of a busy day, with the movie lights gleaming, the voice of pleasure calling, and the thought of another eight hours of toil, beginning with the rising of the sun.

As I said in the beginning, we were riding on a local in the subway. We had started early, leaving the express motionless on the middle track. But before we reached our destination, at least four crowded expresses had passed us.

"There, my boy, is an illustration after your own heart," said I. "The uneducated 'business boy' is a local. He starts first, stops often, gets there last. The well-educated lad is the express. He may start last, but is halted seldom, and gets there first. Are you going to be a local or an express, few seeking your services or almost everyone?"

Samuel J. Robb, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Freemasonry's Hit and Miss

A WRITER in the American Freemason, criticising an article by Charles Johnston in the New York Times on "Caillaux and Freemasonry" declares:

> Many of the brethren are inclined to see in this article an evidence of German propaganda. . . . With this opinion I cannot agree. I give credit in this to a far shrewder propaganda, that of the Church. Nor would one have far to search among the American priesthood to find a shrewd and plausible man who by accentuating the difference between French and American Freemasonry, would gain credit for fairness, and might be able to impose upon even the trained and worldly-wise Mr. Johnston.

That Mr. Johnston was not imposed upon by any member of the American priesthood is evident from the following letter:

> Bergenfield, N. J., July 12, 1918.
> Rev. R. H. Tierney, Editorial Office, America:
> Dear Sir—In reply to your letter of June 18, speaking of an article of mine on Caillaux and French Masonry and criticism thereon: (1) No member of the American priesthood had any part in the article; (2) I took certain data from a work on Latin Masonry, by a French priest; (3) I found ample verification of these facts in secular works, e. g., the Figaro.
> Faithfully yours,
> Charles Johnston.

The editor of the American Freemason will doubtless reprint this letter in fairness to the Church and the American priesthood. At least Mr. Johnston is entitled to an apology.

The Angelus

THE Myers Resolution containing the word Angelus is disturbing the Christian Scientists. The Christian Science Monitor reprints in part an article from the California Christian Advocate, which maintains:

> This adroit use of the "Angelus" should be taken out of the resolution and the Record. Harmless as it may be in this country, though offensive to Protestants, who believe that there is but one "Mediator" between man and God and that is Christ Jesus, yet it will be looked upon in Roman Catholic countries like Italy as an evidence that the Pope dominates America.
> President Wilson cannot afford to lend himself consciously or unconsciously to this ruse, which will be used by many for propaganda even if it was not so intended. . . . It is an astounding fact that Congress allows itself to be led by these propagandists, and our public press puts on the soft pedal and does not call the attention of the country to these attempts which point to the destruction of the foundations of our country which are Christian and Protestant.

It is well that Congress has such champions of the "foundations" which are endangered by the insertion of a word that is sacred to at least thirty per cent of our land forces and more than forty per cent of our naval forces.

Chronicle

The War.—The week opened on the western front with the British sweeping forward to Barelle eight miles from Cambrai, breaking the Drocourt-Quéant line and forcing the German defense back to the Canal du Nord. French infantry crossed the Somme before Epenancourt, while east of Noyon they had reached the outskirts of Salency. The Americans and the French under General Mangin after five days of fighting northwest of Soissons forced the Germans off the Juvigny tableland and drove them across the Soissons-St. Quentin road. On September 4 the British crossed the Canal du Nord on a twenty-mile front, taking Mancourt and Etricourt on the east bank. Further north English and New Zealand divisions took Ruyaulcourt and the outskirts of Havrincourt Wood, while other English divisions occupied the west bank of the canal opposite Demicourt and Boursies. English troops entered Moeuvres from the north, six miles west of Cambrai, which lies on the old Hindenburg line. The French continued to press back the enemy east of the Canal du Nord and between the Ailette and the Aisne, while north of the Ailette they carried their lines to the western outskirts of Coucy-le-Chateau and Juvencourt. On the Vesle front French troops crossed the river at several points, Americans operating with the French crossed the river north of Fismes and near Bazoches, the entire movement registering a gain on five fronts, for the Allied armies. On the following day the official reports announced the capture of Hill 63, southwest of Messines, by British troops, and the regaining of the old line held by them prior to April 9, which is south of Neuve Chapelle as far as Givenchy. On the northern fronts in their advance toward Cambrai the British reached Marquoin, and in Flanders they took Ploegsteert, north of Armentiéres. Advancing northward from the Vesle line Americans crossed the river at Jonchery and Les Venteaux, while further west the Franco-American army pursued the retreating Germans to the Aisne on a wide front. Coucy was among the thirty towns taken by the French on the Ailette front, and farther west Guiscard was captured in the advance to the road center of Ham. By September 6 French troops had taken Ham and Chauny, and were nearing Tergnier, turning the enemy's Ham-Guiscard line. On the Aisne-Vesle front the French had reached the Aisne, twelve miles north of Rheims. They took Coucy-le-Chateau, seriously threatening the German position on the Chemin-des-Dames, and crossed the Hindenburg line at Fresnes. The British made their greatest advance southeast of Peronne, making nearly seven miles east of the Somme, while in Flanders they took Neuve Chapelle and Bussu, following the enemy to the ridge northwest of Wulverghem. The following day the British carried out successful minor operations between Hill 63 and Wulverghem, capturing prisoners and advancing their line in the direction of Messines. They compelled a German retirement on a front of seventeen miles between Havrincourt Wood, southwest of Cambrai to Beauvois immediately west of St. Quentin. The French on the St. Quentin-Laon front carried their line forward on a twenty-mile stretch, and having taken Tergnier, an important railway junction, they arrived within three miles of La Fere. The enemy's main line of communication between St. Quentin and Laon was cut at Tergnier, French troops piercing the old Hindenburg line in this sector. Ground lost by the Allies in 1914 was reached by the capture of Coucy Lower Forest, and a steady advance was made in the direction of Laon. This movement menaces the lower hinge of the Hindenburg line on the south. The upper hinge on the north has already been smashed by the British at Quéant. Marshal Haig in his report on September 7 stated: "The stocks of coal and road-metal which have fallen into our possession together with large quantities of other war materials show that it was the enemy's intention to remain in occupation of the Somme battlefield during the winter months, and also the hurried nature of the retreat that has been forced upon him." On September 8 the British advanced two miles on a twenty-mile front between Cambrai and St. Quentin while the Third French Army under General Humbert occupied Hamel. With the British across the Hindenburg line and the French battering down the defense south of La Fere, nearly all of the Amiens salient has been broken.

Bulletin, Sept. 3, p.m.-Sept. 9, a.m.

On September 5 Director General McAdoo published in full the contract that the Government will make with the railroads, covering Federal control and the compensation the roads will receive. There are provisions in the contract for operation and accounting during the period of Government control, for the maintenance of the properties, and for their return at the end of the period of Federal control in substantially as good repair and as complete in equipment as they were on January 1, 1918. Provision is also made for the payment of taxes in accordance with the Federal Control act, and the annual compensation to be paid each road will be made in equal instalments on the last day of March, June, September and December of each year. In making the contract public Mr. McAdoo stated:

The Government Contract and the Railroads

> I am convinced that the contract offered by the Government is just and reasonable. The railroad owners have no right to assume more than that, and, if the Government offers less, they are fully protected by their right to reject the Government's offer and go into the Court of Claims.

At a meeting of the Railway Executives Committee the contract was approved. The committee represents eighty-two of the leading railroads of the country, controlling ninety per cent of the mileage. Thomas De Witt Cuyler, chairman of the Committee, was empowered to communicate with the heads of each road advising them to accept the Government contract. The National Association of Owners of Railway Securities, however, registered its opposition to certain features of the contract.

Once again the Senate has put itself on record in the matter of Prohibition. On September 6 it passed the $12,000,000 Emergency Agricultural Appropriation bill. The bill contained a rider calling for National Prohibition from July 1, 1919, until the American armies shall have been demobilized. A final effort to postpone the date of the "dry" legislation to December 30, 1919, was defeated. According to Representative Kitchin, Chairman of the Ways and Means Commitee, Prohibition will deal a serious blow to the Treasury. As the manufacture of beer is prohibited after December 1, 1918, the country must face a consumption tax on table necessities or import taxes on coffee, tea, cocoa and sugar to make up for the loss under the $8,000,000,000 revenue bill. Mr. Kitchin said:

The Senate and Prohibition

> I will be candid and say that, if Prohibition goes into effect July 1 next, as proposed in the Senate bill, we will have to go next year to some other subjects to get the $1,000,000,000 intoxicating beverages are estimated to yield under the pending bill.

Before the beer supply of the country is exhausted it is estimated that $120,000,000 can be collected in taxes.

That no agencies which can further the purposes for which we are at war, are to be left unworked, is clear from the Government's attitude towards the schools. The colleges have been commandeered in a benevolent fashion which will be explained in the pages of AMERICA as soon as certain necessary details are worked out. Moreover, the President has addressed the following interesting document to the teachers of the nation:

President's Message to the Teachers

To School Teachers of the United States:

It is quite unnecessary, I am sure, for me to urge a continuance of the service you and your pupils have rendered to the nation and to the great cause for which America is at war. Whatever the nation's call has been, the response of the schools has been immediate and enthusiastic. The nation and the Government agencies know and appreciate your loyalty and devotion and are grateful for your unfailing support in every war service.

The schools and colleges of America are justified by their works when the youth of our land and the homes from which they come are united in unselfish devotion and unstinted sacrifice for the cause and the country we hold dear. The spirit of American democracy is a heritage cherished and transmitted by public education. All that America has meant to us and to the world in the past it must mean with greater and more disinterested devotion in the future. The civic sense that has made each home and child part of a community, part of a State, part of a nation, is today deepened by this war and its issues. It affects the fate of the many lands and peoples whose blood is in our veins, and whose happier future will be part of the triumph of the principles for which we fight.

The doors of the schools have opened to a new generation of children. Your responsibilities, great in the past and greatly met, are still greater today. This publication by the Committee on Public Information, established in response to the requests of the schools and the needs of the departments whose programs involve the schools, will have served its purpose if it aid you in performing and interpreting the new duties implicit in its title.

WOODROW WILSON.

The publication referred to by the President is National School Service, published twice a month by the Committee on Public Information.

Great Britain.—An official of the Coal Controllers' Department reported last Saturday that the coal situation in England is now much more serious than the food situation has ever been. There is an estimated shortage of 36,000,000 tons, though the Government has promised additional supplies over last year's exports amounting to more than 12,500,000 tons. This year's output so far is 13,500,000 tons below the normal, and railroads, private families and staple industries will suffer seriously from the shortage this winter. Seventy-five thousand miners were taken out for the army recently. England's shipbuilding figures for August are considered disappointing. For the first time in history the United States shipping output is bigger than Great Britain's. The Daily Chronicle remarks in this connection:

Coal Shortage in England

> In eight months of the year the British output of new tonnage has not much exceeded a million tons, whereas we need an annual output of 3,000,000 tons. This alarming disparity between our production and our needs must be removed or else we shall be faced with grave difficulties.

One of the causes of the reduced output of merchant ships has been the great demand lately for anti-submarine craft.

Ireland.—Before the recess in the House of Commons Mr. John Dillon endeavored to get from the Government an expression of its intentions regarding a number of questions of vital import to Ireland. Mr. Dillon asked the Chief Secretary for some definite information as to the policy that is to be pursued for the next two months, saying:

The Government's Irish Policy

> Has conscription been abandoned? What is the present intention of the Government with regard to the other branch of their dual policy announced in April, Home Rule? Is the ban on Nationalist meetings and Nationalist associations to be kept in force? And, finally, is it the idea of the Irish Executive to disarm all the volunteer organizations in Ireland, or, on the other hand, to continue to pursue the discriminating policy of applying that process only to the Nationalists, while leaving the Carsonite army in undisturbed possession of their weapons and equipment?

Mr. Shortt, the Chief Secretary, in reply said as regards conscription the act could not be enforced until the reassembling of Parliament. He defended the Government's invasion of the right of public meetings on the ground that the exercise of the right had been abused by one party in Ireland for the purpose of promoting sedition. Coming to the question of the rifles in the possession of the Ulster Volunteers, he declared that the Government was determined to take them. Home Rule, Mr. Shortt added, had not been abandoned by the Government.

Writing in the National News, Mr. T. P. O'Connor declares that Ireland must be saved in the interest of the British Empire and of the war, as well as in the interest of Ireland herself:

> But there are plenty of difficulties. The chief factors in creating these difficulties are well known; the Carson rebellion; the Curragh camp mutiny; the "ineptitudes and malignities" of the War Office—to quote Mr. Lloyd George's historic words; the executions; and the throwing over by the Asquith Government of the compromise carried by the late Mr. Redmond and Sir Edward Carson, at great risks to their own political positions. The mistake, however, so often made by English statesmen and by the English people in believing that the sins died with one administration and were not repeated, is now being made.

T. P. O'Connor maintains that an overwhelming force is necessary to conquer Germany, and America and England must supply that force. Cooperation is necessary between the two countries for the success of the war, and there can be no cooperation worthy of the name unless the Irish problem is settled:

> I wind up with another proposition which is paradoxical, and yet true. A large, generous measure of Home Rule—what is summed up in the words "Dominion Home Rule" in the report of the Irish Convention—will find acceptance by at least three-fourths of the Irish people at home; will find acceptance with even a larger proportion of the men of Irish blood in America. For, this is the paradox, the Irish in America were at one and the same time never so bitter against England, and never so ready for reconciliation with England.

Those who stand in the way of the reconciliation of Ireland, Mr. O'Connor concludes, are doing as much as any German Junker or Pan-German to lose the fruits of the war.

The Irish Voluntary Recruiting Council has issued its plan for enlistments:

Recruiting in Ireland

> The Council, in agreement with the Admiralty, the Army Council, and the Air Council, has taken over responsibility for the executive work of voluntary recruiting and will utilize as far as possible in the carrying out of this work Irish officers and men of the different services, who have been either discharged by reason of wounds or are on temporarily light duty from similar disablement.
> For the purposes of organization Ireland has been divided into ten areas, with several out-stations in each area. The out-stations in each area will be responsible to the area office, and each area office will be directly responsible to the Council itself.
> The quota of recruits required from each area is: Belfast, 3,500; Sligo, 1,500; Omagh, 5,700; Mullingar, 1,900; Armagh, 2,500; Dublin, 11,700; Galway, 2,900; Waterford, 5,200; Limerick, 5,400; Cork, 4,700. In each area representatives of the three services will be at hand to give particulars of the requirements of the navy, the army and the air force. At the headquarters of each area a civilian medical board will be established to examine men and place them, according to their physical fitness, in medical grades 1, 2 or 3. Those who are found to be totally unfit for service will be given a certificate, which will be a permanent release from military service.

Eligible candidates, according to the statement of the Council, desirous of enlisting in the infantry will be allowed to choose their regiments, and they may take their preliminary training at a regimental depot in Ireland or with an Irish regiment stationed elsewhere.

On September 5, Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, and William Bowen, president of the International Bricklayers' Union, visited the British labor congress which was in session in Derby. Amongst other items of Gompers' speech to the delegates was a declaration that his sympathy was and is with Ireland's aspiration for self-government. He felt that had England kept her pledge to Ireland that country would have done anything and everything for the cause of the Allies.

Gompers and Home Rule

Russia.—A nearly successful attempt to assassinate Nikolai Lenine, the Bolshevist Prime Minister, was made at Moscow, August 30, by Dora Kaplan, a young woman who is a prominent member of the Social Revolutionary party. Lenine was at first reported to have died from the effects of the two shots she fired at him, but according to later advices he rallied somewhat. A week after the shooting he was still hovering between life and death.

Bolshevist Reprisals

The Bolshevist authorities of Moscow took drastic reprisal measures after the attempt on Lenine's life. Thousands of persons, it is reported, were removed from that city to Petrograd, numerous members of the Social Revolutionary party were arrested, and the Chief of the Extraordinary Commission in the capital issued a proclamation which read:

> The criminal adventures of our enemies force us to reply with masures of terror. Every person found with a weapon in his hand will be immediately executed. Every person who agitates against the Soviet Government will be arrested and taken into a concentration camp and all his private property seized.

By a decree dated September 5, large numbers of new arrests were made in Moscow by the Bolsheviki. All the Social Revolutionists of the Right were ordered to be taken into custody, and hostages from the bourgeois parties and from groups of former officials were held as a precaution against fresh conspiracies. A number of high ecclesiastics were also arrested in connection with the alleged British plot and numerous executions took place. The Pravda calls the situation extremely grave. There were 107 Americans in a party of refugees from Russia, who arrived at Haparanda, Sweden, recently. They report that while the storm raged in Moscow and Petrograd against the bourgeoisie, the Bolshevist papers clamored for the death of 1,000 bourgeois for every Bolshevist killed. The reports current some time ago regarding the murder of the Czarovitch Alexis seem to be confirmed, though there are no details available about the manner of his end.

The British Consulate Attacked

The British Consulate at Moscow was attacked by the Bolsheviki on August 31, the building was sacked and Captain Cromie, an attaché, was killed. He resisted the troops and killed several soldiers before he was slain. The British Government at once sent a stern note to Foreign Minister Tchitcherin demanding "immediate reparation and the prompt punishment of any one responsible for or concerned in this abominable outrage." If the Russian Soviet Government does not give full satisfaction, Great Britain threatened to see that the members of the Soviet Government "shall be treated as outlaws by the Governments of all civilized nations and that no place of refuge shall be left to them." The British Government has put under "preventive arrest" M. Litvinoff, the Soviet representative in London, and all the members of his staff until the Bolsheviki set "all British representatives at liberty and allow them to proceed to the Finnish frontier." M. Tchitcherin, however, makes these counter-demands:

(1) That the Russian Government should obtain from Litvinoff, the Soviet representative in London, information concerning his position. (2) That Litvinoff and his colleagues should arrive in Bergen before the French and English would be allowed to depart from Russia. (3) That Russian Red Cross delegates should go to France and arrange for the evacuation of Russian soldiers there before the French Military Missions could leave Russia. (4) That the repatriation of the interned English and French nationals must coincide with the abandonment of oppressive measures against supporters of the Soviet in Allied countries and in Russian territory occupied by Allied troops and Czecho-Slovaks. (5) That agents of the Russian Red Cross and International Red Cross must cooperate in the occupied regions for settlement of this question.

The neutral Ministers, as representatives of the belligerents concerned, made an emphatic protest against Tchitcherin's demands, and announced that the authors of the proposed denial of justice would be held personally responsible.

On September 3 the United States, following the example of France, Great Britain and Italy, recognized as belligerents the Czecho-Slovak National Council and the Czecho-Slovak army. Secretary Lansing announced that the American Government is prepared to enter formally into relations with the new de facto Government, whose president is Professor Masaryk, for the purpose of prosecuting the war against the Central Powers. Along the line of the Trans-Siberian Railroad there is said to be a Czecho-Slovak army of 80,000 men or more, and there are other armies of that race in Italy and France, and in this country there are some 410,000 Czecho-Slovaks, a large number of whom are naturalized. On September 4 General March received news of the safe arrival at Vladivostok of General Graves, forty-three officers and 1,888 men who left California several weeks ago. This American force supplemented by two regiments of United States infantry already in Siberia are to work in cooperation with the Japanese and with the Russian and Czecho-Slovak troops to keep Siberia from becoming a German-Bolshevist country.

The Czecho-Slovaks Belligerents

Bolshevism in Archangel

Mr. Arthur Copping, writing from Archangel to the New York Times, says that the sway of the Bolsheviki in northern Russia has filled with a rebellious repugnance all classes of the population, save the very destitute, with the result that "General knowledge, self-respect, and moral culture found themselves on fraternal terms with the most effective elements in the disorderly, armed forces of Bolshevism, German, Lettish, and criminal elements." The principles of Bolshevist domination, says Mr. Copping, are these:

(1) Instead of fostering production and taking toll of increase after the manner of conventional Governments, the Bolsheviki, that they might be in a position liberally to feed and fee their soldiers and agents, forcibly entered warehouses and banks, and helped themselves to food and money, thereby paralyzing industry and destroying the foundation of security on which the fabric of civilized society rests. (2) All newspapers were suppressed save one official organ, which published the Bolshevist mandates to the people of Archangel, and industriously sought, by erroneous statements, to breed enmity with the Allies, especially the British. (3) There was furtive killing of influential opponents. Within the town no shots were heard and no blood seen. The victims were merely missing, a fact of no significance save to an inner circle of intimates, for most men and women of the better classes remained voluntary prisoners within their own dwellings. They and their children seldom or never ventured out of doors and only trusted servants of the household went into the streets, chiefly to purchase food that ever tended to become scarcer, coarser, and more expensive; for in that topsy-turvy world the well-to-do had become the submerged class and only persons in rags and humble raiment could hold up their heads and breathe the air of freedom.

Leading citizens of Archangel are reported "missing" in considerable numbers, and they will continue to be missing if certain hastily made graves outside the town mean anything.

Justice Even for the Pope

J. C. WALSH

WHAT Pope Benedict XV himself thinks of the campaign of calumny waged against him he has permitted the world to know, if the world wants to know. On May 18, 1918, in a letter to Cardinal Ferrari and the Bishops of Lombardy, Italian Bishops accused like himself, his Holiness speaks of "the insidious and crafty campaign of calumny and hatred against Our person and Our work. In the words of the Sacred Scriptures: 'What is there that I ought to do more to my vineyard that I have not done to it?'" He expresses resentment against "the crazy and absurd calumnies which, under many and varied forms, publicly and secretly, by word of mouth and in writing, are being spread everywhere." With reference to Italy, first, naturally, in his affections, the Pope, prisoner of the civil power though he holds himself to be, describes a condition which is more or less existent in every country where these attacks, first upon the Papacy and eventually upon the Church, are made: "At the very moment when Italy should have so much need of peace and concord among all citizens, the enemies of religion, actually taking advantage of this unhappy time, are striving to stir up the ignorant and simple multitude against this seat of truth and justice, against the clergy, against the Catholics, sowing the seeds of discord among the different social classes." Allowance made for difference in degree, the description fits conditions found much nearer home than Italy. And the answer Benedict XV makes to all this is precisely what every Catholic would wish the answer to be: "Against this diffusion of calumnies and hatred we protest anew, and we denounce it before the conscience not only of the Faithful but of all honest men wherever honest men are found." The classification evidently does not include those who are continuously employed in criticising the Vatican, for there is absolutely no indication that any of them have taken the slightest notice of this letter to the Bishops of Lombardy.

It is useful to note that the Pope's protest is not directed against the constituted political authorities in Italy. There is good reason. Wherever and whenever the constituted political authority has had to express an opinion concerning the Vatican itself or the Church in Italy, the verdict has been unequivocal. If there was a real grievance against the Vatican, the military court that had the Gerlach case before it had an unequaled opportunity for proclaiming the grievance to the world. Had the Church in Italy really been in conflict, active or passive, with the civil power, the Prime Minister had a most favorable opportunity, during the panic after Caporetto, to affirm the Church's contumacy. The facts are that the military tribunal went out of its way to exonerate the Vatican, and that Signor Orlando went out of his way to proclaim the loyalty of the Italian Catholic clergy.

In the weeks before the Gerlach case was cleared up there must have been many dark hours. Mgr. Gerlach was an official in residence at the Vatican. He was one of many hundreds, but he was there. His office, chamberlain of the wardrobe, brought him close to the person of the Pope. He abused the confidence that was placed in him. He did consort with a hostile organization in Switzerland, he did plot against Italy's safety, he did participate in Rome in the execution of plans for the consummation of which some of his associates were shot as traitors. This was a case where the condemnation of an individual was eminently just, but a case also where that condemnation could easily have been extended, as so many of the anti-Papal propagandists have extended it, to include the Papacy, the Vatican, the Church in Italy, the Church everywhere. Yet here is the considered judgment of the Italian military tribunal touching the bearing of the case upon the Vatican and the Holy See:

> The tribunal sees no need to go into the question raised by the defense concerning the objective immunity of the diplomatic mailbag of the Vatican, or concerning the exceptional claim of the impossibility of proceeding with regard to Gerlach from the point of view of the extraterritoriality of the place occupied by the Holy See and of the personal immunity of Gerlach himself on account of his official position. Primarily, such an exception, in the case of one who is not present to meet the charge against him, does not present any judicial interest worthy of notice with regard to the cases of those who are present to meet the charge.
> In any case, the evidence given has shown most clearly how Gerlach, successfully evading by means of artful expedients the strict orders of the ecclesiastical authorities, and betraying their confidence, used his own means for the dispatch of secret correspondence and for his other unlawful acts, and those means were not connected in any way with the arrangements of the Vatican mailbag. Nor is it shown in any way that his guilty acts were carried out in the precincts of the Vatican, much less that they were rendered possible by the fact that they took place in the territory of the Holy See, which is not connected in the slightest way with the events which form the subject of the present judgment. Furthermore, it is established that there is no connection at all between the acts alleged against Gerlach and the ecclesiastical duties, whatever these might be, with which he was charged.

So, when Mgr. Gerlach set out to conspire against Italy, for which offence he was condemned, after he had fled, to hard labor for life, this Italian court held that his position near the Pope had nothing to do with his acts, that the Vatican was not the scene of his pernicious activities, that he did not work under cover of the Vatican's diplomatic privilege even in sending letters out of the country, that he ignored and evaded the strict order of his superiors in the Vatican, and that he betrayed the confidence reposed in him by those whose commands he set at naught. And yet a whole year later, for this judgment was rendered in June, 1917, a writer is permitted, in the New York Journal of Commerce, to make the Gerlach episode a capital indictment against the Pope, and, by so attacking the Pope, to cast doubt upon the sincerity of a patriotic pronouncement made by the three American Cardinals. Is it fair to the Pope? Is it fair to the Cardinals? Is it fair to American Catholics? Is it fair to the country in its hour of strain? Could an enemy ask anything more conducive to discord?

Similarly, after the Italian arms failed at Caporetto, when anger and disappointment sought a scapegoat, when the Government of Italy reeled under the blow, when the Socialists set no limits to their calumny of the Pope and the Church, when panic-stricken war correspondents were frantically cabling the only explanation of defeat they thought likely to find acceptance, when there was talk of driving the Pope to Spain, it would have been easy for the Ministry of the day to transfer the blame to other shoulders than its own. Such things had happened before, not in Italy alone, and such things were to happen again, not in Italy either. It was not known then, it was not known in March of this year, nor in May of this year, that Caporetto saw the first western application, as Picardy saw the second and the Aisne the third, of new tactics devised in the east and tried out at Riga. The military critics know it now, but then they did not know it. Premier Orlando did not know it, and yet Premier Orlando was constrained to say from his place in the Chamber of Deputies:

> I deplore the accusations of a general character made by the Hon. Signor Pivolini against high ecclesiastical personages—accusations that tend to hurt the supreme spiritual authority—against priests and against the Catholic party. Such accusations are unjust and offensive, because as the public is aware, the Italian clergy, both high and low, have given noble and beautiful proofs of Italian sentiments, and the great mass of Catholics have known how to reconcile the dictates of faith with their duties towards their country.

Those who profess to be trying the Pope in the balance never mention this speech by Premier Orlando. They are still serving up as unchallengeable evidence the statements cabled by American correspondents as the Italian armies in retreat poured back across the Isonzo and the Tagliamento. What they said then is what "everybody knows" now. Signor Orlando's disclaimer goes for nothing. The censor was very indulgent towards those dispatches attacking the Pope. If the censor knew that the mischief done could never be repaired the knowledge did not worry him. How different it was when the blame for dangerous conditions lay elsewhere. In the summer of 1917 there were mutinies in the French army, but we were never permitted by the censor to know of it. The truth came out only the other day, during the trial of Malvy. The blame has been brought close home to the Masonic junta which has made and unmade ministries in France. Not only were the mutinies not explained; they were not even mentioned. The same elements, Socialist and anti-Catholic, as it turns out, were at work in France in June as were at work in Italy in October. In France they kept their counsel until the real culprits were exposed. From Italy the correspondents were permitted, or encouraged, to condemn in haste those whom time proved to be innocent. But however innocent, the Pope can still rightly complain that "the insidious and crafty campaign of calumny and hatred against Our person and Our work" goes on. Why? Because it is his person and because it is his work? There is no other all-explaining reason.

Pseudo-Histories of Science

JAMES J. WALSH, M. D., Ph.D.

I BELIEVE it is a well-authenticated fact that in distant India, years ago, a young man who had spent some time in learning English out of books proceeded to write a manual of the language for the benefit of his fellow-countrymen. He called his little volume "English as She is Spoke." Whatever may have been its sale at the time, there can be no doubt as to the success d'estime, or perhaps we should say de scandale, which has made it famous in the history of language manuals for considerably more than a generation. Occasionally something no less amusing is issued in our day, even from important university departments. Thus my attention was recently called to a publication of the University of Michigan in which the writer of a thesis for the doctorate of philosophy, apparently under the inspiration of his professor, boldly proceeded to correct the Latin of an inscription on a tablet in Bologna, in Italy. This good American believed he had found a mistake in gender in a Latin inscription which had been compiled with formal attention by the Bologna University authorities. Of course it was his mistake, not theirs, that he found; but this was discovered only after the thesis had already appeared in print, and had been committed to the anything but tender mercies of the academic world.

Lately, however, I happened upon something even more ridiculous. It was eminently laughable, but at first I was inclined to think of it merely as se non é vero é ben trovato. In one of our Western States, I prefer not to mention it by name since the story is evidently an actual event, there is an annual meeting of the Presidents of the Colleges of the State. In due turn their convention assembled in a Catholic college which had recently erected a new building. In the foyer there was a statue of St. Thomas Aquinas. One of these college presidents read the name rather carefully, looked somewhat puzzled, and then, taking a brother college president aside, said to him: "Thomas Aquinas, what did he ever do?" Without hesitation his colleague replied: "Don't you remember? That's the man who wrote 'The Imitation of Christ?'"

Now does not that seem too good to be true? Yet the other day I picked up a formal history of science published in the year of grace 1917 by the Macmillan Company. The authors are professors of science at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Cambridge, U. S. A. One of them has been lecturing for thirty years on the history of science to the undergraduate classes, but in a passage meant to be highly laudatory of the thirteenth century I find the words: "Thomas Aquinas writes his famous 'Imitatio Christi.'" It makes me wonder whether there is a tradition in Protestant and non-Catholic circles that Aquinas did write "The Imitation of Christ." If so, it is a tradition that I have never heard of before and it adds another factor to the problem of the authorship of the "Imitation." What is amusing is that St. Thomas Aquinas died some time about 1270 and à Kempis some time about 1470, so that there are two full centuries between them. Historians of science however, who presume to sum up for their students the science of the Middle Ages, think nothing of confusing the two.

There are many more amusing things in this same chapter on "The Progress of Science to 1450 A. D." There is much talk about the Dark Ages. The principal references for reading given to the students in regard to the Middle Ages are the various books of Draper and White, and Gibbon's "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire." Reference is made to Gibbon's "fascinating pages" without calling the students' attention to the fact that Gibbon wrote literature, not history. He molded his information to suit his own views. Gibbon's scholarship is praised highly but no intimation is given of the fact that Gibbon's historical research has, under careful modern historical criticism, proved almost entirely a compilation from German authors who were very little read in England and whose works could therefore be used by him with complete impunity. One of them, Mosheim, whom Gibbon almost constantly follows, has been repeatedly exposed for his garbled quotations. Mosheim's purpose was to demonstrate for Protestant Germany the blessing of the Reformation and the dreadful conditions that had existed in Catholic times. Now that we are engaged in a war which can be traced directly to that so-called reform movement which consigned Church and State alike to the hands of the ruler and fostered absolutism we are better able to understand such historic allusions.

It is certainly ridiculous to quote White and Draper with any seriousness in regard to medieval science, whereof they knew absolutely nothing. Concluding that the science of which they were ignorant did not exist they proceeded to find a reason for its absence. The Church was as good a reason as any, so they proceeded to tell us how anatomy and surgery and other important developments of science had been suppressed by her. Had they turned to the histories of medicine and of surgery they would have become aware of the existence, during these periods, of magnificent developments in surgical and medical education. As a matter of fact, seven centuries before Draper wrote, surgery had been so much more highly developed than in his own day that he would have been quite unable to understand what the old-time surgeons were doing, though Draper himself was a teacher in medical schools. It was only after we ourselves had developed our surgery, within the last thirty-five years, that we could appreciate properly the anticipation of our work by the great surgical professors of the medieval universities.

It is easy to understand what a farce scholasticism would become under the treatment accorded by authors who confounded à Kempis and Aquinas. It is described as "a characteristic (sic) technical and essentially verbal scholarship." A quotation is given from Rashdall which surely must make students believe that the only thing that seemed of any importance to the scholastic philosophers was whether universal ideas were nominal or real. The paragraph with regard to scholasticism concludes with this extremely illuminating sentence: "Scholasticism nevertheless lingered long after the Crusades were ended and abundant survivals of it exist even today."

In giving the address to the first college-graduates of Manhattanville some time since I ventured to congratulate them on the fact that, instead of receiving the modern materialistic philosophy with its emphasis on the struggle for life and its concept of man as an animal only a little higher than the others, they had been taught the good old-fashioned scholastic philosophy. I even dared to add that the supreme heroic figure of this great world war, Cardinal Mercier of Belgium, was just a professor of scholastic philosophy, the representative type of thinker produced by that system and that there were many people who as the result of their interest in him were beginning to have their attention called to his writings on scholastic philosophy.

The representative of the Regents at the commencement, the Rev. Dr. Alexander, to the surprise of all of us added his congratulations. As a Princeton man himself, he was proud to say that scholasticism had always been the teaching in the Princeton department of philosophy, and that from Jonathan Edwards to McCosh and Patten, Princeton professors of philosophy have been eminently scholastic. Poor Princeton! It is doubtless occupied with the discussion of nominalism and realism and is still living in Dark Ages, though I understand that of the students at the front a larger proportion are from Princeton than from any other secular university, and that everything at Princeton has been made subservient to the idea of patriotic duty. This sounds eminently and practically scholastic and not at all modernly individualistic, but that I suppose may be one difference between scholastic and scientific training.

The dear good men who wrote that chapter on science in the Dark Ages need themselves to come out of the darkness which shrouded so much of American thinking a generation or more ago. At a time when we had no architecture of note, no art to speak of, when our college standards were low, when we had no universities, and our degrees would not be accepted in any foreign university; when our medical course consisted of two terms of four months each of study, though we called it two years, and the students heard the same lectures each year, since the course was ungraded; when our hospitals were a disgrace, and our nursing quite literally disgraceful, supposed scholars here in America dared to write about the Middle Ages as dark, the ages which gave us great art and immortal literature in every country in Europe, whose universities maintained high standards, requiring three years of study preparatory to the four years of medicine and a year of practice with a physician before the young doctor was allowed to practise for himself, a standard to which we have nearly attained again in our day; and when hospitals were beautiful and nursing finely organized and surgery anticipated our own.

Because our sordid materialistic aims were not the ideals of the Middle Ages mid-nineteenth century writers failed to understand these periods. In a recent article I ventured to suggest that the mid-nineteenth century in reality represents the Dark Ages in America. We grew in enlightenment towards the end of the century, but it is only in comparatively recent years that the Middle Ages began to receive due appreciation. Yet, it is true that thirty years ago John Fiske had already suggested that they deserved rather the name of "Bright Ages" than of "Dark Ages." The writers of the "Short History of Science" have heard nothing of this, however. They are still quoting authorities whose works were dictated mainly by religious intolerance and not at all by any real knowledge of the period about which they wrote.

Population and Food

AUSTIN O'MALLEY, M.D.

THE birth-rate has declined throughout the civilized world during the past fifty years. True, the United States has increased in population from 32,433,321 in 1860 to nearly 103,000,000 at the present time, but this increase was almost entirely by immigration; the birth-rate has fallen. In 1900 there were 976 children under five years of age for every 1,000 women of a child-bearing age; in 1900 there were only 508 children to the thousand women. In 1900 in Massachusetts the native stock had a birth-rate of only 14.9 per thousand; the foreign-born a birth-rate of 49.1 per thousand. In that year the death-rate of the native-born was 16.3 per thousand, or 1.4 higher than the birth-rate. The death-rate of the foreign-born was 15.4 per thousand, or 33.7 below the birth-rate. The native stock is dying out, but the foreign-born stock still has a birth-rate more than double its death-rate. The whole social appearance of New England has changed since 1900; the United States generally has so changed that it is high time for a new statement on the nature of the "American," and a final suppression of the "Anglo-Saxon" myth.

The birth-rate of France in 1913 was 19 per thousand, and its death-rate 17.7; in 1914 the birth-rate was 18, the death-rate 19.6. The birth-rate for England and Wales in 1913 was 24.1, the death-rate 13.8; in 1915, 1916 and 1917 the birth-rates were 22, 20.9 and 17.8; the death-rates were 15.7, 14.4 and 14.1. In Ireland the birth-rates in 1913, 1915 and 1916 were 22.8, 22 and 21.1, and the death-rates were 17.1, 17.6 and 16.5. The Italian birth-rates in 1913 and 1914 were 31.7 and 31.1; the death-rates 18.7 and 17.9. The German birth-rate in 1913 was 20.9, in 1916 it was 21.3, in 1917 it had fallen to 10.9. The death-rates for the German civil population in the same years were 15.8, 10.5 and 13.1. Whether these German statistics are authentic or not is difficult to say, but a low birth-rate will lower the death-rate by the absence of children under five years of age, as this is the most fatal age.

We are inclined to look upon birth-rates as altogether a matter of morality, but morality is only one factor. If it were the sole determining factor the Roumanians and Italians would be the most moral people in Europe and the French and Irish the worst. Birth-rates are results of very complex influences. The increase of any population is inversely proportionate to its density; the denser the population the slower the numerical increase, ordinarily, owing to the growing lack of food. From 1850 to 1890 the population increased in the United States 25 per 1,000, because we could feed the increase; in Spain it increased only 5, in France only 2 per thousand. In America the increase was not a matter of birth-rate, but of immigration; in France and in Spain the increase was due to the births. Any part of the earth's surface will contain only as many inhabitants as can be fed with food produced on that area, unless the food is imported.

Again the density of population depends upon the degree of land cultivation. The more scientific the cultivation the more food can be produced in a given territory. Cultivated land can furnish 2,000 times as much food as an equal area of hunting ground, and a country that can support one savage hunter can maintain from 1,600 to 2,000 modern farmers, and even more. Within a century before the present war German farmers trebled the quantity of crops per acre, and recently one American State added 45,000,000 bushels to its yield without increasing the acreage planted, merely by paying attention to the choice of seed. Burbank showed us how to raise 90 tons of fodder to the acre on what was utterly worthless desert land.

Even the direct growth of nations is not from the birth-rate alone, but from the food supply, which has an unmistakable effect on the birth-rate. In colonial days the French Government sent over women by thousands to be the wives of the Canadian fur-traders, but the population of Canada did not increase outside the agricultural areas; New England, however, left to itself, grew because the colonists were food-producers.

When the land cultivation is stationary the saturation point of the population remains stationary. There is not food enough to feed an increased population, and the death-rate balances the birth-rate, as in China. Occasionally a failure of the crops, or a flood, occurs in such a condition, and there is a resulting famine, or a pestilence, which sweeps off people by hundreds of thousands. Ireland in 1659 had only 500,000 inhabitants after sixty years of guerilla warfare, fewer than there are now in the city of Baltimore, but in 1846 it had 9,000,000. The land was saturated with people in 1847, and it was unskilfully cultivated. A potato-crop failure resulted in famine, there were a million deaths and an exodus of the Irish such that now there are many more people in the city of New York alone than in all Ireland. Before the present war there were 15,000,000 acres of good arable land in Ireland lying fallow, yet every eleventh person in the country was a pauper, receiving outdoor relief. Land saturation in Europe is the chief physical cause of the present war.

The food supply is a far-reaching factor in national growth and health. When we killed off the buffalo herds in the West and replaced them with cattle we could feed millions more of people than we could when we had the buffalo. The enormous packs of wolves that fed on the buffalo remained after the buffalo had become extinct and held down the production of cattle. When the wolves were exterminated the cattle increased extraordinarily. While we let the Indians roam over the West their ponies infected the cattle to an unbelievable extent with foot and mouth disease. When we shut the Indians in reservations we saved thousands of people from starvation in European cities that bought our beef. The roaming Indian and the wolf in Montana kept down the population in Philadelphia and London. The stray dog in Pennsylvania makes it impossible for the farmers to raise sheep. The people do without mutton and wool, but the errant cur and the lady that writes about the noble dog in the "agony column" of the newspapers are happy.

Dallas in 1905 proved that the population of India increases and decreases in direct ratio to the annual rainfall. In Australia in places where there is only a ten-inch rainfall they can raise eight sheep to the square mile and feed people accordingly; where there is a twenty-inch fall they raise 640 sheep to the square mile. In Argentina where there is a thirty-four-inch rainfall they raise 2,560 sheep to the square mile and feed and clothe people accordingly.

Soil squandering and exhaustion also affect population. In the many thousands of years during which man has dwelt in the Mediterranean Basin the soil has been exhausted one-third. The soil of Kentucky has been exhausted the same one-third in 150 years by the American farmer. New Hampshire, Vermont and Virginia are filled with abandoned farms as a result of land squandering for present profits.

When civilization is forced upon the lower races as in the Philippines, Java and India, the population rapidly increases owing to the increased food supply. The population of Java swarmed after the Dutch occupation until now the Javanese are crowded like the Chinese. If we had the same density of population for our area we should have 1,680,000,000 people to feed, yet in our extravagance 125,000,000 would pinch us. On the other hand, as soon as a civilization decays the population decreases. The city of Rome under the Caesars had nearly 6,000,000 inhabitants; after the Roman Empire decayed all Central Italy was a desert until our own day. Five centuries before Christ the Island of Ceylon had 10,000,000 inhabitants; the ruins of one city are sixteen miles in diameter. After the island had been overrun by northern races the number of inhabitants so dwindled that even now after a century and a half of improved land cultivation there are only 4,000,000 people there.

The movements of the Asiatic nations into Europe were a search for food. The historical drought which began in 650, A. D. started the Asiatic barbarians on their great invasion of Europe and affected civilization to the present day. Curiously, all the barbaric raids across Europe since the fall of Rome, with the exception of those made by the Huns and Saracens, were made by Germanic hordes, and the Germans accompanied even the Huns, Goths, Visigoths, Ostrogoths, Lombards, Vandals, Gepidae, Alans, Heruli and Norse. The Vandal Genseric was a startling prototype of William the Vandal even in his cant. One of the most disastrous raids the world has known, and we are getting its full effect today, was that started across Europe by the German Luther.

The Irish so-called forays down through Gaul never happened at all. There is enormous contemporary documentary evidence of what took place in Gaul when these imaginary Irish raids should have been going on, but the Gauls never mention them. Nial of the Nine Hostages was not killed on "the banks of the Loire." The farthest south we ever get him in any chronicle is on the banks of the Muir n-Icht, the English Channel. He was killed on the banks of a little stream called the Lore in North Scotland, and Lore was twisted into Loire. Dathi, his nephew, was not killed "in the Alps," but in the Grampian Hills. The oldest document we have relating the Dathi story is the Book of Leinster, which was written 600 years after Dathi's time. There the story is called "Sluaghid Dathi co Sliabh n-Ealpa"; "The Expedition of Dathi to the Alpine Mountain." The term Alp is Celtic, Irish Ailp, and means any peak; there is a Slieve Alp in Mayo now. At best he is as vague as Finn Mac Cumhail, and there is no trace of any evidence that he ever was on the Continent. In the drought which occurred in Europe about 1300 B. C. the Celtic forbears of Dathi probably went south into Italy and Greece. They laid the foundation of the Latin language with their Oscan and Umbrian dialects. They went into Thessaly and left the sagas Homer used—the very name Achilles is Celtic.

Food for the people is the most important fundamental fact that meets us, and because it is so important we pay no more attention to it than we do to little matters like eternal salvation or temporal justice. We listen through tears to the Tagorean drivel on the "uplift," we grow eloquent on feminism, and sad on the decadence of the drama; our young ladies write essays on the subjectivity of modern philosophy, we investigate Nietzscheism and like deliria of the Teutonic mental indigestion, but we let the pork-packers corner the meat, and the wheat-pit corner the grain, and the middlemen have our pay-envelopes, and leave the supreme question of the food of humanity to the Kansan rustic and the State legislature. The world moves on its belly as an army does, and it is probable if the world were intelligently fed the result for peace and civilization would equal the astounding benefits of female suffrage. That wonderful seer James J. Hill said years ago that within a few generations our children would be eating roots like the Chinese, and perhaps he was a prophet.

Tomorrow in the East

NEIL BOYTON, S.J.

AMONG the immediate problems that peace will bring to the fore, is the fate of the foreign missions in Asia. Today, like Belgium, Serbia and Roumania, the Catholic Church in the Middle and Far East must "carry on" as best she can. The war has struck cruel blows at the ranks of the shepherds. They were all too few before '14, and they are a bent line today. That this line cannot break disastrously we know in our hearts, for it has a Divine reserve.

Up to the present, France has been the main support of the Church in the "Brown Continent," and "bad seconds" to her have been, in about this order, Belgium, Portugal, Spain, Germany, and Italy. English and Irish and Dutch missioners there are in Asia, but their total is not a fraction of the above-named countries. American missioners were, and are, about as rare as the sight of the Stars and Stripes, hanging over the taffrail of a steamer east of Suez, before our war fleet slid off the ways.

Indirectly the Kaiser's vain struggle for his place in the sun has done deadly injury, more harmful than all the camouflaged persecution of the United States Freemason cliques, to the entire Catholic mission organization of the East. For European priests are vital to these infant churches and war has taken the majority of the younger missioners, and absolutely stopped the supply of new ones. If some dread disease should wipe out in less than four years seven out of ten of the vigorous pastors and curates of the great archdiocese of New York; annihilate Dunwoodie; and halt absolutely all those New York boys in whose breasts were starting the buds of vocation, what would be the outlook for Catholicism in New York today, or worse, five years from today? Something similar to that imagined catastrophe has taken place in the East, and left a skeleton.

France numbered her missioners by the thousand. So much so that throughout a large part of the Asian continent and the neighboring islands, the term "Catholic Church" and "French Church" had become synonymous on pagan and Christian tongues. Then came La Belle France's deadly peril. Her cry was heard through every mission, and her younger missionary sons, putting patriotism before all else, left their missions in mud-walled villages, or palm-thatched settlement, or "parrot island;" left till their totals have mounted into regiments, and went back to that France who had expelled many of them but two decades ago. In the case of these Gallic soldier-priests this return to Europe has been no dribble, but an exodus. If you meet a French priest under middle age out there today, the odds are that he has some physical disablement, and within five minutes you will hear it brought forward to explain his absence from the firing-line.

Of course, there are left those whose hair is graying, and it will whiten soon under the triple or quadruple burden they are bearing. You stop at a silent "procure," formerly the "rest center" to which the missioners inland used to come for retreats and relaxations, and the great vacant rooms remind you strongly of a mid-winter visit to some summer hotel. A few older Fathers will be there, and they may be discussing the cablegram, announcing the death in action of Lieutenant ——, who was once the active, bearded, little missioner at ——, and they will name you some outlandish name. Within the next decade the demand for successors for these older Fathers will naturally increase, and, like Rachel's children "they are not." For there are no recruits coming into the mission fields from France, nor can many be expected after the war.

Among the "bad seconds"—and it is just to call the other European sources of priests that, for all of them together hardly equal a third of the number of missioners that France had in Asia four years ago—Belgium's contributions to this Eastern front of the Church have stopped, and no one knowing the present plight of that brave land can look for strong future additions to her missionary laborers. English and Irish missioners are relatively so few that with the best will in the world they cannot take over France's missionary enterprises, any more than the British armies could take over a considerable part of the French lines on the western front at this moment.

The usefulness of sons of Germany in any of the Oriental countries, allied to the Entente will be nil for years to come. These eastern countries, each a rich harvest for the workers, include India, China, Japan, the Philippines, Siam, and the handful of strategically placed British colonies—Hong Kong, Straits Settlements, Shanghai. In all these localities, with the exception of our islands, where French Catholic missioners were formerly prominent, and where Catholic work must be carried on, the feeling against any subject of the Kaiser, even those who would come in the name of the Lord, is such that his very nationality would bar him. There remain Spanish, Portuguese, Dutch and Italian missioners. There are not enough of them altogether.

So it is, with Catholic Europe practically helpless to continue carrying God's light into these pagan climes, the Catholic world must turn to generous America. We stand at the dawn of the day of American Catholic foreign mission work. A glorious day, in which is given to us the opportunity of paying to Asia the missionary debt we owe to Catholic Europe. For it was but yesterday that countless young priests ceased to leave "father, mother, and all else for His Name's sake" in order to save the New World. These European missionaries sowed the seed, or equally important, kept the transplanted seed alive in our continent, and the rich harvest of splendid American Catholicism about us is their reward exceeding great.

This paying of missionary debts has been all through the Church's history a relay. Judea brought the Light to Rome, and Rome repaid, not Judea, but Europe. And Europe commenced to discharge her debt, when Columbus put out into the fearsome western ocean. So we American Catholics, in our day, seem privileged to start payment on our indebtedness to Catholic Europe, by taking over the stricken vineyard that lies beyond our Golden Gate.

It is into a friendly continent that these American priests will go. For there is a glamour about Americans in the East, as there is a glamour encircling things American in the eyes of all Allied Europe. The source of this interest is the wonderful tales of the resources and inventions and discoveries that the millions of Asia have heard. The legend of this superman trait will not hurt the American missioner. Rather it should open doors. Protestant missionary America has preceded us. So much so, that one of the first wrong impressions Yankee pioneer priests will have to change is this. For as the French have given their national name to the Faith in the East, so the Protestants have, consciously or unconsciously, made "American" a synonym for "Protestant." But this is a minor detail that the next decade will dispute.

Commercial America has preceded us, our traders, with the British, have made English by far the first "foreign" language of the East. It is spoken, or understood in every big Eastern city, and along the railroads. This facility will help the coming American missioners. These American business men, who have furthered Greeley's advice and gone so far west that they came out east, have mastered the indigenous languages, and it seems reasonable to think that where those of one nationality have learned the tongues the Orientals speak, more of the same nationality will prove equally proficient as linguists. Especially, as their aim, in picking up "native talk" will not be for cash, but for souls.

Finally, traveling through these fruitful fields afar, that today call to America for gleaners, one gets the conviction that, like America's Patroness, "no one has ever called on her in vain." "The Yanks are coming" and when they get over there, with their characteristic national facility to "size up" a situation, that broad-mindedness which the very breadth of their continent gives, their ability to adopt promptly more modern methods, when they see that the new way is the better way, their readiness to mix with all, their knowledge of the powers of "the drive" for money linked with their familiarity with the maxim, "It pays to advertise," they will force the conviction that they, the oncoming young American priests and Brothers and Sisters will reap such a harvest in the Asian fields, that they will cancel all indebtedness due to Catholic Europe, and lay up riches in heaven.

The Catholic Daily Once More

L. F. Happel, M.A.

ONE subject was untouched during the sessions of the Catholic Press Association convention held in Chicago recently. This was the Catholic daily newspaper, of which but the merest mention was made in passing. The existing weekly press and the monthly periodicals presented problems all sufficient for the few hours that were afforded for deliberation.

What was heard far more frequently was a word of bitter complaint against the existing secular press, with frequent charges that news of a Catholic nature is maliciously suppressed. Despite the fact that in addressing a meeting preliminary to the convention sessions, a representative of the Associated Press stoutly maintained that his organization is wholly impartial in the distribution of news, it was stated with emphasis on the floor of the convention that there is a very real and persistently practised boycott of Catholic affairs. The subject is one upon which Catholic and secular editors will never come to an agreement. There is too great a variance between the two in their opinions about the nature of news. An attractive young woman in a low-cut evening gown, who is to sell programs at a popular Catholic benefit, will experience no difficulty in having her portrait appear in the daily press, but no mention will be made of great Church events. There are many of us, though, who cannot forget that certain American papers, after giving widest publicity to supposedly authentic interviews with Vatican officials, never subsequently published the fact that these interviews were found to be spurious.

The matter is a rather difficult one to handle without regional restrictions. There are, possibly, localities where even Catholics feel that their interests and opinions are adequately cared for by the secular press. However, I wonder just how many are satisfied with the manner in which the daily press has treated the war program of the Knights of Columbus. Perhaps in some cities it was given the same kindly consideration at newspaper offices that was accorded to the endeavors of the Y. M. C. A. and even the Salvation Army. Certainly there were districts where it was virtually ignored, and where even the purchase of full pages of advertising space, in an effort to give necessary publicity to the drive for funds, secured only "if"-editorials of approval and tiny news items on the progress of the campaign. War correspondents have sent over columns of descriptive matter on the Y. M. C. A. and the Salvation Army work abroad and, while they may have treated the Knights of Columbus efforts with equal generosity, there were editors here at home who were not so impartial. It does not do to say that the War Activities Committee of the Knights failed in the publicity feature of its undertaking. A goodly portion of the advertising that was given Protestant war work is due solely to the more cordial reception that was accorded at the editorial desk to chance notes regarding these activities. But there is no intention to restrict this discussion to this one phase of the situation. Actually, it will matter little, ultimately, whether the secular press treats the Knights of Columbus program with fairness or not—the adoption of the war-chest proposal for the raising of funds has largely nullified the possible harm that newspaper silence regarding our camp labors could do. There will be, shortly, far more fervid heralds of Catholic activities in behalf of the enlisted men than could in any event spring from editorial sanctums. The tenderest and sincerest compliment I have heard paid to our Catholic Sisterhoods was that of a white-haired veteran of the sixties, who had made the acquaintance of the nursing nuns of the battle-fields. That he wore on the lapel of his coat the emblem of a forbidden secret society made the compliment, if more surprising, none the less welcome. The Catholic Church in America is at this moment afforded an opportunity to create for itself a corps of the most ardent defenders outside its own fold, who for the next half-century will stand between it and its maligners. According to all indications we are exerting ourselves steadfastly to make the best of the opportunity.

The point of the neglect of vital Catholic news by the secular press has been threshed out repeatedly. With each new instance when we are made to suffer somehow by this boycott of our news and our views by publications that in doing so offend against their own professed principles of impartiality, we cry out against it. Who has forgotten the silence of a predominant fraction of the American newspapers on the outrages perpetrated against the Church in Mexico? Let that wo-smitten land in pointing the finger of responsibility not forget an American secular press whose indifference toward the true state of affairs in Mexico connived at the shaping of that people's affairs to their present distressing condition. I have, though, no intention of laying fresh charges of this sort against American newspaperdom.

The nature of our complaint has reached the editorial offices where either this indifference or unfairness toward Catholics holds place. Let us not forget that such sanctums are at best but ante-chambers to other offices where the true kings of the newspaper world are enthroned. Propaganda purposes are, withal, a second consideration in the present-day newspaper business. There may still be some enthusiasts who control newspapers with the purpose of making their own shade of opinion upon one topic or another that of many. But these men are not issuing the startlingly successful and popular papers. Excellent testimony to this fact is the gradual merging of the dailies of our great cities, so that many large cities have only one or two morning papers in place of the five or six that thrived in the days of far smaller population. The newspaper is no longer first a pulpit, and he who would use it as such must be many times a millionaire. Men whose dollars are rapid breeders now control the press.

I would say that our protest against the boycott of Catholic news, which we carried to secular editorial sanctums, went beyond the closed doors to the man whose vital interest in the paper is the final profit and loss accounting. For our protest generally has been accompanied by an argument for which he has sharp ears. "You are foolishly pulling your own nose," we said to him. "Catholics cannot but feel keenly your absolute indifference to their affairs. Look at the opportunity that is offered you. We have so many hundreds of thousands of Catholics in this city. Is their patronage worth anything to you? Then treat them fairly, give them and their interests the same generous space you accord to other denominations and you can easily add them to your mailing lists."

Some ears to which this argument came were not deaf. Some publishers were quick to benefit themselves, if not us, by our proposal. As the politician angles for that fabled "Catholic vote," so circulation managers are now beginning to angle for that very concrete body, "Catholic readers." Without mentioning names and localities I will try to be specific. There is one morning paper in a great city that has been struggling for years to get out of the last place, when circulation and advertising figures of the various publications in the city are compared. Once it had the hearty support of the laboring element. But it betrayed itself in a day when labor troubles came into its own press room. So it lost its main prop. Since then it has been enabled to hang on merely because it is one of a string of publications encircling the country and controlled by an individual. New régime upon new régime took charge of the paper in the effort to build up the weakened circulation. Few encouraging results were obtained. Of late, though, there has been a decided change in the attitude of this paper toward Catholic affairs. For the past three years, news, editorial and feature columns have been opened to us. Big black letters calling out from the news-stands have, at times, made special appeal to Catholics. Illustrations are made to serve the identical purpose. I do not vouch for the results, but I suppose that many have fallen into the trap; and, on seeing over a neighbor's shoulder in the car a picture, perhaps of a group of army officers and nuns, have bought a copy of that paper from the first newsboy. No matter how indifferent Catholics may be to their own publications, any scraping for their favor by the secular press is quite likely to win more than generous response.

To the foregoing paragraph no reasonable objection could possibly be found were it not that upon analysis the most of the Catholic news printed reasonably must be classified with the "beautiful-young-girls-will-sell-programs-for-Catholic-benefit" type. At least, the publication is not noted for having printed denials of the miserable canards that were circulated by the American press, for instance regarding the attitude of the Holy Father toward the various belligerent Powers. Matters that an editor with Catholic ideals would select as really vital to the welfare of the Church, the security of the nation and the good of the readers are not the topics selected for the Catholic readers of this paper. Rather, this paper must be set down with the most vicious of the particular city in which it circulates. It is the most flagrant violater of decency in the matter of printing the intimate details of shocking scandals; it constantly offers its readers the most suggestive pictures, a favorite resort of its photographers being the bathing beaches, where only the most shamefully costumed young women can hope to attract the lenses. On public questions the paper will generally be found advocating the dissolution of authority. No better instance can be cited than the matter of motion-picture censorship. In a bitter fight to maintain a fairly satisfactory censorship of films, this paper catered entirely to the interests that seek the abolition of all restrictions and the unrestricted reproduction of any heinous offence against morality that the picture-producers turn out of their studios.

This is the poison served the Catholic readers of this paper, lured from other publications that profess somewhat higher ethics by the temptation of seeing their own photographs in print and their petty personal events in type. This is a new danger lurking in the secular press, more menacing than anything heretofore because added to the old. The daily papers are anxious to gain Catholic circulation; but they will not pay for it in columns devoted to honest Catholic news. The boycott is to continue so far as really vital Catholic concerns go, in relation to all matters that might dissolve the prejudice against our Faith and that would place our Church, its Hierarchy and its Faithful in a true light.

Concerning the possibilities, therefore, of securing adequate presentation of Catholic matters in the daily press, either Catholic or secular, there was little good news heard at the convention. But I carried away one secret that was heartening, possibly the best word that the two days gave. The matter was not mentioned in the general sessions but whispered only in private chats when each person knew the other. So much of this secret as is permissible I shall unfold here. Something that approaches America's first Catholic daily, published in the English language, has come into being. At least, a daily has appeared that comes far closer than anything heretofore to meriting this title. Unfortunately name and locality must be withheld.

There was one State, with only a minor Catholic population, and the papers of that place carried on a complete boycott of Catholic affairs. The press of the capital, which is likewise the episcopal see, utterly ignored items that had a Catholic tinge. Yet the district is one wherein are widely circulated those malicious, traitorous papers that live by slander and falsehood. Various efforts were made to counteract these conditions and afford the people some vehicle that would bring them true news of Catholic concerns. The diocesan paper was largely powerless. But a few Catholic men of means and zeal managed to gain control, by purchase, of one of the existing dailies. As far as I am aware, this was done very quietly. Then the paper set out with a new policy, not to be partial but to be fair to Catholics. Items of Catholic news began to appear for the first time. Stories with a Catholic tone coming from various news bureaus were published in this paper, if suppressed by the others. This program attracted no unfavorable attention. Among its first fruits, it can be stated that one of the other papers recently published a new story of Catholic interest, a radical departure from the established policy of the paper. Of course, the Catholic control of the one publication must be kept absolutely secret, for there is more than enough existing bigotry to force that paper into financial straits were the facts known. A good blow is being struck daily, however, by these men who offered their dollars for perhaps a not unprofitable venture.

No, the Catholic daily was not a subject to the front in the sessions of the Catholic Press Association convention. The men participating in the proceedings were not blind to the need, but they were men who are every day "up against" the hard facts of the Catholic publication business. There were few notes of pessimism. For men who are trying so hard and are treated so indifferently, there was unexpected enthusiasm. Still these shades of opinion and bits of information that were passed to and fro in private chats showed an appreciation of the evils threatening a nation controlled by a secular press, and a realization of the remedies. Their publication may serve to encourage those through whose cooperation alone it will be possible to build up a great American Catholic press, daily, weekly and monthly.

COMMUNICATIONS

Letters as a rule should not exceed six-hundred words

Agresti's Calumny

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The text of the interview recently given by Mr. Antonio Agresti, an editor of the Tribuna di Roma and a member of the Commission of Italian Journalists to the United States, of which I am also an honored member, to the New York Evening Post, did not come to my notice until yesterday. I was vaguely advised of such an interview several days ago when in Washington, where I incidentally also learned from an authentic source, conversant with and competent to pass upon the subject, that the expression of such opinions would be most disadvantageous to the cause of Italy in America.

I have before me a copy of the August 17 issue of your well-known and estimable paper, which contains a strong editorial entitled "By Mr. Creel's Authority?", dealing with the said interview of "Signor" Antonio Agresti, and which reproduces that portion of the interview attacking the Holy See and the Pope. Without entering into the merit of your criticism of the one interviewed, and much less the position of Mr. Creel, Chief of the Bureau of Information of the United States, permit me to submit here a few personal views on the matter in question. In the first place, I ask you to take cognizance of the fact that Mr. Antonio Agresti is not at the head nor in charge of our Commission. He is, as each one of the rest of us who compose it is, a plain member thereof who speaks, writes and acts only in his name and in that of the paper which he represents. It is unfair for your review, though it speaks in good faith, to hold the entire Commission responsible for the unauthorized and personal expressions of one of its members.

In the second place, I beg to be permitted to comment upon the arbitrary expressions of Mr. Agresti. According to that portion of the text of the interview published in the New York Evening Post which is reproduced in said issue of AMERICA, Mr. Agresti states that the "position of the Vatican is very false" and that "everybody in Italy judges his conduct as anti-Italian." Besides this, he also adds that "the Pope has spoken too much altogether, not openly but in secret, and has been too favorable to Germany and Austria." His climax is reached in the stupid assertion that "even the Catholics blame the conduct of the Pope, as does every one else in Italy."

Mr. Agresti goes too far when he attributes to all Italians—among whom he takes care specifically to include "the Catholics themselves"—an opinion regarding the conduct of the Supreme Pontiff which exists alone in his own, anti-clerical and Masonic mind. The truth is that among impartial and fair-minded Italians, as well as among the honest-minded of the world, the whole conduct of Benedict XV, from the very day of his elevation to the Pontificate to this date, has been inspired and guided by those principles, eminently Christian and highly humanitarian, which from the heritage of universal Catholic doctrine shine forth today in this bloody conflict of interests as beacon lights before the people of all the world.

The Catholics of Italy who obtained from the self-same Pontiff the greatest freedom to serve their country with unlimited enthusiasm and devotion—this being in complete harmony with the dutiful, necessary and inevitable impartiality which the Holy See must preserve with reference to all the belligerents—will be unable to refrain a smile at the odious and ridiculous opinions that Mr. Agresti charges them with entertaining towards the spiritual father of millions of Catholics scattered throughout the world.

A Catholic by family training, by a belief keenly entertained and professed, by reason of studies which cause me to admire and to love the religious traditions of Italy during the centuries, a militant in the ranks of popular Catholic activities, a representative of the greatest Catholic newspaper syndicate of Italy and publisher of one of the leading periodicals embraced in the said organization, I have felt it my duty to express myself in this manner to the Catholics of America, sharing as I do their displeasure because of the inopportune and flagrant offense against all Catholics committed by a member of our Commission and one of their guests.

I sincerely trust that you as well as the rest of the American Catholic press and all the Catholics of the United States, being used to a wide freedom in the public expression of public opinions, will not dignify these inexcusable utterances of Mr. Agresti by paying any further attention to them. Regard them rather, even though most unfortunate, as but one of those inexcusable incidents of almost daily occurrence in journalistic experience.

[Thanks are due to Dr. Cappa for his manly letter. He is mistaken, however, in supposing that AMERICA held the entire Commission responsible for Agresti's stupid calumnies. Moreover, Dr. Cappa's suggestion that no further attention be paid to Agresti does not meet our approval. It is high time that Mr. Creel and some of his itinerant, vaporing Latins learned that American Catholics do not intend to help pay a nimble-tongued guest for calumniating the Holy Father. Unsubsidized calumny is to be had in plenty. Then, too, whatever the desire of Agresti and his kind, Catholics wish to beat the Kaiser flat to the ground and they will not fail to protest against the importation of frantic orators who seem to think that they have a mission to aid Germany by engendering and spreading discord in the United States. Agresti were better in a dark corner at home.—Ed. AMERICA.]

Why Do Catholics Lack "Prestige"?

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Dr. Muttkowski's articles which have been appearing in AMERICA relative to the almost universal lack of prestige of the Catholic Church as a body and of her individual members, have interested me very much. No one will deny that there is a splendid opportunity for intelligent Catholics to combat the lethargy of the secular press in its treatment of Catholic affairs. But the problem is not as easy as it may appear.

Our Church is, and thank God for it, the Church of the masses, the "common" people. Their influence both individually and collectively over the press is practically nil. The wealthy Catholics whose financial status might force attention from the press, are few and far between. There remain then our Bishops and priests and the intelligent, well-informed members of the Catholic laity. Our good Bishops and priests already have their hands full directing the spiritual affairs of their charges. Surely we cannot expect them to fight our every-day battles as well. The task, then, of defending the Church's doctrines, so often distorted in the secular press, and of diffusing a better knowledge of our Holy Church among non-Catholics, devolves upon the qualified members of the Catholic laity. Granted there are many Catholics so qualified who are doing their share and many who are doing little or nothing as lay apostles, the fact still remains that intelligent Catholic laymen who are well versed in the practices and doctrines of their Church and are able to expound them convincingly for the press or for an assembled audience, constitute but a small percentage of our Catholic population.

Zeal for higher secular education has not been as intense among Catholics as it might have been. Witness the large proportion of Catholics in the army and navy, 35 per cent to 50 per cent, but these figures are for the enlisted men. The percentage of Catholic officers is very much lower, for our Catholic youths as a class have not had the higher education necessary to obtain commissions. Education in the arts and sciences and thorough instruction in our Catholic doctrines, both obtainable in Catholic colleges, is the only course by which future Catholic citizens may become efficient members of the Church Militant, demanding by their superior training all necessary prestige and actively combating the indifference and opposition of the public and of the press to the Church.

Brooklyn. M. E. F.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In the issue of AMERICA for August 31, in an article entitled "Catholic Publicity and the Individual," Richard A. Muttkowski says: "Secondly, the average Catholic is timid and fears opposition, especially since opposition has nothing but chaos, intellectual and physical, to offer." "Maybe it is the reaction against this spirit of 'your fellow's business' that makes Catholics crawl into their shells."

Mr. Muttkowski is right in his conclusions. Let me quote a real old Irish priest in this regard, Rev. T. A. Fitzgerald, O.F.M.:

> These people are imbued with the old spirit of Protestant ascendancy, and presumed superiority, and consider that Catholics, especially the Irish, should deem themselves fortunate to be allowed to live on sufferance. Unfortunately, too, there are some Catholics, especially those in comfortable circumstances, whose limbs would feel at ease in the chains of tyranny, who have inherited the broken spirit of some downtrodden ancestor, and are not yet acclimated to the atmosphere of a free country which tyrants cannot breathe.

Father Fitzgerald is right in his remarks; years of oppression have injected servility into the very marrow of some of our Catholic people. But the cowardice of which Mr. Muttkowski speaks I never found in the characters of intelligent graduates of Catholic colleges, but I found it in the diluted Catholicism of the Catholic graduates of the so-called "non-sectarian" universities.

A Catholic Press Bureau

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I cordially endorse an article in a recent issue of AMERICA by Mr. Michael Williams on the importance of some kind of Catholic press bureau. I am a late convert to Catholicism, and my conversion was brought about chiefly through the influence of the apostolate of the press as carried on by the Paulist Fathers. My conversion is the result, not of the personal influence of any friend, but purely of the careful reading of the excellent low-priced controversial literature that has been put within easy reach of non-Catholics. I was especially influenced by that class of booklets which so effectively controvert the many shameful calumnies against Catholics that have been repeatedly published by unprincipled Protestants. The discovery of these falsehoods had a two-fold effect on me; namely to disgust me with Protestantism, and to excite my profound sympathy for a persecuted Catholicism. From this I began the positive study of Catholic principles by the use of the best Catholic theological literature, and my progress in this was like a delightful voyage of discovery. As I proceeded, I saw more and more clearly the beauty and strength of Catholicism, as contrasted with the deformity and weakness of Protestantism, and of course, the final result was my union with the Catholic Church.

Now, I refer to this experience of mine simply to emphasize the importance of a wide-awake apostolate of the press, including an active and efficient Catholic press bureau which will keep on the track of every published utterance that concerns Catholicism. To such an enterprise I, for one, should be more than pleased to lend my most energetic help, whatever that might be worth. During the ten years of my close study of Catholicism, I have collected a large amount of useful matter from both Protestant and Catholic sources, and I have this material preserved in classified form, so that it may be easily available whenever I want to use it. I trust I may not be charged with undue egotism, when I say that I feel myself prepared to controvert every anti-Catholic calumny that has been put before the public in recent years. I have been a Protestant minister for nearly twenty years, with pastoral charges in several different States, and my personal associations, as well as my reading, have made me thoroughly acquainted with every vulnerable point in the various Protestant sects. With all my heart, I hope a wide-awake Catholic press bureau will be established, and if so, I want to be called on for any service I may be able to render. I shall be very eager to help.

Public Accountants

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have read the very interesting letter of A. C. A., which appeared in your issue of August 17, recommending Catholics to adopt accountancy as a profession, and while I agree with him regarding its importance I would not recommend aspirants to enter any of the day or night schools of accountancy as in those institutions pupils acquire only a theoretical knowledge of accounts. Young men about to adopt accountancy as a profession should first enter a mercantile concern in order to acquire a thorough knowledge of book-keeping, and afterwards enter the offices of a competent firm of public accountants where they should make considerable progress in a few years, assuming, of course, that they have a natural aptitude for figures. The fact that a man be a chartered or certified public accountant is by no means prima facie evidence of competency. I have known non-chartered accountants to command much larger salaries than chartered accountants, and it is a well-known fact that non-certified public accountants in this country command larger salaries than certified public accountants. Many certified accountants are very competent but as a rule they are undesirable owing to their lack of practical experience. I myself for that reason seldom employ them.

As you are, doubtless, aware, Catholic accountants as well as all other Catholic professional men are handicapped. A good many Protestant, or rather non-Catholic, concerns and Protestant institutions will not employ them; neither will they be employed by Catholic institutions, which is an amazing and regrettable fact, when it is borne in mind that many of the cleverest accountants in the profession are Catholics who have an international reputation for ability and integrity. While religious tolerance is a commendable virtue it can be carried too far and I would suggest that our Catholic institutions eschew it and assert their independence.

East Orange, N. J. D. C. L.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

We note with interest the article in the issue of August 17, entitled, "Catholic Accountants Needed," and would say that while it may be true that in New York City the Catholic young men have not taken up the study of accounting, such is not the case in Boston. For several years past the Young Men's Catholic Association has conducted courses in accounting, using a standard text which is one of the best written on the subject. The course as given is the same as that conducted in many of the colleges throughout the country and for the last three years our classes have been filled to capacity.

Many of our pupils have shown marked success in handling problems arising through the new income and war-tax work, and many of them are employed in the income-tax office of this city. Many more of our pupils, as a result of their training, have passed the Government examinations as accountants and are now rendering efficient service in the army and navy departments. While the evening classes of the Young Men's Catholic Association make no restrictions as to creed, most of the pupils are Catholics.

A feature of the work has been the excellent training given to women in this line, and the marked success which our women pupils have made in the work is an evidence of their ability to take advantage of the great opportunities now open to them in all branches of commercial life.

The evening classes are doing good work in other ways in training our men and women in many practical lines, the list of special courses numbering about forty. Good work is being done in preparing men in the service for examinations which will bring them promotion, and the splendid results achieved by our courses in first aid and home nursing, under the American Red Cross, are well known.

The classes will open for the fall term the first week of October and we are looking forward to a very busy and interesting year.

A New "Index"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The Secretary of War has ordered the "removal or destruction" of all copies of certain books that may be found in the libraries of United States army camps. Many of these books are by well-known authors and are printed by trustworthy publishers. They treat of various phases of war, and many of them deal with Germany's relations with nations and peoples.

No doubt, some of these books appear quite harmless. It is reasonable to suppose that many soldiers and sailors could read these books, or some of them, without at all endangering the quality of their loyalty to their country.

It would appear, however, that the United States, convinced of the righteousness of its cause, and determined to win this war, is safeguarding the opinions of all its fighters by telling them what they shall read and what they shall not read. The Secretary of War, confident that this country is right and Germany wrong, exercises his powers to tell the men of the army that there are certain books they must not read. Some passages in these books might lead wavering minds to believe that this country is not entirely right and Germany not entirely wrong. Wavering minds are not desired by any great force that aims at complete victory. The Secretary of War, offering no specific reason for his act, lays down the law. The men of the army, subject to authority, must obey.

Centuries ago the supreme authority of the Catholic Church found it expedient to forbid its members to read certain books that tended to corrupt the morals of the Faithful. Rome saw the seed of moral ruin in much of this so-called literature and, the Catholic Church, founded by Christ to spread His teachings and wage a ceaseless and united warfare against the forces of evil, did the thing which the Secretary of War is now doing, and virtually for the same reasons. It requires unity of thought and action to win battles of any kind.

Our disturbed brethren of the sects who have viewed with horror the Church's attitude in forbidding its members to read vicious and seductive matter in favor of anarchy, Socialism, Christian Science, New Thought, Modernism, Spiritism and various other "isms" leading to heresy and lunacy, may, if they like, now extend a measure of their sympathy to the army in France and elsewhere.

The Easy Language

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The Reverend William Poland, S.J., writes in AMERICA for August 17 concerning a universal language. I largely agree with him, much to my credit. The cautious dominie, using a text from an Epistle, remarked: "St. Paul says this, and I in part agree with him." Forsooth, such partial agreement is commendable. How about the partial disagreement? In my case, it is doubt and interrogation.

The argument in favor of choosing, for universal speech, a living language is sound. The very worthy inventions by Father Schleyer in 1879, of Volapuk, and by Doctor Zamenhof in 1887 of Esperanto, have testified to the limitations of artificial language. Volapuk, which had the field to itself but eight years, consisted chiefly of simplified English roots, with an obvious grammar, and its specialization weakened its universality. Esperanto, taking its roots more generally from the principal languages of Europe, appealed to a larger constituency. It has been promoted by the publication of Shakespeare's plays, the Aeneid, the Iliad, the Bible and modern authors, by many Esperanto journals, societies, congresses, and by the action of some of our States. Yet, in its thirty years, it is only a scholastic acquisition, not a language of popular communication, not common speech.

Manifestly, some one of the living tongues must be selected, in order to assure usableness, command immediate practical use and have the helpful prestige of actual usage. Father Poland has cleverly eliminated languages difficult in construction and pronunciation, among those widely current, and has consequently arrived at the Italian and the Spanish, and has elected the Italian. It is just here that doubt and interrogation begin. If the purpose were to choose a tongue, native to the land of the best-known ancient speech, the Latin, parent of the Romance dialects, and one, vernacular in the land of the Holy See and its courtly institutions, Italian would have no rival. If, however, our choice of a universal tongue to be the one that all the rest of the world can most easily acquire, can most readily spell, and can most instinctively pronounce, may not the Spanish have the fair precedence?

Spanish is strictly phonetic, more strictly so than any other modern language, and as regular as the artificial Volapuk and Esperanto; it quite realizes the ideal object of our ambitious spelling reform; and it contains only those sounds which every speaker can utter, whatever his habitual vocalization. Every letter in its place represents a certain fixed sound, and every sound is graphically portrayed by a single symbol. For example, chapel is in Spanish capilla (kah-pil-yah); in Italian, cappella (kahp-pel-lah), with the chance of being articulated correctly or incorrectly. The Spanish ll and n with a tilde are symbols of sounds common to English (William, union), to French, Italian and most other tongues. Spanish is a direct scion of the Latin, while its grammar and its idioms are as plain as day. Spanish is the vernacular of half of our American continent.

The adoption of a universal language might meet with better favor than the introduction of the metric system enjoyed. The devoutly wished, "thrice-prayed-for," world-peace might create a "felt need" for a world language, especially in commercial and social activities. Hence, side by side in every country, would exist the vernacular and the world-language, till the latter superseded the former. Even then, the national literature would still require the study of the native tongue. The Rev. Father Poland has done us a benefit by his advocacy of this subject.

The Psychology of a Draftee

To the Editor of AMERICA:

He revealed his mind to a fellow-soldier as they sat together in a K. C. hut after the evening program was finished and the boys were scattered all over the hall, writing letters and reading magazines. "You know," he said, "I tried to enlist, but the recruiting officer could not see it, so I just waited for the draft." As an individualist of the extreme type, the draft registration was not at all to his liking. It was the first time he was made to realize that he was no longer his own master. During the drawing of the numbers he had a sensation of helplessness, and while recognizing the justice of the draft, he felt a desire to escape it all. As the calls took man after man away from his home town he strove to be stoical, yet ever and again the feeling of rebellious impotence swayed him, aroused by the knowledge that he could no longer direct his own affairs or choose his own way of "happiness." His own call came and with it resignation. Here was a surprising thing. Time and again he felt a desire to get into the fighting, he realized the justice of the draft as every American patriot does, and yet when his own turn came he was resentful while resigned.

With forty others he entrained, while the bands played and the crowds cheered. The farewells made him uncomfortable. The tears of mothers, sweethearts and children made him think, not of his own folk, strange to say, but of the others up and down the land, tasting the first bitterness of war. The parting hour is the hardest for every man. As the train pulled out he began to look over his group. Some were gloomy, others boisterous, the majority reserved. Conversation increased with the slowly-passing hours. One very noisy individual boasted of his "sporting" proclivities. By these he meant his acquaintance with the underworld. There were others who dwelt upon their business connections and how essential they were to the firms they had left. They were fully persuaded that the concerns would go to the wall unless they were restored to civilian life. Another group tried to make an impression by their supposed knowledge of military affairs. They knew about enough to distinguish a gun from a bayonet. Most interesting, however, was the recurrence of two general topics of conversation, the individual conviction of each man that he would not pass the army examination, and the firm belief that the war would soon be over.

Night came and with it comparative quiet, and he began to think of his former interests, pleasures, and friends. He felt a mad desire to escape from his present surroundings. A short prayer and his brain grew quiet. In the midst of a troubled sleep he caught snatches of a conversation. One man was saying: "That was hard, when we walked down the platform and the fellows kissed their hands good-by." "You bet," was the reply. "Gosh, I nearly cried then." And these were two of the roughest men in his quota, whom he would scarcely have associated with in civil life. The thought came to him that despite their coarser grain, they felt as he had felt, at the leave-taking. With that thought his individualism vanished. His mind was at rest.

On arriving at the camp, the men filed out of the train, were counted and recounted and then assigned to temporary quarters. In no time they were ordered out for drilling in charge of privates who exercised their authority in a blustering fashion, giving their orders to the accompaniment of oaths. One can imagine the feelings of those who were men of education and refinement. Had it not been for the instructions they had received from our draft boards on discipline there might have been trouble. But they swallowed their dose, hard as it was. On the third day in camp the men were called up for physical examination. It was interesting to watch the candidates exaggerate their petty ailments while the doctors listened patiently and smiled knowingly. The greater number were accepted by the examining board and strange to say after the decision was given, they grew more cheerful. Knowing something of crowd psychology he believed the draftee suffered more from fright than anything else. As the last officer addressed them he felt his own view-point changing. He forgot his old pleasures and comforts, and the interests of his old life seemed as nothing. With the uniform came an at-home feeling difficult to describe. The khaki seems to give a soldier stoicism, you do not care what may come, someone will tell you what to do.

Danger of False Principles

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In Father Carey's article "Soldiers in the Making," in AMERICA for August 24, I find this sentence: "Perhaps the best thing the country ever did for the army was to enact a law forbidding the selling of intoxicating liquor to soldiers."

Many readers of AMERICA, remembering the thorough manner in which the fallacy of Prohibition has been exposed in your columns, will, I am sure, be surprised at Father Carey's utterance and will ask themselves how an attack upon the personal liberty of millions of American citizens can be "perhaps the best thing" or even a comparatively good thing? Has not the nation entered into this war for, among other things, the extension of human liberty? Why then praise such a law as that which strikes at the liberty not only of the soldiers, but of those citizens whose legitimate business is unfavorably affected by the order not to sell liquor to men in the service?

We are all well-grounded enough in sound teaching to know that intoxicating liquor is not in itself harmful. We have all heard often enough that it is not the use but the abuse of intoxicating liquor which renders it evil—that its moderate use is not only not harmful, but that in the ability to use it moderately consists true temperance. Why not, therefore, instead of prohibiting the sale of it to our boys in the army so regulate the sale of it, or so train our soldiers in the use of it, as to allow them to practise true temperance by using it in moderation? Why should the Government truckle to the radical Prohibition feeling now rampant in this country by proceeding to such an intemperate extreme?

I should not be at all surprised to know that many of the young men of the army resent being placed in the same class as children and criminals. I can well imagine them, and their parents, too, asking indignantly: "Why should the Government make one law for the soldiers, who have sacrificed so much to save the nation, and another law for civilians who have made no such sacrifice? Why should not the wearer of Uncle Sam's uniform have the right to take a drink in a sane and sensible manner just as does the man who wears no uniform? Is the khaki of the army or the blue of the navy a color of shame, a symbol of inability to use liquor moderately, a sign that every soldier or sailor is a potential drunkard? Why brand the soldier and the sailor with this stigma?"

Granted that some soldiers would in the process of their training to use liquor moderately go too far, and that some sellers of liquor, despite regulations, would sell liquor to soldiers beyond the prescribed quantity; is that any legitimate argument against the army as a whole being allowed the right and liberty of drinking liquor in moderation? Because some of the soldiers take too much ice cream, must all ice cream be barred from the camp? Because some soldiers occasionally over-eat the white bread furnished to the army, is that a legitimate reason for putting the soldiers on a no-bread diet? Because the entertainments at K. C. or Y. M. C. A. huts are not always as straight-laced as some puritanical folk would have them, must we abolish all entertainments? Of course, it is absurd to ask such questions, but not less absurd than to say, as Father Carey says, that the best thing the country ever did for the army was to enact a law forbidding the selling of intoxicating liquor to soldiers.

I think it is Dr. John A. Ryan, author of "A Living Wage," who says that the saloon, so far as its social value is concerned, might just as well be abolished, but that the paternalistic and autocratic spirit and methods of the professional Prohibitionist ought to be rebuked. Men must not be made sober by such spirit and methods. That is anti-democratic. That strikes at the very roots of our liberties.

It may be cited, in support of Father Carey's opinion, that the denial of liquor to soldiers has worked well; that it has done a great deal of good to the army in general. But even so, ought we to accept a false principle and a false method just because they, for the time being, appear to work well? Dr. Ryan says again that the autocratic and paternalistic spirit of the professional Prohibitionist is a grave menace in any social movement no matter how meritorious, "for in proportion as it is successfully utilized in a good cause, it will tend to become more widely adopted by well-meaning men and women who are not thoroughly grounded in the principles of democracy. And we believe that the preservation of these principles is more important to society than even the abolition of the liquor traffic.

So that it will not do to advance as an argument the fact that Prohibition in the army has benefited the individual soldier and the army as a whole. As Dr. Ryan says again, dealing with Prohibition in general, such an argument is an implicit assumption that the end justifies the means. "If we may have recourse," declares Dr. Ryan, "to the methods of paternalism and autocracy to get rid of the drink evil, why should we not do likewise in the case of every other social evil? If we act upon this principle how long will we remain a genuine democracy?"

It is true that the army even of a democracy is not a democratic institution in its administration, and that experiments may be tried in the army which would not be tolerated in the country at large; but is there not danger that, finding military Prohibition a success, the radical Prohibitionist may try to impose a prohibitory militarism on the whole nation? Furthermore, is there not another, and, to a Catholic, a graver side to this question? It is stated that about thirty-five per cent of the men in the army and forty-five to fifty per cent of the men in the navy are Catholics. Is there not danger that these young men, most of them at a very impressionable age, subject to the influence of the Prohibition spirit in the army, may become tainted with Manichæism? And the better Prohibition works in the army, the more likely are they to fall a victim to this heresy.

Considering all these things, may I not hope that this communication, voicing as I am sure it does the opinion of AMERICA and of so many of its readers, will find a place in your columns at an early date?

Peace in Sorrow

"THE only happy day now left me," a man once wrote, from the depths of misery, "is the day of my death." There is a Scriptural ring about the phrase, at least, if "only" is omitted; but taken literally, the sentiment reflects weakness rather than truth. Although canonized by many a modern play and novel, the grief that paralyzes action is not Christian but pagan, the outgrowth of an age that neither knows, nor cares to know, the supernatural.

In the background of despairing grief is a gross misconception of man's purpose in life. Christians cannot be as those who are without hope. If the life we know and the world we see, were the sole life and world that will come within our experience, it is conceivable that despair might play a legitimate part in human existence. But we are not pagans. In grief as in joy, in failure as in success, life's purpose can be read truly only in the revelation of God, given us in Christ Jesus. Without Christ, life is, confessedly, a puzzle. With Him, even though we may not at once know the answer, we are sure that there is an answer, and that some day what is dark will be made clearer than noonday. And in this present time we know that He was a Man of sorrows, acquainted with grief, yet one who went about doing good to all men. The servant is not above his master. If we must suffer, and suffer we must, let us suffer with Him, and consecrate the lonely hours, as He did, to deeds of beneficence. There is never balm for sorrow in selfish solitude and silence. But often it may be found in giving of one's best for others.

True, the wise man will deal gently with another's grief, even when it is the inevitable price of folly, and he has no reproaches for a heart bowed down with sorrow. When God afflicts, man's crude intervention is presumption. But after all, it must remain ever true that we were not made for rest but for labor, not for the happiness of human hopes humanly fulfilled, nor for content, except such content as may come with the consciousness that no hard duty has been left undone. Peace and rest will come on that later day when no far horizons beckon, but, our journey done, we find ourselves safe at home in our Father's mansions.

Labor's Tribute

IN the greatest demonstration ever made by the forces of the toilers of the land, labor paid its tribute to the nation on Labor Day, 1918. Pulsing with the activity of the shipyard and the foundry, rank after rank marched by in many cities throughout the country, registering loyalty in every step, heartening the men behind the guns 3,000 miles away and sending a message of unflagging determination to carry on the war to a successful issue. In other years labor parades gave expression to the sentiments of a class. This year the marching hosts voiced the unity of a nation that out of the welter of war has been welded into "a single army of many parts and many tasks, but commanded by a single obligation with faces set toward a single object." The cheers that greeted the marching thousands were tributes to soldiers and not to individual toilers expressing the hopes of their separate trades, to soldiers in an army of democracy where every individual interest was submerged that the common good might be achieved. The different trades represented proclaimed themselves on the banners they bore "soldiers over here behind the soldiers over there."

President Wilson in his Labor Day message had reminded the toilers of the land that this was a war that called for labor's support:

> You know the nature of this war. It is a war which industry must sustain. The army of laborers at home is as important, as essential, as the army of fighting men in the far fields of actual battle. And the laborer is not only needed as much as the soldier, it is his war. The soldier is his champion and representative. To fail to win would be to imperil everything that the laborer has striven for and held dear since freedom first had its dawn and its struggle for justice began. The soldiers at the front know this. It steels their muscles to think of it. They are crusaders. They are fighting for no selfish advantage for their own nation.

The Labor Day parade showed that the workingman realized this; and it showed too that the men in ranks were giving more than their brain and brawn for the victory of American arms. For as line after line filed by, each platoon carried its service flags side by side with the national colors. Many individual marchers bore service flags with three and four stars and there were some too whose banners bore the symbol of the supreme sacrifice, the star of gleaming gold. Not since our entrance in the war has such concrete evidence been given of united effort in the prosecution of the grim task that is ours in making the world a fit place to live in. The voice of united America has been heard before in the prompt response of all the people to the call of sacrifice, whether that call meant the offering of a life or the retrenching of food, or the lending of money. The marching of the Labor Day army is the latest declaration to our enemies that they have to reckon not merely with the forces on land and sea, but with a nation united and determined to bend every effort and coordinate every industry in the land to render certain the victory of American arms.

Imported Anti-Clericalism

IN New York three months ago, by the aid of a substantial subsidy from the United States Government, the so-called "Roman Legion" was founded to carry on a vigorous war propaganda among the Italians in the United States. The Government requested the help of the Italian clergy in this campaign. The Italian clergy responded willingly, and contributed powerfully to the spreading of the Roman Legion. Unfortunately, some of the men prominent in this semi-official organization, supported by the money of the United States, concealed their hatred of Christianity under the mask of patriotism. Instead of being thankful to the clergy for support, they tried not only to exploit the generous help of the United States, for sectarian purposes, but to stir up religious strife in America, and to use the money of the United States for the circulation of the vilest calumnies against the Catholic Church. They sent out circular letters inviting the Italians to celebrate with the greatest noise, the Twentieth of September, the date of the fall of the temporal power of the Holy See. They began a campaign to make September 20 a holiday in the United States. They went so far as to invite the clergy to take part in this campaign against the Catholic Church, by pretending that the Twentieth of September symbolizes the achievement of Italian unity. To that campaign, vigorous support has been given by the numerous Masonic lodges of the Figli d'Italia, and by all the Italian priests who have apostatized from the Catholic Church, and who thrive in this country with the help of sectarian proselyting agencies.

What does the date September 20 really mean? It is enough to quote an extract from an article published in almost all the Italian papers of this country. We translate it from the Voce della Colonia of Philadelphia:

> The date, September 20, does not belong merely to Italy. It belongs to all mankind—it belongs to thought, to universal right. It means the decline of theocratic authority, of absurdity, of the impenetrable, of the caste system, of priestcraft; it means the emancipation of mankind from superstition, of the mind from dogma, of democracy from church terrorism; it is Papal Rome which collapses. No less does it signify deliverance from the pillars of Hercules, and right breaking the chains and bonds which restrain the aspirations of mankind. It drives toward the light and facilitates the development of the mind. Utopia yields to reason, knowledge dissipates prejudices, conscience eliminates the absurd, light conquers darkness.

After this burst of bombastic prose, the Roman Legion formally invites the President of the United States to wage war against the Catholic Church:

> If President Wilson were not the man he is, 300 and more Protestant Italian churches of the United States would remind him of the date, September 20. If America were deaf to the call of her time, the date, September 20, would reproach her with the following words: If hypocrisy darkened the minds of Americans, millions of Protestants and Free-Thinkers would deafen their ears with this date, September 20. The Papacy has collapsed, and has been conquered by the universal conscience in our day.

The Italian press in this country is filled just now with appeals like the foregoing. Regarding the attempt to make September 20 a national holiday in America, everybody with a schoolboy's knowledge of conditions in Italy is well aware that in that country the day is celebrated chiefly by Socialists and anti-clerical, revolutionary radicals who organize violent demonstrations against the Church and the Pope. Our Italian fellow-citizens already have Columbus Day. Let them be content with that. Not only is the Italian press in this country attempting to wage a war here against the Church, but worse still, the Roman Legion is represented in Mr. Creel's Bureau of Public Information by a member who is doing all he can to promote the spread of Italian anti-clericalism, and for this destructive work he is being paid with public money.

Is it right, that at a time when millions of American Catholics are sacrificing their means and shedding their blood for our country, that the United States should practically support Italian atheists in their attacks on the Church? Let Mr. Creel answer. Is it just, that American money should be used in promoting a violent anti-Catholic propaganda here? Mr. Creel should reply. Is it prudent, in this present crisis, to let a little knot of Italian anti-clericals start in this country a wave of religious bigotry? Mr. Creel and his superiors had better conclude immediately that this contemptible campaign of revolutionary atheism should be stopped as soon as possible. Such a decision will save them a great deal of embarrassment.

Capital Punishment Again

WHAT has become of the old-fashioned "reformer" who used to spend his days and some of his nights in advocating the abolition of capital punishment? Formerly he was a figure from whom escape was, at times, actually difficult. You found him on soapboxes, with the original contents of which he was frequently unacquainted, and in the columns of our most advanced near-thought magazines. Many a pulpit in which the Gospel of Jesus Christ was almost an unknown document found a place for him, along with the pacifist and the birth-controller, those "gold-dust twins" of the early twentieth century. His argument usually grouped itself under three heads. The first was that capital punishment did not deter from crime. The second denied that the crime was in the criminal. It was in the community. The third held that there was no such thing as crime, for what ordinary folk called "crime" was simply a lack of mental balance in the supposed criminal. Far from inflicting the sentence of death, it was the community's prime duty to find him a cozy corner in some comfortable inn. If this three-fold argument failed to convince, the listener ran the hazard of being cast out into the interior darkness with Papists and all manner of blind retrogressionists.

The editor of the Arizona Republican is still among the unconvinced. He arises to remark that what Arizona needs, and needs badly, is the restoration of capital punishment. Nor does he deem it necessary to apologize for his views. He avers that murderers were always common in Arizona, but since capital punishment was abolished in the State by sentimentalists and by "cowards, milk-sops and perjurers in the jury-box," they are fast becoming a public nuisance. Condemned to prison sentences, they return as from a brief vacation, ready to take the life of any man who interferes with their plans. But the editor does not argue for capital punishment, as the term is understood by "feeble-minded juries" in Chicago and New York. He favors the kind of capital punishment that means death.

It is, of course, plain that this Arizona person is as blind a reactionary as any Papist who ever defended the right of the State to repair, through the infliction of the death-penalty, the breach made by crime in the order of justice. But it is also plain that many good citizens now see eye to eye with the Arizona man of the pen. One good effect of the war is that by forcing us to face realities, it does away with sham and cant. Many a social reformer in this country has found himself without an "essential occupation" since that fateful day in April, 1917, and the end is not yet.

One Drive

THE week of November 11 will mark an event in the war's history when the seven recognized agencies for war relief will unite in a drive for funds. The American people will be asked to give $170,500,000 to help the work that means so much for our fighting forces. The necessity of one drive for a common end is well expressed by the President in his letter to the chairman of the Commission on Training Camp Activities:

> It was evident from the first and has become increasingly evident that the services rendered by these agencies to our army and to our Allies are essentially one and all of a kind, and must of necessity, if well rendered, be rendered in the closest cooperation.
> It is my judgment, therefore, that we shall see best results in the matter of support of these agencies if these seven societies will unite their forthcoming appeals for funds, in order that the spirit of the country in this matter may be expressed without distinction of race or religious opinion in support of what is in reality a common service.
> This point of view is sustained by the necessity, which the war has forced upon us, of limiting our appeals for funds in such a way that two or three comprehensive campaigns shall take the place of a series of independent calls upon the generosity of the country.

The President's decision is a return to the original plan that was formulated by the Government early in the summer when representatives of the different relief organizations met to consider ways and means for raising funds. The idea of a united drive proposed by the Government met with the prompt and hearty endorsement of the Catholic War Council and the Knights of Columbus. Nothing would be gained by disorganized endeavor, everything would be accomplished by united effort. A nation-wide appeal to Americans of every class and creed for a common work and a common cause, carried on by agencies preserving their own separate "traditions and principles," while working in the best interests of the soldier and sailor, voices in unmistakable terms the spirit of America. Questions of religious differences never entered into the service rendered the soldier and sailor seeking recreation in the K. C. or the Y. M. C. A. hut in the camps at home or overseas. It would have been a lamentable thing to have had seven different agencies with a common purpose in view going before the public in separate appeals, drawing religious lines where none should be drawn. With the united drive there will be a common fund where those at home can register their patriotism in dollars that will be turned into service for soldier and sailor by the different organizations all working in harmony. The common drive fittingly bespeaks the determination of the American people to stand together as a solid unit in every effort that makes for the successful prosecution of this war.

"We Have Shed All Our Tears"

"THERE is a terrible significance in the words, 'We have shed all our tears,'" remarks Noëlle Roger, the author of a poignant little book called "The Victims' Return," in which she describes the pitiful state of the people who had been "evacuated" from the occupied districts of France, and first received humane treatment from the kind neutrals of Switzerland. Typical of many tales she heard from the refugees is this account an old peasant woman of Dompierre-au-Bois gave of incidents that happened in the village during the German occupation:

> "They [the Germans] put the whole lot of us in the church, and while we were there, pillaged all our houses one after the other. They threatened to shoot us, and for two days we believed that they were coming to fetch us out to execution, every time the door opened. Some of the women fainted through fright. . . . . A shell burst in the church. Then it seemed as if one could not see properly any longer. Everybody rushed out and then went back again. . . . . We saw the dead and wounded —twenty-two dead and seventeen wounded." It was a terrible scene: families wiped out; a woman lying dead with her six-weeks-old baby in her arms; another killed while suckling her child, which was found alive. . . . . The most severely wounded were left in the church among the dead bodies till the following day. From the uninjured altar the statue of the Virgin looked down on this hecatomb of women, children and old men. "My poor wife kept asking for water," said an old man, "but I was not allowed to take her any, and she died thirty-six hours later."

To those innocent sufferers from the horrors of the German invasion the worst of misfortunes will indeed seem henceforward like ordinary happenings. The souls of the citizens of Lille, too, are likely to be almost as deeply seared by the memory of the present war as are those of the poor peasants of Dompierre-au-Bois. For in the current Atlantic Monthly Vernon Kellog, who was in France in the spring of 1916, thus describes the ruthless "Lille deportations":

> The seizures were made during the successive days and nights of Holy Week [1916] by officers accompanied by squads of soldiers. Mostly they came to the houses at night, especially in the last hours before dawn. They did not take whole families. They did worse. They tore away the fathers alone, or the older sons and daughters, mothers, children of fifteen and up, girls as well as boys: one from this family, two from that, three from another, and so on. They tore families apart, they wrecked families. And with one and a half hour's notice they carried off their selected slaves.
> Twenty thousand were taken from families of all grades, piled into cattle trains and transported from their homes to flimsy barracks hastily flung up in the concentration camps and fields of the southern districts. There they were put at work, strong and frail, workingman and office-clerk, sturdy woman and frail girl, adolescent youth and child of fifteen, from dawn till dark, with spade and hoe and cart, in the fields of France—to make German crops; housed together at night promiscuously, like cattle in long sheds; worked by day in groups under overseers, not with whips, but with loaded guns with fixed bayonets.

No doubt one of the powerful motives that is giving such irresistible vigor to the attacks of the American troops on the western front is a grim determination in the heart of every soldier there, that as far as in him lies this war will end with such an overwhelming defeat for Germany that the smiling fields, peaceful villages and busy towns of France and Belgium will never be ravaged again by the Kaiser's pitiless military despotism. When the Allies dictate the terms of peace in Berlin, within a year from now, as we hope, they should exact from the crushed and humiliated autocracy that brought on this war the fullest reparation possible for all the pain, sorrow, and misery that the blameless people of Belgium and France have suffered at the hands of the invader.

Literature

RENÉ BAZIN

THE French author René Bazin, born in 1853, graduated in law at Paris in 1878 and since professor of law in Angers University, first became known to the American public chiefly through his books of travel, "A l'Aventure" (1891), "Sicilie" (1892), "Terre d'Espagne" (1896), and particularly through "The Italians of Today" (1904). But later through the Scribner translations of "Redemption" (1908), "The Nun" (1908), and "The Barrier" (1911), he has been revealed to the New World as a quiet simple soul of sedentary life, which observes well and thinks deeply.

There is in "Redemption" a scene which illustrates well much of the spirit of the work of René Bazin, harvesters cutting grain on the banks of the Loire, whose waters are rising in flood, the stacks of grain which swinging scythes have cut, the women raking it into bundles, the growing menace of the river, the final frantic race into the flood, the cessation of cutting to rake in and save all that has already been cut; the calm, inevitable rising of the river, the whole-souled toil of the workers, the battle with that same nature which gives the grain and threatens to crush it under the flood—this is the adventure of harvest toil and one of the conflicts that arises therefrom.

But conflicts of other kinds also are found in "Redemption" and in "The Coming Harvest" as well—social problems, of the factory and of farmers with their wood-cutting and threshing—and problems of the heart. "Redemption" deals in its opening chapters with a factory situation and with a bitterness of the heart which the workers have for their employer. And there through the gathering dusk daily the weary tramp of poverty passes up the stricken street from the factory to the slums where the workers live. All the while between the two René Bazin has shown the futile barrier of distrust and coldness: The worker and the master no longer work together: one is paid for a certain amount of work done with the aid of a machine, and if the steel of a fly-wheel maim one as it did old Eloi Madiot, the master is more hard and unmoved than the chill machine. It is the factory system of the new industrialism that has taken all the personal touch out of labor and has built dangerous barriers which mean class-enmities and class-struggles. It is only typical of the present that the employer says to an old employee who has been permanently disabled, when that employee asks for a pension: "You are a worthy man. But that does not make it my duty to provide you with an income: You are the victim of your own clumsiness. How can I help it?"

Yet in the face of such a rebuff, Bazin paints the old man as still loyal in spirit to the workshop, still keeping the sense of duty which the master was unwittingly breaking down. The factory burns and the old artisan cannot be kept at home. "Henriette! It is Lemarié's factory," he cried in a voice of horror. "Are you sure?" "I know my own workshop. It is reaching the warehouse—let me go!" "You can't—at your age—with only one arm; no, I won't let you!" He pushed past her, groped his way across the kitchen, seized his hat, and slammed the door behind him crying: "I must! I must! Our place is on fire!" There is loyalty for a good example to the world. Nor can we help feeling as we read this book that barriers are being erected which break many of the useful bonds in our modern life: that these barriers are man-made and that they are the cause of most of the economic discontent and labor trouble. Men cannot be congenial over a wall.

It is rather a useful figure of speech, this one concerning a barrier, for it seems that it is the unpleasantness resulting from barriers artificially dividing things which should be together—that this is the great tragedy of modern life. We see it in Les Oberlés (1901), where German nationalism is an artificial barrier between the Alsatians and France. We see the same question of nationality, blood and education, the barrier of 1870-1871, in the story Le Guide de l'Empereur. We see another sort of barrier in Les Noellots (1890), which in spite of a slightly diffuse structure gives a keen analysis and vivid pictures of two barriers, that between a simple country peasant father and his sophisticated metropolitan son, the first is that between the son himself, who loved the social life and the journalist's career in Paris and yet, not being to the manner born, was never thoroughly happy, and the second is that between the son and the life he coveted but could not gain, for at the end he breaks down and says he "never could be anything but a peasant." These barriers are natural ones, not to be too lightly vaulted by the vain or the ambitious: and René Bazin would have us know that the best and greatest happiness is to be found in staying within reasonable barriers and doing the work that lies before the hands with cheerfulness, earnestness and sincerity.

Then, in "The Barrier," we have a barrier of a more exacting kind, the barrier of varying religious belief: a man who belongs to the Anglican Church, a girl who is a Catholic, and a Frenchman who is an apostate Catholic. Nor can the force of love itself break down these religious barriers. But it is likewise René Bazin's purpose, in this novel, to show the necessity for strong bonds and religious ties, even more so than in "The Nun." In fact in this book, "The Barrier," in a passage in the education of Catholic children which every Catholic parent ought to read (pp. 162, ff.) there is continual emphasis on loyalty and fidelity as well as devotion. Too often are bonds supplanted by barriers where bonds should be. Nowhere is this better illustrated, perhaps, than when old Eloi Madiot and his nephew have a quarrel over the military service, a topic, by the way, which is often introduced in Bazin. And here we have examples of both a bond and a barrier: the bond which ties the affections of the old man to the army: the barrier between him and the nephew who mockingly asks what he got from it. "Get from it? Get from it?—I was fed, I had tobacco, I had—I do not argue like you, blockhead. I served with my comrades, not for money, but for honor, for pleasure." Between him and the miserable youth, the fourteen years of his life in war and barracks rolled in confusion. There passed before him visions of his comrades, drawn up in ranks, shouldering their arms; of the officers he had loved; music sounding through cathedral domes; flying flags; bayonet charges; drinking bouts after victory; garrison towns; the mess; all the glory, all the careless joy of the service. Visions of it all rushed through his brain. For the moment the old soldier became the incarnation of the old army. He was a willing servant, a willing worker, a willing soldier. He was the kind who by steadiness, keep the bonds. The barriers already exist between different generations and peoples: but personal ambition and labor agitation which might seek to build new barriers must be kept down. The bonds must be maintained.

The novels of René Bazin stand as an interpretation of the life of the plain French people They are mild and unexciting, but they have the ring of truth about them. They analyze social conditions and individual problems. They reveal the existence of certain barriers erected by one man against another. They represent and deplore the creation of these new and unnatural barriers and also deplore the breaking of bonds. The social theory which he advocates is that every one has his own little garden plot to tend, and should tend that and not worry about his neighbor's goods—a theory as old as Langland and More. The things we find in these simple tales are truth, loyalty, duty, and affection. These things, as we see them in each case in the few characters which he puts in the foreground for contrast against the rest of the world—these are the things which make for happiness and for success in life, spiritual success at least, which is more satisfying than material success. There is none of the romance of adventure in this; there is none of the clash of battle, either military conflict or social struggle; there is no rapidity of action or height of emotion. There is simple picturesque sketching of simple picturesque people. For these things people read and will continue to read the novels of René Bazin.

ANOINTED, HALLOWING HANDS

Oh wondrous hands! Into whose guarding palms
  Hath God of His own power given,
To lead, King David-wise, with praising psalms,
  Christ-ward along the narrow road to Heaven;
To bless, rebuke, forgive, to feed the flock,
To bar the door to sin, and Heaven unlock.

Oh wondrous hands! At whose still benison,
  Thou comest, Lord, in earth's gifts consecrate,
In sacramental veil, which thou dost don
  Lest eyes should dazzle, that upon Thee wait.
When comes the sun from out the silver east,
We worship Thee, and thank Thee for Thy priest.

Oh wondrous hands! Into whose gentle ward
  Thou givest, Christ, the keys of life and death,
Against the hosts of Satan to stand guard,
  That souls afaint with sin may draw new breath.
From grisly husks on heavenly food to feast,
Thou lead'st us in Thy mercy, by Thy priest.

Oh wondrous hands! Bound with Thy fetters, Lord,
  To break our chains and set us free for Thee,
From lustral birth unto that last glad word
  That bids us welcome to our peace with Thee;
For all Thy gifts, oh Lord, from great to least,
We thank Thee, by the hands of this Thy priest.

REVIEWS

From Bapaume to Passchendaele. By PHILIP GIBBS. New York: George H. Doran Co. $2.50.

The story of 1917 on the western front is told in these pages by a well-known Catholic war-correspondent. It was a year of ceaseless battle and desperate conflict with its days of "attack and counter-attack, all the roads of war crowded with troops and transport, the coming back of the prisoners by hundreds and thousands, the long trails of the wounded, the activity, the traffic, the roar, and welter and fury of war." Day by day Philip Gibbs went through all the stirring scenes that have gone to make history, living the life of the soldier yet seeing much more than the soldier who can only see his own special part. If any man can get a broad view of war it is the war-correspondent who passes from one battle to another feeling the pulse of the whole great movement that is rocking a world to its foundations. The messages written in the field lose nothing of their vividness from the revision that has been made by the author in placing them before the public in book-form.

No attempt is made to disguise the horror of conflict in the story that is narrated of brave deeds, and unselfish devotedness and duty done unflinchingly unto death. Philip Gibbs has lived too long in the world of shell-craters and trenches to give a one-sided picture of the glorious phase of modern battle grounds. Neither demigods nor saints are the soldiers that are going through with an ugly task that has to be finished whatever the cost in blood and sacrifice. They have no craving for the pity of the world beyond the battle lines where non-combatants speak of "our cheerful men." The author finds it difficult to describe these men who have lived in a world all their own, clotted with mud and blood, playing with death from one month to another as campaign followed campaign. His intimate knowledge of the men in the ranks has convinced the author that the "courage, honesty and humanity of these boys were a world higher than the philosophy of their intellectual leaders. I hated the thought that we have been brought to such a pass by the infamy of an enemy caste and by the low ideals of Europe which have been our own law of life." Only the defense of the world's liberty justifies the sacrifice of all this splendid youth "seeing straight, thinking straight, acting straight, without selfish motives, flung into the furnace of war, scorched by its fires, maimed and blinded and smashed."

The narrative does not include the Cambrai battles. For the first time in any published account the names of the regiments are given that battled so bravely for the crest of Passchendaele. As a correspondent with the forces in the field the writer offers no criticism on success or failure in the individual actions he witnessed. The definite gains however of the campaign in Flanders are summarized in the words of the Commander-in-Chief. G. C. T.

The Origins of Contemporary Psychology. By CARDINAL MERCIER. Translated by W. H. MITCHELL, M.A. New York: P. J. Kenedy & Sons. $2.25.

A Manual of Modern Scholastic Philosophy. By CARDINAL MERCIER and the Professors of the Higher Institute of Philosophy, Louvain. Authorized Translation and Eighth Edition, by T. L. PARKER, M.A., and S. A. PARKER, O.S.B., M.A. With a Preface by P. COFFEY, Ph.D. Vol. II, Natural Theology (Theodicy), Logic, Ethics, History of Philosophy. St. Louis: B. Herder. $3.50.

These are two recent translations of books well known in the original French. The former appeared first in 1897 and the latter in 1909-12. The first-named volume is wholly the work of the Cardinal, the latter is in part his own production, and in part that of other professors in the Institut Superieur de Philosophie de Louvain, but the entire work was done under his direction and patronage. Both translations are well done, in clear, idiomatic English.

In the "Origins of Contemporary Psychology," Cardinal Mercier traces the genesis, development and divagations of modern psychology, from the aberrations of its father Descartes down through three centuries of divergent speculation to its modern high priests, and ends with an exposition of the sane scholastic system with its scientific and satisfying explanation of the roles played by body and soul. That the "Manual of Modern Scholastic Philosophy" has the sanction of the University of Louvain is sufficient recommendation, which is emphasized by the fact that it has run through many editions and has been translated into a number of languages. The second volume is perhaps more interesting to the general reader in its subject-matter than the first, but it maintains the same high degree of excellence and is open to the same criticism, in minor points, to which Father Cahill called attention in an article in AMERICA for June 2, 1917. Both on account of its author and its intrinsic worth it has been deservedly welcomed by Catholic laymen and seminarians. A comparatively brief but comprehensive outline of Catholic philosophy in the vernacular has long been desired, especially by the Catholic laity. Cardinal Mercier's "Manual" satisfactorily meets the need. J. H. F.

Problems of Subnormality. By J. E. WALLACE WALLIN, Ph.D. New York: World Book Co. $3.00.

Dr. Wallin has written a book which has grieved, shocked and scandalized sundry "high brows" and leading lights of social science. This is only another way of saying that he has written an excellent book. Dr. Wallin has no respect whatever for sensation-mongers, or for those "sob-sisters," male and female, who too often escape from the Sunday supplement to lecture in schools of so-called "social science." His intelligent study of real problems will do much to eliminate the absurdities, and place upon a firm foundation whatever is of practical value in the Binet-Simon and similar mental tests. Dr. Wallin is not blind to their real worth; all that he contends for is simply that until we can establish a fairly definite standard, it is unwise to assert with dogmatic finality precise degrees of subnormality. It ought to be clear that unless we know what we mean by a "pound" it is perilous to insist that the weight of a given object is greater or less than a "pound." Yet it is the neglect of this plain truth that has made the mental test, a valuable aid when properly applied, worse than a joke in most American courts. Judges are slow to believe that a murderer or a thief, who has carefully planned his misdeed, with an obvious realization that it was a misdeed, is only "seven years old" by the Binet-Simon, and therefore morally and legally irresponsible. By using a recognized set of mental tests Dr. Wallin ascertained that a group of successful farmers and unusually gifted college students were, with a few exceptions, "feeble-minded." Had these men been on trial for crime it would have been easy for the alienists to depose on oath that the indicted were at best but high-grade morons, not amenable to legal punishment. It is not to be expected that this volume, touching, as it does, so many debated theses in philosophy, will commend itself in every detail to the Catholic student. But he will welcome it as a sane and refreshing criticism of the modern Bedlam school of applied psychology. P. L. B.

The Private Papers of Henry Ryecroft. By GEORGE GISSING. Introduction by Paul Elmer More. New York: Boni & Liveright, Inc. $0.60.

In the introduction to this volume of essays, Mr. More, writing in a Johnsonian manner, observes that "The meditations of Henry Ryecroft are grave without being heavy, learned without being pedantic, wise and skeptical without being frigid; the little book is one of the rare treasures of English literature." "The Private Papers" are semi-biographical in character, are the fruit of the author's last years, and are written in a chastened style that the after-war period will probably find quite obsolete. Those who are familiar with Gissing's private life, and know what the dominant theme is of his novels will be agreeably surprised at the artistic beauty of this book. The author was an ardent lover of good literature and sometimes went without his dinner in order to buy a volume that would feed his mind. His soul, however, does not seem to have profited much by his intercourse with the kings of letters, for his life was loose, and occasional passages in these "Letters" indicate that Gissing was a skeptic though he apparently regretted that his faith had gone. The following passage is a good example of the author's manner:

> I always turn out of my way to walk through a country church yard; these rural resting-places are as attractive to me as a town cemetery is repugnant. I read the names upon the stones, and find a deep solace in thinking that for all these the fret and the fear of life are over. There comes to me no touch of sadness; whether it be a little child or an aged man. I have the same sense of happy accomplishment; the end being come, and with it the eternal peace, what matter if it came late or soon? There is no such gratulation as Hic jacet. There is no such dignity as that of death. In the path trodden by the noblest of mankind these have followed; that which of all who live is the utmost thing demanded, these have achieved. I cannot sorrow for them, but the thought of their vanished life moves me to a brotherly tenderness. The dead, amid this leafy silence, seem to whisper encouragement to him whose fate yet lingers: As we are, so shalt thou be; and behold our quiet!

The publishers of "The Private Papers of Henry Ryecroft" have done well to bring out this attractive reprint of the book. W. D.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

"There are few more impressive sights in the world than a Scotsman on the make." "Every man who is high up loves to think that he has done it all himself; and the wife smiles, and lets it go at that. It's our only joke. Every woman knows that." Both the foregoing propositions are most entertainingly proved in Sir J. M. Barrie's clever comedy, "What Every Woman Knows," (Scribner, $1.00), the first volume of a uniform edition of his plays that has begun to appear. The prologue, explanations and stage-directions with which the author provides the play are so discerning and illuminating that readers of the text, even if they have not seen the comedy acted, can easily imagine how enjoyable it must be on the stage. Few plays read so well as Barrie's.——"The Brown Fairies," (Yale University Press, $1.00), by Ethel M. Gates, will give pleasure not only to the little ones but to the grown-ups as well, who recall the entertaining evenings spent with Grim and Hans Anderson. The stories themselves are told with much of the simplicity, charm and fascination of the fairy-tale writers with whom we were all so familiar in childhood days.

The Bookman, of which the management was taken over some time ago by the George H. Doran Co., with its September number appears in a new dress and make-up. Among the papers in the attractive table of contents are "Kultur as Patron of Danish Letters," by Maurice Francis Egan, in which he tells both of Germany's efforts to Teutonize the Danish mind and of his own attempts to make the Danes familiar with American literature. "It will be seen from this paper," is his conclusion, "that a minister to a foreign country has more duties than supposed by the illiterate—of wearing 'purple pants' and handing tea to princesses!" Christopher Mosley writes a charming description of the "haunted" bookshop of Roger Mifflin, the hero of "Parnassus on Wheels," and "Jeremy," a promising serial by Hugh Walpole, begins. There are two proleptic book reviews that are pleasant to read, one containing passages from the coming biography of Joel Chandler Harris and the other full of characteristic excerpts from Booth Tarkington's new story, "The Magnificent Ambersons." The publishers of the Bookman announce that its only purpose will be > to cultivate and foster the art of reading—to minister to the mind of the reader by directing attention to the best in current literature, including that great number of publications whose genuine service is the proffering of recreation and amusement. The Bookman will not, even in any remote sense, be the organ or spokesman for any one publishing house or for any group of publishers.

The contents of the present number seems to indicate that under the direction of Mr. Eugene F. Saxton, the Bookman's new editor, "advanced" writers will no longer find the magazine a medium for the propagation of their un-Christian views.

There seems to be little of permanent value in "Ardors and Endurances" (Stokes, $1.25), a young British soldier's book of war-poems and "phantasies." There are a number of free-verse compositions which vividly describe trench-fighting, and "A Fawn's Holiday" contains some melodious lyrics.——Mr. Witter Bynner, the spelling of whose name is so hard to remember, won a Poetry Society prize for producing in "Grenstone Poems" (Stokes, $1.35) "one of the two best books of poetry published during 1917." But there really does not seem to be much in it that is worth while. It has lately transpired that Mr. Bynner is one of the perpetrators of the "spectric-poetry" hoax of last year, a book of ridiculous free-verse, which the reviewers solemnly praised. "Before a Crucifix," which runs as follows, is one of this author's earlier poems:

> At dawn denying Thee, at dusk we sell Thee with a kiss—
> Still art Thou through the many years from that sad night to this > Content to know the comfort Thou shalt bring us when we weary,
> O Jesus, Son of Mary.
> We nail Thee, Christ, all seven days upon another cross,
> With thorns again we crown Thy head and hail Thee with Thy loss—
> Yet wide Thine arms in agony open their sanctuary
> Forgiving us until at last of cruelty we weary,
> O Jesus, Son of Mary.

The fourth edition of "The Trust Problem" (Doubleday, Page, $2.00), by J. W. Jenks, Ph.D., of New York University, and Walter E. Clark, Ph.D., of the City College of New York, is practically a new book. The authors believe that they present "no change of fundamental principle," yet they now incline to the opinion that the degree of power which can be exercised by capitalistic combination is somewhat smaller than was formerly thought, since the regulating power of public opinion and of competition has become stronger. The book is probably too diffuse for use in the classroom, but its value is great as a work of reference. The bibliography indicates a successful attempt at selection, and there is an excellent index. ——"Outlines of Political Economy" (Longmans, $1.75), by S. J. Chapman, now appears in a third edition. Written from an English standpoint and somewhat abstruse for classroom use, the book will be found useful for reference. Dr. Chapman's efforts to avoid the question of free-will, a performance staged in an introductory chapter, lends a rather unexpected touch of humor to a dry-as-dust topic.——"Maids, Wives and Widows" (Dutton, $2.00), by Rose Falls Bres, is not a novel to be read under the summer trees, but a sober production, intended to give a view of the law of the land as it affects the weaker vessel. Some of Mrs. Bres's observations are interesting, if not compelling, and a mere man is tempted to think that there is too much Mrs. Bres and too little law in this rather expensive volume.

The New York Times for August 25 devoted half a page to the tributes in prose and verse which were offered by his friends to the memory of Sergeant Joyce Kilmer who was killed, not on August 1, as was at first reported, but on July 30. Alexander Woollcott wrote:

> I want to report to you and to other friends of his on the ninth floor that, three days after the tide of battle had moved on toward the Vesle, I made my way across the sloping meadow just above the Ourcq and, in the name of all of us of the Times family, placed a spray of cypress on Joyce Kilmer's grave. Grantland Rice and I searched till we found it. He lies buried beside Lieutenant Oliver Ames at the edge of a little copse that is known as the Wood of the Burned Bridge, so close to the purling Ourcq that, standing by the graveside, you could throw a pebble into its waters. . . . He was killed at the height of the great battle, killed in the climax of what I suppose was the mightiest week his regiment had ever known. . . . When his regiment was crouching for the attack across the Ourcq and he found his own battalion would not be in the lead, he asked and received permission to offer his services to the battalion that would be in the lead. So it happened that he was close to the Major's elbow when the battalion adjutant was killed and, in the emergency of the battle, without commission or appointment, he was serving as a sort of aid to the battalion commander, when a machine-gun bullet dropped him.

The best of the Times's poetical offerings to the dead soldier are these stanzas by Eleanor Rogers Cox, entitled "Joyce Kilmer":

> Dead! with that golden splendor all about you
> Of high and pure and selfless sacrifice,
> Dead! and for us, the legioned friends who loved you,
> Deep Sorrow's veil enshrouding heart and eyes.
> For us the loss—the thought that no tomorrow
> Shall bring us back the poet-friend we knew—
> The soul to all nobility responsive,
> The spirit gallant, valorous, and true.
>
> The knightly hand that truth's bright falchion wielded
> St. Michael-wise, undaunted, and serene.
> The song that brought new glories to the worship
> Of Christ Our Lord and Mary Virgin-Queen.
> The friend so leal to Friendship's fairest meaning,
> The poet chanting down triumphant ways,
> Yet turning still to cheer his wearied brother
> With words of strength-enkindling cheer and praise.
> The soldier who at freedom's holy calling
> His splendid all laid freely on her shrine,
> And in far France with Eire's lines advancing,
> Poured out his life's bright sacrificial wine.
> The kindly human man whose very presence
> Has blessed and bettered wheresoe'r he trod,
> The saint whose face already shines upon us
> A star to light us to the courts of God.

EDUCATION

One Form of Child-Abandonment.

IT was a bitter cynic who wrote that the more he knew of men, the better he liked dogs. There is no excuse for the sentiment; it is only a part of the truth and, therefore, the worst of all untruths, as every cynical hit is; but there may be some excuse for the man who uttered it. Possibly, he lived in a large city, where the dregs of humanity are caught, where many a boy and girl can truthfully say, "I never had a chance." Perhaps he was a social worker out of joint with the times, and fundamentally unfitted for the task, by his lack of a generous and comprehensive charity. It may even be that he had been a curious hanger-on in some juvenile or domestic relation court, where he had witnessed many a case of child-abandonment, that crime which seems to register the minimum point of humanity possible to man. Yet even so, the comparison limps somewhat. Dogs, so far as my experience goes, do not abandon their helpless young, but human fathers and mothers sometimes do this thing.

The Point of View

WHEN Giacomo Salimbene, finding the fight for existence too keen, betakes himself for parts unknown, it is customary to put a few wheels of the law in motion to catch up with Giacomo. While they are revolving, Giacomo's helpless children and almost equally helpless wife are committed to the gelid mercies of public charity, and a cry of reprobation, directed at the absent Giacomo, is set up by all parties concerned. The cry and attitude of reprobation cost little, but they are not worthless, for they help to keep public opinion healthy. Even if we cannot remake the broken family, it is well to reprobate the wrecker, whether he is a child-abandoner, a successful petitioner for divorce, or just a "plain drunk." But if, instead of taking to flight, Giacomo had decided to remain at home and ease the burden of existence by sending one or two of his offspring to a non-Catholic or anti-Catholic school or institution, public opinion, I fear, would have decided that Giacomo was not a rascal, but a wise man.

Parochial or Public School?

PUBLIC opinion is often a curious judge. In the case of Giacomo, its ruling would have rested on the unspoken, yet too common, supposition that the father's obligation to provide for the physical and mental welfare of his child, is less binding than his duty to care for his child's soul; that, in fact, in case of a conflict, the spiritual claim may and should be ceded. At this present moment, it may be that some Catholic parents, in whom the true Catholic instinct, for one reason or another, has grown somewhat dull, are debating a choice of schools for the boy and the girl. Are Johnny and Alice to be sent to the parochial school, a proceeding which in some cases may involve a trifling expense, or to the public school, where "everything is free"? The descendants of men and women who valued the Faith above all worldly considerations should not hesitate, but all of us are not worthy of our ancestors. The prime question at issue is whether the parents are obliged to take more care of Johnny's soul than of their own temporal advantage. The public school may offer a release from some expense, but what else can it offer? One thing: it may offer the parents the chance to become child-abandoners. As expressed by the Archbishop of St. Louis in a recent Pastoral:

> The child has a natural right to be supported, protected and educated. He has the right to be taught not only all that is necessary for good citizenship here, but, as a child of God, he has even a prior right to know the laws God has given for his moral and spiritual life, and all that is necessary to fit him for citizenship in the kingdom of his Father. But a knowledge of, and an education in, this latter, the Catholic child can only obtain in a Catholic school. Therefore to the Catholic school he should be sent. The parent neglecting to do so violates the natural right of the child, and is guilty of child-abandonment. . . . Parents who fail in this without grave reason are held unworthy to receive the Sacraments.

In these vigorous words the Archbishop of St. Louis asserts the inalienable right of the Catholic child to a Catholic training; furthermore, he gives his presentation of this right, fresh point and energy by pronouncing those who violate this right, "guilty of child-abandonment."

Dangerous Education

IT is nothing else. Parents guilty of it can no more be admitted to the Sacraments than anyone who has determined to continue in a deliberate violation of law. The obligation, it is to be noted, rests not upon ecclesiastical, but on the natural law; that is, the Church did not make the law, although in this, as in other instances, she prescribes how the law is to be fulfilled. The natural guardian of the child, failing to provide for its physical welfare, exposes it to the hazard of physical death; the father who does not place his child in a Catholic school exposes it to moral ruin and death. That the danger is not so readily or so quickly discerned makes it not less, but more perilous.

Surely, the times have not grown better since our Fathers in God decreed that the normal education for every Catholic child was to be sought in a truly Catholic school. The world, the flesh and the devil have not been idle. It is almost obvious that there are today malign influences, non-existent even a quarter of a century ago, against which it is exceedingly difficult to protect the child. These influences may be found even in our public schools. It is not detracting from the personal and professional integrity of thousands of public school teachers, to say that Christian uprightness is not always, and what may be called "the Catholic point of view" is never, considered a requisite by the authorities empowered to appoint to the teaching staff. As New York has learned in the last eighteen months, it is possible for teachers to maintain in the public schools an active propaganda in behalf of principles which lead directly to disrespect for all authority, and even to personal immorality. Furthermore, it is fair to conclude that had not the war attracted the attention of the public to the pacifists and the Socialists in the schools, these people would have continued their nefarious work among the children, unhindered. As for the reading prescribed by one New York public school teacher for his class, it is sufficient to say that a majority of the books required, were either not shelved by the public library, or were on the restricted list.

The Catholic Contrast

AT best, the public school teacher can introduce positive ideals of religion and morality only by night and by stealth, thereby degrading the whole subject in the mind of the child. Put religion in the second place, and you divest it of all importance. For the immature mind, it is wholly a question of emphasis. The subjects that count are the subjects that come first, by right, openly, and are followed by an examination. The highest effort of the public school is reached in some "ten thousand dollar code," which an intelligent, well-bred pagan would have scorned. He had his faults, this pagan, but he never thought that a law was worth much unless it had a sanction, and if he believed in one god or in a thousand or in none, he did not hesitate to confess his creed. But even a million dollar code is worth little in a stand-up fight against moral evil. A school is not merely a place where catechism is taught, but no school is good enough for a Catholic child which does not base its code of morality upon Divine revelation, which does not put God first, not in vague theory, but in every-day reality. Today, evil is rampant, persuasive, cultured, and borrows the guise of an angel of grace. To try to defeat it by the current pseudo-ethical theories of sweetness and light, is as satisfactory as the process of trying to cure a cancer by dusting it with orris root. The immediate effects are pleasant, especially to the operator, but they do not last.

The Great Mother

THE lips of the aged are the custodians of wisdom. Down in Louisville, a town which will find itself without an essential occupation when the Prohibitionists triumph, is a priest aged only in years and wisdom. To his many personal merits he adds this, that he is an editor. Writing in the current Record, Father Deppen thus addresses himself to Catholic parents:

> Listen to the Church, obey the Church. The Church is older and wiser than you, and more experienced than you, and she is also more solicitous for your children than even you, their parents. If you would have the peace of God, the joy of a good conscience, and be finally judged "the good and faithful servant," see that your little ones are educated within the sacred walls of the Church. In that Church you live and hope to die. So also see that your children live and die. Make not Our Lord sad or angry. Remember His words: "Suffer the little children to come unto Me, and forbid them not."

I cannot add anything to that: I am not minded even to try. But I wish I could impress upon the mind of all Catholic fathers and mothers their obligation in conscience to send the Catholic child to the Catholic school.

SOCIOLOGY

Teaching the Alien

THE sixteen months the United States have spent in raising an army, have taught us several lessons. When the results of the first great registration had been tabulated, it was found that 9,683,445 had been enrolled. Of this number, 1,352,169 were alien residents. The country had no choice but to grant the latter exemption from military service, and they were mainly classified in the fifth group. Considering the fact that many of these men, except for their alien citizenship, were fully fit to assume the task of defending the country in which they resided, and in which the majority surely intended to make a permanent home, we have the explanation of the present very determined movement that this condition shall not be allowed to continue, and that these aliens shall be made an integral part of our national life. In short, they must be Americanized.

Americanization is a hazardous word in Catholic quarters. The term has frequently been made to cloak proselytism. Bigotry has paraded itself so long under the banner of "Americanization" that any movement of this nature is immediately suspected of being anti-Catholic. Even in the present agitation the old enemy has been found to be lurking. Then there is the further stir for the teaching of English to the foreign-born. In the minds of too many enthusiasts, the teaching of English to immigrants is synonymous with the immediate obliteration of the mother-tongues of these people. This is a dangerous experiment, as American Catholics know from their experience in handling the foreign-born classes.

The Necessity of the Work

IN contrast with the Catholic attitude on these two questions are the following incontrovertible facts: The Catholic Church has been easily the first among private agencies in effectively Americanizing the immigrant; the same is true with regard to the teaching of English to the immigrant classes. Furthermore, it can be asserted with conviction that any national program with these two objects in view will succeed only in proportion to the cooperation that is asked of, and received from, the Catholic Church in America. Beyond this point, these subjects, the Americanization of our aliens and the teaching of English to our foreign-speaking peoples, are not linked; and they will no longer be dealt with at one time.

There is not merely sentiment behind this determination that those who come to live with us shall be one with us in tongue. The least argument against permitting the continuation of the present conditions, is the last. It took America fifty years to discover that men who did not speak English would not fit into our military forces; and, having passed through the coming trying years, we trust it will not again be a matter of concern for many decades. The argument for the teaching of English to the immigrants which is worth emphasizing is mainly that such knowledge would be of greatest value to the immigrant himself. Many of the non-English-speaking immigrants think that as long as they live in the great foreign colonies of our cities, where their own tongues are the common languages, their ignorance of English will not be detrimental to them. Against this stands the probability, that, as long as this ignorance continues, they will be compelled to live in these colonies, which is a hard enough life sentence to impose, not to say choose. In addition, the non-English-speaking men and women, in seeking employment, face the greatest handicaps. They will be given the least remunerative and the most arduous sorts of work. Even after they have found employment, their troubles are far from being over, for their lack of knowledge of the country's tongue will add to the hazardousness of their occupations. To what extent this is true is emphasized in the statement of the Ford Automobile Company which reports that by teaching English to their foreign-born employees, accidents have been reduced fifty-four per cent.

Not Haste but Caution

WHAT havoc is done by "too rapid Americanization" is one of the most tragic and insistent stories told by the courts that handle our delinquent youths. Against this style of "Americanization" the Catholic schools have taken the youths, taught them our tongue and the Faith of their parents. The Church schools never considered themselves capable of replacing the father and mother of the immigrant child, as the State schools have done. Side by side with this teaching, the Catholic schools have taught their pupils English, have inspired them with the ideals and the culture of America, have fitted them to take their places in American life and prepared them to gain the first object of their creation. Here is the full explanation of such highly satisfactory statistics as those which showed that only one-seventh of all the boys appearing before Chicago's boys' court, during the first six months' period of the current year, had been educated in the Catholic schools. Furthermore, one can appreciate why Catholics have so large a representation in our armed forces, and whence came the inspiration which led to the enlistment of the Lesniowskis, the Panazzos and other Catholic foreign-born soldiers whose names are filling the casualty lists every day. On the score of teaching English to the children of the foreign-born, Catholics have little to learn, while the State may sit with profit at our feet. There is, though, the other angle, the teaching of English to the adults among the foreign-born. Here we Catholics can learn from the experiences of the State. Night schools are the first suggestion. The school authorities of New York, Chicago, and many other communities have experimented along this line. The highest attendance at the elementary classes of the Chicago evening schools was reached in 1914-15. The figure was 17,646. In 1916-17 it had dwindled to 7,696. A very low estimate of Chicago's foreign-born non-English-speaking adult population is 150,000. The explanation of the lack of response is simple and not merely a want of ambition among the aliens. The exactions of the daily employment leave little energy to be expended in study at night. Were evening schools the solution, Catholics could quickly step to the fore with their excellent institutions in the heart of the foreign colonies.

Factory Schools

MOST success has met the efforts at teaching English when the classes were conducted in industrial establishments during working hours. This is a method adopted constantly by firms employing non-English-speaking help. One line of endeavor of those working on this problem is to establish by law such schools in all large factories, making attendance compulsory. The classes are to be held during the usual hours of employment, while the employers are to be compensated for whatever financial loss is incurred. Where not enough of this type of help is engaged to warrant the opening of such classes in a factory, a central school in the vicinity of several factories is to be established, which the non-English-speaking workmen and women will be compelled to attend. This is radical legislation. Its adoption seems improbable. Yet the current agitation forces the problem to the front and some action is certain. Catholics cannot but be interested in the matter. Their interest will be a measure of the success with which the movement meets. Surely the Church is concerned in the material welfare of these aliens in America who are of her children. Her interest goes farther than does the State's. She must see to it that in the endeavor to give them material aid, spiritual damage is not incurred. Catholic pastors can impress, first of all, upon the non-English-speaking adults in their congregations, the necessity of learning English, pointing out the added possibilities of securing employment, and the probability of greater remuneration, and insisting upon the stronger tie which will be formed between parent and child, if father and mother learn the language of their adopted country. In some instances it might be feasible to open an evening school which, because of local conditions, may meet with greater success than did Chicago's experiment. Through means of fraternal and parochial societies, opportunity and even added incentive may be given those who ought to acquaint themselves with our tongue.

Cooperation and Watchfulness

THEN, should the State intervene with legislation, such as suggested above or other, Catholics will have to be alert. Constant watchfulness will be necessary to prevent proselyting under the guise of teaching English. This is true even now when the classes are voluntary and conducted in industrial establishments. Heresy in religion and politics can easily be made the subject of lessons in English, but only in the event of Catholic indifference. On the other hand, initiative on our part can rob this movement of any anti-Catholic bias it may have. Employers are constantly growing more ready to adopt methods that assure a more contented, industrious and efficient working-force. Catholic pastors in the foreign sections have an opportunity to induce capable men and women of their own parishes, those who have had the advantages of an education in our own colleges and convents, to offer their services to teach men and women of their own blood the English language. It might even be possible to connect such volunteers with industrial concerns ready to accept and remunerate them for their services. But whatever is done, there must be no laxness on our part. The nation is determined that the foreign-speaking shall be made one with us in language. This is for the country's good and for the immigrants'. That there is a dangerous angle, is no consideration. The danger will be minimized by our earnest cooperation and watchfulness.

NOTE AND COMMENT

The First Missionaries from Maryknoll

THE Field Afar announces that the first missionaries from Maryknoll are about to leave the United States for the mission field in China. The Sacred Congregation of Propaganda in Rome has assigned to the Catholic Foreign Mission Society of America a small part of the present Vicariate Apostolic of Canton, in the portion adjoining Tonkin in the province of Kwang-tung, where there are more than 1,000,000 pagans. There are four in the band of missionaries who will cover the territory mentioned. Their departure will mark an epoch in the annals of the Catholic missions, the entrance of America into the mission field. It should be a stimulus to the mission spirit of American Catholics to realize that the foreign missions belong to them now in a personal way. It has been the cry of the non-Catholic missionary societies that the world must be evangelized during the present generation. Now that American missionaries are formally taking over a portion of the Far East for peaceful conquest, American Catholics will not be outdone by their non-Catholic friends in their enthusiastic support of the mission cause.

Universal Training Association Proposal

THE "National Association for Universal Military Training" advocates in a recent statement a reduction of the draft age to eighteen years, though it would not call young men into service until they are nineteen years of age:

> This association is committed to universal military training and equal national service as the permanent military policy of these United States, and pursuant to this policy we propose the following amendment to the Administration's Man-Power bill, S. 4856:
> That in addition to the persons subject to registration and selective draft under the act approved May 18, 1917, all male persons between the ages of eighteen and forty-five, both inclusive, shall be subject to registration and draft in accordance with the provisions of said act; provided, that all registered male persons who have attained the age of eighteen years shall be subject to military training in accordance with regulations to be prescribed by the President, but shall not be called for active service until they have attained the age of nineteen years.
> The Association believes that the nation will be more in sympathy with the present military plan if it is known that the actual service age is nineteen years.

The Law of Nations

FATHER CHARLES PLATER'S essay on "Catholics and the Law of Nations" is being distributed by the "British Bureau of Information" in New York. Father Plater, who is the Master of Campion Hall, Oxford, makes a plea for the sacredness of God's law:

> The war aims of the Allies may be condensed into a phrase: We fight to establish the Law of Nations. The war aim of the restoration of Belgium is the outstanding example of the vindication of that law. The war aim of substituting Right for Might is but a statement of the Law of Nations in more general terms. We make war, as St. Augustine says, to secure peace; not any kind of peace, but a peace which recognizes the Law of Nations. We may focus all our aspirations and all our resolves in the demand: "Let the Law of Nations stand."
> For recently it has been tottering, and Germany's bull rush has threatened to bring it down with a crash. Yet it is not in Germany alone that the Law of Nations has been undermined. Read modern text-books of international law and what do you find? The authors laboriously collect customs and conventions, tabulate treaties and tell us what has been. Of what ought to be they have little to say. The Law of Nations is relegated to the lumber room. Yet without it treaties and conventions are so many scraps of paper.
> Neglect God's law and what is the result? Man's law

crumbles into ruins. For why, after all, should treaties be kept any longer than it is convenient to keep them, unless there be a God who will punish the violation of them? By what means shall we establish international peace unless we take as our starting point the establishment of the Law of Nations?

A league of nations, democratic control of foreign policy, disarmament, all plans for permanent peace, Father Plater argues, are as a body without a soul. The Law of Nations must be their guiding spirit. Our hope is in the force of Christian labor. We must "go to the people," as Leo XIII exhorted, but go to them with a scheme of the universe which does not leave out the Maker of the universe, a scheme which leaves room alike for patriotism and humanity, a scheme which unlike pacifism and militarism, leaves out nothing that is of value.

Labor in War

THE important part to be played by labor in the winning of the war is made clear by the statement of General Crowder explaining the "work or fight" order:

This is not alone a war of military maneuver. It is a deadly contest of industries and mechanics. Germany must not be thought of as merely possessing an army; we must think of her as being an army, an army in which every factory and loom in the Empire is a recognized part in a complete machine running night and day at terrific speed. We must make of ourselves the same sort of effective machine.

One of the unanswerable criticisms of the draft has been that it takes men from the farms and from all useful employment and marches them past crowds of idlers and loafers away to the army. The remedy is simple—to couple the industrial basis with other grounds for exemption and to require that any man pleading exemption on any ground shall also show that he is contributing effectively to the industrial welfare of the nation.

The Government order very wisely forbids able-bodied men to engage in the field of ineffectual employment and stamps idleness as a crime.

Reconstruction of the Disabled

CHARLES M. SCHWAB, contributing to the August number of Carry On, a magazine dedicated to the interest of our disabled soldiers and sailors, reminds Americans that the subject of reconstruction bears on every branch of American industry:

The man who has offered his body in the defense of his country must not be allowed to return to us merely as a hero worthy of our sympathy. His physical handicap, whatever it may be, will not, except in rare instances, render him useless as an industrial factor; on the contrary, it will afford a greater opportunity than ever before to utilize his brains upon which he was not so dependent when he went away.

Reconstruction is a very live issue in America. Not an academic problem, but a practical one. For some time it has been gaining in importance as a part of the very fabric of industry, and because our big leaders are blessed with imagination, many of them have already foreseen the necessity of salvaging their man-power, of holding trained and loyal employees and not discarding them on account of a disability for which they are not responsible. Most of them will not have to learn new trades—not more than ten per cent, I am told. But practically all of them can be put back into the industrial life of the country and must be. We need these men, need them badly. Their physical courage proves their worth; and ought to dispel once and for all the notion that they crave pity.

Returning soldiers and sailors can be well employed in industrial work, opening a new field for their energies and releasing able-bodied men for military service.

A False Witness

AN article in the Florida Baptist Witness for August 15 warrants the changing of the name of that benighted sheet:

It has been our convictions that the most unreasonably officious, damaging and damnable meddlers which have attempted to impose themselves or itself upon governments in the present world crisis is not the Roman Catholic Church, but the political Roman Catholic Hierarchy.

The way to cure the prejudice against Roman Catholicism is perhaps not to howl it down, but to remove the cause of the prejudice—that is, the Vatican from meddling in politics. This is a big job and goes down to the political roots of one of the strongest and perhaps one of the most corrupt political organizations which today exists in the world.

The present world struggle and the beautiful relations which everywhere exists between the Roman Catholics and others, especially in the States, and the common efforts of Catholics, Protestants and Evangelicals alike may greatly improve future conditions. If it shall be it will be one of the wonders worked out by this present war.

The article concludes with the wish that "the religious lay Catholics will discover the danger of the monster who rules over them and throw off the yoke of religious autocracy and become a great independent, democratic body. This done, religious prejudice will be largely, if not wholly, overcome." Not as long as papers like the Florida Baptist Witness continue to display their ignorance and bigotry. As the Government is calling upon all publishers to conserve the stock of white paper, no more patriotic action could be taken by the managers of this magazine than to cease publication. The world of commonsense and truthfulness will be helped by its speedy demise.

Disease and the War

THE Christian Advocate considers one of the good effects of the war its influence on public health:

In all previous wars disease has been far more destructive than shot and shell. Of the total losses of the Northern armies in the Civil War about three-fifths were from disease, while similar losses in the armies of the South amounted to about three-fourths of the total. In the Russo-Turkish war of 1878 the Russians lost over 102,000 men, of whom only 16,000 were killed in battle. In the Spanish-American war 345 were killed by guns, but 3,000 were destroyed by germs. In the Russo-Japanese war modern health-preserving measures began to turn the tables on disease, and in the present war the old dreaded enemies—typhoid, cholera, dysentery and typhus—have been put to flight forever.

Crippled by disease, soldiers returned home from former wars practically useless for industrial pursuits. In the present war the reconstruction of disabled soldiers and sailors is a part of the work of the Surgeon General's department of the army.

Avoid the Word "Christianity"

THE most interesting paper in the September Catholic World is Hilaire Belloc's article "On the Word 'Christianity.'" He maintains that it is a neologism that has come into currency during the past 250 years and that there was no word "used anywhere until well after the Reformation," which can be correctly translated "Christianity." Mr. Belloc's objection to the term is this:

The word "Christianity" connotes the historic existence of an unreal thing; of something which never did exist, never will exist, and in the nature of things never can have existed. It connotes a common religion which never was or could be. The word "Christianity" connotes a general idea of which the Catholic Church is but a particular example, and that is bad history. There is no general idea of which the Catholic Church is a particular example. The plain historical fact is that the Catholic Church is a certain thing or historical phenomenon or institution from which other things have broken away (forming sects or heresies, as the Catholic Church calls them), but there is no one thing common both to this institution and to the welter of those who have been derived from but have quarreled with it. . . .

There is such a thing, however, as Catholicism, the idea to which the institution called the Catholic Church conforms. But there never has been a real thing to which the idea "Christianity" could correspond. The only real Christianity has always been Catholicism.

The War.—Minor operations marked the progress of the Allied offensive in the beginning of the week. In the north British and New Zealand troops carried the German positions on the high ground between Peizière and the Havrincourt Wood, while the French advanced east of Avesne in the direction of Clastres. Official reports announced the crossing of the Crozat Canal before Liez. La Fère is the point at the southern end of the Hindenburg line that the French advance is menacing, the Germans still holding Messines Ridge, the northern bulwark of their line. Heavy rains impeded the British troops in their advance on September 10, making rapid progress difficult. Their forward movement was northeast of Neuve Chapelle and west of Armentières. The French continued to push on between the Somme and the Oise, capturing Etreillers and Roupy. Beyond the Crozat Canal Clastres and Remigny fell into their hands. On the following day official reports mentioned only artillery activity on the Aisne and Vesle fronts and in Champagne, while unofficial dispatches credited the French with holding the La Fère-St. Quentin road. Travecy and the heights dominating La Fère were taken from the enemy. Before St. Quentin the British infantry went forward at two points while despite stiff resistance on the part of the enemy they fought their way forward north of Epehy and at Vermand. Franco-American troops under General Mangin foiled the enemy's attempts to break through at Mount de Laffaux northeast of Soissons. The strong Allied position here threatens the German hold on the entire line of the Aisne and the Chemin-des-Dames. September 12 witnessed the launching of the first big American drive. Hurling the enemy back five miles on a front of twelve miles along the line east of St. Mihiel the American First Army under General Pershing delivered a telling blow between the Meuse and the Moselle rivers; tanks, cavalry and air planes cooperating with the infantry. On the front north of St. Mihiel American and French troops pushed the enemy back two miles on an eight mile front, and the town of St. Mihiel was captured. It had been in German hands since September, 1914. The British took Havrincourt and Moeuvres, crossed the Canal du Nord northwest of Havrincourt and took up their positions on the west bank of the canal above Moeuvres, advancing within seven miles of Cambrai. Their position fronts the reformed Hindenburg line from St. Quentin to Epehy. By the capture of Attilly, Vermand and Vendelles they reached a point within four miles of St. Quentin, aligning themselves with the French to the south. On the following day the American advance flattened out the St. Mihiel salient, reducing the front in this sector from forty miles to twenty, and pushing the enemy back to the Wotan-Hindenburg line. Most of the villages taken by the Americans were in good condition, the town of St. Mihiel itself suffering little damage. The Verdun-Toul-Nancy railway line and the railroad running from Thiaucourt to St. Mihiel fell into the possession of the advancing army. The official communiqué reported the capture of more than 13,000 prisoners. The British battling for St. Quentin took Holnon Wood, three miles northwest of their objective, while on their left the French took Savy which is three miles west of the St. Quentin railway station. The French on September 14 began an offensive from the southern end of St. Gobain Wood, before Laon, to the Aisne northeast of Soissons, advancing two miles on an eleven mile front and taking several villages. The full force of their blow was delivered against the western end of the Chemin-des-Dames and its southern flank. Marshal Haig reported British gains east of Havrincourt and in the Lys valley sector in Flanders. More detailed reports from the American forces in the St. Mihiel salient place the number of prisoners taken by Pershing at 20,000, making a total of more than 175,000 prisoners credited to the Allied armies since the first drive of July 18. Following the remarkable success of American arms and general Allied progress on the Western Front during the week came the general peace proposal from Austria, and Germany's separate peace offer to Belgium.

Bulletin, Sept. 9, p.m.-Sept. 16, a.m.

The President in his reply to the strikers at Bridgeport, Connecticut, reminded them that they had agreed to submit to the decision of the War Labor Board. As the members of the board were unable to reach a unanimous decision on all the questions presented, the disputed points were referred to an arbitrator who was unanimously chosen by the members of the Board. The attitude of the strikers who rejected the final decision of the arbitrator was condemned by President Wilson, who said in part:

> The arbitrator thus chosen has made an award which more than ninety per cent of the workers affected accept. You who constitute less than ten per cent refuse to abide by the award, although you are the best paid of the whole body of workers affected, and are, therefore, least entitled to press a further increase of wages because of the high cost of living. But whatever the merits of the issue, it is closed by the award. Your strike against it is a breach of faith calculated to reflect on the sincerity of national organized labor in proclaiming its acceptance of the principles and machinery of the National War Labor Board. If such disregard of the solemn adjudication of a tribunal to which both parties submitted their claims be temporized with, agreements become mere scraps of paper. If errors creep into awards the proper remedy is submission to the award, with an application for rehearing to the tribunal. But to strike against the award is disloyalty and dishonor.
> The Smith & Wesson Company, of Springfield, Mass., engaged in Government work, has refused to accept the mediation of the National War Labor Board and has flaunted its rules of decision approved by Presidential proclamation. With my consent the War Department has taken over the plant and business of the company to secure continuity in production and to prevent industrial disturbance. It is of the highest importance to secure compliance with reasonable rules and procedure for the settlement of industrial disputes. Having exercised a drastic remedy with recalcitrant employers it is my duty to use means equally well adapted to the end with lawless and faithless employees.
> Therefore I desire that you return to work and abide by the award. If you refuse, each one of you will be barred from employment in any war industry in the community in which the strike occurs for a period of one year. During that time the United States Employment Service will decline to obtain employment for you in any war industry elsewhere in the United States, as well as under the War and Navy Departments, the Shipping Board, the Railway Administration and all Government agencies, and the draft boards will be instructed to reject any claim of exemption based on your alleged usefulness on war production.

Several labor leaders have expressed themselves entirely in accord with the President's action, and the Central Federated Union in New York voted in condemnation of the Bridgeport strikers. The threatened strike of puddlers in the steel mills in eastern Pennsylvania and New York has been postponed to await the hearing of their demands by the National War Labor Board.

Belgium.—The special correspondent of La Croix, writing from La Havre, paints a pitiful picture of conditions in Belgium. The price of food is seven times more than it was before the war. Such household necessities as eggs, rice, butter, lard, farina, sugar, coffee and tea command prohibitive prices which only the rich are able to pay, and even the rich find it difficult to procure them. The future is black with menace. Public canteens have been set up which furnish the poor with the bare means of subsistence, the little portions of bread which can be offered them being very much adulterated, black, heavy and indigestible. Private benevolence has thrown in its resources with those of the public committees, and both are carrying on a losing fight against starvation and disease. The young, in particular, are suffering severely. Tuberculosis is growing enormously: in Liege alone, it is stated, there are 17,000 persons under sixteen years of age, victims of the terrible scourge, and remedies are not to be had.

The Food Situation

The land, even under present conditions, is producing enough food, especially potatoes, to supply the needs of the Belgians; but unfortunately the Germans, under the pretense of combating food-monopolies, have created what they call Zentralen, in which they concentrate all the products of the land that they can seize. These Zentralen were heralded as instruments for bringing back the golden age. In reality they reserve and distribute food-products only to the German civilians and the army. The Belgians are stripped of all supplies and are obliged to pay fabulous prices for whatever they can hide from the vigilance of the German police. Concealment of food is very dangerous and is punished by frightful penalties.

The spirit of the Belgians, however, is unbroken, their resistance unrelenting, and their confidence in victory unfaltering. They persistently refuse to make any terms with the enemy. They have vehemently opposed the efforts of the Germans to substitute Flemish for French in the schools. The inauguration of the Flemish university at Ghent, although launched with great eclat, and manned by professors procured with great difficulty and at very high salaries, has fallen flat. The Germans have been able to obtain as members of their "Council of Flanders" only obscure individuals heavily burdened with debts or some few officials long known for pro-German sympathies.

Belgian Spirit Undaunted

Manifestations in favor of Germany are rare and have to be afforded the protection of the police, and in some cases, in spite of protection, those who took part in them were severely handled by the people. The same individuals go about making manifestations in different cities. The Germans give incorrect accounts of the meetings which do take place. At Arendonck, for instance, the "Activist," as the pro-German propagandists are called, had four persons for his entire audience; the following day the Activist newspapers announced an enthusiastic reunion, which, it was declared, 700 persons had attended. The people show their detestation of the Activist movement in the most pronounced way; the Activist leaders have been condemned as traitors, and many summary executions have already taken place, and there is open talk of setting fire to the houses of the Germanophiles. Dark days of reprisals are in store for them, when the German retreat from Belgium begins.

France.—The text of the discourse made by the President of the French Republic when he conferred on Marshal Foch the insignia of his office is eloquent in its appreciation both of the distinguished merits of the General himself and also of his brave soldiers of the allied nations. Recalling the many claims to public recognition which the military genius of Marshal Foch unquestionably possesses, the President said:

Tributes to American Soldiers

> Once you had been invested, through the generous approval of the British and American Governments, with the power of Commander-in-Chief of the Allied armies you set yourself to bring about unity of strategic action, so necessary in the face of the powerful organization of German discipline, and scarcely had the first waves of the formidable American tide come rolling to the front, when, by the succession and combination of your well-chosen operations, you surprised and beat back the enemy, first at the Marne and the Aisne, then on the Avre, the Somme and the Oise; you have broken the German offensive, foiled their plans, exhausted their best reserves, captured large bodies of their troops, their cannons, their machine-guns and their ammunition. The glory of it belongs to you, Marshal, and to all the armies you command.

Shortly after the conclusion of the ceremony, Marshal Foch gave an interview to the press representatives, in which he deprecated prophecies and contented himself with stating that the campaign was progressing satisfactorily. He added:

> As for the admirable troops, you may say all that you can, and you will not say enough. It is impossible to exaggerate when speaking of their courage and their heroism. Despite blinding heat, despite fatigue, despite all difficulties, they continue to advance. It makes no difference whether they have been fighting without ceasing, whether they are allowed to rest, whether they are relieved; no matter what is asked of them, they carry out the order superbly.

After paying a high tribute to the splendid success of the British, he referred to the Americans:

> You may say of the Americans that they are fine soldiers; the only complaint that can be made of them is that they are too eager. I am obliged to restrain them. No army could receive a more glorious compliment. The only thing they ask is to advance and do their utmost to kill the Germans.

This highly commendatory criticism has often been passed on our soldiers, but it is extremely gratifying to have it corroborated by their Generalissimo.

In spite of the fact that Malvy has gone into exile, his case is still occupying a considerable place in Parliamentary concerns. It has already been recorded in AMERICA that his exile did not involve civic degradation, but it was generally taken for granted that it carried with it the loss of his seat in the Chamber of Deputies. It now appears that the latter penalty is by no means certain. A commission of forty-four members was recently appointed by the Chamber to decide whether he should be regarded as having forfeited his seat as a deputy. On it are serving M. Viviani and M. Painlevé, who testified in favor of Malvy, and twenty-one of his other special friends. The chances are therefore that a decision will be rendered in favor of Malvy retaining his political rights. It is even hinted that he may be allowed to return from exile in order to attend the coming Parliamentary sessions.

Malvy's Political Rights

Ireland.—For some time past petulant and untrustworthy propagandists have been spreading the reports that the Pope was preparing a letter condemnatory of the Irish hierarchy. This pernicious rumor has finally been set at rest by the following splendid letter which was recently sent to Ireland by the Holy Father:

The Pope and the Hierarchy

> To Michael Cardinal Logue, Archbishop of Armagh, and the other Archbishops and Bishops of Ireland.
>
> To our dear Son and to our venerable Brothers health and Apostolic benediction. It is with much satisfaction that We have learned through the letter which you collectively addressed to Us on the twentieth of last June, that the decree proclaiming the truth of the martyrdom of the Venerable Oliver Plunkett has been received with profound joy by the entire Irish people.
> We knew well that this would be the case, venerable Brothers, for We were aware of the veneration in which you hold this invincible champion of the Church, who jealously guarded, at the price of his own blood, the sacred patrimony of the Faith, the glorious heritage you have received from St. Patrick. The true representative, in that, of the generous Irish people, who have always been the energetic defenders of the Faith on their native soil and its distinguished propagators in the most distant lands.
> Of your faith and of your attachment to the Seat of Truth, We have found proof, venerable Brothers, in the expressions you make use of in the rest of your letter, receiving with gratitude the new code of canon law, and protesting against the insidious campaign of calumny and hatred to which Our person and Our action are at present subjected.
> Of your own accord, venerable Brothers, you recall, in this connection, the efforts We have made from the very beginning of Our pontificate to assuage the consequences of the terrible conflict, and to hasten the end of the horrible butchery.
> The unjust campaign, of which We are now the object, shall not diminish Our ardent wish and Our unflagging efforts in behalf of humanity as a whole, for we are certain that once these stormy times have been terminated and men's minds have recovered their calm judgment, the nobility and impartiality of Our charitable action will be everywhere recognized.
> In the meantime, it is your duty, venerable Brothers, as it is the duty of the other Bishops, and of each and every one of the clergy, to see to it that, amidst these multiplied attacks, the Faith be preserved untainted in the heart of the Christian people, and that all remain closely united to Holy Mother Church and to her supreme Pastor. We realize how numerous and serious are the difficulties, with which at the present moment the episcopate and the clergy of the entire world have to cope; but We are confident that they will imitate the Christian force of which the Venerable Plunkett gave so admirable an example, that they will unite to it the wise prudence and the moderation which the Apostolic ministry of its very nature demands, especially in situations of a very grave and delicate character; thus they will be able to fulfil their mission and to pave the way for better times for the Church of God.
> As an earnest of the Divine assistance which, with this object in view, We invoke from heaven, and in testimony of Our very special good-will, We grant, out of the affection of Our heart, to you and to all the Faithful, the apostolic benediction.
> Given at Rome, at St. Peter's, in the Vatican, July 31, 1918, the fourth year of Our pontificate. POPE BENEDICT XV.

Rome.—The very day the condemnation of M. Malvy, the French Freemason, was announced, the Havas Agency published a dispatch, dated from Amsterdam, and communicated to the entire press, which stated that Pope Benedict XV, on the occasion of his onomastic feast, had addressed a telegram to the Emperor William, couched in expressions of deep regard, in which, it was said, the Pope had gone so far as to invoke on the work of the German Emperor and on his august family the blessings of the Almighty. The Havas Agency added the following significant comment: "The language would be quite in agreement with the Pontifical message." The anticlerical press of all countries, without investigating the accuracy of the dispatch or the grounds on which it rested, at once accepted it at its face value, professed itself scandalized and professed to find in it another proof of the pro-German sympathies of the Holy Father. The object of the publicity of the press comments was obviously to divert attention from the treasonable activities of the protegé of the Freemasons.

Another Falsehood Disproved

It may be remarked in passing that, if the report had been true, there would have been nothing in the Pope's expression to give color to the charge of pro-Germanism, for he would merely have been using the polite formulas, traditional with the Vatican for many centuries in responding to the felicitations sent to the Holy Father by the heads of State. As a matter of fact, however, the Havas Agency dispatch was false. On August 22, the Osservatore Romano, published this official denial:

It has been stated at Amsterdam that in answer to a telegram sent to the Holy Father on the occasion of his onomastic feast by the Emperor of Germany, the Pope responded by invoking the Divine benediction on the work of the Emperor. We are authorized to declare that this information does not correspond to the truth. The Holy Father, in his telegram, thanked the Emperor for the good wishes and benedictions which he had invoked on the charitable work of His Holiness.

It is impossible, in truth, to deplore sufficiently either the bad faith with which reports are invented or falsified in order to rouse public opinion against the Holy See, or the lightness with which such information is accepted as true. The boldness of the false report passes belief. The actual fact is quite the contrary of that given to the public. It was not the Holy Father who invoked the Divine blessing on the work of the German Emperor, but the latter who called down God's benediction on the charitable work accomplished by His Holiness.

Russia.—The Committee of Public Information has begun the publication of a series of seventy documents which make startling disclosures concerning the relations of the Bolsheviki and the German Government. They were obtained by Edgar Sisson, the committee's representative in Russia. These documents are in part originals, annotated by Bolshevist leaders, and in part photographs of originals, the rest being circulars which complete the scheme of German intrigue.

The Bolshevist Treachery

The documents show that in June, 1914, before a pretext for going to war had been discovered, before the assassinations at Sarajevo, Germany was perfecting her plans for world conquest, by distributing to all industrial concerns sealed industrial mobilization plans. They also show that four months after the war began, and more than two years before the United States accepted Germany's challenge, the German General Staff of the High Sea Fleet had called for the mobilization of "all destructive agents and observers" in the United States and Canada in order to prevent ships from sailing from the American ports to England, France and Russia; explosions, strikes, delays, embroilments, difficulties, the employment of anarchists and escaped criminals being recommended as apt agencies for this purpose.

It is also clear from the documents that the present heads of the Bolshevist Government, Lenine and Trotsky, and their associates, are German agents; that the Bolshevist revolution was started and financed by Germany; that the Brest-Litovsk treaty was a betrayal of the Russian people by the German agents, Lenine and Trotsky; that a German-picked commander was chosen to "defend" Petrograd against the Germans; that German officers were secretly received by the Bolshevist Government as military advisers, spies upon the embassies of Russia's allies, officers in the Russian army and directors of the Bolshevist military, domestic and foreign policies; that the Bolshevist Government has played false with the Allies, the Russian people, and in particular with the Russian working classes whom they pretend to represent; and that it is not a Russian Government at all, but a German Government, acting in the interests of Germany.

Detailed proof is given of the sums of money put at the disposal of the Bolshevist leaders by Germans for the purposes of peace propaganda, the upkeep of the Red Guards, the maintenance of agitators throughout the country, and for the seizure, and, should it be deemed necessary, the destruction of Japanese and American war materials at Vladivostok. There is also a complete summary of a proposed German control of all Russian industries, one condition being the exclusion from Russia for the space of five years after the conclusion of hostilities of all American, British and French capital, and for the same space of time of all mechanics and workmen of nations other than Austria and Germany.

Letters are reproduced which show the arrangements made by the Bolshevist and German leaders for the assassination of the Russian Nationalist leaders, the destruction of the Polish legionaries in the Russian army, the disorganization of the Rumanian army and the deposition of the Rumanian king, the elimination of patriotic Russian generals and the substitution for them of officers satisfactory to the German Government, the suppression of patriotic agitation, the theft of the papers of the Italian Ambassador at Petrograd and an attack to be made on him, and the employment of Germans in Russian uniforms against the Russian nationalist armies.

Another group of letters points out how the Germans betrayed the Bolshevist leaders in their dealings with the Ukraine and made a separate German peace with the anti-Bolshevist leaders.

The Epidemic of Vulgarity

EDWARD F. GARESCHÉ, S.J.

CONSIDERING the influence of print it is really astonishing that society is not more deeply corrupted. One would think that the stuff they read would make half the world criminal and the other half crazy. Look over the heaps of magazines of every color that litter the newstands and conjecture what influence they are likely to have on the credulous, receptive, and uninstructed mind! It is sensationalism and emotionalism that give the current fiction of the masses what the chaste authors would call its kick, and the sensationalism runs into the lurid and the emotion verges to the vile. We are overcome by an avalanche of vulgarity. It is this that impresses itself on the character of the age more than the offenses of current literature against the laws of morals. The trivial, the cheap, the falsely sentimental really does get into the minds and the lives of the people who read in their idle and receptive hours the huge piles of stuff that one finds on the "news butchers'"—is not the title significant?—stalls.

It is a supreme calamity to have an immoral mind, but it is also a great misfortune to have a vulgar mind. Vulgarity is a degradation. If the heaps of "current fiction" and "light literature" that clutter the newstands are making our people more vulgar, they should assuredly be cleared away. Evidently there is profit in vulgarity and it will require no little power of protest to stamp out this plague at its fountain head, the conscienceless publishers.

The dictionary defines vulgarity as meanness, grossness, coarseness of manners, but of course, the word in its original derivation comes from the Latin term for crowd. So that in its literal sense "vulgar" means according to the taste and manners of the crowd. Combining these meanings of the word one comes to a conclusion that is not very complimentary to the multitude, to wit, that the taste and manners of the crowd are mean, gross, coarse by habit and preference. At least it will be interesting to inquire whether this low taste of the multitude is a cause or an effect, in other words, whether vulgarity is only a necessary response to the ingrained and natural craving of the many for what is mean, gross, and coarse, or whether the apparent taste for meanness, grossness and coarseness is only the result of being fed upon things unworthy, low and mean.

The second theory is far more probable. Taking the common run of men and women one may say that their taste depends in great measure upon what their imagination, intelligence, and feelings have been fed on. One must, of course, except the two extremes, those who have naturally such sound and excellent taste that it will scarcely be corrupted by a diet of vulgarity, and those whose natural equipment is so gross and mean that they will scarcely relish higher and nobler things even when urged upon them. But both these classes are the exception, the second almost as much so as the first. Take the child of the slums out of his gross environment and give him only what is noble, beautiful and lofty to contemplate, and his love and desire will be fixed on the higher things. Set the child of artists and poets in the sour and crude atmosphere of the slums and he will batten on vulgarity.

This may be seen clearly in those stages of society when refinement and the taste for beauty were in the air and common to high and lowly. In the fortunate middle age, when Catholicism had sway to exercise its refining influence, the recreations, the delights of the poor were often as refined as those of the learned. The fireside legends of those days were literature, the ballads were poetry. The art of glorious cathedrals and the paintings of the masters stirred the common people as much, though with a less conscious joy, as they did the small company of the learned. More, the craftsman who wrought the iron for the minster's door was no less an artist in his way than the sculptor who carved the statuary above it. The taste of the people in those times whether for things to be heard or things to be seen, was not vulgar in the evil sense. The culture of the mind was, it is true, rarer than now; the culture of the heart, which is refinement, was far more common.

What has changed all this and made vulgarity, the taste of the crowd, once more a synonym for baseness and coarseness as it was in the pagan times? Unquestionably the destruction of Catholic traditions brought about in the sixteenth century is in great part responsible. The ancient monasteries were centers of culture. Catholicism is the great patron of the great arts. True Christianity is of its nature inimical to coarseness, baseness, meanness. Let the Church have a free sway and she will refine any stratum of society. The corruptions that preceded the revolt of Luther weakened her refining influence on great bodies of society, and that revolt killed it altogether. It is significant that whenever our separated brethren become highly cultured in the true sense they recur to Catholic models. Tennyson rewrites the "Mort d'Arthur," Longfellow translates Dante; the best modern art is busy with the great Catholic originals, architecture hangs on the summits of the medieval masters, musicians over the unapproachable creations of men who were Catholic or touched with Catholic inspiration. The huge destruction of lovely works of art that was wrought by the barbarous "reformers" was an allegory. Their principles destroyed culture in the hearts of the peoples no less than their hands destroyed its masterpieces.

But there is a still more fecund source of vulgarity that has risen in modern times. It is the immense increase of information and curiosity without a corresponding increase in the true culture of the taste and feelings. Education is almost universal. Culture is, even more than of old, the possession of the proportionately few. If a man knows how to read and not what to read his case is more desperate so far as culture is concerned than that of him who does not read at all. A man may be cultured with the knowledge of but a few excellent books, or without books at all, from intercourse with those who have good taste and fine feelings. So, too, one may be an omniverous reader and withal very vulgar minded. To read everything that comes one's way is, nowadays, save to the solidly mature, quite ruinous to culture.

Again, the immense demand for reading and for all things else that can be heard or seen, such as songs, pictures, shows, sensations, experiences, which finds its supply in books, magazines, picture books (for the young and for those who should have somewhat outgrown them), moving pictures, vaudeville, plays, operas, good and bad, and all the hectic array of commercialized amusements which cater to a world too nervous to stay at home, requires an immense diversity of material to supply it. Consider the appalling bulk of written matter that is needed to feed the ogre of the daily press. It is impossible, considering the present state of education, that there should be enough cultured persons on earth, male and female together, to shovel provender for that insatiable monster. Therefore, tribes of "pen-pushers" have grown up and since they must, come what may, turn out in a given time a certain bulk of matter, it is inevitable that their product should be tinged with vulgarity. For human nature has two sides, the base and the noble, and literature in its wide sense appeals to one or the other. To appeal to the noble side one must have discrimination, taste, skill, and a power of patient application. To appeal to what is baser in us is easy, obvious and, alas! natural. The angel in men often needs awakening, the animal is always awake and hungry. Therefore, it is only natural that the tribe of pen-pushers, being pressed for copy, write vulgarity. And since vulgarity appeals to one side of human nature very strongly it is no wonder that it finds a sale. The publishers, who in many instances are no better and no worse than any other tradesmen, see their business flourish, and rejoice. And, alas, again! the situation promises to grow worse instead of better as the demand grows, the state of culture is progressively injured, the scribes and their congeners in other lines of commercialized amusement—for in that class must modern publications be set—grow more hurried and badgered, the monetary rewards of vulgarity increase, and so also does vulgarity. What are we Catholics to do to stem the tide? When vulgarity goes so far as to become indecent we can protest and claim the enforcement of the law. But what of that even more dangerous kind that invades even chaste minds and lowers the standards and aspirations of our own people? We cannot shield them from it nor keep it from them for it goes everyplace and is heard and seen everywhere. Our only and best resource is to fortify them against it. The work must begin in the schools.

The Translation of Catholicism

MICHAEL WILLIAMS

IN the course of a very interesting and valuable article in a recent number of AMERICA, Mr. Henry Somerville let fall some observations concerning a subject which deserves the earnest attention and study of all thinking Catholics. The theme of his paper was "A Social Mission to Protestants." He pointed out that a tremendous opportunity for Catholic workers was indicated by Cardinal Bourne in his recent pastoral on "Catholics and Social Reform," wherein his Eminence declares that many of the utterances of the leaders of "modern unrest" are merely exaggerated or confused statements of the main principles of Catholic social philosophy, and, therefore, Catholics should not find it difficult to put before the most ardent advocates of social reform a practical program embodying their own ideals in a more coherent and satisfying form than they could do it for themselves. Then Mr. Somerville goes on to say that this view is not only profoundly true and important as it applies to social problems, but also as it applies to international law and all world problems that are based on moral principles, as well as to "purely religious questions, to the fundamentals of Christianity." He refers to his own practical first-hand experience amongst Protestant social workers, as a member of an inter-denominational social-service conference, in support of his statement. This experience proved to him that Protestant social workers held opinions that fundamentally were Catholic. In expressing their views, however, Protestants, he says, become "sentimental rather than intellectual." They "feel" that so-and-so is right, and this-or-that is wrong; but they rarely are able to give a statement of the reasoned principles of their beliefs. Mr. Somerville's Protestant co-workers could be "enthusiastic about the living wage, but they could not themselves have based it on the bed-rock of natural law, as Leo XIII did. They would have been indignant with the profiteering that the war has shown to be so shocking, but they would not have known the constructive doctrine of the just price that medieval thinkers stated so precisely. A score of similar examples might be given." And Mr. Somerville declares that unquestionably Catholics can express for Protestants their own righteous, though vague, emotions and feelings, because Catholics possess a tradition of logic, of definiteness, of striving after clarity, or arguing from principles. But—and it is a formidable "but," indeed—Mr. Somerville hastens to add, Catholics may intellectually express the Protestant's emotional opinions better than the Protestant may do, only when "we are ourselves not too absolute"; and provided we "try to understand the Protestant point of view."

For, says this acute and practical writer, "it is a curious fact that because Catholics hold truths intellectually rather than sentimentally, they often realize less of their force. There is a wealth of sociology in every seminary's course of ethics, and even in the catechism, but how few are aware of it. How few can translate the technical terms of theology into the language of the newspapers. . . . We Catholics learn old truths in an old way, and we do not discover their perennial newness. . . . If we Catholics made a greater and more sympathetic attempt to understand the difficulties of Protestants, we should get a better appreciation of our own solutions."

I have often thought about this problem so eloquently stated by Mr. Somerville. Years ago, at a time when I was engaged in writing a series of articles on hygiene for a great New York Sunday newspaper, I remember being deeply impressed by a remark made by Professor Irving Fisher, of Yale, who was one of the principal sources of material for my articles. "One of the greatest needs of science today," said he, "is a body of translators, I mean, a corps of writers able first of all to understand scientific works, and capable of re-expressing them accurately yet simply in order that the great public may be reached and influenced by the mass of scientific knowledge at present lying idle and unapplied on the shelves of libraries and laboratories." If this is true, as true indeed it is, of science and its unapplied principles and knowledge, how much more is it not true of Catholic ideas, ideals, and teachings? I am firmly persuaded, along with Mr. Somerville, that one of the great needs of today is a body of writers and speakers able to spread Catholic truth in speech understood by the people, not only the Protestant public, not only the non-Christian public, but the less instructed and at present rather indifferent mass of the Catholic public.

In other words, we need a well-organized, widely circulated, vivid and popular translation of Catholicism into terms of journalism, into terms of sociology, into terms of trade unionism, into terms of the popular lecture platform, yes, and I would go so far as to say, into terms of the soap-box orator, of the street-corner forum.

Translation? Yes. For, so far as the great public is concerned, a very large part indeed of Catholic theology, and of the books, essays, sermons, and articles in which efforts are made to spread Catholic theology among the people, is set forth in a strange and unintelligible language. The language of by far the greater number of people in the United States is a corrupt language; a language abounding in words which have been torn away from their true meanings and now express ideas and connotations startlingly different from their true definitions. I do not mean by this, the way in which English as written and spoken in our country differs from English as written and spoken today in England. For the English of England, today, is also a corrupt and misleading tongue. And this for the same reason that it is corrupt and misleading in this country, namely, because from the time of the terrible disaster of the Luther-Henry VIII rebellion the greater number of writers and speakers of our tongue—and often, too, the most eloquent and forceful ones—have been using words in a sense differing more or less, but increasingly more, from their true, or Catholic sense.

Take such a basic and wonderful word as "charity," for example. You know what it means in Catholic theology. You know, and I know, how that meaning has been worked out and applied by the Church. You know, indeed, that in a sense the Church is nothing but the mechanism for the dissemination, the distribution, of God's charity among men. You recall St. Paul, with his, "Though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor . . . and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing." But you also know that to millions of poor people, the word is something that makes their hearts sick, and causes their very souls to shudder; it is a word of shame, a word that rings with the accursed chime of the chains of slavery. And when a dictionary is consulted, what do we find? Well, in my dictionary (the Standard) the Christian, the Catholic, the Pauline meaning, the true meaning, of charity, is given last of the five main definitions of the sacred word. The principal, present-day meaning of the word is defined as "Liberality to the poor; the spirit of charitable giving," and the authority quoted to back up this definition is not any out-of-date saint, but a professor of political economy, who says, "We are beginning to hear of a science of charity: and it is sorely needed, for old-fashioned alms-giving is a curse."

This distortion of the meaning of words, of which the above is a capital case, is multiform and well-nigh universal. How could it be otherwise? Private judgment is at work, here, splitting, separating, dissolving the strands of language, as it breaks up the definitions and the dogmas of faith when once the authority founded by God Himself, and by Him maintained through all the ages, the Church, is ignored.

Do you say: "Well, but if this is the case, why ask that Catholic ideas and teachings be expressed in a corrupt form? Why urge that truth be told in untruthful words?" I do not; nor does Mr. Somerville, urge anything of the kind; but I do urge the necessity of reaching the millions of souls now plunged into the horrors and agonies of the world-wide catastrophe, and who soon must face the terrific labor of remaking the shattered forms and systems of society after the war; of reaching them with statements of Catholic ideas in forms they can appreciate. And in order to do this, I feel sure that Catholics must come more generally to understand that many, and many a Protestant or Socialist writer or speaker or political leader who now is writing and talking for social reform is really making for the same solutions as are offered by Catholic sociology, but is lost and wandering in the mazes of his perverted and erroneous language. In order to argue with such a man, still more, in order to convince him of the value of Catholicism, we must be able to understand what he is driving at, and we must make him understand what we are driving at. And I am sorry to say that a very great deal of our Catholic writing and speaking is couched in terms too rigidly conventional, too narrowly academical, to convey its teaching in a living, vitalizing fashion.

The remedy? I venture to suggest that it lies in the encouragement of more, and yet more, and more, "popular" restatements, re-expressions, of Catholicism. Let not, however, the higher circles of Catholic literature, and study, be for a single moment discouraged. On the contrary, without the work of the best and highest scholarship and research of which we are capable, attempts at popularization would be futile. The higher, "purer" work fills the magazines, the arsenals, the storehouses of Christian knowledge. But we do need well-trained and enthusiastic "interpreters," "translators," distributors of this knowledge; which when it is put into practice, means power. I believe that many more Catholic schools and colleges should give a practical training in journalism, and in applied sociology, to their students than are doing so today. Catholicism possesses the solution, and the only safe and enduring solution, of the entangled problems of this apocalyptic crisis. Our libraries, our seminaries, our books, are like the granaries of Egypt in the days of Joseph when famine was upon all the world beside. Our Bishops are the custodians of this treasure. They, from the great Leo XIII down to today, including our present great Pontiff, are the teachers, the sacred spokesmen, and throughout the world their voices are uttering the message of Christ. But they need helpers. The help that at present they need is particularly the help of writers and speakers who can interpret Catholicism to the bewildered millions who wander outside the walls of the Fold.

Christian Science Testimonies

FRANCES BEATTIE

"TESTIMONY in regard to the healing of the sick is highly important," wrote Mrs. Mary Baker Eddy in the "Church Manual," Article VIII, Section 24, page 47, when she formulated the by-laws of the Mother Church, "impelled by a power not one's own." These testimonials are published in the periodicals of the Christian Science Publishing Society, the Christian Science Journal, seemingly the headquarters for the output. The June number of this periodical, page 150, gives the testimony of a "Scientist" in San Francisco who was cured of "some form of blood poisoning," and "can truly say that I am healed of . . . [that disease] and also of sleeplessness, stomach disorder, chronic bowel trouble, corns, as well as of using profane language and indulging in other bad habits." Page 151 quotes a Pennsylvania woman who, "through the reading of 'Science and Health,'" was "healed of stomach and bowel trouble. My husband was healed of rheumatism in one treatment, after suffering more than a year under medical treatment." Further, the woman's son, not interested in Christian Science, was cured of acute appendicitis, was able to sit up three days after the practitioner had taken the case, and was back at work in three weeks. A man in Montreal (page 154) expresses his "deep thankfulness to the giver of all good, our Father-Mother God," and his "gratitude to His messenger, Mrs. Eddy," for having been cured of a "tubercular disease of the lungs" from which he had suffered nearly four years. After having been "confined to bed for nine months," finally given "only about four hours to live," this lucky Canadian heard of a Christian Science practitioner, and "in two months was able to take a position." A sister of this man adds her testimony on pages 154-155, stating that she became interested in Christian Science "through the healing of my brother, who was in a dying condition with lung trouble when Christian Science restored him to perfect health." This woman was "taken suddenly with what the doctors termed erysipelas," and, holding to the truth, she was cured, "a practitioner lovingly gave me absent treatment." Further: "Another time I badly scalded my arm, which to material sense was one big blister, but the pain was instantly overcome by declaring the truth."

A woman in Portland, Oregon, "on the journey from sense to soul," declares (page 159) that Christian Science has brought "many proofs of the power of Truth to overcome discord of whatever name or nature in our home." What a pity Mrs. Eddy had not made this discovery before she divorced Daniel Patterson, her second husband. A woman in Idaho, suffering with Bright's disease, and told that there was no hope for her recovery, was "healed in one Christian Science treatment, after twenty-seven years of suffering" (page 159). An Oklahoma enthusiast's testimony, published on page 160, tells the world that he has "been healed of chronic rheumatism of years' standing, heart trouble, nervous chills which were most terrible, sore eyes of a bad type, coughs and colds which I always had during winter months, and many other ailments." This happy fellow now aims "to make it my daily task to do my Father's business, and to read the Bible and our text-book, which are my only companions and comfort."

The Christian Science Sentinel, for June 8, publishes the prize batch of testimonials, however, relating instances of a lost fortune returned, and a child playing safely with a double-edged razor, through the power of "Science and Health." A woman of Oakland, California, relates on page 814, the loss of a purse containing considerable money. A daughter, carrying the purse in her muff, lost it, and it was not missed for two hours or so.

> We took a lantern and searched as diligently as was possible by this light, and returned next morning and went over the ground as soon as it was light enough to see, again searching thoroughly. We had all been working for some time on the problem of seemingly great financial loss, in which our home and the means of much greater educational advantages for the children had apparently been swept away.

Then there occurred a "clearer realization of what true substance is," for the family decided to advertise the loss in the daily paper. Half an hour later, the phone rang with the news that the purse had been returned to the identical newspaper office, though it was the one most inconvenient of all to reach before the lost advertisement had been printed, the finder only accepting his car-fare as a reward. Thus did "Science" come to the rescue!

The same woman concludes with a still better tale. Caring for the eighteen-months old son of a friend, a babe who had never heard the word fear, she left him alone for "from fifteen to twenty minutes." She noticed him "biting on what I supposed was my shoe buttoner," and went on with her work, "at the same time going over portions of the week's Lesson Sermon. . . . 'God, the Preserver of Man,' being the subject. Her work and reading completed, the woman asked the child to give her what was in his mouth, and "he immediately laid in my hand a double-edged razor blade which some one had used and failed to put in its right place. It had been in his mouth for at least twenty minutes, and there was not an atom of anything on it but the moisture from his mouth!"

A San Francisco woman was "instantaneously healed of facial paralysis," another was cured of an "injury to the hip" of at least eight years' standing, in two weeks' time, by "absent treatment" (page 815). A Washington woman (page 816) was "almost instantaneously healed of a badly ulcerated tooth," another woman of Oklahoma "healed of an ulcer on the eyeball, and of an injury to the spine, caused by a fall" (page 817). A Colorado man decorates the same page with his tale of a cure of "sciatic rheumatism, lumbago, and many other erroneous conditions, also of a bad temper and the use of profane language."

But why marvel? Mrs. Mary Baker Eddy herself provided for the giving of testimonies through the Christian Science periodicals, and she says of herself, in her "Miscellany," page 105, ss.:

> After my discovery of Christian Science, I healed consumption in its last stages, a case which the M. D.'s by verdict of the stethoscope and the schools declared incurable because the lungs were mostly consumed: I healed malignant diphtheria and carious bones that could be dented by the finger, saving the limbs when the surgeon's instruments were lying on the table ready for their amputation. I have healed at one visit a cancer that had eaten the flesh of the neck and exposed the jugular vein so that it stood out like a cord. I have physically restored sight to the blind, speech to the dumb and have made the lame walk.
> The list of cases healed by me could be made to include hopeless organic diseases of almost every kind. I name those mentioned above [pneumonia, among the others] simply to show the folly of believing that the immutable laws of omnipotent Mind have not power over and above matter in every mode and form, and the folly of the cognate declaration that Christian Science is limited to imaginary diseases. On the contrary, Christian Science has healed cases that I assert it would have been impossible for the surgeon or materia medica to cure. O petty scorner of the infinite, wouldst thou mock God's miracles or scatter the shade of one who "shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty"?

While the Christian Science Monitor calls attention to the fact that ten relief workers have been sent to France "from the headquarters of the church in Boston," to extend the war relief work of the Scientists in France, and that such aid is not confined to Scientists but is extended to all worthy of help, the Christian Science Journal for June says, referring to the sending of knitted goods to men in the army and navy:

> Christian Scientists, however, will not lose sight of the fact that the above-named activities can only supplement the primary metaphysical responsibilities for which their membership in the Church of Christ, Scientist, stands. Prayer without ceasing, based upon the realization and demonstration of the facts of divine science, is the hope of the world.

With babies playing with keen-edged razors and men and women healed of tuberculosis and cancer by Christian Science, what need the Christian Science soldier fear at the front? The New York Times, June 9, in its magazine section, prints: "Christian Scientists as Warriors," describing the work of the Scientists and extolling the cause. The article is so pleasing to the Scientists that it is reported that it is to be reprinted and given wide circulation among the newspapers of the world. The Times quotes an editorial in the Christian Science Sentinel, April 27, which reads:

> Members of this [Christian Science] invincible army wear the uniform of their country and go where their duty calls upon them to be, finding no "valley of the shadow of death" to go through, because they maintain the assurance that God is life and man cannot be separated from God. Consequently, amid trials they are not afraid and give courage to their comrades.

"In a recent issue of the Christian Science Monitor," continues the New York Times, "we find this:

> Now, in destroying an unreal mental phenomenon there is no difference whether it be a torpedo in the Atlantic, a shell in No Man's Land, a wound in a dressing station, or a fever in a base hospital. You do not turn aside a torpedo or a shell in flight, or a bayonet thrust, any more than you will away a fever. What you do is to realize that these things are "not made of things that do appear." You endeavor to grasp the fact that, inasmuch as a lie cannot be about nothing, your torpedo, shell, bayonet thrust or fever must be a lie about some truth, which, when you know it, frees you from the effect of the ignorance bred of the material concept. . . . When once you have grasped that metapsysically, and attuned your life to that precept, you will find how utterly impossible it is that the false concept for a lie, whether in the shape of torpedo, shell, bayonet thrust or fever, shall ever come nigh you.

The testimony then proceeds to show that Christian Science soldiers came back from Flanders and France unscathed, "while soldiers of other beliefs and no beliefs passed on into the land of silence." It is related that two Science boys in the British army, half their regiments cut to pieces, read the Sunday lesson in a shell-hole and marched off to safety. A non-commissioned officer of the old American regular troops was wounded in the arm and dropped from loss of blood on his way to the front-line dressing station. But he practised Christian Science and "in a short time the flow of blood stopped;" he then helped another wounded American on his way to the dressing station, "and promptly returned to the American trenches." A New Yorker cured himself of acute appendicitis and went on with the fight. There is always an opportunity for absent treatment, and there are Science practitioners at the front. How sad the Kaiser would be if he had to face an entire army of Scientists.

The Colleges and the War

M. J. AHERN, S.J.

WAR is a serious affair, as the United States now knows by experience. A new draft has been put into effect and by it more than 2,000,000 men will soon be added to our army in France. Of these about 1,400,000 will be between the ages of nineteen and twenty-one. New line officers, 60,000 of them, are necessary for the efficiency of this great force, and the Government has turned to the colleges for aid in training these men. The Reserve Officers' Training Corps, the R. O. T. C., established in many colleges, had been of immense service in this respect, but it was at best too desultory a process of officer-training to be retained under the present imperative necessities of the service. Accordingly a plan was adopted by which every co-operating college became practically a military academy on the West Point model. The students were to enlist in the army and be furloughed back to the college for the training that would make them fit candidates for officers' training camps. It was found however that, under the new draft law, this furlough, though feasible, would be considered, if it did not practically amount to, a class exemption. So the plan of the Students' Army Training Corps, or S. A. T. C., was modified to overcome any reasonable objection or opposition. Representatives of all the colleges were invited to a conference with Government officials, the conference for the Eastern colleges being called for Plattsburg on September 3 and 4, when some 300 delegates from more than 200 colleges from Maine to Florida spent two strenuous days of discussion and inquiry about the project. Most of the delegates lived in the barracks and "messed" in the same way as the 4,000 students sent from the colleges for summer training at request of the War Department. Before going to Plattsburg the college men got a general notion of the work expected of their institutions from this statement issued by the Government:

1. All young men who were planning to go to school this fall should carry out their plans and do so. Each should go to the college of his choice, matriculate, and enter as a regular student. He will, of course, also register with his local board on the registration day set by the President. As soon as possible after registration day, probably on or about October 1, opportunity will be given for all the regularly enrolled students to be inducted into the Students' Army Training Corps at the schools where they are in attendance. Thus the Corps will be organized by voluntary induction under the Selective Service Act, instead of by enlistment, as previously contemplated. The student, by voluntary induction, becomes a soldier in the United States Army, uniformed, subject to military discipline, and with the pay of a private. They will simultaneously be placed on full active duty, and contracts will be made as soon as possible with the colleges for the housing, subsistence, and instruction of the student soldiers.

2. Officers' uniforms, rifles and such other equipment as may be available will be furnished by the War Department, as previously announced.

3. The student-soldiers will be given military instruction under officers of the army, and will be kept under observation and test to determine their qualification as officer candidates and technical experts, such as engineers, chemists and doctors. After a certain period the men will be selected according to their performance, and assigned to military duty in one of the following ways: (a) He may be transferred to a central officers' training camp. (b) He may be transferred to a non-commissioned officers' training school. (c) He may be assigned to the school where he is enrolled for further intensive work in a specified line for a limited specified time. (d) He may be assigned to the vocational training section of the Corps for technician training of military value. (e) He may be transferred to a cantonment for duty with troops as a private.

4. Similar sorting and reassignment of the men will be made at periodical intervals, as the requirements of the service demand. It cannot be now definitely stated how long a particular student will remain at college. This will depend on the requirements of the mobilization and the age group to which he belongs. In order to keep the unit at adequate strength, men will be admitted from secondary schools or transferred from depot brigades as the need may require.

Students will ordinarily not be permitted to remain on duty in the college units after the majority of their fellow-citizens of like age have been called to military service at camp. Exception to this rule will be made, as the needs of the service require it, in the case of technical and scientific students, who will be assigned for longer periods for intensive study in specialized fields.

5. No units of the Students' Army Training Corps will, for the present, be established at secondary schools, but it is hoped to provide at an early day for the extension of military instruction in such schools. The secondary schools are urged to intensify their instruction so that young men seventeen and eighteen years old may be qualified to enter college as promptly as possible.

6. There will be both a collegiate section and a vocational section of the Students' Army Training Corps. Young men of draft age of grammar school education will be given opportunity to enter the vocational section of the Corps. At present about 27,500 men are called for this section each month. Application for voluntary induction into the vocational section should be made to the local board, and an effort will be made to accommodate as many as possible of those who volunteer for this training.

Men in the vocational section will be rated and tested by the standard army methods, and those who are found to possess the requisite qualifications may be assigned for further training in the collegiate section.

7. In view of the comparatively short time during which most of the student-soldiers will remain in college and the exacting military duties awaiting them, academic instruction must necessarily be modified along lines of direct military value. The War Department will prescribe or suggest such modifications. The schedule of purely military instruction will not preclude effective academic work. It will vary to some extent in accordance with the type of academic instruction, e.g., will be less in a medical school than in a college of liberal arts.

8. The primary purpose of the Students' Army Training Corps is to utilize the executive and teaching personnel and the physical equipment of the colleges to assist in the training of our new armies. This imposes great responsibilities on the colleges and at the same time creates an exceptional opportunity for service. The colleges are asked to devote the whole energy and educational power of the institution to the phases and lines of training desired by the Government. The problem is a new one and calls for inventiveness and adaptability as well as that spirit of cooperation which the colleges have already so abundantly shown.

9. The plan contemplates the making of contracts with all institutions having units of the Students' Army Training Corps for the housing, subsistence and instruction of the student-soldiers to take effect on or about October 1, 1918. A separate statement of this date sets forth the procedure and principles governing these contracts.

This was good as far as it went, but the War Department felt that explanations would be demanded, and it wisely detailed Lieutenant-Colonel Clark, Secretary of the Committee on Education and Special Training; Major Orton of the General Staff, and Dr. Mann, Chairman of the Advisory Board, to answer difficulties and clear up doubtful points. At the risk of some repetition, it will be well to explain their ideas. They soon made it clear that the S. A. T. C. was not devised as a benefit to education but as an asset for the army. Students between the ages of eighteen and twenty-one will be inducted into the army by the local draft board of the district in which their college is situated. This induction will not be left to the discretion of the district board, which will be instructed by the War Department to induct every student who is duly registered at a college authorized to maintain an S. A. T. C. Upon induction the status of a student is that of a private of the United States army on active duty. Hence he will receive the pay of a private, and in addition will be maintained and educated at the expense of the Government which will make contracts with the various colleges for the housing, subsistence and instruction of the student-soldiers. As long as the present military emergency endures the colleges will lay aside the customary classification of students into Senior, Junior, Sophomore and Freshman classes; they will be grouped instead in three classes according to age, forming the military classes of eighteen, nineteen and twenty years, and as they will practically all be assigned to active duty in the field by June 1919, the tentative arrangement is to leave the twenty-year class not more than three months in college, while the nineteen and eighteen-year classes will remain not more than six and nine months respectively. Certain exceptions may be made in the case of students engaged in technical studies of military value, such as medicine, engineering and chemistry, to the extent demanded by the needs of the service. But there is to be no deferred or favored class. Even the length of time students of the various ages are to remain in college will be determined largely by developments in Europe, so that the number of months of college work may be decidedly less than that given above. Whatever the duration of each period, at its end the student-soldiers will be selected according to their performance and assigned either to a commissioned or non-commissioned officers' training school, or they may be transferred to a cantonment as privates, or, if they have ability as technicians, they may be assigned to the vocational training section of the S. A. T. C. In certain cases they may be left at college for further intensive work in certain special lines for a limited time. The question of awarding academic credits is left to the individual college to determine; but obviously, except for exempt or rejected students or for those under eighteen, the colleges, in the ordinary sense of four-year schools with course arranged to secure credit towards degrees, are suspended in operation for the period of the war, and are practically taken over for strictly military purposes by the Secretary of War. Where dormitories or fraternity houses of sufficient and sanitary accommodations exist at colleges and universities they will be used as barracks. In the absence of such facilities, the War Department will build and furnish barracks similar to those in the cantonments without expense to the colleges, and will supply besides all necessary uniforms and other military equipment.

The military training, which will be given under a commanding officer assigned by the Adjutant General, with a corps of subordinate officers in the ratio of one officer to every seventy-five students, will have for its prime object the acquirement of military discipline. Close-order drill will, as the most effective means of inculcating military discipline, form the staple of the training, although musketry, bayonet exercise and physical drill will be rigidly taught to inspire confidence in the power of the rifle and for developing an offensive spirit and a strong physique. Infantry training alone will be given both because it is fundamental in all branches of the service and because the War Department has at present complete teaching facilities for this branch only. Assignment to various other branches will be made at the officers' training camps and at the cantonments. Eleven hours each week will be devoted to practical military training and two to lectures on strictly military subjects.

The educational program for the S. A. T. C. recognizes a vocational section and an academic section. The vocational section of the S. A. T. C. will be established in such institutions as have facilities for training technicians for the multiple needs of a vast army. The plans for this section provide for possible promotion to the collegiate section provided the student-soldier shows aptitude for a more academic training.

In the academic section a course in war aims is to be given to all the student-soldiers. This course is described as "a course on the remote and immediate causes of the war and on the underlying conflict of points of view as expressed in the governments, philosophies and literatures of the various states on both sides of the struggle. The purpose of this course is to enhance the morale of the members of the corps by giving them an understanding of what the war is about and of the supreme importance to civilization of the cause for which we are fighting." The course is designed to occupy a minimum of three hours per week during the first nine months, divided into three units of three months each, "the first three months to be devoted mainly to the historical and economic causes of the war, the second three months to the study of the points of view of the various nations engaged, as expressed in their governmental institutions, and the third three months to the study of their points of view as expressed in their philosophies and literature."

In the academic section the trend of all the courses is to be towards utility in making officers, and the colleges are to help in all ways possible in achieving the most rapid and complete results. Therefore the academic work is to be along military lines; and while detailed programs were not available at Plattsburg, a general idea of the Government's demands could be gathered from the explanation of Dr. Mann. The student-soldier should be taught to some extent both to read and speak military French and as much German as possible. His program should include English composition, so as to enable him to acquire precision in formulating and writing military orders, history, geography, literature, psychology and economics, drawing, including topography and map-making, mathematics, physics and chemistry, some astronomy and geology and the elements of meteorology. Ethics should be included in the war aims course. As the average stay at college of any of the student-soldiers will not be over six months, obviously these courses will cover merely the bare essentials of the subjects. But the work will be intensive, and so adjusted that each lecture period of one hour shall be accompanied by two hours' study or laboratory work. The academic rating is to be kept separate from the military rating. But there will be ample sanction for academic discipline in that, if a student-soldier persistently neglects his studies, the college authorities may report him to the commanding officer of the college, who will recommend his transfer to a cantonment. It is hoped and expected that the colleges will administer their entrance requirements even more rigidly than usual. And high school authorities are urged to intensify their courses so as to reduce the age of high school graduation, which averages a little over nineteen.

A temporary contract will be made by the War Department with each college to run about sixty days from October 1, 1918. Under this contract the college will be paid one dollar a day per student for housing and subsistence and a per diem amount for his tuition based on the tuition fees in vogue at the college in 1917-1918. In addition to the latter laboratory fees and books are to be paid for by the Government. At the end of the sixty-day period a permanent contract will be made for nine months, subject to renewal, or revocation for cause at any time. The entity and power for usefulness of the colleges will be safeguarded so that when the contract ends the colleges will be in condition to resume their functions of general education.

Such are the essentials of the plan of the War Department in regard to utilizing the enormous facilities of the colleges of the country in an effort to bring about a speedy and victorious termination of the war. If the spirit manifested by the educators gathered at Plattsburg is any criterion, the co-operation of the colleges will be whole-souled and enthusiastically loyal. It is frankly recognized that enormous difficulties must be met before the confusion caused by such a revolutionary upheaval of academic methods can be overcome and the full effectiveness of our colleges realized in the new plan. There could scarcely be offered a more impressive tribute to the value of a college education than this appeal of the Government to the colleges in this most momentous crisis in our nation's history.

Laymen's Week-End Retreats

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The sixth annual series of Laymen's Week-End Retreats was held at St. Charles Seminary, Overbrook, Pa., from August 23-26 and August 30-September 2. As usual they were well attended, some 400 retreatants in all being present. The retreatants went away filled with increased religious ardor, due to the devotional environment of the seminary and the inspired eloquence of the retreat-master, Rev. T. J. Shealy, S.J. The report of the secretary showed that about 1,600 retreatants had attended since the inauguration of the retreats at Overbrook six years ago. It was also shown that retreats are now being held annually in various parts of the country through the exertions of the Philadelphia association.

Admiral W. S. Benson, U. S. N., first Vice-President of the association, attended the first retreat. As the Admiral read the stations of the cross, attended by Captain Clarence Carr, U. S.

N., and Lieutenant John J. Ferrick, U. S. N., all attired in the regulation naval uniform, he impressed the retreatants with his sincerity and devotion. The Admiral is a convert to the Faith. At the experience meeting he stated that he attributed all of his success and all of his ability to cope with the serious and intricate war problems he meets to the inspiration he received at the retreats. The Admiral is a daily communicant. It is related that on one occasion when leaving a church he was met by a fellow-officer who said to him: "Well, Admiral, were you praying?" The Admiral replied: "I was just reporting to my Commander-in-Chief."

On Saturday, August 31, His Grace, Most Rev. D. J. Dougherty, Archbishop of Philadelphia, paid an official visit to the retreatants. He endorsed the good work heartily, gave to it his official sanction, promised to co-operate in the laudable work in every way in which his personal effort could be of service and stated that he desired to commend publicly the unselfish work and untiring zeal of Father Shealy.

At the experience meetings it was noted with pleasure that the veteran retreatants had learned to use the name of Christ in their public expressions in a reverential and trustful manner. It was decided that one of the most effective ways that could be used to retain and practise the good lessons of the retreat is to acquire the habit of approaching Holy Communion daily. One gentleman stated he lived in a city of 60,000 population, about 6,000 of whom are Catholic. He gave it as his opinion that there would be a revolutionizing of religious sentiment in his city if 200 Catholic men would become daily communicants.

It was suggested that the influence of the retreat would be very much enhanced and its effects made lasting, if all the retreatants would use their influence to increase the circulation of AMERICA. This, because AMERICA espouses to an eminent degree all of the sublime principles commended by the retreats. Retreatants, therefore, should subscribe for AMERICA, they should read it assiduously and support it ardently. By so doing they would assist greatly to bring into their own lives, and into the lives of their fellow-men, that ardent and loyal zeal for religion which the retreats endeavor to develop.

It is the confident opinion of the retreat leaders that their efforts will result finally in forming a sturdy militant laity that will be of great assistance to the Church in its battle for virtue.

The Pope and the Kaiser

To the Editor of AMERICA:

It was within a few minutes after I had read Mr. J. C. Walsh's article in AMERICA for September 7, under the title "Is a New Anti-Catholic Drive Imminent?" and with his summary of the pro-German accusations hurled at the Pope still fresh in my mind, that I chanced to take down from the book shelf an old bound volume of the Century Magazine. The date of the volume was 1905, and my eye was especially attracted by one title, "Impressions of the German Emperor," by Andrew D. White, one of our former ambassadors at Berlin. The article is a part of Mr. White's volume, "Chapters from My Diplomatic Life."

Mr. White was one of our most highly regarded diplomats, an educator, a man of letters, and at all times he was held up as a good American citizen, although his writings show no love for the Catholic Church or its Apostolic head. Enemies of the Vatican, therefore, should be willing to accept the testimony of Andrew D. White, who, in describing the Kaiser's relations with his Catholic subjects, said:

> A good example of the curious union, in his mind, of religious feeling, tolerance and shrewd policy is shown in various dealings with his Roman Catholic subjects. Of course, he is not ignorant that his very existence as King of Prussia and German Emperor is a thorn in the side of the Roman Curia. . . . He is perfectly aware of the part taken in that quarter against his country and dynasty at all times, and especially during the recent wars; and yet all this seems not to influence him in the slightest as regards justice to his Roman Catholic subjects. He does, indeed, resist the return of the Jesuits into the empire—his keen insight forbids him to return to the policy of Frederick the Great in this respect—but his dealings with the Roman Catholic Church at large shows not merely wisdom, but kindliness. If he felt bound to resist, and did successfully resist, the efforts of Cardinal Rampolla to undermine German rule and influence in Alsace and Lorraine, there was a quiet fairness and justice in his action which showed a vast deal of tolerant wisdom.

Mr. White, when he wrote this article, had been hobnobbing with the Kaiser for about eight years. He had received the Royal Gold Medal of Prussia from the German Emperor, and, in common with almost everyone in the United States, including Theodore Roosevelt, then President, looked upon the head of the German Government as a wise and humane ruler. The article is given over to fulsome praise of the Kaiser, who is described as a ruler pretty nearly perfect. The diplomat's assertions with regard to the Vatican's attitude toward the German monarchy are interesting only as showing how an American statesman regarded the relations existing between Potsdam and Rome.

Mr. White refers to the "Hohenzollern common sense," and asserts that the Hohenzollerns have given to the world "various strong types," such as the Great Elector, Frederick II and William I.

> Mainly under them, and men trained or selected by them, Germany, from a great confused mass of warriors and thinkers and workers, militant at cross-purposes, wearing themselves out in vain struggles, and preyed upon by malevolent neighbors, has become a great power in arms, in art, in science, in literature; a fortress of high thought, a guardian of civilization; the natural ally of every nation which seeks the better development of humanity!!! (Wonder points inserted.)

Ten years after a presumably wise American diplomat has rendered this glowing eulogy of the monarch of Potsdam, "so hated by the Vatican monsignori," the same Kaiser is condemned by the world at large as a beast and a vulture. It would appear that the Ambassador, praising the now despised Kaiser to the disparagement of the Pope, unwittingly paid the Vicar of Christ a high compliment. If the enemies of Rome say that the turn of events prove that Mr. White's estimates and conclusions were wrong in their entirety, we can say that as far as Mr. White's appreciation of the Kaiser's greatness was concerned the Kaiser misled the Ambassador as he misled nearly everyone with whom he came in contact. As for the analysis of the relations between Pope and Kaiser, Mr. White, in all probability, wrote what the Kaiser would have dictated. As American Ambassador, Mr. White had been exalted by the Emperor of Germany; he had been his friend and confidant. If there was one thing he should have known with certainty it was the Kaiser's opinion as to what the Pope thought of the Kaiser.

Mr. White, in an earlier chapter, refers to the young Kaiser's summary dismissal of Bismarck and the displeasure it created in some quarters of the empire. He adds: "And yet, to me, admiring Bismarck as the greatest German since Luther, but reflecting upon the vast interests involved, this act was a proof that the young monarch was a stronger man than anyone had supposed."

Of course, since that was written the world has materially changed its opinion as to the vaunted greatness of Bismarck and Luther. As for the former, attention to his personality is drawn largely from the action of those communities that were named in his "honor," and which are earnestly striving to adopt more respectable "monickers." The discarding of Bismarck monuments and memorials also directs attention to "the greatest German since Luther." Fixing upon qualities to determine the greatness of conspicuous Germans is a difficult problem these days. But one thing is certain: after reviewing the events of the last four years more people than ever before will heartily agree that the present King of Prussia is the worst German since Luther.

Apropos of Dress

To the Editor of AMERICA:

It was both consoling and refreshing to read in a recent issue of AMERICA that the International Federation of Catholic Alumnæ, which was to have held its convention in St. Louis from October 16 to 20 inclusive, has placed the ban on evening dress being worn at any of its functions in the future. God grant that this attitude may be productive of glorious results for our beloved Church and country! Among these results, let us trust that not the least glorious will be the setting of a loftier standard in the matter of woman's dress.

No sane person, I daresay, will accuse one of squeamishness for deploring the prevalent styles in female attire. One would have thought that America's entrance into the war would be the signal also for greater circumspection in milady's wardrobe. But alas! the modes which have been flaunted in the face of high heaven during the summer months have been more than sufficient to make the modest blush and the angels weep. Sad to relate, even the purest of our young women seem not to scent the evil. Disporting their charms in imitation of many of the half-clad creatures of the stage and the underworld, only too many, suspecting no irreverence, unceremoniously invade our churches, and fear not to kneel at the altar to receive the God of purity into their insufficiently covered breast. But, we are flippantly told that "to the pure all things are pure." Thus distorted, the principle is as ill-smelling as the much abused "art for art's sake." Can we ever imagine the spotless Mother of God thus flimsily attired? Our Christian sense revolts at the very thought. Still, Mary is the type of all that is fairest and noblest in womanhood. The mere sight of her, so demure and modest, but withal so queenly, aroused none but the holiest memories in the beholder. On the other hand, judgment day alone will reveal the countless evil suggestions that had their origin in the shameless negligee of the present votaries of the goddess of style. How many souls may possibly have been lost as a consequence, we dread to conjecture. Must not every honest lover of woman and souls immortal pause and gaspingly ask: "O God, how far will the pendulum still swing before women return to an appreciation of their truer and nobler self?"

I think, we all grant that the evil is widespread. But are we without a remedy? The fine instincts of the members of the I. F. C. A. inspire us with a well-grounded hope that means will be found to readjust conditions. All must agree that our Catholic women, but especially our convent-school graduates, are, by reason of their faith and education, particularly obligated to close up the sluices before the waters of indecency break through and carry away the protecting barriers of maidenly reserve. The Alumnae have a golden opportunity of vindicating anew the principles of womanly modesty and of flinging defiance at the conscienceless dictators of fashion who seem bent on exploiting the honor of their sex. However, if the remedy is to be availing, it will not suffice to draft a set of resolutions commending in merely general terms modesty in dress. It is imperative that definite measures be adopted. I am willing to concede that women know best how to reach woman's heart. Still, I trust, it will not appear presumptuous to inquire by way of suggestion if it would not be feasible to inaugurate some concerted plan of action. Could not the Alumnae be persuaded, for instance, to sign a pledge plighting themselves to eschew both the nude and diaphanous in wearing apparel? Further, would it not be possible to appoint permanent committees vigorously to prosecute the campaign in their respective home towns? The work of these committees might embrace various activities, e. g., urging other members of their sex to sign a pledge similar to that previously signed by themselves, bringing pressure to bear upon manufacturers to supply garments that will meet the requirements of modesty, protesting to the offenders against indecent representations used to advertise certain articles of dress. Such a campaign launched by women themselves, if supported by the whole-hearted cooperation of the clergy, could not possibly fail of success.

Let no woman fear that I wish to interfere with the styles. I am too wise to imagine that mere man can hope to come between milady and her modes. Let our women adopt any style they list. Be it ever so bizarre, provided it offend not against modesty, we shall not complain. Neither am I fatuous enough to wish our sisters to go about in dowdy or frumpish attire. But, we do beseech them, for the love of all that is holy, not to lower themselves and their sex in our estimation by slavishly harnessing themselves to the chariot of sinful fashion. Perhaps some may smile at my efforts and exclaim: "Time wasted." But my faith in womankind and her inborn love of virtue teach me to hope for the dawning of a better day. As I view it, all that is needed is a courageous band of women with initiative who, recking not ridicule, are prepared to undertake the conquest. Given such a band, we shall soon behold a transformation that at present is almost the desperation of the age. Doubtless many women with more far-reaching vision than I am possessed of, will be able to offer valuable suggestions. A calm discussion of the subject, devoid of acrimony, should do much to help along the cause. The subject is too sacred to call for pleasantries. Many may be pleased to brand me as a misogynist. On the contrary, I prefer to call myself a philogynist.

Why Do Catholics Lack "Prestige"?

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Mr. O'Grady, in your issue of August 31, seems a bit excited in his criticism of Dr. Muttkowski. His failure to convince is not due to lack of effort, but rather to the poverty of the subject he selected; he had nothing to work on. Says Mr. O'Grady:

> When Mr. Muttkowski says that he "feels certain" that the newspapers would proclaim the Masonic affinities of Schwab, Ryan and Stettinius if they possessed such, he shows how little he knows of the rules of metropolitan journalism. If the United States calls a man to a post of honor and responsibility, there is absolutely no news or importance attached to the fact that that man is a Catholic or a Methodist, a Mason or a Knight of Columbus. In the published accounts of big events involving the life and progress of the Church, the daily papers, almost without exception, are lavish in their praise and space.

Your correspondent's reflections are given for the benefit of Catholic readers who lack the proper appreciation for all the "lavish praise and space" given by the secular press, and result from twenty years of active service on the staff of the metropolitan press.

Since reading Mr. O'Grady's contribution, the wonder grows whether he might have got a better idea of the real power behind had he spent a few of those years in the business department—let us say, the advertising department.

Let us take up the assertions in the order made, to wit: (1) That there is absolutely no news or importance attached to the fact that a man called to a post under the Government is a Mason, as viewed by the editors of the metropolitan press. (2) That the daily papers are lavish in their praise and generous with their space when recording events vital to the Catholic Church. The press of the week before last refutes the first contention, and proves the case for the other side.

Recently a local lawyer was commissioned a major in the judge advocate department of the national army. From the published accounts of that appointment one may judge whether the secular press placed a news value on the Masonic affiliations of the recipient of that commission. One Manhattan journal, in a double-column spread, which included a picture of the Major, used this head: "High Masonic Dignitary Gets Major's Commission in Army." And this, as a qualifying head: "——, of Thirty-third Degree Scottish Rite, Joins Judge Advocate Office." The body type of this article occupied seventy-five lines, nearly half of which were consumed in recording the Major's Masonic alliance. Other New York papers carried a news item similar in tone.

From New York to Garrison is a far cry, but, surely, Mr. O'Grady has heard of Billy Sunday, and his tabernacle. In the Manhattan Hall of Records are filed the plans of that structure, the seating capacity of which is stated to be 12,500; nevertheless the whole secular press of Manhattan Island told, day after day, of an army of 40,000 persons at the tabernacle, all eager to catch every word that fell from the lips of the Evangelist in his exhortations to walk the plank.

When John D. Rockefeller, Jr., or Mrs. Helen Gould Sheppard, or any more or less prominent Protestant, hit the trail the same vehicles of publicity told of the incident, referring to them by name; the particular creed of the individual was not recorded. But when, in an unguarded moment, a former Corporation Counsel of New York, a man presumed by the press to be more prominent than the average layman in Catholic circles, walked upon the platform, ye gods! how the news editors grabbed at that choice morsel and proclaimed it in an article on which was placed this head: "Big Roman Catholic Hits the Trail." Will Mr. O'Grady explain the news value of that heading? Was it intended to be in derision of our ancient Faith?

Possibly not, but the writer of that head judged, and judged rightly, that the Catholic who walked the plank at Sunday's tabernacle scandalized the crucified Christ who died to redeem him.

The second assertion needs no comment other than to ask your Garrison correspondent in what papers he read of the defense as given by those in charge, and at the time offered, of the Catholic child-caring institutions when they were fighting for their existence at the inquisition constructed and advanced by two financially powerful Protestant foundations, ably assisted by a former City Administration.

Greek Catholics and Schismatics

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Father Asman in AMERICA, for September 14, performed a valuable service by protesting against calling members of the so-called Orthodox sects of the Orient "Greek Catholics." The expression is of sectarian origin and implies the untenable "Branch Theory." None of the Oriental sects ever call themselves Catholic except for controversial purposes. In the countries where they predominate, even more than anywhere else in the world, the name Catholic is understood by every one to mean one "in the Roman Communion."

In this respect they are precisely like the older Protestant sects, any "intelligent" member of which will insist, on occasion, that he belongs to the Catholic Church. But every one of the sects in question is heretical as well as schismatic. The sectarian portions of the Pure Syrian, Coptic and Ethiopic rites are Monophysites, and therefore confessedly heretical; the separated part of the Armenian rite (Pseudo-Gregorian sect) is charged with the same heresy; that of the Syro-Chaldean rite professes itself Nestorian. All the remaining professedly Christian sects of Oriental rites call themselves "Orthodox"; but in fact their approximation to orthodoxy, however close, is no closer than that of the others named and is very far from complete. Since the orthodox sects are not really orthodox, and since orthodoxy is, of its very nature, a note of the true Church alone (included under Apostolicity), they should be named, like other sects, from their principal leader or founder, and called Photianist.

Although the Photianist sects are very numerous, all of them, except the Bulgarian-Photianist sect, are ostensibly in fellowship with one another. Among these the only one of any great size is the Russian-Photianist, which is generally hated by the others, because of its systematic efforts to absorb them all. This sect, which calls itself "The Holy Orthodox Church of Russia," is not Greek, because part of it belongs to the Armenian rite and perhaps another small fragment to the Syrian rite, although the latter is probably Græco-Syrian, of the same rite as the Catholic Melchites.

The most intelligent names for the primary subdivisions of the Oriental rites are those ordinarily used in the Roman Curia; and not the misleading and confusing neologisms of Dr. Fortescue, for instance, his constant reference to the Photianist Antipatriarch of Constantinople as "The Ecumenical Patriarch," a title officially condemned by the Holy See centuries ago, even in its application to the real Patriarchs of that See. Dr. Fortescue is a specialist, and an extremely competent and trustworthy one, in the history of liturgy and ritual, but he confuses the rites as organic portions of the Church (including the sects constituting their disrupted fragments), with rites in the liturgical sense. According to the Roman nomenclature the many sub-rites of the Greek rite are called Pure Greek, Græco-Melchite, Græco-Bulgarian, Græco-Roumanian, etc., etc.; just as those of the Syrian rite are called Pure Syrian, Syro-Maronite and Syro-Chaldæan (including the Syro-Sorian or Syro-Malabar). The rite to which the Greek portion of the Russian-Photianist sect belongs is one of a number of Græco-Slavonic sub-rites.

Until the collapse of the Czardom, most of the Ruthenian Church was in or from Austro-Hungary. Of late it has spread rapidly in the Ukraine, because a large portion of the people of that country have been for centuries kept out of Catholic Unity only by force. But it is the Church, apparently, to which all Græco-Russian Photianists would belong, under the Apostolic regulations governing perpetuation of rites, if they abandoned their schism.

Uniate is a most excellent word; but it is an abuse to apply it to Catholics of Oriental rites only. The Italo-Greek portion of the Pure Greek sub-rite of the Greek rite has always belonged to the Patriarchate of the West and has never been in schism. Some sects of the Armenian rite, to say nothing of others, have always been in communion with Rome. The ecclesiastical province of Venice was in schism for several centuries under a pseudopatriarch, but Catholics belonging to it are not for that reason distinguished as United Latins. We are, strictly speaking, all Uniates because we are in Holy Unity, united in the faith and fellowship of the Apostolic See of Rome and members of the One Universal Church. In the first century Catholics were called saints, because they belonged to the Holy Church, were called to be saints, in the strict sense of the word, and were surrounded by strikingly unholy sects. Then they began to be called Catholics because they belonged to the Universal Church and not to any of the petty local sects pretending to be Christian. In the time of the great dogmatic controversies they were more commonly called Orthodox, in contradistinction to the surrounding heretics. In the Middle Ages they were called simply Christians. In modern times they have been called Catholics, as distinguished from Protestants. In the future they may well come to be called Uniates, as distinguished from separatists of all stripes, Christian and non-Christian, organized and unorganized, religionists and secularists. This appellation would be much less of a novelty than are many details of Dr. Fortescue's terminology.

"Follow Fashions Slowly"

IN a letter published in another column of this issue of AMERICA a correspondent sorrowfully protests, in the name of Christian modesty, against the way women dress nowadays. He writes:

> I am too wise to imagine that mere man can hope to come between milady and her modes. Let our women adopt any style they list. Be it ever so bizarre, provided it offend not against modesty, we shall not complain. Neither am I fatuous enough to wish our sisters to go about in dowdy or frumpish attire. But we do beseech them, for the love of all that is holy, not to lower themselves and their sex in our estimation by slavishly harnessing themselves to the chariot of sinful fashion.

It is in following the extremes of fashion that the danger lies. The woman who in selecting a gown consults not only her purse and her good-taste but her Christian conscience too, will not seriously offend against modesty in her attire. The extremists are always to blame, and in every age they have deservedly brought down on themselves the jibes of the satirists and the denunciations of the clergy.

In the seventeenth century, for example, "The Simple Cobbler of Aggawam," which was the pen-name of the Rev. Nathaniel Ward, the Puritan parson of Ipswich, Mass., was so distressed by the mere recollection of the extravagant fashions he had seen the women of England affecting, that he felt bound in conscience to devote to the painful subject several pages of a pamphlet. He begins:

> I shall make bold for this ônce to borrow a little of their [women's] loose-tongued Liberality and misspend a word or two upon their long-wasted but shirt-skirted patience. . . . I honour the woman that can honour her selfe with her attire: a good Text always deserves a fair Margent. . . . To speak moderately, I truly confesse it is beyond the ken of my understanding to conceive how those women should have any true grace or valuable vertue, that have so little wit as to disfigure themselves with such exotick garbes, as not only dismantles their native lovely lustre, but transclouts them into gant, bargeese, ill-shapen-shotten-shell-fish Egyptian Hyeroglyphicks, or at best into French flurts of the pastery. . . .
> I desire all Ladies and Gentlewomen to understand that all this while I intend not such as through necessary modesty to avoyd morose singularity, follow fashions slowly, a flight shot or two off, shewing by their moderation that they rather draw countermont with their hearts, than put on by their examples. I point my pen only against the light-heeled beagles that lead the chace so fast that they run all civility out of breath, against these Ape-headed pullets which invent Antique foole-fangles merely for fashion and novelty sake.

Of a surety this sage counsel proves that the zealous "Cobbler of Aggawam" was far from being so "simple" as he would fain have us think him. "Follow fashions slowly" was his frequent exhortation, no doubt, to the godly matrons and demure maidens of his flock, and so richly did they all profit, we may piously believe, by Parson Ward's ghostly concern for their manners and morals, that while carefully avoiding on the one hand "morose singularity" in dress, on the other hand they so highly honored themselves in their attire that we have no record of Parson Ward's ever being forced to note with sorrow among the women of his New England congregation any Ape-headed pullets whatever (perish the thought!), nor a single gant-bargoose, let alone an ill-shapen-shotten-shell-fish Egyptian Hyeroglyphick.

The Eye of the Bigot

OVER in France, where the times are strenuous, the Knights of Columbus, the Y. M. C. A., the Salvation Army, and the children of Israel, are engaged in a tireless competition to make the times less strenuous. But the keen competition, far from destroying, rather suggests and effects cordial cooperation. As the President of the United States has recently written, "the services rendered by all these agencies to our army and to the Allies are, essentially, one and all, of a kind." None know this better than the brave men and women who are following the forces abroad. Dictated by love and gratitude, the services of the aforesaid societies are never restricted to one class, for they make no distinction of Jew and Gentile, Greek and barbarian. Those to whom they minister are all children of our common Father in Heaven, and this sonship is the sole and sufficient claim of the soldier who in weariness of mind or body seeks a refuge in the hut, the home, or the chapel, erected by these associations in France.

It is, of course, obvious that any propaganda intended to stir up hostility among these organizations is little short of treason to our cause. In a very true sense, its effect would be to give aid and comfort to the enemy. No propaganda of this kind will meet favor in the more literate sections of the country, in which Catholics and non-Catholics have been living in harmony these many years, knowing and appreciating one another's good qualities. But where dense ignorance and a bitter hatred of everything that is Catholic still dominate public opinion, it is quite probable that certain men and women will think that by opposing Catholic war work, they are doing God and their country a service. Thus, for instance, the editor of the Presbyterian of the South, quoted in the Herald and Presbyter for September 4, can see in the efforts of the Knights of Columbus, exerted for all without distinction of creed, nothing but "a Romanist propaganda." He warns his readers, therefore, that to help the war work of the Knights of Columbus is equivalent to furthering the cause of "Romanism."

No doubt, the excuse of this editor, who probably knows his constituency and the best methods of appealing to their bigotry, is that he wrote before the publication of the President's letter, ordering the united drive for funds in support of all the war-work agencies. Since the publication of that letter, it can hardly be presumed that these militant Presbyterian editors will oppose the drive on the ground that the Knights are one of its beneficiaries. But the spirit which dictated the original offending article, the spirit of bigotry, dies hard. Had the Knights refused to engage in their work of mercy, they would have been pointed out as an irrefutable example of Catholic indifference to the public good. Even now, having engaged in this work, and with such splendid success, they cannot hope to escape obloquy. For in the eye of the bigot, Catholic activity for God and country, and Catholic inactivity, are equally reprehensible.

Forward, the Middle-Aged!

TWO "middle-aged men" they were, and they spoke together on the morning of September 12. "Do you expect to go across, Bill?" asked the man with greying temples, as he slipped his blue card into an old pocket-book. "Well, yes," replied Bill, thoughtfully. "Hadn't looked at it much that way before. Was thinking of the wife and the children. But after this morning I'm ready. Believe I'd like to go. We've got to see this thing through, you know. If they want a fight, we'll let 'em know they've been in one."

There was no bluster about this man on Registration Day, just as there was no bluster when we went into this war. As the typical American would outline the situation, "It's all a business proposition." Maddened with innocent blood and an unchecked lust for domination, Germany deliberately provoked a friendly and unoffending people into war. Her whole attitude towards the United States was equivalent to a declaration that we might choose between an alliance with the Hohenzollerns and a repetition within our own borders of the blood and butchery of Belgium. It was thoroughly characteristic of German militarism, malicious, arrogant and supremely stupid, and has met a thoroughly characteristic American answer. "It's no quarrel of our choice. We didn't want war. You forced it on us. Now take the consequences."

That, too, is the spirit of the "middle-aged men" who registered on September 12. It is the spirit that is the seed of victory, complete and unquestioned. These millions would prefer to remain at home with their wives and their children, busy in the profitable pursuits of peace. But if their country calls, there will be no "quitting," no holding back. Looking on the matter as "a business proposition," they will carry it through, quietly, calmly, in a business-like manner to a successful end. German diplomacy and German "efficiency" have written many a strange page in history, but they overtopped the high mark of fatuity when they planned the program, one result of which was Registration Day, September 12.

Before and After

FOLLOWING the President's announcement of the joint drive for all war activities that is scheduled to take place during the week of November 2, the press gave great publicity to the statement of John R. Mott, who said:

> This is not to be a Y. M. C. A. campaign nor a Knights of Columbus campaign, nor a Salvation Army campaign, it is to be a campaign for the men over there in France and in the cantonments on this side and on our brave ships everywhere; a campaign for the maintenance and increase of morale.
> The dollars given the common fund will reach the boys through seven different channels; and no matter what sign is painted over the door of any hut and any hostess house, its door will be open to every boy equally.

The ordinary reader perusing this news item would very naturally conclude that Mr. Mott and the organizations he represents were for the united drive from the beginning. The very opposite is true. At a meeting held in Washington in the early summer, the Government proposed a united effort to the different organizations engaged in soldier and sailor welfare work. The Knights of Columbus immediately put themselves on record as favoring this proposal. Mr. John R. Mott, speaking for the Y. M. C. A. and the Y. W. C. A. put himself on record as opposing the combined drive, because those who supported his organizations, and the public whose support these organizations would look for after the war, were unwilling to rally to the common drive in which two of the organizations engaged in war work were represented. Then came a second meeting of the representatives of the war-work agencies, and Mr. Mott was asked if there was any change in the attitude of his organizations. He answered that he could report no change.

President Wilson settled the matter in his letter to the chairman of the committee on Training Camp Activities and Mr. Mott very properly announced the agreement of the Y. M. C. A. to the Government plan for a common effort saying: "The President has raised the standard to which every man and woman in the nation can and will rally loyally." The standard was raised two months ago by the Government. The Knights of Columbus were the first to rally to the call for a united drive, while the now repentant Mr. Mott was the first to stand opposed to the proposition. It would have been much more honorable and more American if Mr. Mott in his statement to the press had said: "I was very much opposed to a united drive, and at two meetings of the war-work agencies voiced my protest. Now that the President has spoken I see the un-American attitude of my former position, and very heartily endorse the present plan." That would have been real Americanism, fair and sincere.

The Military Value of the "Pom"

A HEARTLESS economist recently computed that the 6,000 dogs in the single State of Kansas consume each day food enough to support 1,000 French babies. He then raised the question: Is each of these prosperous Kansan canines engaged in an essential employment that will hasten the victory of America and the Allies? No doubt a good proportion of those 6,000 dogs are leading rather useful lives as hunters, shepherds or watchers. Thus they more than earn the food they eat, and they cannot be justly charged with snatching food from the mouths of needy French and Belgian children. But what can be said in defense of those Kansan dogs' innumerable kith and kin that enjoy a life of idleness and ease in all our large cities and in countless suburban homes? Though we have now been in the war nearly a year and a half, milady's Pekinese or Pomeranian seems to be as well-fed and well-cared for as formerly. A large part of a maid's time appears to be spent in keeping the pampered little animal clean, healthy and good-tempered, and the weekly cost of the delicate fare such pets must have would doubtless represent in patriotic war stamps a comfortable sum.

When our solons arrange the scale of taxes on luxuries, therefore, the toy dog should by no means escape. The smaller the animal is, the bigger should be the revenue it yields to the community war chest. A tiny "Pom's" military value would thus be made equal to that of half-a-dozen Great Danes. Large dogs that are purely ornamental, but consume considerable costly food, need not all be encouraged to live. A little judiciously administered chloroform will save these dogs' owners both food and taxes. As the one great task before the country now is to win the war as quickly as possible, useless pets that waste money, food or labor which would otherwise promote relief work of various kinds should be taxed out of existence.

A Recipe for Serenity of Soul

IN the current Bookman are quoted two letters written to his children by Joel Chandler Harris, the renowned creator of "Uncle Remus." The communications seem to betray the secret of that delightful author's perennial cheerfulness and remarkable serenity of soul. To one of his sons he wrote:

> By being as nice and as clever as you know how to be you can always make a good impression anywhere you go. You know how your own folks (except me) misunderstand you when you give way to your foolish little temper; strangers will misunderstand you even worse. My plan has always been to conceal my feelings about small and unimportant matters, and be genial and funny even when I didn't feel like it. A little practice goes a long way. I have got so now I feel genial all the time.

And in a letter to his daughter he said:

> Now, how do you suppose I can find any news to write while all this is going on? More than that, how do you suppose I survive the infliction? Well, I'll tell you, Billy-Ann—I laugh at it. I'm just as happy, almost, when things are going wrong, as I am when they are going right; and for a very good reason. It doesn't amount to a row of pins. There's nothing funnier than to see small troubles disappear when you laugh at them. They seem to get ashamed of themselves and run away.

Though Joel Chandler Harris did not become a Catholic till near the end of his days, passages like those quoted above show that he understood and practised long before his conversion well-known principles of Catholic asceticism. Some clear and simple rules for preserving perfect serenity of soul which a consummate master of the interior life once laid down for his followers are virtually embodied in the foregoing letters. "A little practice goes a long way." By schooling one's self to act counter to one's natural inclinations in little things, great strength of will and force of character are developed. To smile at trifling annoyances, to banish small troubles with a merry jest, to remember always that most of the things we worry about never happen at all, to see that the heart is kept full of sunshine and the forehead free from scowls, habitually to put a kind construction on the sayings and doings of others, and to show a practical belief that as God's in his heaven, all's well with the world: those are the lessons that the genial author of Uncle Remus's tales taught in his life and writings, and, better still, they are practices which are based on the soundest principles of the Church's attractive asceticism.

Waiting

"SEEMS like most things come out all right," wrote that excellent thinker, Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch, "if you jest wait long enough." That is only another way of saying with Browning, that since God is in His heaven, all's well with the world. Or, if the comparison be allowed, the words are a deduction from St. Paul's heartening philosophy, that to those who love God, all things, even things which appear to be unmitigated evils, work together unto good.

But the trying period is the period of waiting. Until the longed-for surcease of sorrow comes, we can pray or repine, work or rebel. But rebellion against the chastising fatherly hand of God cannot lessen sorrow. Only love can do that. "There are in this world blessed souls whose sorrows all spring up in joys for others," writes an American novelist, "whose earthly hopes, laid in the grave with many tears, are the seed from which spring up healing flowers and balm for the desolate and distressed." Sorrow has no bitterness, if it teaches love for those whose burdens are heavier.

THE INVENTOR OF PORTMANTEAU WORDS

WHEN Lewis Carroll in the sixth chapter of "Through the Looking Glass" first laid down the principles governing the correct exegesis of that imperishable poem, "Jabberwocky," there was opened in the development of the English language a new era which is rightly considered of the highest importance to the student of our tongue. For the distinguished author of the Alice books has not only enriched the language with a number of words which it is hard to see how even Shakespeare managed to do without, but he has set down in such luminous terms and illustrated with such felicitous examples the principles governing the formation of "portmanteau words" that since Carroll's time a countless number of them have been coined.

The secret of the new art was first divulged when Humpty Dumpty in expounding to Alice the opening stanza of "Jabberwocky," explained that "'Slithy' means 'lithe and slimy.' 'Lithe' is the same as active. You see, it is like a portmanteau—there are two meanings packed up into one word." In his admirable preface to "The Hunting of the Snark," Mr. Carroll subsequently threw a flood of light on the psychology of the coiner of portmanteau words when he remarked:

> Take the two words "fuming" and "furious." Make up your mind that you will say both words, but leave it unsettled which you will say first. Now open your mouth and speak. If your thoughts incline ever so little towards "fuming," you will say "fuming-furious"; if they turn by even a hair's breadth towards "furious," you will say "furious-fuming"; but if you have that rarest of gifts, a perfectly balanced mind, you will say "frumious." Supposing that when Pistol uttered the well-known words: "Under which king, Bezonian? Speak or die!" Justice Shallow had felt certain that it was either William or Richard, but had not been able to settle which, so that he could not possibly say either name before the other, can it be doubted that, rather than die, he would have gasped out, "Rilchiam!"

Other examples of portmanteau words from Carroll's own writings which will at once occur no doubt to the reader, are "snark," "chortle," "galumphing," etc. The mysterious animal that bears the name first quoted above is obviously a creature uniting in itself the characteristics of both the snake and the shark; that complicated emotion which can find adequate expression only in a mingled chuckle and snort is of course a "chortle"; while "galumphing" vividly describes a rapid movement of which the component parts are a gallop and a jump.

That portmanteau words are not confined necessarily to the English tongue was proved to admiration by the late Mr. A. A. Vansitart, of Trinity College, Cambridge, who translated "Jabberwocky" into sonorous Latin elegiacs, ingeniously finding an Ovidian equivalent for even the most Carrollian words of the original. Here, for instance, is the first stanza:

Coesper erat: tunc lubriciles ultravia circum
Urgebant gyros gimbiculosque tophi;
Maestenui visae borogovides ire meatu;
Et profugi gemitus exgrabuêre rathae.

['Twas brillig, and the slithy toves
Did gyre and gimble in the wabe;
All mimsy were the borogroves,
And the mome raths outgrabe.]

"Coesper," it will be noted, is a perfect translation of "brillig," being made up of "coena," meaning "supper," and "vesper," signifying "evening." "Lubriciles" is of course formed from "lubricus" and "gracilis," becoming excellent Latin for "slithy." As for "utravia" ("wabe") and "maestenui" ("mimsy"), the cultivated student of portmanteau words will at once recognize their felicity. As for the useful words that since Lewis Carroll's time have been added to the English language simply by applying the rules he left us, they are too numerous to quote. An entire menagerie of altogether new animals, for instance, has been created by an imaginative artist and the young men of Oxford by coining such expressive portmanteau words as "brunch," which is a meal served between the hours of breakfast and lunch, and "unctimonious" (unctious + ceremonious), which vividly describes the Pecksniffian air affected by some Evangelical ministers, have without question wonderfully enriched the English tongue.

Charles L. Dodgson, the inventor of the portmanteau word and of the thousand other bits of delicious nonsense that have made "Alice in Wonderland," "Through the Looking Glass," and "The Hunting of the Snark" immortal masterpieces, was born in a Lancashire parsonage in 1832, went to Rugby and was graduated with distinction in Oxford in 1854. Subsequently he became lecturer in mathematics at Christ Church and was ordained a deacon of the Establishment. Owing to an impediment he had in his speech, his extreme shyness, and, as it would seem, also because of his love for the theater, he never became a "priest." The first of his renowned books, "Alice in Wonderland," was practically composed during a boating expedition he made on July 4, 1862, with the three little daughters of Canon Liddell, the second oldest being "Alice." The Rev. Mr. Dodgson at first had no intention of publishing the story, but his friend George MacDonald persuaded him to show it to Macmillan, who accepted the book at once. John Tenniel, happily, was then persuaded to draw the pictures for it, and exactly three years after little Alice Liddell first heard the story she received a presentation copy of "Alice in Wonderland" from "Lewis Carroll," the pen name over which the Rev. Mr. Dodgson wrote his parodies and nursery classics. The book received a prompt and enthusiastic welcome. Edition after edition left the press, it was translated into half a dozen foreign languages, dramatized and made into an operetta. In 1871 "Through the Looking Glass" appeared, and five years later "The Hunting of the Snark" was published. The author's fame was now secure. Though Lewis Carroll before his death in 1898 had written for children a rather "improving" book called "Sylvie and Bruno" and some clever parodies, and the Rev. Charles L. Dodgson had composed a number of erudite treatises on mathematics, it is as the creator of Alice's wonder-world that his name will live.

Lewis Carroll's readers, young and old, will never agree, of course, as to which is the most amusing chapter, the cleverest verses or the most ridiculous character in his works. "A Mad Tea-Party" and "The Mock Turtle's Story" are perhaps the funniest chapters in "Wonderland." "Through the Looking Glass" has no chapter fully equal to them, though "It's My Own Invention" is ridiculous enough. Carroll's parodies of well-known poems have now become almost as familiar as the verses they imitate. Was it Southey or Carroll who first wrote "You are old, Father William"? The admirably sustained absurdity of "The Hunting of the Snark," particularly the cantos entitled "The Bellman's Speech" and "The Baker's Tale," with their smoothly flowing verses and clever rhymes, places the masterpiece in a class of its own, while the tragedy described in "The Walrus and the Carpenter" abounds in quotable lines. When charged with veiling a mystical allegory under his description of the bootless quest of the Snark, the author promptly denied that he ever had any such purpose. Some commentators, however, find in the epic an admirable morality on the emptiness and worthlessness of worldly success, while others find it a solemn allegory on the elusiveness of earthly fame. Carroll, after all, is by no means the first poet who "builded better than he knew." As to which is the most entertaining character of Lewis Carroll's creation grave doctors differ widely. Is the Cheshire Cat, with its exceedingly persistent grin, a more ingenious conception than the tearful Mock Turtle? Is the truculent Queen of Hearts, mainly occupied in ordering others to be beheaded, more amusing than the amiable White Queen, who keeps her credulity in perfect condition by believing "as many as six impossible things before breakfast"? Who shall say?

Lewis Carroll in writing the Alice books, though he probably little realized it at the time, not only created a new mythology for the nursery but founded a school of humor. Such sparkling wits as Sir W. S. Gilbert, Edward Lear, Oliver Herford, Carolyn Wells, etc., owe much of their inspiration, no doubt, to Lewis Carroll. His correct taste safeguarded him from the dangers of overdoing the ridiculous or the absurd, perils which too many of his imitators are not so successful in avoiding. He has been parodied and paraphrased a thousand times, words, characters and phrases from his books are now imbedded in our literature and in the language of everyday life, and though he wrote his books primarily for the little ones of the nursery, it is children of a larger growth who enjoy them most.

The Oxford Stamp and Other Essays. Articles from the Educational Creed of an American Oxonian. By FRANK AYDELOTTE. New York: The Oxford University Press.

The enthusiastic American (Rhodes) Oxonian, and the Professor of English are writ large upon these ten educational essays, here gathered into a modest two hundred pages from the Atlantic Monthly, the Nation, and the other magazines in which they first appeared. They have a certain timeliness and larger purpose than the mere exposition of educational ideas, in that they are from the pen of one very loyal to the purpose of the Rhodes Scholarship Foundation. The bulk of the volume deals with educational ideas, and that with a sincere enthusiasm, a nice moderation and a clear vision of the finer and more solid things. Without narrowness of outlook the author urges that we have to learn from Oxford the value to university experience of a larger leisure and a fuller collegiate social life impregnated with intellectual interests, quoting Cardinal Newman very effectively in his support; of athletics purged of the gladiatorial character, eliminating the spectator by making him a player, and finally of making the study of literature and composition not so much a study of its history or its forms, as of the contents, of the ideas, and insisting that the first aim in the study of an author, as in learning to become one, is to have a care of what is said, not so much how it is said.

To the American Catholic educator these ideas are familiar, not only as facts, but also, except for the fascinating but hardly practical use of a large leisure as an educational instrument, as things of daily practice. Again some of these ideas he would supplement and fix on more solid, ultimate grounds. One of the papers, "Robert Louis Stevenson's Darkening Counsel," is a thrust at those who on the authority of R. L. S. advocate the practice of imitation—"playing the sedulous ape," qua ape—for the acquisition of a style; it turns the tables on them. "The Religion of Punch"—the adoration "of the ability to achieve the end without the means"—has some good things on the taint of charlatanism in our American educational ideals.

The Mythology of All the Races. In Thirteen Volumes. LOUIS HERBERT GRAY, Ph.D., Consulting Editor. Vol. III. Celtic. By JOHN ARNOTT MACCULLACH, Hon. D.D. (St. Andrews). Slavic. By JAN MACHAL, Ph.D. Boston: Marshall Jones Company. $6.00.

The work and labor required to write the volumes which make up what may be called an "Encyclopedia of Mythology" are truly monumental. For the student of comparative ethnology and for all those interested in the history of the development of human opinion and thought, the work will have a wonderful fascination. Nothing can be more interesting to us than to learn what were the ideas of the various races as to the origin of the world, man's relation to the universe around him and to the God or deities from which he imagined he had sprung. It is a difficult field of study and investigation. It craves wary walking, for everywhere there are stumbling blocks in the way. As a rule the authors have successfully avoided them. They have not tried to read their own views into the myths they are studying, but treat them objectively and on the whole without bias. This undoubtedly greatly enhances the value of the work. The present volume keeps to the high standard of scholarship reached in the preceding treatises, which have already been noticed in AMERICA. Owing perhaps to the nature of the matter treated, the mythology of the Celtic races and that of the Slavic and Baltic groups, the present volume may have a still wider appeal than the former tomes in which the mythologies of the East were so admirably studied.

Professor Machal gives a most interesting account of Slavic myths. The chapters on the "Household Gods" and on the "Navky," or souls of the children that have died unbaptized, and on the "Rusalky," or water-nymphs, will be read with especial pleasure, not only because of their intrinsic merit, but because of the light they throw on the mysticism and melancholy of the Slav nature.

Professor Macculloch, already known by his former work, "The Religion of the Ancient Celts," gives an exhaustive review of Celtic mythology. He sums it up in these words: "Romance and love, war and slaughter, noble deeds as well as foul, wordy boastfulness, but also delightful poetic utterance; glamor and sordid reality, beauty, if also sordid conditions of life, are found side by side in these stories of ancient Ireland and Wales." The myths, he adds, seldom exist as the pagan Celts knew them. They have been altered in many ways, for they have been remolded by romance, pseudo-history and Christianity. He recognizes that we owe a debt of gratitude to the Christian scribes and poets of early medieval Ireland and Wales, who wrote down or re-edited these mythic tales of the pagan period. Any one who reads them will come to the conclusion that the "editors" enriched the world with a series of battle pictures and romantic episodes second to none in all the poetic record of the race.

The Vandal of Europe: An Exposé of the Inner Workings of Germany's Policy of World Domination, and Its Brutalizing Consequences. By WILLIAM MÜHLON, Former Director in Krupps. Translated with an Introduction by WILLIAM MCPHERSON. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.50.

This is a prominent German's indictment of his own country's pitiless military autocracy. The book is cast in the form of diary written from the first days of August until early in November, 1914, and contains opinions of the Prussian system of waging war, which, if known at Berlin, would probably have sent Herr Mühlon to prison. "Our whole conduct toward Belgium," he frankly owns, for instance, "was so brutal, so tricky, so against all political committals and obligations, so poorly prepared for by diplomatic means, that Belgium could not possibly assent without becoming contemptible for all time." The author piously, but very hastily discerns in the death of Pope Pius X "a symbol of the collapse in this war of his church, its teachings and its morals." Herr Mühlon is on surer ground when he tells us why the German common soldier "becomes frightful," for he lacks "any higher capacity of discrimination" and "recognizes no such thing as individual conscience." His pages about the way that the Germans themselves were often the "franc-tireurs" that brought so many horrors on poor Belgium are also very enlightening. The sound conclusion which the author reaches is: "If we want to restore to mankind its most essential basis—which is mutual confidence—we must, above all things, combat the idea that there may be a different morality for different individuals or for different human institutions."

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

The Catholic Mind for September 22 contains valuable matter for our teachers and educators. In explaining "Why Men Sin," Father Hull tells in clear, non-technical language how nature and grace cooperate in the formation of character. He well observes that:

> A good deal of our religious and moral training in schools is in the hands of Brothers, nuns or lay-teachers who have not done theology. Hence the question arises whether the principles bearing on this subject are always sufficiently familiar to our teachers; whether certain failures to build up character in our pupils, and the numerous collapses which take place after leaving school, are not due to this deficiency.

In another paper Father Hull answers satisfactorily the question so often put nowadays: "Is Catholicism of Pagan Origin?" He proves conclusively that "Whatever the Church has assimilated of pagan usage was something quite natural and proper in itself; adopted because it was human, not because it was pagan." In the third article of the number R. H. Smith, S. M., briefly shows what "Our Country's Debt to the Catholic Schools" is. Father Reville continues his list of books on apologetics and controversy.

Mr. Robert Cortes Holliday of the publishing house of George H. Doran has been made the literary executor of the late Sergeant Kilmer, whose widow writes:

> I know from his references to the subject to me that it was the desire and understanding of my husband, Joyce Kilmer, that in the event of his death Robert Cortes Holliday, whom he regarded as his oldest and closest friend, should act as his literary executor. This is also my wish.

Mr. Holliday announces that he has in preparation a biographical memoir of his friend, and requests that anybody who has letters from Sergeant Kilmer be kind enough to send them, or typed copies of them, to Mr. Holliday's address, 68 Seaman Avenue, New York City. All such communications will be returned, if desired, as soon as practicable.

To give American readers an idea of the atmosphere in the countries under the shadow of the battle-clouds Winston Churchill has published "A Traveler in War-Time" (Macmillan, $1.25), his experiences in England and France. The book contains good descriptions of what a traveler would encounter in going up and down the land that has been close to war for four long years. Not less interesting is the author's account of the persons he met during his trip. He is unhappy, however, in his allusion to the revival of religion in France, which Churchill calls a note "of mystic exaltation to be succeeded by a period of realism." Everything is to be attributed to science, and if we are able to face facts "as many anointed chaplains in Europe are doing" we will realize that God is on the side of intelligence, and we will begin to "embrace the religion of self-reliance." The writer's descriptive power is beyond question, probably at its best in his impressions of London during an air-raid. The book closes with an essay on "The American Contribution and the Democratic Idea." In this essay the author makes a plea for a new and distinctly American system of education.—— "Germany Her Own Judge" (Houghton, Mifflin), translated from the German of H. J. Suter-Lerch, though written primarily as a reply to German propaganda in Switzerland, is a valuable addition to our war-literature. Though the author's education and earlier sympathies were German, his present convictions, that this is neither a defensive nor a preventive war on Germany's part, are expressed in no dubious form. The chief value of the book arises from the fact that the author bases all his proofs on German official acts and documents.

In Mr. Theodore Maynard's latest book, "Folly and Other Poems" (Erskine, MacDonald, London, 5 shillings), is this Chestertonian "Ballade of a Ferocious Catholic," which all American Papists of a militant type will doubtless read with high glee:

There is a term to every loud dispute,
  A final reckoning, I'm glad to say:
Some people end discussion with their boot;
  Others, the pigs, will simply walk away.
  But I, within a world of rank decay,
Can face its treasons with a flaming hope,
  Undaunted by faith's foemen in array—
I drain a mighty tankard to the Pope!

They do not ponder on the Absolute,
  But wander in a fog of words astray,
They have no rigid creed one can confute,
  No hearty dogmas riotous and gay,
  But feebly mutter through thin lips and grey
Things foully fashioned out of sin and soap;—
  But I, until my body rest in clay,
I drain a mighty tankard to the Pope!

I've often thought that I would like to shoot
  The Modernists on some convenient day;
Pull out eugenists by their noxious root:
  The welfare-worker chattering like a jay
  I'd publicly and pitilessly slay
With blunderbuss or guillotine or rope,
  Burn at the stake, or boil in oil, or flay—
I drain a mighty tankard to the Pope!

L'ENVOI

Prince, proud Prince Lucifer, your evil sway
  Is over many who in darkness grope:
But as for me, I go another way—
I drain a mighty tankard to the Pope!

EDUCATION

The New Code and Education

THE illustrious author of "The Purple Cow," has anathematized all and sundry who invoke the tattered phrase "a far cry." Nevertheless because, geographically speaking, it seems to fit the case, I venture to remark that from the Bishop of Rome on the Vatican Hill beyond the Tiber to young Johnny O'Connor on Vinegar Hill beyond the tracks, is indeed a far cry. Yet on second and subsequent thought, it would appear that the distance between Johnny and the Pope is not so great, and the abbreviator of the distance is the new code of canon law. For in this corpus juris the Holy Father, following the constant tradition of the Church, has expressed his ardent desire and his command, that Johnny's guardians send him to a Catholic school.

Why Catholic Schools?

THAT the normal place for the Catholic child is the Catholic school, is a proposition not open to debate. As a rule, it is questioned only by fathers and mothers whose motives are not above suspicion, parents in whom the faith, exposed to all manner of worldliness, has grown weak. It is indeed a sad thing, especially in these democratic days, that young Harold Hannecy, whose grandfather's pay-roll name was Hennessy in the days when he swung a pick on Fourteenth Street, should be forced into a class-room with young Mickey O'Toole, son of the noble Hannecy's chauffeur. However, even for the child of a man whose soul is so mean that it seems scarcely worth saving, the Church is genuinely solicitous. She is anxious to undertake the task of impressing upon Hannecy, fils, the fact that he has an immortal soul, whose eternal destiny is determined in this world. She also desires to bring home to this young sprig of alleged aristocracy, the truth that all service ranks the same with God, and that a man's worth is measured by his own, not by his grandfather's, achievements. The Church knows, what his fond parents do not seem to know, that this youngster has a soul, and that, if caught young enough, he may be transformed into a useful citizen of this world, and a future dweller in the lasting Kingdom of God.

First Principles

SOME thirty years ago, the Reverend Thomas J. Jenkins wrote an excellent little book, "The Judges of Faith." In the preface, Father Jenkins remarked that the argument he had shaped in favor of a Catholic education for Catholic children, was supported by a respectable showing of authority. First of all, it was backed by the conciliar and private rulings of no less than 380 Church dignitaries. Next, Father Jenkins was able to quote from twenty-one plenary and provincial councils and six diocesan synods; from the utterances of two Roman Pontiffs and two Sacred Congregations; from the decisions of seven Cardinals, thirty-three foreign Archbishops and Bishops, and eighty members of the American hierarchy. The general tenor of these testimonies was that the only fit place for a Catholic child was the Catholic school, that the Catholic child placed in a non-Catholic or anti-Catholic establishment was in grave danger, that the parent was bound by the strictest of obligations, arising from the natural, the Divine, and the ecclesiastical law, to provide for the spiritual welfare of the child, and that parents who deliberately neglected this grave obligation, could not be admitted to the Sacraments.

These documents belong to the period 1836-1886, and it is, of course, obvious that the list of testimonies has greatly increased since that time. It is quite probable that there is not a single member of the American hierarchy who has not addressed frequent pastorals to his flock on the necessity of securing to every Catholic child his right to a Catholic education.

The new code of canon law, therefore, simply restates in compact legal form, the constant tradition of the Church in the matter of the education of the child. The fundamental proposition is thus presented in canon 1113:

> Parents are bound by a most serious obligation to procure as far as possible the religious, moral, physical and civil education of their children, and to provide also for their temporal welfare.

To every Catholic, the proposition is so clear as to admit of no dispute. The obligation is "most serious," it embraces a complete scheme of education, and it binds first of all, the parent. There is a tendency today, and in many localities more than a tendency, to regard the proper training of the child as a prerogative of the State, rather than a primal parental duty. But to educate the child is a responsibility as well as a right, and both right and responsibility belong to the parent first. No law may deprive him of the right, and no State can relieve him completely of the responsibility. In canon 1372 this Catholic position is once more affirmed:

> 1. All the Faithful are to be trained from childhood in such a manner that not only is nothing to be taught them which is opposed to the Catholic religion, but that religious and moral training hold the first place.
> 2. The right and most grave duty of giving children a Christian education belongs not only to the parents, according to canon 1113, but also to all who hold their place.

After reading these clear precepts, it is impossible to understand how anyone laying claim to the name of Catholic, can lightly send a Catholic child to a non-Catholic school.

Gravity of the Obligation

YET it is probably true that many fathers and mothers who would shrink with horror from an invitation to eat meat on Friday, have no scruple in flouting the stringent law of the Church on education. Surely, there may be reasons, in given instances, which to some extent will justify the placing of a Catholic child in a non-Catholic school, just as at times, specific circumstances allow one to eat meat on Friday, or to absent one's self from Mass on Sunday. But these reasons should be seriously considered by the parents, and submitted to the proper ecclesiastical authority for final decision. This is not a counsel of perfection, but an obligation imposed by positive law. Canon 1374 of the new code enacts that > Catholic children must not attend non-Catholic, neutral, "mixed," schools which are open to non-Catholics. It is for the Bishop of the diocese alone to determine, in conformity with the instructions of the Holy See, in what circumstances and with what safeguards against the danger of perversion the frequentation of such schools may be tolerated.

Of course, no power on earth, not even the Pope himself, can grant permission to attend a school so dangerous as to constitute a proximate occasion of ruin to the child's faith or morals. Nor is the "dangerous school" rare. Experience has shown that many a school, thoroughly respectable, in the cant sense of the phrase, has ruined first the faith, and then the morals, of the unfortunate Catholic child brought under its influence.

The English Declaration

IN August, 1905, the Bishops of the province of Westminster issued a formal declaration on the subject of education. This declaration which anticipated and sums up the spirit of the legislation now in force, was reaffirmed and reissued by the hierarchy of England and Wales, at their annual meeting in Low Week of the present year. The text follows:

> 1. We desire to call the earnest attention of all Catholics to the grave departure from Catholic teaching and tradition, and to the very serious dangers to Catholic faith and spirit, which are involved in the placing of Catholic children, of whatever class in life, in non-Catholic schools. Owing to the usually proximate nature of these dangers, it is, under ordinary circumstances a grievous sin on the part of parents to expose their children to such risks, and this has been expressely declared in the instruction of the Holy See, and of the Bishops of the province. There is, not infrequently, also a grave sin of scandal; for when Catholics, and especially those in a prominent position, make use of non-Catholics schools, they affect injuriously the whole Catholic position, leading many to follow their example, and making it increasingly difficult to provide, maintain, and improve our own schools and colleges. 2. We recognize, indeed, that in some rare cases, where no other means of entering a particular profession can be found, parents may be justified in exposing their sons and daughters to such risks, provided that they take all possible precautions to render them remote; but we declare that these exceptional cases in no way justify a like course of action where preparation for a career in life may be obtained without any similar necessity of attending non-Catholic places of education. The social advantages to be gained at certain schools, manifestly do not constitute such a necessity. 3. No individual priest or confessor is entitled to decide where necessity of this nature exists, but the matter is one to be referred to the Ordinary of the diocese for his counsel and judgment. 4. We again call upon the clergy and the laity alike to support by every means in their power our existing schools of all grades, and to make every effort to increase and improve them, and 5. We appeal to our flocks to adhere faithfully to those principles of loyalty to the Church and the Faith for which their forefathers made so many sacrifices, not only of worldly position and success, but even of life itself.

Certain passages in this wise document have been put in italics. They serve to show that England, like the United States, has its "weak-kneed" Catholics, who find in "social advantages" an excellent remuneration for the loss of faith.

An Analysis of Socialism

AN analysis of Socialism must be limited to an exposition of the popular conception of what it means. Socialism in reality is some undefined state of society which, it is prophesied, industrial evolution will bring into existence. Almost universal, among Socialists as well as anti-Socialists, is the belief that Karl Marx outlined a Socialistic scheme or an ethical economic program in "Capital." This is well illustrated by an editorial in the New York Evening Call for March 14, 1918, the principal Socialist organ in the United States. The all-knowing Dr. Crane, from his throne in the New York Globe, had casually observed:

> Supposing Karl Marx from his seat among the clouds, should get out a new volume on Socialism, would he not be likely to embarrass Mr. Trotsky and others who are now reshaping the universe according to the principles of "Das Kapital"?

On which the Call comments, in part:

> Now, if we were angry at the doctor, we should possibly say that he would be surprised to know that there isn't a word about Socialism in "Das Kapital"; that it is nothing more than "a critique of capitalist production"; that Marx sticks consistently to his subject, and never leaves it to develop "principles" for "reshaping the universe," or anything remotely connected with that subject.

Yet, in the popular notion, an analysis of Socialism is an analysis of the Socialist's bible, Marx's "Capital," and only in that fact is there justification for the title of this paper.

WHAT THE WORKER EARNS

BUT perhaps the "analysis" will resolve itself into a mere summary of Marx's explanation of the mode of capitalistic production, and may be termed simply an elucidation of Marx's teaching, which teaching is as little understood by those who vote the Socialistic ticket as by the opponents of Socialism.

The Church, as is made clear in an Encyclical of Pope Leo XIII., demands that the worker get all that he earns, in these words: "It is just and right that the results of labor should belong to him who has labored." Marx teaches, preposterous though it seems, that it is under capitalistic competition that the worker gets the full value of his labor. No doubt the publication of the first volume of "Capital" many years before the other two books of the work, is the chief cause for the misconception of Marx's analysis. In his first book he laid the foundation for the presentation of his subject. In it he did not treat the matter of competition among capitalists at all. And without competition among capitalists, who will deny that all the worker will get is enough to keep him fit for his most efficient effort? Marx does not say anything worse than that.

A summary of "Capital," complete, most consistent with the false deduction that the workers must be exploited by the capitalist, is presented by Edward Aveling, Fellow of University College, London, in his book, "The Students' Marx." He presents the following:

> Competition among the laborers enables the capitalist to beat down the price of labor, and the falling price of labor enables him to lengthen the working-time.
> Then follows competition among the capitalists. To undersell one another, they leave out from the price of the commodity the unpaid part of the labor-price, making a present of this to the buyer. Next, they leave out from the price of the commodity part of the abnormal surplus-value created by the extension of the working-day. Hence an abnormally low selling price of the commodity, which henceforward is the basis of a low wage for an excessive working-time.

But if competition among the capitalists forces them to leave out from the price of the commodity, all the unpaid part of the labor-price, sufficient competition must also force them to leave out from the price all the surplus-value created by the extension of the working-day. Also, the workers are the majority buyers; and when the unpaid part of the labor-price is made a present to them, and the abnormal surplus-value is left out from the price, they have not been mulcted to the extent that Socialist propagandists contend, nor as much as minimum-wage advocates would hold. In any event, if there is exploitation, it is clear that it is society that benefits and not the particular employer.

COMPETITION IN A LIMITED MARKET

IT seems, so idealistic is Marx's representation of the capitalist system, under competition, that the general understanding was, and still is, that he must be prophesying conditions in an Utopian state of society. John Spargo, the most pretentious writer among the Socialists of this country, summarizes it all in these words:

> Whatever the necessary basis for a Socialist system of remuneration may be, it is not the determination of the value of the individual labor product, and the payment of value for value. Marx's theory of value (as we have seen) is not the basis of an ethical system of distribution to be realized in an ideal society, but a general explanation of the workings of capitalist society.

Of course, it is only under competition in a limited market that full justice to the worker must be attained. For it is clear to anyone, that that which goes to foreign markets, under the euphonious title of "our favorable balance of trade," must represent that which the workers produced but which is not available to them; it merely extends the capitalists' ownership of the earth. It means that the exporter has his wealth and has shipped it, too.

If, then, the desideratum is that the worker receive the full product of his labor, the way is not in the direction of what is understood to be Socialism. Rather is it to be secured through competition in a limited market. This does not mean a constricted market, but a market reasonably great; not a varying market, this year supplying Africa and the next year shipping to Asia, wherever the greatest profit may be obtained, but a regular market.

A well-informed Socialist will not disagree with any of the foregoing, but he will say it is impossible to prevent the operation of home-produced capital in fields afar, and that competition among capitalists cannot persist, because it would end in the ruin of the weaker competitors. It is his belief in "economic determinism," a doctrine akin to fatalism, that gives him that feeling of enervation. But the worker should force the condition under which he gets all he is worth, and under which he can increase his worth; and he should have as little interest in the capitalist's difficulties as the capitalist altruistically displays in the prosperity of his employees.

Control of Economic Factors

THAT men may hope to control their economic life, instead of being doomed to be subject to it, is encouraged even by Spargo. He writes:

> Marx and Engels sometimes, in controversies with their critics, over-emphasize the influence of the economic factor in social evolution and made their statement of the theory too absolute. This Engels himself freely admitted toward the close of his life. Thus in 1890 he wrote to a student: "Marx and I are partly responsible for the fact that younger men have sometimes laid more stress on the economic side than it deserves. In meeting the attacks of our opponents it was necessary for us to emphasize the dominant principle denied by them; and we did not always have the time, place or opportunity to let the other factors which were concerned in the mutual action and reaction get their deserts." (The "Economic Interpretation of History," pp. 142-143.)

Spargo further says:

> It may also be admitted that, even in the statements of the theory by Engels toward the end of his life, the sense of proportion is not perfectly maintained, and that the sphere of influence ascribed to spiritual and idealogical factors is too limited.

Economic determinism, so qualified in progressive degrees, can be accepted without revulsion by Christians. It is not fatalism. It does not exclude "spiritual factors" dominant in life, but implies and postulates them.

NOTE AND COMMENT

A Forum for Citizenship

NEW YORK Catholic ladies have done an excellent work in establishing a forum where the women of the city can learn and discuss the views of prominent public men on the rights, duties and privileges of voters. Beginning September 28 and continuing for eight successive Saturday afternoons free lectures will be given in Cathedral College by men well versed in statecraft. Amongst the speakers will be the Hon. A. E. Smith, State Senator Wagner, Job Hedges, Dr. James J. Walsh, Dr. John A. Ryan and others equally capable. It is to be hoped that the response of the women will be hearty and persistent. Now that the ballot is in their hands it is their duty to use it well. This, however, presupposes an intimate knowledge of the problems that are vexing city, State and nation.

The I. W. W. of American Politics

THE systematic anti-Catholic campaign now carried on throughout the United States has met with scant approval in its latest outburst of bigotry at Baltimore. Both the Star and the American express their indignation at the campaign of hatred and abuse against Catholics carried on by the blatant Waldron, as State organizer of the Great Secret Order and the "Free Press Defense League." Under the heading "Disloyalists," the former paper writes:

> Any men, no matter what their religious or political beliefs, who will at such a crucial time in national life, when every move should be for unity and good feeling, join in such a disgraceful meeting as the anti-Catholic gathering held in this city last night, deserve to be abhorred and ignored by all right-thinking men. Statements made publicly that a venerable prelate is an "arch-fiend," and that "Catholics murdered Lincoln and McKinley and would murder Wilson, if they could," are so ridiculous as to place them in a class attributable only to men who are insane, and in ordinary times could well be merely laughed at as the vaporings of idiots. At such a world crisis as this, however, any men who attempt to sow the seeds of discord among the American people are disloyalists. Such men should be branded as would-be assassins of religious liberty and the world democracy for which the Allies stand. Every true American will know how to treat such a tribe.

The American parallels the connection existing between the Great Secret Order and the Republican party with the relation between the I. W. W. and the representative trade unions.

K. of C. Secretaries

THE Knights of Columbus War Service is steadily growing. A force of 100 secretaries has recently left New York for service in Italy. They are to be detailed for work among the American and Allied armies on the Italian front, with headquarters at Genoa. Attention has already been called to the new branch established in Switzerland whose duty will be not merely to aid and comfort the soldiers interned in that neutral country, but likewise to come to the assistance of civilians. In addition to these new undertakings, seventy-five secretaries, selected because of their special qualifications, have been assigned to transport service. They will brave the menace of the submarines and other dangers of the seas to entertain and serve our American soldiers while enroute for their ports of debarkation.

The Rosary in Battle

THE Stars and Stripes, in its issue for August 2, tells how "Scotty" fell, a private of Company H, known as the "Indians," because of their terrible warwhoop as they went dashing into battle. Scotty had accounted for thirty enemy soldiers before he himself fell, pierced through the head and heart. The article continues:

> But the men of Company H had another character. They were good Catholics, most of them. No one knows where they got the idea or who first suggested it, but had you been watching at dawn on the morning of the 18th, you would have found that when they went over the top, each one of the Indians wore something that is no part of issue regulations looped around the left shoulder strap of his blouse. It was a rosary.

There are no braver men than those who hold in their souls the certainty of another and a better world and whose lips have been taught to repeat with tender affection the Angel's message to Mary.

Another Masonic Hit and Another "Miss"

IN the May issue of the American Freemason there was an article entitled "Campaign for Pure Manhood," in which this passage occurred:

> In the Philippines the old Spanish law is still in force. Such institutions [bawdy-houses] are still licensed in Manila. and a tax, maybe a stamp, placed on the inmates. The money collected is paid to the Bishop, whose hospital cares for those "inmates."

After reading this outrageous passage the editor of America wrote a note of inquiry to a well informed friend who has lived in Manila for more than twenty years. The answer is as follows:

> (1) There is no such hospital whose money is paid to the Bishop. (2) There was one owned by the city. (3) At the request of the city authorities some Sisters of St. Paul were given charge of it with the intention of making it a House of the Good Shepherd. (4) As the Sisters of the Good Shepherd could not be got from anywhere, the whole thing was turned back to the city authorities.

Since the editor of the American Freemason is a persistent gentleman, it is safe to say that, some time before his death, he will have the consolation of hitting upon at least one true accusation against the Catholic Church or some of its ministers. Thus, from a Masonic viewpoint, his life will not have been entirely in vain.

Chronicle

The War.—On the western front, in the Balkans and in Asia, the week was marked by a series of Allied successes. On the western front, in Flanders, in the Lys salient south of Ypres, near Voormezeele, the Germans slowly withdrew under pressure from British troops aided by an American force. In the northern part of this sector, the British moved forward along the Ypres Commines Canal below Zillebeke Lake and improved their positions south and east of Ploegsteert. The Wytchaete-Messines Ridge is thus being enveloped on the north, east and south. On the southern tip of the salient the British advanced toward La Bassée and captured the important railroad junction of Auchy on the canal southwest of La Bassée.

Bulletin, Sept. 16, p.m.-Sept. 23, a.m.

On September 16, the offensive against St. Quentin was renewed. On that date the 4th British Army under General Rawlinson, and the 1st French under General Debeney moved directly forward against the defenses of the city. The objective was the St. Quentin Canal, which runs north to Cambrai where it links up with the Scheldt Canal. The Allied attack was made on a twenty-two mile line extending from north of Gouzeaucourt ten miles southwest of Cambrai to Castres, four miles southwest of St. Quentin. The Hindenburg line was pierced at two important points, at Villeret, southeast of Hargicourt, and then from Holnon to Pentru. On September 18, the enemy made a counter attack in force against Moeuvres which lies close to the Hindenburg line almost due west of Cambrai, and also tried to turn the Allies back at Havrincourt. For a while the Allied troops yielded Moeuvres, but on the following day they reoccupied part of its outer lines and completely reoccupied it two days later. On September 19 French troops under General Debeney, in a series of operations designed to envelop the city from the south, captured Essigny-le-Grand. An advance here eastwards of a little more than two miles would flank the canal front. On September 22 English troops east of Epehy and Australians near Hargicourt made new inroads into the outer defenses of the Hindenburg line northwest of St. Quentin.

The Somme salient is by these operations almost entirely wiped out. The portion still remaining to the enemy is the slice from La Fere north through Benay and Gauche to Bellinglise, nineteen miles long by two miles wide, and a five mile strip south of Lens. A part of the Wotan switch line extending from Drocourt to Biaches also remains in German hands. The Oise salient, too, was entirely reconquered, and the French made steady advances beyond St. Gobain Forest and along the streams which flow into the Ailette towards Laon, which is in range of their guns. American troops co-operated with the French north of the Vesle and gradually pushed the enemy westward toward the Canal de l'Aisne which connects the two rivers north of Reims. In the lately recaptured St. Mihiel salient the Americans were busy with continual but on the whole minor and preparatory operations. Several of the outer forts and defenses of Metz were under fire from their long-range guns.

On September 18 the Allied armies in Macedonia, mainly composed of Franco-Serb and Greco-British contingents, and under the supreme command of General Franchet d'Esperey, began a vigorous attack against the enemy's lines. These were held chiefly by 250,000 Bulgars, supported by several Austrian divisions and some German artillery. The first assault was made by the Franco-Serbs between the Vardar River and Lake Doiran on a ten-mile front, netting a gain of five miles. Immediately after, assisted by a Jugo-Slav division, they advanced on a twenty-mile front from Blatets west to the Cerna and gained Rasembey, fifteen miles up the river. In the first three days forty-five villages were reported taken by the Allied forces, and the Dopropolie plateau, with some of its peaks rising to a height of 5,000 feet, was stormed. British and Greeks advanced in the region east of the Vardar between Lake Doiran and Lake Tachino. By September 21 the Serbs east of Monastir were less than eight miles from the highway connecting Prilep with the Vardar River. The dispatches of September 23 reported the Serbs within four miles of the Uskub-Salonica railroad.

British and French forces in Palestine under command of General Allenby resumed their offensive on September 19. Attacking on a front of sixteen miles between Rafat and the sea, they advanced twelve miles along the Lydda-Damascus railway. This brought Allenby's forces to within ninety miles of Damascus, his immediate objective. Aleppo, the ultimate objective of the advance, is 288 miles away. Seven hundred miles across the desert to the east, in Mesopotamia, is General Marshall with an Anglo-Indian army. He was last reported sixty miles south of his objective, Mosul, on the Tigris. By September 22 the British had completely trapped the Turkish army between the Jordan and the Mediterranean. Allenby's forces, sweeping across the field of Armageddon, had by that time advanced sixty miles. They took 18,000 prisoners and 120 guns. Nazareth was captured and the gateway opened to Damascus and Aleppo. On the Caspian sea the Turks recaptured Baku.

The President's Answer to Austria

On September 17, Secretary of State Lansing gave out the United States reply to the Austrian peace proposal, in the form in which it was handed to the Swedish Minister, Mr. W. A. F. Ekengren, now in charge of Austro-Hungarian interests in this country. After recalling the suggestions made in the Austrian note, Mr. Lansing thus addressed the Swedish Minister, who, as intermediary, brought us the Austrian note:

> In reply I beg to say that the substance of your communication has been submitted to the President, who now directs me to inform you that the Government of the United States feels that there is only one reply which it can make to the suggestion of the Imperial Austro-Hungarian Government. It has repeatedly and with entire candor stated the terms upon which the United States would consider peace, and can and will entertain no proposal for a conference upon a matter concerning which it has made its position and purpose so plain.

The substance of the reply had already been given to the public by Mr. Lansing on September 16, in a statement authorized by the President. Almost coincident with this summary note was Belgium's rejection of Germany's offer for a separate peace. Speaking for his nation, Premier Cooreman characterized the Teutons' proposal as empty, fallacious, void of any promise of reparation, and without the least renunciation of political domination.

Russia and President Wilson

The reign of terror in Russia, of which news has leaked out in spite of the suppression of all newspapers except those controlled by the Bolsheviki, has received official confirmation in the President's appeal to the world for assistance for the unfortunate Russian people. This appeal, which was sent by Mr. Lansing in the form of a telegram to the representatives of the United States in the capitals of allied and neutral countries, is as follows:

> This Government is in receipt of information from reliable sources revealing that the peaceable Russian citizens of Moscow, Petrograd and other cities are suffering from an openly avowed campaign of mass terrorism and are subject to wholesale executions. Thousands of persons have been shot without even a form of trial; ill-administered prisons are filled beyond capacity, and every night scores of Russian citizens are recklessly put to death, and irresponsible bands are venting their brutal passions in the daily massacre of untold innocents. In view of the earnest desire of the people of the United States to befriend the Russian people and lend them all possible assistance in their struggle to reconstruct their nation upon principles of democracy and self-government, and acting, therefore, solely in the interest of the Russian people themselves, this Government feels that it cannot be silent or refrain from expressing its horror at this existing state of terrorism. Furthermore, it believes that in order successfully to check the further increase of the indiscriminate slaughter of Russian citizens all civilized nations should register their abhorrence of such barbarism. You will inquire, therefore, whether the Government to which you are accredited will be disposed to take some immediate action, which is entirely divorced from the atmosphere of belligerency and the conduct of war, to impress upon the perpetrators of these crimes the aversion with which civilization regards their present wanton acts.

This message is taken to be a reiteration of the President's determination to befriend the Russian people, as voiced in his speech of May 18, 1918, when he said: "So far as I am concerned, I intend to stand by Russia as well as France. The helpless and the friendless are the very ones that need friends and succor."

Canada.—The Canadian papers report the appointment by the Holy See of a bishop for the Canadian forces at home and overseas, in the person of the Right Rev. Bishop Emard of Valleyfield, Quebec.

An Army Bishop

There are 64 Canadian priests in the service: of these 50 are rated as English and 14 as French, though all speak both languages; 13 of these chaplains are members of Religious Orders and 46 are diocesan clergy. The 5 dioceses of the maritime provinces are represented by 14 priests, the 11 dioceses of Quebec by 1, the 10 dioceses of Ontario by 23 and the dioceses of the West by 6. Antigonish, London and Pembroke have each sent 5 chaplains. The Religious Orders are represented as follows: Oblates 8, Franciscans 3, Jesuits 3, Basilians 2, Dominicans 1, Benedictines 1. One chaplain was killed in action, 3 have been wounded, 1 has won the D. S. O., 6 the M. C., and 5 have been mentioned in dispatches.

France.—The women of France have given another proof of sterling Catholicism and stanch attachment to the Holy See. The following letter, which is dated July 29, but which only lately reached the United States, is a touching expression of faith and of devotion to the Holy Father. The translation is taken from the Irish Catholic of Dublin:

The Widows of France

> Most Holy Father: French war widows to the number of 200,000, humbly prostrate at the feet of your Holiness, beg you to accept the expression of their inviolable fidelity to the Roman See. As heads of families they take at your feet the sacred pledge to bring up their children in the love of the Church, and promise your Holiness to teach them the grave duties which this love and this attachment imply. They supplicate you, Holy Father, in exchange for this promise, to offer to God their broken lives and all their sorrows, in order that, accepting this offering, the Divine Majesty may be pleased to transform their tears into a torrent of benedictions which will fall back upon their children, and bring back to the feet of your Holiness a renewed France. Holy Father, those who suffer most for France and who hold her future in their hands are happy and proud to proclaim themselves aloud the most faithful daughters of your Holiness.

As an expression and reminder of this act of homage, which was undertaken under the patronage of Cardinal Luçon, Archbishop of Reims, and seventy-six French Archbishops and Bishops, those who were associated in it presented to the Holy Father a book made of parchment in which were written both the letter and the names of all those concerned. Together with the volume the ladies presented the Pope with vestments, altar linen and the sacred vessels needed for the Holy Sacrifice, in order that He might deign to use them at the Mass, which He promised to say for their intentions. On the base of the chalice were inscribed in diamonds the words: "From the widows of France to His Holiness, Benedict XV."

Ireland.—The Irish Catholic, under date of August 24, 1918, published this rather startling letter from the Primate of All Ireland:

Cardinal Logue and Palestine

To the Editor of the Irish Catholic:

I have received through the French Embassy in London a letter from the Vicar-General of the Catholic Greek Patriarch of Jerusalem. In the letter he states that large sums of money have been collected for sufferers from the tyranny of the Turks in Palestine. This money is employed in providing food and clothing for the poor sufferers, and workshops are opened for the employment of the women and girls. He complains that the Protestants are served first; next to them the Greek schismatics, and the Catholics are served last, or rather generally not at all, up to the time of his writing. He says he has consulted the Catholic parish priests of Jaffa and Ramleh, who affirm that women and girls are not accepted in the workshops unless they consent to join the Protestants in prayer, a condition for the relief of pressing needs to which we are well accustomed in Ireland.

He asks me to come to the relief of the Catholics by having Catholic members appointed to the committees and employed in the distribution of relief. This, of course, is out of my power. The only thing I can do is to direct public attention to the matter through the press.

There was general rejoicing when the Holy Places in Palestine had fallen into the hands of Christians. It would be lamentable if Catholics, in Palestine and Syria, should wish to be back under the rule of the Turks, which is not unlikely, should discrimination, such as is referred to, and efforts to rob them of their faith, be persisted in. I am, dear sir,

Yours faithfully,

Armagh, August 19, 1918. ✠MICHAEL CARDINAL LOGUE.

The discrimination under stricture contrasts so strangely with promises made by the Americans interested in this particular charity that the grievance will no doubt be quickly remedied.

The Irish papers, especially the capable Leader, are making much these days of a new book, the "Complete Grammar of Anarchy," a compilation which contains extracts from the speeches of the clumsy politicians who hold Ireland's fate in their hands. Some idea of the temper of these men can be gained from these extracts. On October 5, 1912, Mr. Asquith, speaking at Ladybank said: "The reckless rodomontade at Blenheim in the early summer, as developed and amplified in this Ulster campaign, furnishes for the future a complete Grammar of Anarchy."

Enshrined Anarchy

To this Carson replied:

The Attorney General says that my doctrines and the course I am taking lead to anarchy. Does he not think I know that? Does he think that after coming to my time of life, and passing through the various offices and responsibilities I have accepted, I did this like a baby, without knowing the consequences?

And Mr. Asquith, speaking in the English Parliament, July 31st, 1913, declared:

What answer are you going to make to the vast majority of the Irish people when they resist the considered determination of Parliament and appeal to the language of the Right Hon. Gentleman to justify their action?

Later, on March 13, 1914, the present Lord Chancellor, in a speech delivered at Swansea, felt that civil war was the path of danger, but it was also the path of duty; and he was convinced that no other alternative was left to the loyalist of Ulster.

On December 5, 1915, Pretyman Newman gave expression to the following thoughts, at Potter's Row:

If Mr. Asquith did employ the British army, he would break the back of the army, and if by any chance he should bring bloodshed in Ulster by means of imperial troops, then, to his mind [Mr. Newman's] any man would be justified in shooting Mr. Asquith in the streets of London.

One of the Irish journals points out that all this makes interesting reading, especially in view of the fact that Ulster, Belfast excluded, is Nationalist.

Italy.—In the July 8, 1918, issue of the Gazzetta Ufficiale there appeared the text of the recent decree which provides for the establishment of the Central Commission, which is to study conditions that will prevail during the period when the nation is passing from the state of war to the state of peace. The Commission is divided into two sub-commissions, the first dealing with juridical, administrative and local questions, and the second with economic questions. The Central Commission is under the presidency of S. Orlando, and the sub-commissions under Senator Scialoia and S. Pantano, respectively.

Commission on After-War Problems

The sub-commissions are divided into twenty-seven sections, as follows: (1) juridical international questions, (2) revision of war legislation, (3) regulation of administrative functions and taxes in the provinces and communes, (4) State administration, (5) reconstruction of invaded provinces, (6) financial provisions, (7) colonial questions, (8) private rights, (9) rights arising from obligations taken on themselves by the members of the Entente, (10) social legislation, (11) problems concerning worship, (12) military justice, (13) agricultural production, (14) industrial production, (15) hydraulic and electrical forces, (16) co-operation and labor, (17) credit, (18) commerce, (19) mercantile marine and naval works, (20) communication and transportation, (21) public works, (22) emigration, (23) professional and art studies, (24) social hygiene, (25) civil assistance, (26) demobilization, (27) provincie irredente. The Commission is made up of about 600 members, among whom are eighty-eight senators and 135 deputies, many functionaries of the State, representatives of industrial pursuits and the liberal professions, and a number of women. An attempt has been made to satisfy all parties, but the Socialists have been shown an evident partiality.

Mexico.—Dissatisfaction and consequent turbulence are still common in Mexico. Sometimes the prevalent discontent manifests itself in unexpected ways, as is apparent from these abstracts from a manifesto recently circulated in Pueblo:

National Unrest

The Government is for the most part composed of elements that are neither honorable nor efficient. It is altogether unpopular, its mandates are ill-considered, and very often opposed to the law. Señor Venustiano Carranza, head of the Government, is lacking in practical wisdom, whatever his pretensions. He has no strength of character and mistakes obstinacy for that quality. He permits, tolerates, and even suggests misdeeds of every kind in order to keep his hold on the men who support him in his post. No reliance can be placed on his promises, as is proved by the way he deceived the public first by the Vera Cruz affair . . . and again by the "Plan of Guadalupe," and by the fake elections. He acted in the same way towards companies and private individuals. The public in general, and the middle classes in particular are in great misery: some few there are who are growing rich under the shadow of the Government, by tolerating immorality and by other illicit means. Work is scarce, because property, industry, and native and foreign capital have been systematically destroyed, and because there is no security. Civilians, and still more the military, commit assaults of all kinds with impunity, because the central Government is not only weak but also immoral.

Amongst the troops themselves there is much discontent and many chiefs are awaiting an opportunity to abandon the Government, which has few munitions of war and little money. The great majority of the people do not pay their taxes because they are illegal and ruinous. Public opinion is entirely adverse to the Government, expresses a profound hatred for it, collectively, and individually for the elements which compose it. The moment is approaching when this hatred will break out in a violent and overwhelming form, destroying native and foreign lives and interests.

The revolt against the Government has mustered approximately 300,000 men, for the most part badly armed, with few guns or ammunition, and little money; otherwise they would already have overthrown this régime. The principal chiefs are united under the flag of the Constitution of 1857, determined not to lay down their arms until the evil which afflicts the country has been done away with. These chiefs, in arms against the Government, are in agreement with a respectable group of competent men, beloved and appreciated in all classes of society, working together in perfect harmony, without distinction of politics or religious beliefs, fully determined to lead the country along the path of order and true progress, giving protection to all interests created under the true, legitimate laws of the country. For while it may be true that these laws require some reforms, these must be carried out with wisdom and justice by the employment of the legal methods already established, and on a basis of the fullest respect for acquired rights.

The humanitarian, honorable, and sensible course to take for the benefit of natives and foreigners alike is to support and aid these chiefs to succeed in overthrowing the usurping and anti-Constitutional Government of Señor Venustiano Carranza and his followers, so that a representative Government may be promptly established, one whose acts will be moral, conscientious, above all things just.

The peaceful inhabitants of all the towns are ready to support such a Government, not only with money but also with arms. The whole country is tired of civil war, and desires to put a stop to the anarchy and the immorality which are consuming the nation.

A letter from AMERICA's correspondent in Mexico bears out most of the above contention. It reads in part as follows:

The unfortunate Government is morally and materially ruined: many of the officials are so corrupt that they can be bought for small sums of money. The country is dissatisfied and restless: twenty-four States are nursing grievances. Even the Germans, whose Government is in sympathy with ours, despise this régime, although they would like to provoke a conflict between Mexico and the United States, in order to distract your attention from the European war. Mexico hates the new and intolerable Constitution, and is anxious for a general amnesty, religious liberty and cooperation with the Allies.

Poland.—The appointment of Mgr. Ratti, Apostolic Delegate to Poland, has aroused a great deal of enthusiasm among the Polish people. Both clergy and people vie with each other in manifesting to the Holy See, in the person of its official representative, every mark of respect, and his visitation of the dioceses has been marked by the most filial and devoted expressions of attachment to the Holy Father. One of the most important of the results of his mission has been the decision, taken by the Polish episcopate, to found a Catholic university at Warsaw on the plan of the Catholic universities at Louvain, Paris and Washington. Already the general outlines of the scheme have been formulated by Mgr. de Ropp, Archbishop of Vilna and formerly member of the Duma. These tentative plans will be submitted for approval at an early date to the Bishops of Poland and later to the Pope.

Catholic University of Warsaw

Hitherto the only institute of higher education for the Polish ecclesiastics has been the Academy of Petrograd, which, owing to the distance from Poland and the rigid supervision of the imperial bureaucracy, did not and could not attract many of the Polish priests, failing, as it did, to correspond to the needs of clergy or the wishes of the Holy See. The project of the new university which is to be situated at Warsaw, has received a warm welcome from both clergy and laity, and already between four and five million dollars have been subscribed for the foundation. The Academy of Petrograd will continue to exist, but it will be used to meet the needs of the Catholics of Russia. In order to give an added impulse to the religious movement in Poland the Holy Father has appointed six new titular bishops.

John Cardinal Farley

JOHN C. REVILLE, S.J.

ON the afternoon of Wednesday, November 29, 1911, His Holiness Pope Pius X imposed the cardinalitial berretta on their Eminences Cardinals Falconio, di Belmonte, Farley, Bourne, Amette, O'Connell, Dubillard, de Cabrières, Bisleti, Lugari, Pompili, Billot, and van Rossum. In answer to the address in which Cardinal Falconio, the dean of the newly created Princes of the Church, thanked the Holy Father for the honor conferred on them, the Pope referred to the enthusiasm with which the appointment of the American Cardinals had been greeted by the people of the United States, and the popular demonstrations which had accompanied their departure for Rome. He thus expressed his happiness and his hope, when turning to the newly appointed American Cardinals, he said:

> The enthusiasm with which the news of your elevation to the Sacred College was received, the demonstrations which were made for you by all classes of citizens, the acclamations, accompanied with blessings, wishes and affectionate greetings on your departure from New York and Boston, and finally your triumphant voyage across the ocean protected by the Papal flag, afford me not only hope, but certainty that the Lord on your return will multiply the fruits of your Apostolate, and that over the hospitable land which receives all peoples of the world, and with well-ordered liberty provides for the universal well-being, the Lord will reign and His glory will shine therein.

On the heart of one of the hearers, the good shepherd whose loss the archdiocese of New York now mourns, these words made a deep impression. He quoted them among the very first sentences which he spoke in St. Patrick's Cathedral on his return from the Eternal City. The priestly heart of John Farley could not but be responsive to the unsolicited manifestations of joy of his own flock and of those outside the fold over the great honor conferred upon him when he was appointed to the College of Cardinals. But his soul was above any thought of worldly honor or prestige which such a position might give. A supreme honor had been conferred upon him; that would only enlarge his influence and opportunities and add a brighter flame to his pastoral zeal. Like Pius X, he had but one hope, that on the return to the land so beautifully described by the Holy Father as the land of a generous hospitality, the land of well-ordered liberty, he might more fully, more chivalrously, even than before, were that possible, carry out the ideals for which from his boyhood days he had ever striven.

In the lives of those men who work especially for God there is a wonderful unity. That unity we find in the life of John Cardinal Farley. It was not without a special meaning that the Papal flag floated at the masthead of the ship that bore him across the seas to receive from the hands of Pius X the insignia of his office. It was a long time since that flag had been seen on the highways of the ocean. It was a splendid augury that on one of the rare occasions when it floated there in the last half-century it should be unfurled over an American Cardinal whose whole life as priest, bishop and Prince of the Church was one continued act of loyalty to the Chair of Peter, whose one dream from childhood to the last hours of his pastoral duties in the greatest diocese in the western world, was to extend the kingdom of God and the love of the Church of Rome and of Christ in the hearts of men.

John Farley was essentially a priestly soul. It is as a priest that he will especially be remembered. He had great gifts. Breadth of view, a thorough understanding of the problems of the day, administrative qualities of the highest order—these he had, and used for the noblest ends. With a thorough grasp of the intellectual problems of the hour, he looked at them steadily and calmly. But he refused to depart from the solutions which his Faith, his training, his clear mind, his varied experience of men and things had taught him were absolutely correct and sound. In abstract reasoning, in purely metaphysical questions, in theories as such, he had little interest. Yet he was keenly logical, and an accomplished scholar. But his one passion in life was to deal with the hearts, the souls, the lives of men. He was practical in all things. He socialized his gifts of mind and heart, his innate love of virtue and truth, his sincere and tender piety. Ornaments of his own life, they were the source and the explanation of his influence and his power.

The dead Cardinal spoke the truth when he told his people that his life among them for fifty years as student and priest was an open book. The record he wrought and wrote with his hands and his life, was one of labor, prayer, humility, unselfishness and unceasing fidelity to duty. He could truthfully say that the holy priesthood was the only honor which he had ever ambitioned. Honors came quickly to him. They pursued this gentle cleric and priest from the days when he was a student in St. Maccartan's College in his beloved Ireland, and later at St. John's, Fordham, to the hour when after years as priest and pastor he was made auxiliary Bishop of New York, then Archbishop and finally Cardinal.

When these high honors came to him they found the shepherd in the midst of his labors. It was thus that the Pope's ambassadors had found St. Bonaventure in the humblest duties of the monastery when they carried to him a cardinal's hat. The whole priestly life of the late Cardinal was passed within the limits of the archdiocese of New York. With the City of New York, its life, its activities, its marvelous growth, its problems, some of them more puzzling than the questions that face many a populous republic and kingdom, he was intimately acquainted. He loved its people, many-tribed and many-tongued. For the energy, the manhood, the push, the epically audacious economic and business enterprise of her citizens, he had the greatest admiration. To America and the American constitution, to America's aims and purpose in the war, he was unflinchingly loyal. The governors of the State, the mayors of the city, its professional, business and literary men time and again expressed their admiration for him in heartfelt and sincere words, praises which filled his heart with gratitude. In the course of his long and useful life in the great city, New York learned to reverence and love this unworldly priest, who had but one desire, to rule his flock as a true and holy bishop, and to let those outside of his fold know that if they did not consider him their spiritual father, he looked upon them all as his friends.

John Farley was essentially a man of the sanctuary. He was absolutely unworldly. As a young priest, when assistant at New Brighton, Staten Island, he gave evidence of the strong and tender piety, the mental and spiritual equilibrium, the zeal which ever marked him. For twelve years as secretary to Cardinal McCloskey he was unconsciously preparing himself for the duties which one day were to be his in the position then occupied by the first American Cardinal whom he so loyally served. For eighteen years he was pastor of St. Gabriel's, in the very heart of the city he loved, daily in contact with the warm heart's blood of the people, keenly alive to their spiritual, social, educational wants, providing for their children and their poor, always giving the example of an untiring, successful and zealous shepherd of the flock of Christ. In 1891 he was appointed Vicar-General of the archdiocese. Immediately the force of his zeal, his unusual administrative capacity, his practical insight into the complex workings of the vast organization under his control, showed the true worth of the man. Made Auxiliary Bishop in 1895, he found a still larger field for his energies, his talents and his powers. On the occasion of Archbishop Corrigan's episcopal silver jubilee he raised $300,000 to clear from debt the diocesan seminary at Dunwoodie. In 1902 he was appointed Archbishop of New York, in 1911 he was created a Cardinal of the Holy Roman Church.

When Leo XIII, who knew men and looked quite through their deeds, appointed Bishop Farley to the archdiocese of New York, he knew the pastor and the flock. He realized that the man of his choice was to rule one of the greatest and one of the most thoroughly Catholic sees in the world. Within its limits almost all the tongues of man are spoken. Problems that would tax the brains of the greatest educational, financial, social, clerical and administrative experts must be faced almost daily in the chancellery of its first pastor. The Pope was convinced that John Farley would solve them. He was convinced that when difficulties would arise he would not betray his duties or be false to his trust. If the newly appointed Archbishop trembled at the thought that he would have to wear the mantle of Archbishop Hughes, "the hero" and the champion of the rights and liberties of the Church; of Cardinal McCloskey, "the sage," and of Archbishop Corrigan, "the saint," the keen-sighted Leo was absolutely confident that the newly appointed prelate could successfully tread in the path of such illustrious predecessors. To use the words of one of his priests addressed to the Cardinal after his return from the Eternal City: "To have held this portion of the garden of the Lord at the point of fertility and productiveness to which they had brought it, would in itself have been a great achievement." Cardinal Farley did more. Not only did he suffer "no flower or fruit or tree or shrub to wither and decay," but he "added to their beauty, their number and their variety."

The splendid administrative abilities of the Cardinal Archbishop of New York were mustered into the service of the noblest of causes. He had grown up with the archdiocese. He realized its needs. As a country and city pastor he had seen the needs of the clergy. He loved his priests. They repaid his love with theirs and added to it their unfailing loyalty. For the younger members of the clergy he had a special affection. Cathedral College, Dunwoodie Seminary, where the future priests of the archdiocese undergo their training for their life's work, were especially dear to him. He insisted that the American priest should ever be the man of culture and refinement, fully equipped for the manifold duties of his office. He still more emphasized the fact that he should ever be a man of prayer, a man of heroic self-denial, spotless in life and conduct. If he prayed for the greater spiritualization and sanctification of his devoted priests, he gave them above everything else the inspiring example of his own lofty ideals and childlike piety and faith.

Cardinal Farley was little given to the arts of self-advertising. He was modest and self-effacing. Yet he was a man of keen mental vision and eminently practical. He grasped a situation, saw a problem to be worked out, and calmly set about realizing his ideals or his dream. There were gaps and shortcomings in our Catholic educational system. He endeavored to stop them and to improve our methods. He gave his intelligent and loyal support to the Catholic University at Washington. He improved the parochial school system. An alumnus of St. John's, Fordham, he remained one of her most loyal sons and an advocate of the sterling education which his Alma Mater and her sister colleges uphold. As a young priest, as a pastor in St. Gabriel's, he had suffered with the poor. Out of his own scanty resources he had often relieved their wants. His gentle and sympathetic nature, his warm Celtic heart, throbbed in unison with their sorrows. He was ever their friend. The St. Vincent de Paul Society and its American Ozanam, the lamented Thomas Mulry, found in him not only an adviser but a champion. The spiritual director for many years of that society, he infused into that body an enthusiasm and a zeal, and gave evidence of an intelligent and practical insight into the needs of the poor which might well make the study of the best social workers. When the "Catholic Encyclopedia" was planned he gave it his whole-hearted approval. It was launched under his patronage, and he never wavered for a moment through many a crisis in his confidence in its final triumph.

Head of a great diocese, he worked for its financial, religious, educational welfare. Thanks to him, St. Patrick's Cathedral was freed from debt. Successful in relieving the dioçesan seminary at Dunwoodie from a heavy financial burden, he was still more so when he collected almost a million for the noblest sacred edifice in the United States and saw it solemnly consecrated to God. He was undoubtedly a great administrator. He was more. He was in all things a priest and a shepherd. He was all-embracing in his sympathy for his flock. For the blind, the deaf, the dumb, the children whose schools he multiplied nearly fifty per cent, for the homeless orphan, he had a special care. His heart was open to every appeal, his hands were ready for any task. In John Farley, priest, Bishop and Cardinal, political corruption, socialism, the gilded immoralities of the stage, found a fearless opponent; the sanctities of the hearth and home, a white-robed and dauntless champion.

"A priest above all things"—such is the tribute which John Farley in his "Life of John Cardinal McCloskey" pays to his illustrious predecessor in the see of New York. Cardinal Farley was pre-eminently that. Wearing the white flower of a blameless life, while mingling with the world he kept his priestly robes unstained by any taint of worldliness. Differing in many respects from his three immediate predecessors, he was worthy to be counted on the roll of the great bishops who in the greatest city of the western world have done so much for the welfare of their fellow citizens and for the spread of the kingdom of God. The splendid example of his blameless and holy life will not be lost on the mighty city which the dead Cardinal loved. In the midst of hurrying throngs, amidst the hum of the traffic and the sound of passing feet he sleeps under the arches of his noble cathedral. It is a fit resting place for the good Cardinal of New York.

Publicity for the People

RICHARD A. MUTTKOWSKI, Ph.D.

PUBLICITY ordinarily covers two types of dissemination of knowledge. There is the transient phase called news and the more permanent or staple phase called literature. The first concerns itself with the current events of the world, the other is concerned with what we might call the past, with past achievements and experiences and the conclusions to be drawn therefrom.

Mr. Williams, in several important articles in recent numbers of AMERICA, has outlined a splendid Catholic news program, devolving upon a central news bureau and various types of releases in the way of Catholic news items. Into this same plan the leaflet service of AMERICA, the Truth Society, and others may be easily fitted, for these are concerned with topics of immediate interest.

There follows the field of literature, concerned with more permanent knowledge, such as philosophy, religion, economics, sociology, and history, published in books and higher class magazines.

Before I proceed, let me state that the shelves of libraries are filled with hundreds of volumes on Catholic topics, but that these books are rarely read. There must be a reason for this. I have in mind, especially books of a popular and polemical nature. As for the others, the splendid works on philosophy, sociology, education, religion, and sacred topics, these are not for popular consumption, and not intended for that purpose. As a result, the vast mass of this literature is utterly unknown to the average Catholic, not that Catholics are not willing to read, but because the books are too technical for the man of average education. The conclusion may be drawn that if Catholics do not read these books the non-Catholics surely will not do so.

Now the everyday man is intensely interested in all topics of life. He desires especially to know "the whence and the whither" around which religion centers. Each man wishes to have these mysteries solved. Philosophers have tried to solve them since the beginning of man, and to this day even the meanest of men has his thoughtful moments when he ponders these questions. He desires certainty and wishes to obtain it in a manner both comprehensible and comprehensive. To adduce an instance: take the argument on evolution. In this case the truth of my statement that the public desires enlightenment, is attested by the popularity of books like London's "Before Adam," the ridiculous Tarzan series by Burroughs, the books of Wells and many others. Dilettante in scientific matters, it is true, but they have aided tremendously to spread the Darwinian explanation of evolution. For the novel is one of the chief means of presenting certain principles in an attractive, simple, and even drastic manner. It is, as stated, not an authoritative means, although the popular mind is apt to regard it as authoritative.

To continue this illustration from the field of biology. Father Eric Wasmann's "Modern Biology" was written to correct and refute the exorbitant claims of evolutionary philosophy. The book is splendidly written, highly meritorious, and thoroughly scientific. Yet priests and educated Catholics who have read it have confessed that it is above their understanding. It is written by a scientist and an appreciation of it postulates a technical training of years. Aside from the clergy and an occasional biologist none reads the book, despite its importance, for the simple reason that it is hard to understand.

Yet Catholics, at least, educated Catholics, ought to know the evolutionary argument well, for evolution is the only philosophy that receives any consideration, aside from that given scholasticism and the momentary popular fad. On the other hand, take the enduring vogue of Haeckel's popular exposition of Darwinism, to whose principles our foremost enemy has wholly committed himself. Its popularity is based on the factors of simplicity and obviousness. In fact, the success of the Darwinian argument lies in its seeming simplicity: the people do not appreciate that simplicity may be apparent, and not real. It is thus with Darwinism, whose simple perfection is that of a mirage.

Now, the moral of this is not that such books are popular, or that the public taste is unreliable, but that the people are interested in whence and whither and seek the solution of the mysteries. There is a thirst for information on these vital topics and man aims to satisfy himself in the most direct manner. That the sources of drink are polluted, is not necessarily the fault of the people. But this much is indicated by their action: the throbbing, all-absorbing question is the central problem of life, the beginning and end of man, and evolutionists have offered a solution which the popular mind is only too willing to accept. Not only that, the educated mind has accepted it. Scientists these days are very careful not to accept a simple theory: there was a time, in the heyday of Spencerian dogmatism, when simplicity was the chief outcome of the value of any hypothesis or theory. But that day is past. Scientists have discovered that the so-called simple phenomena are tremendously complex. Nowadays they regard a simple or obvious explanation with deserved suspicion. Thus, they quickly discovered that the simplicity of Darwinism was a delusion. But the popular mind has not been taught to discriminate.

In the field of evolution Catholic literature for popular consumption is negligible. Catholic books on religion are accessible and easy of comprehension, although they usually assume a belief in a personal Creator and proceed from that standpoint. Better, in many cases at least, to prove the existence of God and then continue the apology. However, perhaps, this would be of little use. For how many read these books? This question carries the burden of my paper. I wish to emphasize that on the whole too little attention is given to the popular phase of "staple" publicity. Except for leaflets and sacred writings staple literature is written primarily for the educated mind and has little popular appeal. This is especially the case with books on evolutionary topics and their philosophical applications. It is little use to evade these topics. Catholic writers can and should write on them for popular consumption. Evolution and its philosophical applications have been so widely accepted that it is essential that Catholic propaganda should include them in its scope. Nor is this the only phase of the problem that needs popular discussion. Only recently we have gone through a wave of sexualism in popular literature, one of the periodical waves, and the present wave has not yet receded. It seems to me desirable that Catholics should take part in this propaganda, of course, not to further it, but to provide a healthy antidote. As stated, it is of little use to evade the issues. I am referring to actual facts. Such issues are prominent in the popular mind and call for discussion. Any person mixing with men, young and old, educated and uneducated, knows the fascination that the topics of sex, evolution, and religion exercise over the popular mind. So closely linked are they in the minds of people that pagan educators assert that the origin of religion is the sexual instinct. The popular mind has been contaminated by this propaganda and it is needful to set it aright.

These are the issues I would specify in publicity for the people: religion, sex, and evolution. News and leaflet service are transient in character, while the enumerated topics form the permanent "staple" points of interest and are of vastly more importance, since they strike at the center of things. The need exists. Why fear to approach it? The demand is there. Why not supply it in a Catholic manner?

The Woman Labor Problem

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

THE problem of woman labor has become of permanent interest and importance. The world war has but lent to it an added significance. It is a strictly modern problem. The industrial work of women in the Middle Ages was usually confined to assisting father or husband in the home, which was often likewise the workshop of the master tradesman. Yet this was a limited and casual occupation, since there was other work for woman's hands to do.

It is true none the less that women often held a place in the trade gilds and there is mention even of a gild of women goldsmiths. It was a craft calling for delicate skill rather than strength, and woman's nimble fingers might therefore ply it with special success. Gild regulations in general did not overlook the wives and daughters of the gildsmen. They were to uphold the honor and good repute of the organization and in return to receive its fullest protection during the life of the gildsman and particularly after his death. The only person who might conduct a trade by proxy was the widow who desired to continue her husband's business. She was permitted to transfer the master-work which this implied to a paid workman.

The first oppressive labor statutes against women that have come to the writer's notice were those enacted by a woman. They are contained in the labor code of Queen Elizabeth, known as "5 Eliz. cap. 4," and admirably illustrate the summary way in which labor difficulties were settled in the post-Reformation day. A servant problem had evidently arisen with the increase of wealth and luxury on the part of the rich, and the deep and hopeless depression of the laboring classes that followed upon the Reformation. To supply the desired number of domestic servants it was enacted by Queen Elizabeth that unmarried women between the ages of twelve and forty years could be assigned by the magistrates to service at such wages as these magistrates should determine. If a woman refused she was to be committed to ward until she consented. The delicate prison attention bestowed upon such recalcitrants in the days of "Good Queen Bess" did not encourage any hunger strikes. In practice women might thus be turned over as bondslaves to any employer, against both their own wish and the will of their parents or guardians, to labor for any wages the magistrate might assign. There was no merciful limit set to the hours of labor or the nature of the work that might be imposed upon them.

Woman's more general entrance into the industrial field, outside of the home or apart from domestic service, was to follow upon the invention of machinery. Not that the actual conditions which then came about were necessitated by this invention, but because labor had been handed over to the merciless greed of capital under a system that was no longer influenced by the saving principles of the Catholic Church. Woman consequently was to be exploited in common with man, and even her helpless litle ones were not to be spared by "the greedy speculators," as Pope Leo XIII wrote, "who use human beings as mere instruments for money-making."

For generations woman was to furnish the "cheap labor" of the world. She was to be placed in competition, not merely with men and with her own sex, but with the newly invented machinery itself. It was often found less expensive to employ the deft hands of woman labor than to purchase the costly devices of the modern era of industry. In a million sweat shops and a million homes the song of the shirt was repeated from early morning until late at night: "Work! work! work!" till the brain began to swim and the eyes grew heavy and dim. Far better had been the condition of woman even under the earlier serfdom which the Church had slowly worn away by the power of her doctrine, which insists that man and woman should be equally free in Christ.

While the new form of sweated labor did not elevate woman, it degraded man through her. It brought about that other equally modern problem of unemployment, and clogged the labor market with starving men and women ready to slave for any pittance. Wages were accordingly depressed. Often an entire family, husband, wife and little children labored for a wage far less than was due to the father of the family alone. We need not go beyond the United States for illustrations. Thus in the summary of a New York State factory investigation some few years before the war we find the following statement in a clipping made at the time from an A. F. of L. News Letter:

> Testimony has been adduced which shows that in many instances the children were compelled to work or the entire family would face starvation. It was shown that the price of the necessities of life are higher than ever before in the history of the United States, and the earnings of the tenement dwellers so low that, even with the entire family working, the average was only seven dollars a week. The stories related under oath are almost unbelievable in their recital of hunger and misery. They deal with women working side by side with men in iron foundries, performing tasks far beyond their strength, and subject to sudden changes in temperature which result in many instances in fatal diseases; of women working nine to fourteen hours nightly in factories and mills, and of mere children working in canneries until long into the night. Babies of eighteen months are being trained to sort out artificial petals, and children of tender age, some less than five years, are being used to take advantage of the Christmas holidays to dress dolls, extract meat from nuts, etc.

"It's, oh, to be a slave along with the barbarous Turk," if this is Christian work. Child labor is closely connected with oppressive woman labor, and is based upon the same pagan philosophy which the Holy Scripture described as especially peculiar to the men of the generation in which Christ was to be born: "The things which are weak are found to be nothing worth."

With the mother forced to sweated labor, the child was soon obliged to help her. The poor mother entering the factory, the child was made to follow. It was the condition against which Pope Leo raised his voice and against which Cardinal Manning so strongly wrote long before our Child and Woman labor laws had in any effective way remedied this barbarism. Men complain, wrote the great Cardinal in his comment on the Labor Encyclical, that employers prefer the cheaper work of women, and women are finding that employers prefer the cheaper work of children. "It is the old formula of modern political economy, 'Sell in the dearest market, and buy in the cheapest.' What is cheaper than the work of women and half-timers?" A normal state of wage-earning should not merely put the wife back into the home into the midst of her children, as he says, but likewise protect the home itself against the encroachments of that greed to which nothing is sacred. Here is a picture of child labor as a modern social poet faithfully presents it. Facts such as these have helped much to make our Socialists and anarchists:

> Lisabettta, Marianina, Fiametta, Teresina,
> They are winding stems of roses, one by one, one by one,
> Little children who have never learned to play;
> Teresina softly crying that her fingers ache today;
> Tiny Fiametta nodding when the twilight slips in, gray,
> High above the clattering street, ambulance and fire-gong beat,
> They sit, curling crimson petals, one by one, one by one. . . .
> They have never seen a rose bush nor a dew drop in the sun.

Thus for the sake of the unholy dollar were mothers and children alike oppressed and their souls and bodies left blighted and stunted. What rendered the problem doubly difficult was the fact that both women and children were often prepared to enter into conspiracy with their sweated-labor bosses to evade the provisions of the law when this had at last been enacted. But what were they to do? They must live, and too often the law had failed to provide for this. It was still less possible to organize such women. The organization of all woman labor has everywhere been extremely difficult and, unfortunately, radicalism often played a dominant part where such organization was achieved.

Labor unionism has for its own self-protection earnestly worked at the total elimination of child-slavery and of the unnatural conditions and interminable hours of woman labor, and with no slight success. It has particularly fought to secure for women the same wages that are accorded to men at the same labor. Here too its purpose has been self-protection. It has sought to reduce still further the existing competition and to guard the wages of male labor. An equal wage should, however, imply an equal service. "The standard of wages hitherto prevailing for men," says the United States war program, "should not be lowered where women render equivalent services."

As regards the enactment of minimum wage laws we must, however, clearly distinguish between the lowest wage that may be paid to the adult woman and that which may be paid to the adult male laborer. The former must receive no less than an individual wage which will suffice to support her independently of any external assistance. Though there are some girls who work for "pin money" or clothing, cumulative evidence shows that the vast majority are aiding in the support of a family or are living alone, exclusively dependent on their earnings. But while the adult woman worker should receive at the least a living wage, the adult male laborer should receive no less than a full family wage. This will either enable him to marry or to support, in Christian decency, the wife and children whom God has already given him. "The minimum wage," says Cardinal Manning, "must be sufficient to maintain a man and his home. This does not mean a variable measure, or a sliding scale according to the number of children, but a fixed average sum."

We have here dealt mainly with what may be regarded as the historical aspect of the question and have touched upon certain phases only of this great problem. In the following article still other fundamental considerations to which this subject gives rise at the present time will be considered in greater detail.

The War Record of English Catholics

H. C. WATTS

THE idea that is prevalent throughout the world that England is one of the great Protestant Powers is responsible, to a very large extent, for the fact that the war record of English Catholics has by no means received the attention it deserves. While the State religion of Great Britain is undoubtedly Protestantism, it is nevertheless true that throughout the extent of the British Empire Catholics generally experience a freedom, and absence of molestation on the part of the Government that is often in contrast to the treatment meted out in some of the so-called Catholic countries.

Many of the Irish regiments in the British army are composed very largely of Catholics. The same is probably true of some of the overseas regiments. But too often there seems to be little or no recognition of the fact that in the English and Welsh regiments there are Catholics also. In England and Wales there are approximately 1,890,018 Catholics, of which number 76,764 are in the two dioceses of Wales.

There are no official figures published as to the religious strength of the different denominations in the British army. But certain percentages are made known from time to time, and from these it is possible to get a rough idea of the number of fighting men belonging to any given denomination. If these ratios can claim to have any statistical accuracy, then it would seem that in the English and Welsh regiments there are serving some 490,000 men who profess the Catholic religion. The number is not high when compared, for example, with the large percentage of Catholics in the American army. But even so it is splendid, for it shows that twenty-five per cent of the total Catholic population of England and Wales are under arms in the service of their country.

At the outbreak of the war there were some fifteen Catholic chaplains attached to the army. Of these, Bishop Keating, who holds the rank of brigadier-general, is Catholic Chaplain-General to the Forces and Episcopus Castrensis, under the title of Bishop of Meletopolis. Of the remaining original fifteen Catholic chaplains there are two of the first class with the rank of colonel; four of the second class with the rank of lieutenant-colonel; three of the third class with the rank of major, and five of the fifth class with the rank of captain. These are chaplains who hold permanent commissions, whether in peace or war.

When hostilities began, the supply of Catholic chaplains was found to be inadequate for the spiritual needs of the men, and the War Office asked the Bishops to provide an additional number of priests who would be temporarily commissioned as chaplains. Each chaplain receives the military pay and allowances of his army rank, and he is provided by the War Office with a portable altar and everything necessary for the celebration of Mass on the field. The War Office also provides prayer books for the Catholic soldiers, which are printed by the Government Stationery Office. The whole Catholic priesthood of England and Wales is 3,952, and of this number 450, or about eleven per cent, are serving with the forces; 250 are from the ranks of the secular clergy, while the remaining 200 are volunteers from the religious Orders.

Although the honor of giving the first chaplain of any religious denomination to lay down his life on the field of battle cannot be claimed by any one of the English or Welsh regiments, it was nevertheless a Catholic chaplain of the British army, Father Finn, serving with the First Royal Dublin Fusiliers, who was killed by Turkish guns at Gallipoli in 1915. Since that date a constant succession of Catholic priests have suffered wounds and death in their devotion to duty. Again, the first chaplain of the British Expeditionary Force to be wounded on the western front was neither an Englishman nor a Welshman: he was an Irishman, Father Gwynn, S.J., attached to the Irish Guards which has its depot in England, who died of wounds received in the battle of Loos in 1915. It was, however, a Welsh priest, Canon Gwydir of Swansea, in South Wales, who gave his life for the wounded when the hospital ship Rohilla was sunk off the Yorkshire coast in October, 1914. In 1917 six Catholic chaplains of England and Wales died in action, or of wounds received in action, and during the present year no fewer than five priests serving with the English and Welsh regiments have suffered death in the performance of their duty. When the hospital ship 'Glenart Castle' was torpedoed by the Germans in the early part of this year, among those who lost their lives was Father McIlvaine, chaplain to the forces, who was not attached to an English regiment, but to the Eleventh Royal Dublin Fusiliers.

Many of the chaplains have been wounded or gassed, and several have been taken prisoners by the enemy. For their bravery the Catholic chaplains have received the highest military honors, save the Victoria Cross. Bishop Keating is Commander of the Order of SS. Michael and George, as well as Officier de la Legion d'Honneur. Three chaplains have received the Commandership of the Order of SS. Michael and George, and ten have been awarded the Military Cross, while the number of those who are honorably mentioned in dispatches for distinguished devotion to duty increases weekly.

From every rank in life the Catholics of England and Wales, equally with their fellow-Catholics of Ireland and Scotland, have rallied to the flag, and, except for one known instance, the Catholic conscientious objector has yet to be discovered. The record of the Catholic colleges, too, is one of splendid patriotism. Stonyhurst, the Jesuit college, has an average of 420 boys on its list of students. Its record in the war for past and present students is: Serving in the forces, 916; killed, 116; died of wounds or disease, 10; missing, 12; wounded, 176; prisoners of war, 12. The alumni of Stonyhurst have received 133 war honors, and three have received the highly-prized Victoria Cross. The Distinguished Service Order has been awarded to 22 alumni, and the Military Cross to 60. Individual alumni have received war honors from the Governments of France, Belgium, Russia, Serbia and Italy.

Beaumont College, which also is conducted by the Jesuits, has a student roll of 200 boys. Of its alumni 540 are serving in the army; 100 have been killed, 5 have died of wounds or sickness; 108 have been wounded, and 4 have been taken prisoners of war; 131 old students have received honors, including the Military Orders of Knighthood, and 194 have been mentioned for distinguished service in the dispatches of the generals commanding-in-chief.

Ushaw College, which is a descendant of Cardinal Allen's Foundation at Douay in 1568, is of a more ecclesiastical character, yet its chapel and lecture rooms have many a seat made empty by the war. Of its alumni there are 554 in the service; 46 have died in action, while 72 have been wounded or gassed. Of the priests who claim Ushaw as their Alma Mater no fewer than 68 are serving with the armies as military chaplains. "A visitor to the college," says the college magazine, "who looked down upon the chapel from the rood screen could scarcely fail to be struck by the rows of empty places in the benches beneath; and if he happened to be present at meditation his surprise would be all the greater. Then it is that we realize how many of our students are away in the army."

The list is not exhaustive. It makes no mention of the glorious sacrifice made by Ireland and Scotland, of Clongowes, with 551 students serving with the forces, or of the war record of the Catholic colleges of Scotland. It is merely a rough attempt to show that the Catholics of England and Wales, who number nearly 2,000,000 all told, have, if official percentages lie not, about one-quarter of their whole number fighting in arms side by side with their fellow-Catholics of all the allied nations.

The Dramatic Ascendancy of Mars

JOHN B. KENNEDY

DESPITE his rather insufficient shirt of mail, Mars has brought an angle of uplift to the dramatic offerings of the current season. The war plays, unquestionably, appeal to an instinct as primitive as that which the sex melodramas exploit, for, granted efficient provocation and deficient moral balance, human impulse will just as speedily urge one to covet one's neighbor's throat as to covet one's neighbor's wife. And while the shielding cloak of patriotism protects those who nominally break the fifth commandment it has very little that is positive protection to throw about the sixth.

"Friendly Enemies" and "Allegiance" are the early birds of the patriotic theatrical procession, and they catch the most blasé worms. Both plays are built upon the same theme, the psychological tug of war that was supposed to take place within every German-American personal equation, when Uncle Sam stripped off the cumbersome tailed coat that hampers his progress through cartoons, rolled up his spectacular shirt sleeves and took his place in the allied corner of the international prize ring.

Capable actors have been assigned to the roles in both plays. In "Allegiance" the gentleman who plays the part of an amiable Prussian spy in the American army is particularly hateworthy. His head is handsome, blonde and porcupinish; his voice is rich and deep and he lies with the zest of a truly Prussian nobleman. But his clever machinations with the affections of a Germanophile American banker are ruined, so far as realism is concerned, by melodramatic juggling with the inevitable "papers." There is also a stiff scene in "Allegiance" when the old Americanized native of Heidelberg hears about the sinking of the Lusitania. Knowing the satisfaction with which that tragedy was received, at the time of its commission, in such centers of kultur as beer gardens and rathskellers, it is difficult to imagine how any transplanted Teuton could have been shocked into paralytic seizure by it.

In "Friendly Enemies" we see the amusing and somewhat sentimental process by which a stubborn old German is persuaded that the Potsdam clique are not the best possible prescription for the national health of Germany. Melodrama in "Friendly Enemies" is at a minimum and characterization at a maximum, with the result that in deft hands the play is both entertaining and convincing. President Wilson, who ought to be well-informed regarding the state of German-American feeling both before and after our appearance at Armageddon, is quoted as awarding high endorsement to "Friendly Enemies," and as Señor Carranza is just now giving our Chief Executive a demonstration of the subtle literary possibilities contained in the term "friendly enemy," we may assume that when the President expresses satisfaction with the play he does so on his own not-inconsiderable recognizances as a critic.

The tang of war atmosphere pervades, also, one of the cleverest pieces ever produced in New York, "Three Faces East." Here we have the good, old-fashioned recipe for blood-stirring and hair-raising, cooked to perfection, ending in what might be termed a zipbangish surprise. There are handsome, accomplished spies, who employ rapid elocution and violate the Sullivan act with the imperturbability with which your new-school problem-play Adonis crumples up his or somebody else's marriage vows. Of course, our brave, fearless, keen-witted, quick-footed, hard-hitting and so forth secret service men secure what are popularly known as the goods before the curtain and the modern substitute for the guillotine descend upon the knaves and confound their politics, which are not in any way designed upon regular party lines, unless you happen to belong to the party that is having an unusually hard pull into office.

"Under Orders" has other contents besides martial trappings to make it a freak play. During the entire performance, substantially over two hours, but two actors appear, taking four roles, or, if we must be technical (and there is no earthly reason why we must) "doubling." A German mother is related to an American mother, so each mother's son, so far as the author's purpose is concerned, might just as well have been twin to the other. Shrewd plot construction and excellent acting smooth over the obvious gaps in probability, certain situations in the piece being so exciting that even the professional displayer of ennui overlooks the fact that the long arm of coincidence has been stretched out of joint.

Several other war plays have been threatened, but those mentioned comply with even the hungriest demands for our quota. Sufficient for any season are the war plays thereof.

Yet "Where Poppies Bloom" demands one short, sweet swish of the scimiter before its scenery goes into musty storage. The play may be a very true depiction of Prussian viciousness and anti-Prussian virtue, but its merciless and crude cross-sectioning of the relations between a woman and her husband are unsuitable entertainment, and unprofitable phenomena for the study of any but psychiatrists.

Appended here should be a few words regarding the ostentatious war-spirit of the girl-and-music circus-masters. The Ziegfeld Follies oozes khaki, stars-and-stripes, union-jacks and fair patriots who may not have known there was such a condition of disturbance in the world until a blunt stage manager put them through graceful parodies of squad drills. Mr. Ziegfeld's annual chautauqua manifests the straits in which the genial impressario finds himself when he is at length compelled to admit that salaciousness is impolitic in the face of a national crisis. His legions of ladies are positively burdened with clothes, that is, considering their care-and-clothes-free upbringing. But apart from a witty cowboy, Rogers by name, who is also, contrary to all prejudices, clean of tongue, the production is amazingly innocent of amusement. It is presumed that the police agent whose job comprises the inspection of frolicsome farragos arrived at the "Follies" after the fatuously suggestive opening tableau was concluded.

Even if toward the end of our meal, we can come to our mutton in a consideration of Martin Brown's "A Very Good Young Man." The heroine is the daughter of a mechanic whose wife considers the turning-point in his life to have been occasioned by his initiation into the Knights of Columbus. She says so twice, the story refusing to support her contention. The daughter, who was named Pearl by the priest and has become "Poil" to her intimates, has a dread that the very good young man whose wooing she accepts will some fine or foul day burst out into vicious practices and scareheads. She consults an oracle in the person of Mrs. Mandelharper, relict of Mandelharper, who carries on at her late spouse's undertaking parlors. Mrs. Mandelharper declares that "Youse can trust no man not until he has a lily on his chest," which epigram constitutes the leitmotif of the comedy. The very good young man, resolving to win Miss Hannigan (Pearl) at all costs, tries, without much success, to earn a reputation as a rake. In the sticky trouble that ensues Pearl comes to her senses, and all is well. The contrast between the Celtic and Semitic character here displayed is no less than delicious, although the healthy belligerence of the Hannigans is overstressed. But Mrs. Mandelharper is an escape from some unwritten novel by Dickens. Comes the sad reflection that this play is altogether too humanly funny to be a success.

A tribute to a certain New York police commissioner was evidently intended by the writing and production of "The Blue Pearl." The plot concerns the robbery, at a foolish social function, of a fabulously precious gem bestowed by one of our representative millionaires upon one of our representative clubmen's wives. The police commissioner spends a good hour in smart investigation which fails to find the thief, and the play, which, as usual, is smartly written and well-acted, terminates in the strange paradox of the rich society persons parting for divorce and the tawdry adventurers resolving to be constant and true.

"She Walked In Her Sleep" is neither as titillating to the thick-lipped nor as aggravating to the thin-skinned as its advertising matter suggests. The idea of the play, a somnambulist prowling about with a deadly explosive, has legitimate farcical substance, which, one must admit, is not subordinated to the risqué in situation. With the elimination of a background bedroom and some snatches of dialogue the play would be a cause of fairly innocent merriment.

Booth Tarkington's "Penrod" follows in the wake of his "Seventeen" and is every bit as American and amusing. "The Maid of the Mountain" comes to Broadway bearing the approval of the veteran London Johnnies who have not yet been conscripted; "The Woman on the Index" is one of those plays that are dangerous to juveniles and perplexing to conscientious adults; "Why Worry" is a delicatessen entertainment in which Hebrew persons make fun of their racial traits; "Keep Her Smiling" is brief, unbrilliant and clean, and "Lightnin'" is a well done reversion to the old brave-heart-beneath-baggy-trousers school of melodrama.

The Government once more enters the movie field with "America's Answer," an interesting exhibition for all with sons and brothers and sweethearts in France, and there is everywhere the customary hodge-podge of throbbing film stuff which in no wise helps to explain the presence on earth of those who prepare and project it.

Why Not a Catholic Y. W. C. A.?

To the Editor of AMERICA:

As I am an enthusiastic reader of AMERICA I would like to ask why we are not doing for our Catholic women what the K. C. is doing for our men, that is, in the way of social recreation? There are many Catholic women belonging to the Y. W. C. A. who would gladly join a Catholic association if we had one that offered the same advantages. As long as I have been reading AMERICA I do not think this subject has been discussed. What are the views of the readers of AMERICA on the matter?

"Echoes from the Catholic Press Convention"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In "Echoes from the Catholic Press Convention," Mr. Happel pointed out in AMERICA, for September 7, that instruction in the knowledge and in the interests of the Catholic press should be given to the pupils in the Catholic schools. Mr. Happel seems, however, to have overlooked the small item of the preparation that might first be necessary for many of the teachers in these schools before much effective work could be accomplished among the pupils along the lines which he points out.

"Florida Baptist Witness"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I was much interested in the article on page 564 of AMERICA for September 14, "Notes and Comment," concerning the Florida Baptist Witness. It so happens that the part of the Witness's editorial which you quote is taken from a longer and more grammatical editorial which appeared in Life under the date (I think) of August 8.

A friend sought to enliven a long and tedious convalescence by presenting me with a three months' subscription to the last-named periodical. The number which contained that precious editorial was accompanied by a most confident request for a year's subscription. As the editorial had roused my ire I wrote to Life's editorial office, saying that I did not care to subscribe to a periodical that could publish an article so biased and so at variance with actual facts about the Church of which I was a member. I added that I had purposely refrained from passing that number on to the soldiers and sailors, as I did not wish to have any part in handing "Our boys" a periodical which insults the Faith to which some forty per cent. of them belong. I concluded by asking if the person responsible for the editorial considered that such published statements were the very best way of insuring a continuance of the "pleasant relations" between people of all faiths which was mentioned in the last paragraph. Needless to say, I was vouchsafed no reply.

The article quoted by you under the heading "A False Witness" has been boiled down somewhat and the wording slightly altered, to the detriment of the grammar. The middle paragraph, beginning "The way to cure the prejudice against Roman Catholicism," is word for word with the Life editorial, except that the words "and perhaps one of the most corrupt" have been interpolated, presumably to satisfy this Florida Baptist editor's anti-Catholic bigotry.

Cardinal Mercier's Philosophy

To the Editor of AMERICA:

On reading again, with great pleasure, Father Cahill's able article on Scholastic Philosophy, to which reference was made in your review of "A Manual of Modern Scholastic Philosophy by Cardinal Mercier," which appeared in AMERICA for September 14, I find that he makes two very mild criticisms of the work: on debatable questions of philosophy it rather closely follows St. Thomas without taking into account what other scholastics of recognized ability and standing have said on the subject; it breaks with a time-honored custom by setting the beginner to study cosmology and psychology instead of logic, as is usually done. The latter criticism rather nullifies the former, for more than one text could be quoted from St. Thomas to the effect that logic comes first in the study of philosophy.

Cardinal Mercier, however, in a preface to the volumes under consideration, has tried to justify at length his innovation, and it is a matter for just criticism, or at least regret, that this preface was not included in the English translation. It contains, besides, excellent reasons why philosophy should be taught in the vernacular, and explains how this can be done without jeopardizing the technical Latin phraseology with which seminarians at least should be familiar in view of their theological studies. Moreover, the Cardinal does not insist that the new order which he advocates should be followed. The French original, as distinguished from the English translation, was also published in an edition where the old arrangement, with logic at the head, was preserved. This, as was expressly stated, was for the accommodation of those teachers who wished to conform to the existing custom.

As for the first criticism, it is very true that no room was made for various scholastic solutions of debatable questions, that differed from those of St. Thomas. The explanation may lie in the avowed purpose of the "Manual," which was intended for beginners; and it seemed unwise, from a pedagogical standpoint, to overburden their minds with divergent theories. These are left for the larger "Cours de Philosophie," intended for university students, and they are expounded there at great length. Of course, on this point also there is room for legitimate differences of opinion, and, as Father Cahill well notes, Catholic philosophers are to a much smaller degree the slaves of "great names" than non-Catholics, who think themselves secure from criticism under the aegis of Hegel or Spencer or James.

Accountancy

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Would one be justified in inquiring if the communication of A. C. A., in your issue of August 17, is one of a series of letters advertising public accountancy? If not, permit me to suggest that among collegiate institutions the time to try to arouse attention on a specialized study is that devoted to ancient history.

A stranger to New York's educational institutions, as enumerated, might try to explain the lack of apparent ambition on the part of your New York Catholics to attend the College of the City of New York; by stating that the same disproportion of Catholic students may be found in other departments of the same college, and the Pace Course can always be found in Y. M. C. A. schools of accounting. The religious complexion of New York University, if known, would show a preponderance of one creed, and that non-Catholic. Why should not A. C. A. try to demonstrate that the Presbyterians are not interested in medieval history or the catechism, because the majority of those enrolled in Manhattan College and Fordham are Catholics?

Perhaps it would be best if the question of religion were left out of this phase of commercial education, because the Catholics in some sections of the country have been actively engaged in securing non-Catholics to attend our Catholic institutions by offering courses in accounting and other phases of business. Here in Pittsburgh we have succeeded. The Catholic with ability and "get up" succeeds here, and every other place, I think. In business, shrewd business men analyze prospective employees on a basis akin to tests in purchasing materials. This phantom should not be raised again.

Your correspondent should not worry about the future crowding of the accounting profession; that is not to happen soon. He should, and undoubtedly does, know that nine-tenths of those therein today are checkers-up, auditors and verifiers of dead and recorded business transactions; the other tenth render constructive criticism, and like the statistician and economist, build a budget for the next two, five or ten years from the journals of yesterday.

This latter kind of really worth-while work needs more knowledge than the accounting courses, even the best, can give; it requires accurate information of finance, government, commerce, commercial law, etc.; and its foundation is a mastery of the business under analysis; it presumes a mind capable of grasping many details and co-ordinating and correlating them into a completed whole, and accounting courses in themselves will not give this kind of training to a Catholic or a Protestant.

I believe that A. C. A. is just a wee bit pessimistic about our fellow citizens; there are some few lethargic lads, but not many; the past two years have made us all think, and many of our Catholics in camp, in cantonment, and in field have found out that the principal reason why so many Catholics are in the ranks, and so few on the staff and line, is attributable primarily to the fact that special training is not theirs. Accountants, generally speaking, bear the same relation to a business organization as a stenographer bears to a president; they re-express another's efforts, knowledge, ability and efficiency.

My suggestion is to give Catholic young men and women an intensive course in business administration, after the regular four-year college course is completed; the college course would make them thinkers, the business world would find them executives. It is useless to try to make an accountant out of a ledger man or to make a president of a million-dollar corporation out of an errand boy, or to graft a university education on a kindergarten head. Ability will come out sooner or later. We have some real good Catholic accountants, senior and junior, and four or more able accounting instructors whose balance sheet of life shows an excess of assets over liabilities, and whose monthly income and profit and loss statement show an increase in the surplus account that would convince St. Peter that they practised in their religious life the creation of a spiritual reserve—as they advised their clients to do in financial matters.

The country needs all the thinkers today; the business world will require them tomorrow. A specialized study of an isolated subject, like advertising, accounting, credits or transportation will not give us the kind of gray matter that is wanted, but a course at a college that makes for health, sanity and holiness will do so.

A Word to Friends

THE war has brought in its train many inconveniences that should be borne with patience. Not the least of these troubles has befallen managers of papers and periodicals whose minor business affairs, especially those that concern bills and the mail, were in the hands of men of the draft age. Gaps were made in the ranks of clerks whose places cannot at present be filled satisfactorily. Subscribers, no less than managers, suffer from this drawback, but the former, as well as the latter, will be patient and forgive occasional lateness and a mistake now and then. "It is the war," and the war is paramount. Then, too, it should not be forgotten that the Government is very active these days. Its commands are numerous and exacting, but patriots are only too glad to harken to them. And AMERICA's friends are patriots, if ever such existed. They will, therefore, read with equanimity that exchange and complimentary copies are forbidden during the period of the war, and that subscriptions must be deleted unless renewed on or before the date of expiration. "It is the war," and nobody will complain, least of all the numerous patrons of AMERICA. On the contrary, amongst the latter will be found kindly folk whose generosity will enable us to continue to cheer the hearts of missionaries in China, Japan, Africa, India, and so on, by sending them the usual weekly copies of the paper. And these same cultured people will check their rising chagrin if, during the year, the paper is not spotlessly white or perfectly calendered, for the war chariot has been driven through paper mills also, and left in its wake, if not wreckage, silent machines and depleted supplies. But, then, "it is the war," and even if more inconveniences and sacrifices attend the successful prosecution of the great crusade for justice, they will be sustained not only, but also welcomed joyfully by AMERICA and its friends.

Protestantism and Indifference in Italy

IT is a matter of common knowledge that Protestantism has long cherished the hope of supplanting Catholicism in Italy and especially in Rome. The popular impression has been that such an attempt was doomed to failure from the very outset and that it was idle to entertain any fear of its success. But an article in the August number of Les Nouvelles Religieuses gives a careful statistical survey of religious conditions in the peninsula, and points out the gravity of the danger to the true Faith, not only in Italy but in the Holy City. The warnings of Leo XIII., Pius X. and Benedict XV. are shown to have been only too well founded, and the writer does not hesitate to pronounce the situation serious. Moreover, he feels that it will rapidly become worse unless Catholics find some way to remedy it.

Protestantism is growing and indifference is alarmingly on the increase. In 1862 there were 32,975 Protestants of various sects in Italy, in 1901 there were 65,595, in 1911 the number had grown to 123,253, which means that in ten years it had almost doubled. The writer believes that the official registration of Protestants would be still greater were it not that human respect prevented certain Italians from publicly proclaiming their apostasy. Figures show, however, that the Protestant propaganda is more successful in depriving Italians of all religious belief than in converting them to heresy. In 1901 there were in all Italy only 36,092 persons who professed to have no religious affiliations, ten years later the number of those who were without faith was not less than 874,532. If to this number be added the 653,404 persons who in 1911 refused to make any statement as to their attitude toward religion, we find that at that date these two categories embraced about five per cent of the entire population, and that in ten years they had almost doubled.

The large number of strangers in Rome, which varies greatly with different seasons, makes it difficult to obtain exact statistics, but a conservative view holds that, if Protestantism has not gained in the Holy City during the past ten years it has not, on the other hand, lost; while it appears that there were 13,117 more Romans in 1911 who belonged to no religion than there were in 1901. During the same period the number of those who refused to state what religion they professed had increased by 8,378.

Not many years ago a Methodist minister prophesied that if Protestant propaganda in Italy were generously supported the near future would witness a separation of the Italian people from the Seat of Truth unparalleled since the inauguration of the Reformation in Germany by Luther in the sixteenth century. His wish, as the writer in Les Nouvelles Religieuses remarks, was father to his thought, but it indicates the aim and the hope of Protestantism, and, in view of the statistics given above, furnishes grounds for serious consideration to every loyal child of the Church.

Labor and Loyalty

PRESIDENT WILSON made it clear to the Bridgeport strikers that there would be no temporizing with a disloyal minority bent on gaining its own selfish ends at the cost of American lives. This war cannot be waged by the armies in the field and the navies that sweep the seas. It must be waged by 100,000,000 Americans working together as a solid unit and backing up the fighting forces. Every ounce of energy that can be put into the struggle is needed to make victory sure and a righteous peace permanent. The part that Labor has to play in the winning of the war is tremendous. Indeed, no one can overestimate it. And Labor has risen to the task whole-heartedly.

The lamentable thing is that a wilful minority can cast discredit on the loyal majority, as was done at Bridgeport and more recently in the coal fields of Pennsylvania. The strong stand taken by the President in the Bridgeport strike was welcomed by everyone having Labor's interests at heart, for Labor's interests to-day as never before are the nation's interests. And every loyal American approved of the attitude of the Fuel Administrator toward the striking anthracite coal miners. Rightfully he refused to confer with them or take any step in their behalf while they continued on strike, and they were told that the Government will hold them personally and strictly responsible for their conduct. This is as it should be, for on the loyalty of the miner depends the supply of coal, and coal is an essential to victory. It takes its place with steel and food and guns, and without it the American army in France must lay down its arms. There is especial need of hard work on the part of every American miner in view of the fact that there is a shortage of coal in England, while in France the richest mines are in the hands of the enemy. Hence, it is plain to every thinking mind that our own coal fields must be worked to the highest point of productive efficiency. This fine message of Marshal Foch to the miners of Great Britain must be taken to heart by every American engaged in our mines: "Coal is the key to victory. Miners of Great Britain, help me on. My brothers, miners of Great Britain, let not a moment be lost to hasten the hour of peace."

Fixing the Burden

THE extreme rise during the last four years in the price of commodities has been offset in part by a rise in the incomes of many workers. But there are men, counted by the hundreds of thousands, whose salaries are precisely what they were in 1914. An increase in the price of any commodity is a grave handicap on this class in the race to keep just beyond the reach of destitution. Economically speaking, destitution has no redeeming feature. It is sheer loss. Against the advance in price the individual has no guard whatever. It is the duty of the community, therefore, to protect him in this contingency, in which he cannot possibly protect himself, preferably by fixing a minimum wage, or, if this be not immediately feasible, by invoking the familiar war-power of the Government to establish a maximum price.

This conclusion is only a deduction from sane Catholic philosophy. We Catholics should have urged it years ago, with Leo XIII. But instead of that policy, which by this time would have produced excellent results, some of us preferred to denounce it as "Socialism," a loose word representing a multitude of uncertain horrors vaguely conceived, while the rest of us thought we could best serve the cause of Christian democracy by defending the equally undoubted right to private property. At the present moment the conclusion has a very pertinent application to the matter of an increase in street-railway fares. A company with an exclusive transportation franchise, in a great metropolitan city, claims that a continuance of the five-cent fare means bankruptcy. There is no reason whatever to believe that this claim is true. In its appeals to the public the company in question has never been noted for a consuming love for the virtue which made George Washington's youth famous. But if it is true, it should seem a fairly simple matter for the community to revoke the company's franchise, and itself take up the business of public transportation. Conversely, if the company's cry of "Wolf" is not true, the Public Service Commission can put an end, once for all, to the corporation's demand for a higher fare.

The question is by no means confined to New York, or to the single problem of public transportation. It has a bearing on every public service corporation. No doubt, in these days of high prices for coal and other materials, profits are not what they were before the war. But it is better that Reginald Van Dyckman should be forced, by a lowering or even a temporary cessation of his profits arising from corporation stocks and bonds, to worry along with one limousine instead of a fleet of six automobiles, than that the children of Michael O'Leary, who works for a fixed "salary," should be forced to economize in bread. And it is the duty of the community to see that the burden falls on Reginald.

"Make It Right"

"YES, SIR," the elated manufacturer was saying to his group in the Washington smoker, "we haven't had a rejection by the War Department. We're rated one hundred per cent efficient. All our machines have been passed. What's the use in sending out poor work and having it turned back on you? Make it right. It's honest and it pays better." There was a touch, and perhaps more than a touch, of self-satisfaction, verging to smugness, in the manufacturer's oration, but on the whole, it expressed the just satisfaction which a man may rightly take in work well done. And to the philosophy no exception can be entered.

"Make it right" is an order that we were in danger of forgetting. "Make it quickly, and be in a hurry about it," was far more popular. It is said that only a few years ago a surprisingly large number of American exports had graded beyond the stage in which they were looked on with suspicion. No suspicion whatever attached to them; they were known for what they were, poorly made goods, that would not bear usage; poorly prepared foodstuffs, that would not stand one more touch of the sun. They had been assembled or arranged with speed, with an eye to large immediate profits gathered from a continually shifting trade, with no concern for a continuance of steady custom. Other peoples might spend a thousand years in building a cathedral, but our specifications demanded a structure complete from foundation to turret within six months. "Make it right" if possible, but in any case "make it quickly," and let the next generation shift for itself.

Nor was "make it right" the principle on which we built up other structures of more enduring importance than commerce, our system of education, for example, or what passes for a system. The Commissioner of Education wrote in his last report that we spent more money on education and received less in return than any other nation, while in a recent issue of the New York Times Dr. Harris Hancock characterized our grade and high schools as "little less than a travesty." The War Department examiners will teach us the value of "checking up." With them a shell is worthless, if it will not explode; with us, at least before the war, a shell was good enough, if it looked well from the outside. As we are now beginning to realize, our public educational authorities, with a liberal appropriation to back their harebrained schemes, bought many an education shell that was empty. For just one, the good people of New York paid over $5,000,000 before they realized that while Gary, Indiana, may make good steel, it does not necessarily make good schools. Gary's were full of blowholes, like those famous armor-plates which our hurried and confiding Government bought some twenty years ago from a famous philanthropist. "Make it right," will be a valuable heritage from the war, not only for the manufacturer, but for the teacher, the social worker, and about ninety-nine and nine-tenths per cent of the rest of us, who do not teach nor "uplift," nor manufacture.

The Laity in Action

IN an article contributed to the Catholic Convert for September the Rev. Thomas A. Judge, C. M., tells of the incredible struggles of the Church in certain portions of the South. It is now some six years since the Vincentian Fathers began their work of zeal in the eastern section of the Mobile diocese. Several have been forced to relinquish their labors. One was beaten, another stoned, a third had other indignities heaped upon him. The small congregation which they succeeded in gathering together within their little church was startled during the Holy Sacrifice by a shot fired into the sacred edifice. Three distinct attempts were made to burn the building to the ground. Such were but a few of the tokens of welcome and appreciation lavished upon them; a natural effect of the persistent campaign of slander against priests and sisters.

In breaking down the barrier of prejudice Southern Catholics are now, however, realizing the efficiency of the lay apostolate. Attention has already been called by AMERICA to the splendid results achieved through the propaganda of enlightenment carried on by the Catholic Laymen's Association of Georgia, and to the wonderful influence exercised by it upon the secular press. In a similar spirit the work of the lay apostolate was begun in the little Alabama community in charge of the Vincentian Fathers. The education of the poorer classes had been systematically neglected, and high-souled Catholic ladies gratuitously undertook to remedy this wrong. The gratitude they met with consisted at first in the most venomous and diabolical calumnies.

Promise after promise broken, street demonstrations to attract crowds and incite tumults to destroy them, the vilest mouthings of malicious fiends, frequent efforts to disposses them, and three attempts to provoke the populace to tar and feather them—these are but fragments of the persecution that they suffered to start the school. The United States flag in front of their school, the only one flying in the town, was torn down and ripped to tatters, and not content with this desecration, it was knotted and twisted to make repair impossible.

Yet nothing could daunt these heroic women. The school, which started with three children two and a half years ago, closed last June with 150 pupils. Of that number 145 were Protestants. A change has come over the town. Today these devoted lay apostles are not merely held in respect, but are regarded with affection by the people. It is thought that there will be 200 children in the school this September, albeit the schoolhouse is but a shed, the desks are planks, and the seats empty boxes. But as for the faculty, it "ranks second to no teaching staff in the country."

Here is a work that deserves and should receive the financial support of Catholics. The very necessities of life are often wanting to these valiant warriors of Christ. But they have given us a striking example of the great good that can be accomplished by an intelligent and zealous laity, even though priests and religious alike fail in their efforts. What has here been described is but part of the labor of charity undertaken, in the interest of the poor and unfortunate, by a handful of Catholics in that intensely bigoted and sadly misinformed section of the South. People who could not be stirred by the eloquence of words have at length been moved by the far mightier eloquence of deeds.

Literature

SIR JAMES M. BARRIE

THERE is much of "Peter Ibbetson's" Mimsey about Sir James Matthew Barrie; the elfin, brave, adorable Mimsey, of whom the dear old Major used to declare that hers was the double, sweet intelligence of the head and of the heart. Never, surely, in all modern times has a "dour" Scotchman been so beloved—save only his friend and contemporary, the even more beloved Robert Louis Stevenson!

Barrie was born in the little town of Kerriemuir, the "Thrums" which he was to immortalize, and which so promptly and unexpectedly returned the compliment. He studied at the old Dumfries Academy and later at Edinburgh University; and he was writing not very successful "leaders" for a provincial English journal when the thought suddenly came to him that "there was something quaint" and colorful about his birthplace. "A boy who found that a knife had been put into his pocket in the night could not have been more surprised," he tells us. "When I sent off that first sketch I thought I had exhausted the subject, but our editor wrote that he would like something more of the same, so I sent him a marriage, and he took it—and then I tried him with a funeral, and he took it, and it really began to look as if we had him."

Barrie had, in fact, begun to tap a fresh vein in contemporary literature, and the little dialect sketches which charmed the heart of the London editors were those we know as the "Auld Licht Idylls" and the "Window in Thrums." "My Lady Nicotine," in which he did for the pipe what Izaak Walton had long ago done for the fishing-rod, was somewhat by way of digression. But the curious and characterful Thrums reached its fairest transfiguration in the delicious pages of "The Little Minister," or of "Sentimental Tommy," with its successor, "Tommy and Grizel." There, to the familiar milieu of dominies, school-rooms and bitter-sweet village romances, was added a new breadth of fancy and pathos. The creator of Lady Babbie, of proud, piteous Grizel, of the Painted Lady and of the magnificently fictional Tommy, was not merely the master of a charming by-path, but quite manifestly a man to be reckoned with on the highway of contemporary literature.

Barrie, from the first, had written of his native Kerriemuir with irresistible humor and exquisite sympathy, although his gentle contempt for "Auld Licht" vagaries—as personified in the redoubtable Tibby M'Quhatty—more than once drew upon his head the wrath of that curious sect. But it was neither local attachment nor literary thrift which held him so long to the familiar spot. It was a much simpler and more incredible thing—the ruling passion of his love for Margaret Ogilvy, his mother. "There was never much pleasure to me in writing of people who could not have known you," he once confessed in answer to her own arch query, "nor of squares and wynds you never passed through, nor of a countryside where you never carried your father's dinner in a flaggon. There is scarce a house in all my books where I have not seemed to see you a thousand times, bending over the fireplace or winding up the clock."

So the Thrums period, if it may be so formally called, of his work lasted precisely as long as its inspiration. When she was gone, it reached in 1896 its finale and apotheosis in that unique masterpiece of tenderness, "Margaret Ogilvy." Seldom, indeed, has a woman been so celebrated by her son: and who can question but that to love so consummately is as rare an achievement as to be so consummately loved? To her son—apparently to all her family—Mrs. Barrie became, in Tagore's fine symbol, "the sky and the nest as well." He writes of her "gentle face" in the days of his early childhood, . . . of the laugh which came "running home" at last after the anguish of her elder son, David's, death. "I have heard no such laugh as her's save from merry children," he continues; "the laughter of most of us ages, and wears out with the body, but hers remained gleeful to the last, as if it were born fresh every morning. . . . . How much she gave away of all she had, and what pretty ways she had of giving it!" Winsome, forceful, thrifty, artful, loving, past mistress of the art of managing men and beguiling children, vibrant with a very passion for motherhood and with a wealth of that indefinable charm, the slight woman passes again and again across the pages of Barrie's work. He could no more keep her out of his later plays than he could out of the earlier tales and romances: she was as close to Miss Thing as she had been to Mrs. Dyshart or to Grizel—she it was who taught him "What Every Woman Knows." Still giving and still gracious and still smiling, one watches her pass through the long drama of her life until its final scene is reached. And when that last call has sounded and been answered by the mother's long silence, her son penned from a room nearby this incomparable tribute: "There lay all the work I was ever proud of, the rest is but honest craftsmanship done to give her coal and food and softer pillows. My thousand letters that she so carefully preserved, always sleeping with the last beneath the sheet, where one was found when she died—they are the only writing of mine of which I shall ever boast. I would not there had been one less though I could have written an immortal book for it."

In 1895 Barrie had written his first play, "The Professor's Love Story," a delightful character-study, although perhaps a trifle halting in tempo for our marching life today. But it was really in 1896, when "The Little Minister" was put upon the stage, that the world—and perhaps the author himself—discovered that he really was a dramatist. Never was a creator more happily interpreted: for then, too, began the artistic partnership which has meant so much to the gaiety and the tears of nations, that gracious dual partnership of Sir James Barrie and Miss Maude Adams. It inaugurated that long line of successes of which one hopes the end may be far afield. Most of these plays have not yet been put in printed form, although Scribner announces the "collected edition" for, this year of grace, so one must trust to memory for the whimsical charm of "Quality Street," "The Admirable Crichton," "Peter Pan," "Alice-Sit-by-the-Fire," "What Every Woman Knows," "The Legend of Lenora," and "A Kiss for Cinderella." More accessible are the unique, brief dramas, "The Five-Pound Look," "Rosalind," and "The Will," this last perhaps the only work in which Barrie's humor is less kind than cynical. Then, too, there are those heart-shaking little war-plays, "The New Word" and "The Old Lady Shows Her Medals," and the lovely little fantasy of "Pantaloon."

Probably the greatest of these plays in humor and human quality is "The Little Minister," but the greatest in significance and sweep of imagination is undoubtedly "Peter Pan." Peter opened up a new era for the children's theater—he founded, as it were, a dynasty. Not for the first time in human annals, he presented a fairy tale destined to make history. His successors have been many and various: Belgium gave, four years later, Maeterlinck's mystical "Blue Bird"; France, "The Good Little Devil"; America, "A Poor Little Rich Girl," and a score of others. But Peter remains still the one which children (of all ages) themselves love best; and little fragments of him have had to be borrowed from the theater and slipped into volumes about "The Little White Bird," and "Kensington Gardens," and "Peter and Wendy"—from which gentle confinement he is always and forever managing to escape.

Humor and sentiment, a genius for "local color" and dialogue.

and allegiance to high ideals were Barrie's always. But the exigencies of the drama taught him just the concentration his work most palpably lacked before. Not that his plays are really concentrated or condensed, save relatively speaking! They leap from drama to dream with the most amazing nonchalance. They are always breaking loose from the stage, as Peter breaks loose from the books, and going home confidingly with the mothers and little children.

In the final analysis, it is perhaps the eternal childlikeness of Barrie which takes surest and longest hold upon the heart and the imagination. To the last he will remain the son of Margaret Ogilvy, the boy whose youthful horror was of the day when he must grow up and have done with games! "The gates of Heaven are so easily found when we are little," he tells us in "Sentimental Tommy," "and they are always standing open to let children wander in." That the gates of the heart are very like them, Barrie's own success bears witness. He is the far-faring but home-loving Scotch brother of Pierrot the immortal!

A SONG OF ROADS

The world is full of roads that wind
  Over hill and hollow,
Roads that cast a glance behind
  And beckon one to follow;

Roads that loiter and roads that run
  Past the wild-rose hedges,
Roads that lure the wandering one
  Down among the sedges.

Now some roads take a brook along
  For the day's beguiling;
The brook is ever at its song,
  The road is always smiling.

Some roads go plodding through the heat,
  Dust-besprent and jaded,
Unswept by breath of meadow-sweet,
  By greening tree unshaded.

Some roads darkle and some roads shine,
  And some roads go a-Maying,
Some with the air of a martial line,
  And some like children straying.

And all roads lead away from home,
  Where the hearth-fire gloweth,
And every highway leads to Rome,
  And every lane—God knoweth!

But the fairest road 'twixt sea and sea
  That feet of men have trod
Is the bleak road of Calvary,
The rugged road of Calvary,
  That leads to the Heart of God.

REVIEWS

Folly and Other Poems. By THEODORE MAYNARD. London: Erskine MacDonald, Ltd. 5 shillings.

Since the publication of "Drums of Defeat," reviewed in our issue of July 6, 1918, it is clear that Mr. Maynard has married. Even if this new book of poems were without its dedication "To My Wife," wherein he sings:

We two have pierced with our own eyes
God's multitudinous disguise;
Waylaid Him in His voyaging
Among the buttercups of spring.

a perusal of the finest lyrics in the little volume would show that the author has found in wedded happiness new inspiration. Such poems, for example, as "There Was an Hour," "Sonnet for the Fifth of October," "Vocation," "Beauty," "Humility" and the following stanzas, entitled "Wed," indicate that the author is singing of his bride:

I know the winds are rhythmical
In unison with your footfall.
I know that in your heart you keep
The secret of the woodland's sleep.

You met the blossom-bearing May—
Sweet sister!—on the road half way,
And she has laid upon your hair
The colored coronal you wear.

But ah! the white wings of the Dove
Flutter about the head I love,
And on your bosom doth repose
The beauty of the Mystic Rose.

That I must add to poetry
A dark and fearful ecstasy;
For in the house of joy you bless Unworthiness with holiness.

In "Folly" there are not so many poems after the Chesterton-Belloc manner as in Mr. Maynard's two preceding books, though "Laughter," "Drinking Song," "Ballade of a Ferocious Catholic," the "Dedication" and "Folly" are somewhat like pieces in "Laughs and Whifts of Song." In the present volume, however, the author has included poems which describe so admirably both the beauty of the soul and the loveliness of nature that they will rank with the best work. "Christmas on Crusade," for instance, and "Cloistered Love," both of which appeared originally in AMERICA, are full of lofty mysticism, while the pictures Mr. Maynard paints of nature's beauties in such poems as "Blindness," "The Holy Spring," and "In May" are as vivid as could be wished. When he writes:

I traffic in abysmal seas
  And dive for pearls and colored shells,
Where over seaweeds tall as trees
  The waters boom like tenor bells.

Where bearded goblin-fish and sharks,
  With fins as large as eagles' wings,
Throw phosphorescent trails of sparks,
  Which glitter on drowned Spaniards' rings.

and again:

The bluebells in the deep dim woods
  Like fallen heavens lie,
And daffodils and daffodils
Upon a thousand little hills
  Are waving to the sky.

without question an authentic poet is recording the harvest of his quiet observant eye.

Le Saint Coeur de Marie: Vie Intime de la Sainte Vierge. Par J. V. BAINVEL, Professeur de Théologie à l'Institut Catholique de Paris. Paris: Gabriel Beauchesne.

The study of the heart of the Blessed Virgin which Father Bainvel announced some time ago as in preparation has proved somewhat different from what it was supposed it would be. It was thought that he would follow along the historical lines to which so large a portion of his work on the Sacred Heart was devoted. No doubt the learned author believed that this phase of the subject had been amply provided, at least for present needs in the exhaustive series of articles which recently appeared in the "Dictionnaire Apologétique de la Foi Catholique." At any rate most people will be of opinion that the present work is far more valuable than a mere companion volume to "La Devotion au Sacré-Coeur de Jésus" would have been, although this project has not been relinquished, but merely deferred. We are far more interested in the nature of the interior life of the Mother of God than in the development of devotion to her.

Father Bainvel disclaims any purpose of writing a theological treatise, or a work on asceticism, although the theology of the subject is constantly supposed and thoughts on asceticism, of necessity, are of frequent recurrence. He outlines his object as follows:

> These are pious studies, aimed at increasing knowledge of Mary. Inevitably such knowledge will lead to love, and this love, together with this knowledge, cannot but be useful for the spiritual life. The author, therefore, studies the interior life of Mary; to know her better and to make her better known, to love her more and make her more loved, because from this knowledge and this love he looks for great good both for himself and his readers.

After a rapid survey of the more striking characteristics of the Heart of Mary, Father Bainvel enters more into detail, and devotes separate chapters to Our Lady's simplicity, humility, to the nature of her spiritual life, to the extent, qualities and reasons for her share in Christ's suffering, to the merciful manifestations of her loving-kindness, to her love for God and her neighbor. The most attractive chapters are those which treat, contrast, and harmonize two characteristics, in other hearts incompatible, but in hers essential, inseparable, and miraculously united: her sublime virginity and her Divine maternity. This book is, as most readers will probably concede, the best of Father Bainvel's books. To his profound acquaintance with theology, of which he has long been a recognized master, it unites the simple piety of a loving child, and both together make him a subtle analyst, an illuminative teacher and a sure guide, all in that crystal limpidity of expression, which is French at its best. India and the Future. By WILLIAM ARCHER. New York: Alfred A. Knopf. $3.00.

In the mind of the general reader India usually is associated with "coral strands," or the "road to Mandalay" and various other nebulous geographical and lyrical localities. Hence it is startling to find in the headlines of the current dailies speculations about the chances India has for home rule when the great war is over, and her place in the sun on terms of equality with the other great nations when democracy makes the world again safe to live in. Mr. Archer had a long experience in journalism to guide him for a comprehensive survey of Indian conditions and the details he has collated are of special interest now in helping to the conclusions the reader aims to arrive at in regard to these new international problems. He does not think British rule can be dispensed with under the coming program, but he is sure that there must be a modification along the lines of the popular self-determination ideal and a more comprehensive respect for local political aspirations and possibilities. There is a Catholic note in the outlook for India's future which readers of recent contributions to AMERICA will recall, but Mr. Archer does not include it in his survey. The apostolic influence radiating for centuries from Goa's venerated tomb must not be forgotten in any horoscope cast for the land of the Rajahs. T. F. M.

Right and Wrong after the War: An Elementary Consideration of Christian Morals in the Light of Modern Social Problems. By BERNARD IDDINGS BELL. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co. $1.25.

At first sight the very title of this book is likely to cause misapprehension; for the reader is inclined to say: "Are not right and wrong eternal?" The author, however, is not professedly a pragmatist; in fact he professes to seek only to teach the "old morality" in terms of the "new life"; i. e., to apply the principles of Christianity to four problems arising respectively, from the "hunger urge" and the "sex urge" problems of the local community and those of a "national and international" character.

With most of the author's solutions we cannot agree; first because many are not solutions in any sense, and secondly, because in other cases there is left very little of the "old morality" when he has finished. Feminism, for example, he rightly regards as one of the great problems of the day. But in advocating the adoption or the countenancing of the movement by any church calling itself Christian, Dr. Bell has taken a really unintelligible stand. For no movement in modern times has struck more mercilessly at the dearest things in Christian life, than has feminism. In fact the only explanation of the author's position, granting his desire to stand by the "old morality" is a failure to comprehend the real drift of feminism. Ellen Key and Edward Carpenter the Doctor dismisses as being the extremists of the movement. But he neglects to note that these writers are extreme, mainly because they are explicit. They have attempted to follow to its logical conclusion the doctrine to which every feminist will give unhesitating assent; namely that woman never has the freedom of a personality until she is free to use her sex-life as she sees fit, independently of "conventions." The author again surrenders precious ground when, touching upon another aspect of the "sex-urge," he enunciates the following spineless if not pernicious proposition:

> The Church ought not to dodge the problems connected with contraception, but to examine the whole subject in the light of the law of love. If in that light contraception seems good under proper restrictions let her teach her people what those restrictions are. If in that light it still seems a thing inadmissible then let her formulate her reasons for this position in language comprehended by the people and persuasive of them.

The one laudable feature of the book as a whole is the manifest desire of the writer to be of service in the era of readjustment which he believes to be at hand and the fearless sincerity with which he goes about the task. G. B.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

In "My Country's Past" (Scribner, $0.50) Mary Synon, the well-known Catholic writer of short stories, has prepared an excellent book for American boys and girls. To prove that whatever their parentage or ancestry may be, their plain duty now is a manifestation of ardent loyalty to the United States, the author first writes an admirable story about "My Grandmother and Myself," and in the nine subsequent chapters tells how the war began, why we entered it, and what we are doing to win it. A companion volume to Miss Synon's book is Frances Nimmo Greene's "My Country's Voice" (Scribner, $0.50) which is made up of well-selected poems and speeches dating from Revolutionary times until today. In singing the praises of the Puritans and Cavaliers the author neglects to remind the young reader that the religious liberty they sought here was for themselves alone.

The fifth completely revised edition of "A Manual of Style, a Compilation of Typographical Rules Governing the Publications of the University of Chicago, with Specimens of Types Used at the University Press" ($1.50), contains among its special features 118 pages of rules for composition, a chapter explaining technical terms, an appendix of hints to authors, editors, proof-readers and copy-holders, and 150 pages illustrating specimens of type. It is a good book for those who prepare copy for the press to have at their elbow.——"Voltaire on the English Stage" (University of California Press, $1.50) is a revision of a thesis submitted by Harold Lawton Bruce to the faculty of the Graduate School of Yale University in candidacy for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy. While not minimizing the dramatic power of the French radical of the eighteenth century, the author's conclusion is that Voltaire was not an influence on the English stage. Forming neither a school nor a tradition, he made no creative appeal, nor was the dramatic taste of England in any sense remolded by his plays.——"Business English, Its Principles and Practice" (American Book Co., $1.08), by George Burton Hotchkiss, M.A., and Celia Anne Drew, Ph.B., will appeal not only to the commercial student, but even to those experienced in business life. It is distinctive for its simplicity and conciseness; and the force of its examples will mean the retention in a nutshell of the entire contents.——"French in a Nutshell" (Dutton, $1.00), by Jean Leeman, cuts away all that is unnecessary, leaving only the genuine French idiom, though better grouping and more orderly arrangement might be desired. The army, the navy and the Red Cross will doubtless welcome this cut into the language of France.

"Gentlemen at Arms" (Doubleday, $1.40) is a book of war stories by "Centurion," who has seen service with the British army in France. The tales that have their setting in the big battles of the war carry with them a description of events as they actually occurred while, of course, the names of units and individuals have been disguised. In telling of the great battles the author does not write as a military critic but gives a battle-story as it presented itself in glimpses to those who were actually engaged in the struggle. The book concludes with an epilogue on the faith of the soldier that proves very clearly that aside from Catholicism there is little faith in the fighting man. "He is fatalistic rather than religious." Two army chaplains are quoted to the effect that the ministrations of their churches "failed to reach the soldier." Had the author of this book attended some of the field Masses held by the Catholic troops in the armies of the Allies or been near a Catholic chaplain during an engagement he might not have concluded that the soldiers' religion is one "that has never hardened into a creed."

"The Admirable Crichton" and "Quality Street" (Scribner, $1.00 each), new volumes in the uniform edition of J. M. Barrie's plays, sparkle with his wit and wisdom. In London Crichton is only Lord Loam's very conservative butler, but when the nobleman's yachting party is wrecked on an uninhabited island, Crichton by the dominating force of his personality soon becomes "Gov." of the little community and is about to marry Lady Mary when all are "rescued." The last act finds the party in London again with the old relations resumed and the situation neatly saved by the Admirable Crichton. "Quality Street's" scenes are in England early in the last century, with Phoebe and Susan, schoolma'ams, and Captain Brown just home from the wars, as leading characters. In identifying Phoebe with her fictitious niece, Livvy, Barrie strains probabilities a good deal, but he unfolds a pretty love story and gives Phoebe the happiness she so well deserves.

Thorough research-work marks Arthur J. Hughes' Thesis: "The Influence of the Catholic Church and Her People Upon the History of Illinois" (University Press, Notre Dame, Ind.), a prize M. A. essay. Beginning with the earliest history of Illinois, when in 1673 Jacques Marquette, a Jesuit missionary, first set foot on that western soil, the author brings before our eyes in rapid succession the makers and shapers of Illinois, showing what an important part the Catholic Church played in that State since its discovery. In hardships and patience a "long line of Catholic missionaries" like Father Allouez, Gravier, Pinet, instilled Catholic principles and thus subdued the "dusky aboriginal brother" the Indian and the early settlers. Charges of idleness among the early people and the lack of advancement of education are refuted, and the testimony of army officers, senators, surgeons and bishops makes the author draw one conclusion, namely, "That the Catholic Church has influenced the history of Illinois. That influence has made itself a composite part of the growth and development of the State."——"St. Joseph of Cupertino" (Herder, $1.00), a translation by the Rev. Francis S. Laing, O. M. Cap., is the biography of a seventeenth-century Saint written along conventional lines. The rapturous flights, varying in distances up to one hundred feet, form the most striking feature of this favorite of God. The presence to a degree of the drawbacks of generalizations and superlatives is admitted by the author, and two or three chapters rescue the book from being a mere inventory of virtues and miracles. However, the author assures us that the Apostolic processes were cited in the original for every fact related; and so the door is sharply closed to the stock objections against this sort of book. Admiration is the fruit proposed, and those who delight in lives in which the extraordinary becomes the ordinary will undoubtedly gather of it in abundance.

In "Thais, a Tragedy" (Torch Press, New York, $1.25), Mr. C. V. Roberts has gone back to the early reign of Nero for the subject of his latest drama. We have here a picture of the downfall of Agrippina, and, with some faint echoes of Sienkiewicz, a glimpse at the black and white of the matricide Emperor's court. The love of Brittanicus and Thais and their Christianity, which seems to lack something, moves through the action like a breath of goodness in strong contrast to the pestilential atmosphere of their surroundings. The theme is a familiar one and one easy of development, but Mr. Roberts brings to his work an air of largeness and dignity not too common with modern dramatists.——"The Art of Aubrey Beardsley" (Boni & Liveright, $0.60) is a collection of sixty-four sketches in black and white, with a brief prefatory essay by Arthur Symons. "He died," writes Symons, "in the peace of the last sacraments of the Church, holding his rosary between his fingers." If Beardsley had an intense passion for the truth, as Symons thinks he had, he found the truth not in his hectic day of passion, but only when, by the infinite mercy of God, "he made a good end."

The English Bookman recently published these stanzas by C. A. McCartney, Lieut. R. F. A., entitled "Marching to Action":

Dim-seen before me lies the way,
  Dark stretch the fields to left and right;
It wants another hour to day,
  Yet all the eastern sky is bright,
So quick the flashes leap and die;
And we go marching silently,
Our faces to the eastern sky.

How fiercely leaps the battle roar!
  Yet overhead and all about
The night is silent as of yore,
  And rank on rank the stars shine out,
With one that flames exceeding bright,
A lamp of God, a living light,
A benediction on the night.

And near me, on a grassy hill,
  I see that Form raised up to bless;
The Face that knows and pities still
  Two thousand years of bitterness,
And dark against the troubled sky,
One moment seen and then passed by,
Those Arms outstretched to draw me nigh.

O Way, dim-seen, my feet must tread—
  O Cross beside, O Star before—
The Spirits of the holy dead
  Speak to me as they spake of yore:
"Lo, this is what we sought afar,
The End to which all questions are—
The Way, the Cross, and then the Star."

EDUCATION

Uncle Remus and the Convent School

DO you remember "Daddy Jake the Runaway"? If you were a youngster some thirty years ago you followed with breathless affection Joel Chandler Harris' lovable old darkey as he moved through the pages of St. Nicholas. In a fit of righteous wrath, Daddy Jake had struck the brutal overseer on the head with a hoe handle, and thinking, not unjustifiably, that he had killed the man, had taken refuge in a cane brake, where he was found at last by two of his little friends. Informed that "Papa wasn't mad and the overseer wasn't dead," Daddy Jake commented in blank amazement: "Well, I'll be blest! W'at kinder head you reckon dat w'ite man got? Honey, is you sholy sho' dat man ain't dead?" But some people have hard heads.

The Pig and His Counterpart

ESPECIALLY some Catholic parents. I do not know what the "Oxford Dictionary" has to say on the matter, and at the moment that treasury of verbal elegance and accuracy is too far away to consult. But in some parts of the country it is not meant as a compliment when one says that so-and-so has a "hard head." It means, rather, that so-and-so is set on having his own way, that he will not listen to advice, that he is "pig-headed," since, like that valuable domestic animal, he would rather follow his own inclination and squeeze under a barb-wire fence than trot comfortably through a convenient gate at another's behest. The hen, as Hawthorne says somewhere, is an animal worthy of close study, for the rich variety and piquancy of her habits. Similarly, reflections based upon the manners and customs of the pig and his human counterpart may bear rich fruit, but negative fruit, mostly. You will learn what not to do. It may smack of disrespect, whether to the lower or to the higher animal need not be here decided, to institute a comparison between the hard-headed, pig-headed pig and the pig-headed, hard-headed Catholic parent who insists on registering his child at some school, or any school, provided that it is "fashionable" and, preferably, non-Catholic. For, all points in the argument reviewed, your pig is not to be blamed because he is pig-headed. It is the nature of his kind; neither Luther Burbank, nor even the Abbot Mendel, could make him otherwise. A poor nature is his perhaps, and ill-favored, but his own. The Catholic father or mother, however, who imitates him cannot claim his immunity. If their heads are harder than a pig's, or the head of Daddy Jake's overseer, they have made them so, and can be excused only on the plea of invincible ignorance.

To Think and to Think Right

JOEL CHANDLER HARRIS, "a kind of a brother-in-law to the Catholic Church, with the hope and expectation of a closer relation when I feel good enough," as he once described himself, was not a pig-headed father. "He entertained the highest opinion of the value of the Sisters' influence on their pupils," writes Mrs. Julia Collier Harris, in the wholly charming "Life and Letters of Joel Chandler Harris," just published by Houghton Mifflin. This high opinion was based on common sense and on the facts in the case of education for young girls, and he therefore chose a Catholic school for his children. As gentle in his private life as Uncle Remus, and as wise as Br'er Rabbit himself, Harris would not hesitate between the Sisters' school and the pretentious "fashionable" institution. One strove, and with marvelous success, to form what the old South (and the old North, for that matter) revered as a "gentlewoman," as brave as she was tender, a woman equally developed in heart and mind. The other was not capable of developing either, for it was, and is, a surface school, fitted to give nothing but a hard veneer. St. Joseph's Academy at Washington, Georgia, was selected by Harris, and his letters to his little daughters show how thoroughly he loved the spirit of this remarkable school. In November, 1896, he writes his beloved "Billy-Ann":

> But seriously, I am very proud of the report, and so is your mother, and we thank our stars that we were fortunate enough to have an opportunity to place you with those devoted Sisters, who have the art of developing young minds. More than that, we are grateful that Providence has so arranged it that you might be under the especial supervision of Sister Mary Bernard, who seems to have the gift (and it is a heaven-born gift) of imparting something of her own knowledge and exquisite culture to her pupils. I knew from the third letter I received from you that you had fallen under some sweet and yet powerful influence, and that you had begun to learn how to think and think right, which is the end and aim of all education.

Influenced by an enervating atmosphere of their own seeking, some fair-weather Catholics have sent their children to non-Catholic schools "because the convent schools teach only music and catechism. They do not really educate, you know." Harris, who knew a hawk from a handsaw, did not hold with this gentry. "To think and to think right" was to him the end and aim of education, and he found the aim set and the end sought, in a little Catholic school in Georgia.

A Rare Parent

"MY kindest regards to the Sisters," he writes at another time, "and ask them to forgive the frivole-ivole-ousness of an old man." "My kindest regards to the Sisters" was indeed a customary subscription to his letters, but "Sister Mary Louis," "that bright Sister Sacred Heart," and "Sister Mary Bernard" seem to have won an especial place in "this old man's" heart. For the amusement of his "dear gals" at school, he translates an ancient riddle into rhyme, and sends an answer, which begins with the faculty roll of St. Joseph's:

> The simple riddle! So you couldn't guess it?
> Dear Gals, I never would confess it!
> With all the wise heads St. Joseph's has in > Its walls. Why, first, there's Father Bazin,
> Then Mother Clemence, and that bright Sister
> Sacred Heart, so keen, I wist, her
> Mind must have solved it; and Sister Bernard
> Who's shy and gentle 'cause she's learn-ard;
> And then there's Sister Mary Louis
> I own to you that it's mighty cou'is . . .

But graver issues were at stake. Curiously enough, the layman will concede that the doctor, the dentist and the drayman are competent to manage the affairs of their respective professions without extraneous aid; but many parents have forgotten more about teaching than any teacher ever knew. Consequently, when a state of war has been declared to exist between little Johnny and little Johnny's teacher, the parent who does not side with Johnny is at least as rare as a republican in Texas. Joel Chandler Harris was one of these exceptions. He believed that while he could write better folk-lore stories than Reverend Mother, this same Reverend Mother knew better than he whether or not "Billy-Ann" ought to correspond, from her convent school, with the nice boy who used to live next door in Atlanta.

> You know perfectly well that we have no objection to your corresponding with him. Yet at the convent it is a different matter. We as well as you must be governed by the rules. If the Mother Superior decides that this particular case would be an infraction of the rules . . . then it would be better not to correspond with Charles. You see the question has a wider bearing than your own personality, and the Mother Superior must judge of its importance.

"O, rare Joel Chandler Harris." As a rule, fathers of boys and girls at school are far more reasonable than the tender-hearted mothers. But many a father who in his business and professional relations insists on entrusting certain technical aspects of his work to specialists is ridiculously unreasonable in interfering with the education of his children. "The boys are all right," said an old schoolmaster, who now has a high place in Heaven; "that is, they would be if we could isolate them from their parents."

What Makes a School?

"SOME day when you are grown up you'll be very glad you went to St. Joseph's Academy," is his message to "Sweetest Tommie," "Billy-Ann's" younger sister, "and you'll remember the patient and gentle Sisters as long as you live; you'll remember them with love, and wonder how they could manage so many girls, young and old, so quietly." When Johnny and his brothers come marching home again, having sent the Kaiser to his place, they will not find the academy which engaged so deeply the affection and the intelligent regard of Joel Chandler Harris. It was destroyed by fire some years ago, if my memory serves me, and has never been rebuilt. But they will easily come upon a thousand others. Essentially, all convent schools are the same, and each one has its "bright Sister Sacred Heart" and its Sister Mary Bernard, of "exquisite culture," yet "shy and gentle 'cause she's so learn-ard." Since the war began we have learned that huge endowments and imposing buildings do not make a school, and that an acquaintance with a number of facts does not constitute an education. To be able "to think and to think right" is to be educated, and we now have no doubt that character, as well as technical knowledge, is a requisite in all who take upon themselves the work of forming the minds of the young. That is, our secular educators have learned these things, some, it is believed, at the instance of the Federal authorities, and now profess them. Among Catholic educators, they were never called in question.

SOCIOLOGY

Knights Errant and Erring

ONE of those chances which come to inquisitive people had put us on speaking terms. It is only fair to say that the inquisitiveness was my sin. My chance friend was the victim. His had been a life of considerable adventure. At an early age he had run away from home and made his way to South Africa. There he had enlisted with the British forces, had fought against the Zulus, and later, against the Boers. When these far-away lands lost their glamor and fighting grew irksome he sailed for America, buckled on the buskin and became an actor, admired of the pit and applauded by the gallery. Now, in the fifth year of the war, when the armies of civilization need doughty men, he was on his way to join one of our allies. He is still young, robust and full of high purpose; so there is no reason in the world to doubt that, with proper training, he will prove himself a raging berserke against any Boche foolhardy enough to stay his progress.

Enthusiasm and Failure

HOW glorious is youth with its scorn of difficulties, its disdain of obstacles, its impatience at delay, its visions of achievement! It fixes its eyes on the golden treasure, and recks not of pain nor of failure nor, too often, of the means it must use if the treasure is to be won. Only the bitter years bring to youth the realization of what sort is the unseen burden that galls it, and bows it down. On the other hand, youth must not grow palsied through timorousness, else enthusiasm will fail and nothing worth while will be accomplished. Age itself has no guarantee against foolishness, though it has the ruins of others' fatuity to make it cautious, and experience teaches all save the hopelessly careless. Yet enthusiasm, worthy of the name, is not mere sentimentality in ebullition, is not lightheaded, not heedless of sane advice, not disdainful of sound precedent, not blind to examples that point to failure, not unmindful of the limits of one's own powers, and of the difficulties inherent in the struggle after success; it is not unteachable, not undisciplined. In the heat of its finest efforts, youth, when it is capable of fine efforts, works with a calmness, a precision, a self-possession, that astonishes the uninitiated. What are apparently aimless strivings are, on the contrary, well considered actions carefully directed; because the successful man, be he young or old, works according to plan. No one, better than he, knows the vanity of trying by fits and starts. No one, more thoroughly than he, realizes that only consistent and persevering effort can bring about lasting results. No one more clearly perceives the folly of chasing a will o' the wisp and trusting, as they say, to luck.

The "Runaway"

THESE reflections were induced by our chance friend who ran away from home. Our subject is "runaways," so we have not been talking so far beside the matter as may at first sight appear. From the records of the police courts and the Travelers' Aid Society, we learn that runaways have notably increased in numbers since the war began. Now, without animadverting on any particular runaway, one may hazard the statement that, speaking in general, every runaway is at heart a renegade. There may be good runaways, but the great rule is that runaways, like thieves, acquire goodness only through repentance. This being offered by way of text, I shall proceed to elucidate it.

By a runaway we mean a young person who, without license, and with the mind of independently shifting for himself, leaves his home, or the care of lawful guardians. The motives for going away are various. Some very few are ill used. They have ambition to get on in the world, and believe they are able to do so. They see that they are continually and unreasonably put down, and that opportunity will never come to them so long as they remain at home. They are willing to bear "the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune"; they are sure they can withstand them. Young people of this kind do not deserve to be called runaways, as the word is commonly accepted. They are only seeking the liberty of doing an honest part, and of becoming useful citizens. Generally they turn out well in the end, for they start out with a fixed and worthy purpose and are willing to fulfil their duty. They are so rare, and so capable of caring for themselves, that we shall give them no further consideration.

Potential Tramps

ANOTHER class is afflicted with the lust of the highways. They are tramps in petto, ever on the lookout for variety and change. At times it has been found that the cause is a certain weakness of mind. The remedy is proper restraint, and sympathetic teaching. It happens, also, that a boy who is restive at a school where his studies are chiefly literary, will develop interest in his lessons, and do well, at a business school, a trade or technical school. Or his surroundings are undesirable. The trouble may come from disagreeable or unfit companionship. The part of parents and guardians is to consider carefully whether a change from one school to another, or even from school to employment, is for the boy's greater good. Parents have a grave matter in hand when they are deciding upon the school or college which their children are to attend. Catholic parents, in particular, are seriously bound to select a place where the teaching will carry on the moral training given at home. The undoing of right ideas of moral conduct is the cause of more instability of mind, and of consequent failure, than most people realize.

The last class of runaways we shall deal with is beyond doubt the most perverse, and therefore the most interesting. Who can help being interested in youngsters whose consuming ambition is not only to become fmillionaires and "movie stars," but to rise to economic and histrionic fame at once? They are obsessed by the notion that the abyss between humdrum existence and the life of a hero or heroine can be cleared by a running jump. True, their fathers and mothers never did so much, nor, for that matter, anyone they ever knew. Their friends and relatives, if they are honest, will tell them that, even when wages are good, bread is eaten in the sweat of one's brow. What of all that? No one can deny that there have been meteoric careers. They have read about them, time and again, both in books and the Sunday supplements of the newspapers. They have studied their progress in the movies. They can recite examples like that of our adventurous friend whom we spoke of in the beginning. They admit, of course, that not every young person can go out into the world and conquer it single handed. But, in their own case, they have reason to thank God because they are not like the rest of youngsters. It is not for such as they are to lag in a becraped procession to the entoning of misereres; not they. So off they go to learn, as multitudes of their kind have learned before, that to make threnodies by the soughs of disappointment is no whit merrier than the plain chant of humble performances at home, and not half so profitable.

The Lure of the Uniform

THE girl who runs away, lured by a uniform, is the most pitiable of all. There is a witchery about a uniform, even though it be only a bellboy's. Especially if the uniform be of one's country, it proclaims an ideal; it is an outward profession of the spirit of sacrifice, a mark of altruism. It represents a certain aloofness from the commonplace. It is, or is intended to be, a sign to all beholders that the wearer has heard and answered a call to higher aims and motives. It means abandonment of selfish ambitions, a laying aside of smaller purposes for the larger ones of the common good. It is the peculiar insignia of loyalty, a public signification of a finer devotion than the civilian is capable of. It shares the sacredness proper to the flag of the nation. While it should not mask what is good in one's character, much less efface what is personal, the uniform and what it stands for should elevate personality, lifting it upward and onward beyond what is petty and self-centered. We observe, too, that the soldier is conscious that the character he bears marks him off from the man in the street. The soldier realizes that donning the uniform is an investiture, a consecration to a sacred cause; is like the wearing of a phylactery emblazoned with the legend: "At your service, O my country!"

One can understand, then, how the soldier's uniform adds a special charm to the witchery of manner and appearance. The greater the pity that it is so misunderstood and belittled by a silly horde, as if the business of a soldier were rather to look pretty and write ditties to the love-lorn than to fight bravely.

The Preventive

WHAT is to be done with these miscreant runaways? They are miscreants and a threat to society. So much is admitted. Therefore, what is to be done with them? The question has been decided, as far as public authority and welfare organizations can decide it. But anyone of experience will tell you that the final thing cannot be done by public authority and welfare societies. They cannot do the final thing because they cannot do what is fundamental. Well, then, what can? Only a good home and proper home training. Nothing else can be final, because nothing else can be fundamental. Surely at this state of the world's life, no sensible person will ask for proof that shifting the burden of education wholly to hired instructors cannot form children aright. Money can do much, but it cannot buy a mother's love or a father's insight and solicitude. Parents must learn that a home is something more than a refuge where their children may eat and find shelter from the weather and the fears of the night. You cannot make good children by simply leaving them to their own devices. You might as well try to make a model of propriety by putting a painted nimbus around the head of a street arab.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Our Fourth Liberty Loan

SEPTEMBER 28 is the date set for the opening of the fourth Liberty Loan drive. Three successive times has the nation over-subscribed the great loans asked of it. With our armies winning in the field and the end of the great struggle perhaps more nearly in sight than ever before, we cannot doubt that a generous response will be given to this fourth call by every American, according to his means. "If you can't fight, your dollars can," is the motto kept before us. Contracts placed by the Ordnance Department alone totaled $4,300,000,000 from the beginning of the year to June 30, 1918, the last day of the past fiscal year. The estimate for the current year is over $7,000,000,000. With a prospect of about 5,000,000 men under arms in the near future and the launching of mighty steel leviathans at an almost fabulous rate, we can well imagine what immense sums will be needed to hasten all these operations. "Our soldiers in France are gloriously doing their part toward victory," a Government circular tells us; "the Liberty Loan subscription must show them that the people at home are doing theirs." Bonds speak louder than words.

Why Save Sugar?

"WAS your customer peevish when refused more than two pounds of sugar per person per month?" the Food Administration asks the clerk in an open letter.

> Suppose you had said to her that she was being asked to restrict her use of sugar because the ships which were formerly used to transport sugar to this country were now taking our soldiers to France in such numbers that they have definitely staggered the German line. Suppose you had explained to her that the Allied countries of Europe have been holding that line for years on a lower sugar ration than we are now asked to observe, and that in the face of pitiful shortage of all other supplies. Suppose you had taken a few minutes to show her how soldiers need sugar for quick energy and how much greater our exports must be now that we have more than 1,000,000 men over there to be fed, in addition to the 120,000,000 Allies, all of whom look to us as the last food resource of the civilized world. Women are sympathetic and loyal by nature. Any woman would give her last pound of sugar to her sisters in France, and she would deny herself anything to serve her country. This woman merely did not understand.

The lesson is well given and should be learned by every purchaser and consumer. Whereas the wholesale price of sugar in the United States on May 1 was $7.30 per 100 pounds, it was $8.07 in Canada, $12.59 in England, $12.28 in France, and $26.30 in Italy. Our total consumption of sugar for the fiscal year 1917 to 1918 was 8,218,582,000 pounds. This amount will doubtless be considerably reduced during the present year.

The Fatherless Children of France

IN the issue of La Croix, of Paris, for August 16, 1918, there is a resumé of the articles on the Fatherless Children of France, which have recently appeared in America, that ends with the following comment:

> It seems well to add that the situation, in consequence of the protests made by Catholics, has certainly improved; nevertheless in the country districts, many school teachers, either because they have not received, or have refused to read, the instructions, persist in seeking to profit by American assistance to favor the public school. As we have not ceased to say, the list of the benefactions should be published.

Those who love the French children will derive much satisfaction from the assurance that conditions have improved, although they will experience anxiety over the statement that the distribution of funds is far from satisfactory in the country districts. La Croix points out the way to stop complaints. It is very simple. If the Fatherless Children of France will consent to publish a list in which the names of the children assisted is given, and append to each name the school to which the children are sent, or in cases where assistance has been given to beneficial associations, the name of the association and the amount of money given it; the world at large will have an opportunity of judging whether or not the religious convictions of the dead fathers of the children are respected. This request for the publication of the benefactions of the Fatherless Children has often been made, but so far has met with evasive answers.

I. F. C. A. Postpones Convention

THE International Federation of Catholic Alumnæ announces that the third biennial convention, which was to have taken place at St. Louis during October of this year, has been postponed until after the war. "The Federation," the official circular explains, "is anxious to cooperate with the Government in every possible field, and in deference to the restrictions placed on travel, except for business or war exigencies, has decided to defer the convention until the war is ended and normal conditions prevail throughout the country." The organization at present numbers 50,000 graduates and pupils of the Catholic institutions of higher education throughout the United States and Canada, and extensive war work has already been done by its various State chapters. During the period of stress the interests of the Federation will be provided for by a meeting of the executive board and advisory council under the chairmanship of the Very Rev. Edward A. Pace. Date and place have not as yet been determined.

The Students' Army Training Corps

TO prevent the premature enlistment of college students who can do more effective work by continuing their college course the War Department has established the Students' Army Training Corps. In its announcement the Department calls attention to the need of highly trained men:

> This is a war in which soldiers are not only marksmen, but also engineers, chemists, physicists, geologists, doctors, and specialists in many other lines. Scientific training is indispensable. Engineering skill is needed by the officers who direct every important military operation and who control our lines of transport and communication. In the same way chemical and physical knowledge are in constant demand at the front as well as behind the lines, while the task of saving the lives and restoring the health of hundreds of thousands of wounded calls for the services of regiments of military physicians. The scientific training which prepares a man to fulfill one of these highly specialized duties and the more liberal training which helps to develop the qualities of leadership needed by the officer or administrator are essential elements of military efficiency.

Recently there were 7,000 members of college faculties and selected students taking a course designed to equip them to share in the work of military instruction in the colleges during the coming year.

Father Duffy of the Old "Sixty-ninth"

"DESPITE constant and severe bombardment with shells and aerial bombs, he continued to circulate in and about the two aid stations and hospitals, creating an atmosphere of cheerfulness and confidence by his courageous and inspiring example." That is the testimony given by General Pershing to Father Francis P. Duffy for his devotion to the wounded and dying in Villers Fère from July 28 to July 31. It was likewise the reason for conferring on him the Distinguished Service Cross. Yet it gives but the cold outlines of the fact. "Every one, living and dead, has done gloriously," wrote a soldier boy on July 20, from France; "no one really stands out, except perhaps Father Duffy—one can't help but love him, and he's just as good a friend to us non-Catholics as he is to his own flock" (Evening Mail, September 5). How the news of the honor conferred upon Father Duffy was received in the home city of the old "Sixty-ninth of New York," now the 165th Regiment, can best be judged from the following editorial tribute paid by the New York Herald:

> Father Duffy, we may state, is as popular with Episcopalians, Presbyterians, Baptists, Methodists, Hebrews, etc., as he is with the members of his own Church. He is, in fact, a shining example of the new orthodoxy, which is based on a belief in national and international decency and all that decency involves. He is one of the men who believe that those who are not with us in this war are against us and that is all that can be said.
> One of the recent German propagandist lies, the whispering lies, was to the effect that Father Duffy was dead. As if it could help the cause of the Kaiser and his gang to convince New Yorkers that the Teutons had managed to put out of business a man who, while he was spoiling to be in the fighting, was able to attend to the cure of souls or handle the end of a stretcher, under fire, with all the nonchalance of a cleric taking his afternoon walk down Fifth avenue!
> Well, instead of being buried under the poppies that bloom in Flanders fields Father Duffy is very much alive. He will have the right to wear the War Cross on his cassock. And we all hope that when the boys come home we shall be able to show what we think of a chaplain of whom a private of another faith said: "Believe me, he is some man, and don't you forget it!" We won't.

Father Duffy is but the splendid type of the Catholic chaplain at the front. May their service to our country never be forgotten!

The New York Press on Cardinal Farley

DURING the past week columns of sympathetic comment upon the life and labors, the religious zeal and patriotic devotion of the late Cardinal Farley filled the New York papers. Practically each of the great metropolitan dailies honored his memory with a special editorial replete with kindly feeling and high appreciation for the many admirable qualities of the illustrious prelate. The following tribute from the New York Evening Sun may be taken as typical of the tone of the entire press:

> Cardinal Farley's long and useful life is bound to be an inspiration to youth and a pattern for maturity. Not more as churchman and prelate than as a simple lover of mankind, a man among men, human, lovable, gently tolerant and filled with the peace which abides in the innocent heart, this good man was held in adequate esteem, love and reverence by his friends of every order.
> Throughout his long career, during a great part of which he was a definite influence in New York, his kindly figure, whether as parish priest or Cardinal Archbishop, has always been recognized as a fixed star in the firmament of his Church, whose magnitude was accurately reckoned and securely established. He was a sturdy defender of his devout faith, religious and political; never finding occasion for harsh judgment, nor yet relaxing firmness in the essentials of man's duty to God, the State and himself.
> In the course of so long a life in high ecclesiastical station a thousand incidents might be recalled indicative of the character of the faithful shepherd of souls, of the spirit in which meekness joined with the acceptance of high responsibility. Yet none is needed, for many thousands cherish personal memories of this well beloved friend which are more precious to them than any of the more public incidents. The other day when Bishop Greer read prayers in Trinity for the Cardinal as he lay ill nobody saw anything surprising in the action, however unusual. Beloved by all who knew him, his consummate worth was taken for granted by all communions.

As the life of the Cardinal was slowly ebbing away, the Jews did not forget him while celebrating their New Year's festivities. "Prayers," wrote the New York Herald, "were offered in many synagogues at Yom Kippur services yesterday for the distinguished churchman." So men of all creeds and all factions united in publicly showing their esteem for this "lover of mankind," this "man among men."

Chronicle

The War.—For the Allies the week was one of the most successful of the war. In prisoners alone it netted for them more than 100,000. At the northern tip of the western front, Belgian and British troops attacked from Dixmude to the north of Ypres, making an advance of over three and a half miles. On September 28, the new Allied line ran through Woumen, Pierkenshoek, Schaep, Baillie and Broodeseynde. Two days later Dixmude, Zarren, Stademberg, Passchendaele, Moorsiede and part of Westroosebeke were taken, and the Allies had advanced to within two miles of the German base at Roulers. Attacking on a wide front the British First and Third armies, respectively, under the command of Generals Horne and Byng, aided by Americans, tightened their hold upon Cambrai. On the extreme right the Americans captured fortified outposts of the Hindenburg system south of Le Catelet. The main thrust was upon a front of about fourteen miles against strong enemy positions, particularly in the sector of the Canal du Nord. On the north of the main attack the British captured Beaucamp and the ridge running to Marcoing, and Sauchy-Lestrées and Sauchy-Cauchy, south of the Sensée and Scarpe Rivers. On the right center the British, under General Haldane, broke through the German lines east of Havrincourt, took Flesquières and stormed the ridge running eastward to Marcoing. The line of the Canal du Nord east and southeast of Moeuvres was also stormed and Anneux captured. Fontaine Notre Dame was also taken, thus bringing the British within three miles of Cambrai. The following day, September 28, further progress was made, particularly on the east and southwest. At Sailly the British were only two miles distant from the town. The next day the British advanced to the gates of Cambrai; the Americans supporting them took Bellecourt and Nauroy, south of Le Catelet.

Bulletin, Sept. 23, p.m.-Sept. 30, a.m.

Around St. Quentin, and on the Oise front north of La Fère, the French mastered the west bank of the Oise for more than half the distance from La Fère to Moy. On the Chemin des Dames General Mangin advanced his lines two miles. General Debeney's troops reached the Oise through Vendeuil, which had been evacuated by the enemy. As the French drew near the Hindenburg line around St. Quentin the enemy made determined efforts to hold them back. North of the Somme the Germans are reported to have organized a defensive system on the heights running parallel to a portion of the old Hindenburg line.

A heavy blow was struck by a combined French and American force on a comparatively quiet sector. The attack extended from the Meuse north of Verdun beyond the Argonne Forest into Champagne as far as Auberive on the Suippe River. This territory was probably chosen because the enemy here lacks good supply lines. The brunt of the attack was delivered east of the Argonne between the Aire and the Meuse, where for thirty miles northward, as far as Sedan, the Germans have behind them no natural defensive obstacle. West of the Aisne, where the French were operating under Gouraud, the average depth of the advance was three miles; east of the river the furthest point reached on the first day's attack by General Hunter Liggett's American divisions was Dannevoux, close to the Meuse. The following day the Americans made a further gain of three miles, striking the Kriemhilde Line at Brieulles and then reaching Exermont and Romagne. West of the Argonne the French reached Somme-Py then Bellevue Heights, Manre and Bussy Farm.

Both from a military and political point of view the Allied victories on the Macedonian front were surprising. These started with the Allied attacks upon the Bulgarian front between the Cerna and Vardar Rivers, chronicled last week, which were followed by the disordered withdrawal of the Bulgarians. On the left or western extremity of the line the Italians on September 23 advanced on the Bulgarian base at Prilep, north of Monastir, and separated the First Bulgarian army from the Second army in the Doiran section. In the center, Serbian, French and Greek forces crossed the Drenska mountain range and cut the railroad from Prilep to Gradsko at its junction with the main line from Saloniki to Uskub. Under pressure of Greek and British forces operating in the Lake Doiran district, the enemy evacuated the line from Doiran to the Vardar.

The Balkan Front

The following day, September 24, French cavalry, supported by the Serbians, captured Prilep; the British took Doiran and swept north past Kara Oghular. At the same time the Serbians reached the eastern bank of the Vardar between Demirkapu Pass and Krivolak, while their cavalry reached the plains of Lipa and Kaliyan. North of Monastir the Italians captured the strategic heights of Liobishte, while Greek and French troops operating on the British left took Gurinchet, a few miles west of the Vardar. The broken Bulgarian army was soon in full retreat on a front of 130 miles, heading for Veles, east of the Vardar. The Serbians crossed the Vardar east of Gradsko, advanced along the Bregalnitza River, four miles northeast of Gradsko, and cut the main road from Krivolak to Ishtib. Ishtib surrendered, and by September 26 Vales, twenty-five miles southeast of Uskub, the main railroad center of old Serbia, was captured by the Serbians, while British and Greek troops invaded Bulgaria from the Doiran region and crossed the Belachist range, and British detachments crossed the border opposite Kusturino, about six miles from the fortress of Strumnitza. The Bulgarian Premier, Mr. Malinoff, at this juncture asked the Allied commander for an armistice. The latter refused, but stated that he was willing to receive accredited Bulgarian peace envoys. The Bulgarian request was forwarded to the Allied Governments. As far as can be now ascertained the terms seem to be "unconditional surrender." It was reported that Bulgarian peace delegates had reached Saloniki; that Chancellor Count von Hertling had resigned, and that while the Allied armies were sweeping forward in Macedonia on a 225-mile front from Lake Ochrida to a point within the Bulgarian border, the Germans had begun a withdrawal from Rumania.

In Palestine General Allenby's victory is now considered to be one of the most complete gained by the Allies during the war. His capture of Haifa and Acre on the coast, his encircling of the Turkish army north of Nazareth and his possession of the Jordan near the Lake of Genesareth, together with the fords east of the river, enabled him to destroy practically the entire Turkish army. At least 45,000 Turks were captured, and the remaining divisions are so disorganized that as a military force the Turkish army in Palestine may be said not to exist.

In his New York speech of September 27, the President rejected the recent peace offers put forth by Germany and her Allies. After a brief reference to the Fourth Liberty Loan Drive, and a statement to the effect that our purposes in the war were perhaps not clear at the outset but they are clear now, Mr. Wilson thus splendidly outlined our aims and our program:

The President and the Peace Offensive

The war has lasted more than four years and the whole world has been drawn into it. The common will of mankind has been substituted for the particular purposes of individual States. Individual statesmen may have started the conflict, but neither they nor their opponents can stop it as they please. It has become a people's war, and peoples of all sorts and races, of every degree of power and variety of fortune, are involved in its sweeping processes of change and settlement. We came into it when its character had become fully defined and it was plain that no nation could stand apart or be indifferent to its outcome. Its challenge drove to the heart of everything we cared for and lived for. The voice of the war had become clear and gripped our hearts. Our brothers from many lands, as well as our own murdered dead under the sea, were calling to us, and we responded, fiercely and of course.

The air was clear about us. We saw things in their full, convincing proportions as they were; and we have seen them with steady eyes and unchanging comprehension ever since. We accepted the issues of the war as facts, not as any group of men either here or elsewhere had defined them, and we can accept no outcome which does not squarely meet and settle them. Those issues are these:

Shall the military power of any nation or group of nations be suffered to determine the fortunes of peoples over whom they have no right to rule except the right of force? Shall strong nations be free to wrong weak nations and make them subject to their purpose and interest? Shall peoples be ruled and dominated, even in their own internal affairs, by arbitrary and irresponsible force or by their own will and choice? Shall there be a common standard of right and privilege for all peoples and nations or shall the strong do as they will and the weak suffer without redress? Shall the assertion of right be haphazard and by casual alliance or shall there be a common concert to oblige the observance of common rights?

No man, no group of men, chose these to be the issues of the struggle. They are the issues of it; and they must be settled—by no arrangement or compromise or adjustment of interests, but definitely and once for all and with a full and unequivocal acceptance of the principle that the interest of the weakest is as sacred as the interest of the strongest.

This is what we mean when we speak of a permament peace, if we speak sincerely, intelligently, and with a real knowledge and comprehension of the matter we deal with.

We are all agreed that there can be no peace obtained by any kind of bargain or compromise with the Governments of the Central Empires, because we have dealt with them already and have seen them deal with other Governments that were parties to this struggle, at Brest-Litovsk and Bucharest. They have convinced us that they are without honor and do not intend justice. They observe no covenants, accept no principle but force and their own interest. We cannot "come to terms" with them. They have made it impossible. The German people must by this time be fully aware that we cannot accept the word of those who forced this war upon us. We do not think the same thoughts or speak the same language of agreement.

It is of capital importance that we should also be explicitly agreed that no peace shall be obtained by any kind of compromise or abatement of the principles we have avowed as the principles for which we are fighting. There should exist no doubt about that. I am, therefore, going to take the liberty of speaking with the utmost frankness about the practical implications that are involved in it.

If it be indeed and in truth the common object of the Governments associated against Germany and of the nations whom they govern, as I believe it to be, to achieve by the coming settlements a secure and lasting peace, it will be necessary that all who sit down at the peace table shall come ready and willing to pay the price, the only price, that will procure it; and ready and willing, also, to create in some virile fashion the only instrumentality by which it can be made certain that the agreements of the peace will be honored and fulfilled.

That price is impartial justice in every item of the settlement, no matter whose interest is crossed; and not only impartial justice, but also the satisfaction of the several peoples whose fortunes are dealt with. That indispensable instrumentality is a league of nations formed under covenants that will be efficacious.

Without such an instrumentality, by which the peace of the world can be guaranteed, peace will rest in part upon the word of outlaws, and only upon that word. For Germany will have to redeem her character, not by what happens at the peace table but by what follows.

And, as I see it, the constitution of that league of nations and the clear definition of its objects must be a part, is in a sense the most essential part, of the peace settlement itself. It cannot be formed now. If formed now, it would be merely a new alliance confined to the nations associated against a common enemy. It is not likely that it could be formed after the settlement. It is necessary to guarantee the peace; and the peace cannot be guaranteed as an afterthought. The reason, to speak in plain terms again, why it must be guaranteed is that there will be parties to the peace whose promises have proved untrustworthy, and means must be found in connection with the peace settlement itself to remove that source of insecurity. It would be folly to leave the guarantee to the subsequent voluntary action of the Governments we have seen destroy Russia and deceive Rumania.

But these general terms do not disclose the whole matter. Some details are needed to make them sound less like a thesis and more like a practical program. These, then, are some of the particulars, and I state them with the greater confidence because I can state them authoritatively as representing this Government's interpretation of its own duty with regard to peace.

First, the impartial justice meted out must involve no discrimination between those to whom we wish to be just and those to whom we do not wish to be just. It must be a justice that plays no favorites and knows no standard but the equal rights of the several peoples concerned.

Second, no special or separate interest of any single nation or any group of nations can be made the basis of any part of the settlement which is not consistent with the common interest of all.

Third, there can be no leagues or alliances or special covenants and understandings within the general and common family of the league of nations.

Fourth, and more specifically, there can be no special, selfish economic combinations within the league and no employment of any form of economic boycott or exclusion except as the power of economic penalty by exclusion from the markets of the world may be vested in the league of nations itself as a means of discipline and control.

Fifth, all international agreements and treaties of every kind must be made known in their entirety to the rest of the world.

Special alliances and economic rivalries and hostilities have been the prolific source in the modern world of the plans and passions that produce war. It would be an insincere as well as an insecure peace that did not exclude them in definite and binding terms.

The confidence with which I venture to speak for our people in these matters does not spring from our traditions merely and the well-known principles of international action which we have always professed and followed. In the same sentence in which I say that the United States will enter into no special arrangements or understandings with particular nations let me say also that the United States is prepared to assume its full share of responsibility for the maintenance of the common covenants and understandings upon which peace must henceforth rest. We still read Washington's immortal warning against "entangling alliances" with full comprehension and an answering purpose. But only special and limited alliances entangle; and we recognize and accept the duty of a new day in which we are permitted to hope for a general alliance which will avoid entanglements and clear the air of the world for common understandings and the maintenance of common rights.

I have made this analysis of the international situation which the war has created, not, of course, because I doubted whether the leaders of the great nations and peoples with whom we are associated were of the same mind and entertained a like purpose, but because the air every now and again gets darkened by mists and groundless doubtings and mischievous perversions of counsel and it is necessary once and again to sweep all the irresponsible talk about peace intrigues and weakening morale and doubtful purpose on the part of those in authority utterly, and if need be unceremoniously, aside and say things in the plainest words that can be found, even when it is only to say over again what has been said before, quite as plainly if in less unvarnished terms.

As I have said, neither I nor any other man in governmental authority created or gave form to the issues of this war. I have simply responded to them with such vision as I could command. But I have responded gladly and with a resolution that has grown warmer and more confident as the issues have grown clearer and clearer. It is now plain that they are issues which no man can pervert unless it be wilfully. I am bound to fight for them, and happy to fight for them as time and circumstance have revealed them to me as to all the world. Our enthusiasm for them grows more and more irresistible as they stand out in more and more vivid and unmistakable outline.

And the forces that fight for them draw into closer and closer array, organize their millions into more and more unconquerable might, as they become more and more distinct to the thought and purpose of the peoples engaged. It is the peculiarity of this great war that while statesmen have seemed to cast about for definitions of their purpose and have sometimes seemed to shift their ground and their point of view, the thought of the mass of men, whom statesmen are supposed to instruct and lead, has grown more and more unclouded, more and more certain of what it is that they are fighting for. National purposes have fallen more and more into the background and the common purpose of enlightened mankind has taken their place. The counsels of plain men have become on all hands more simple and straightforward and more unified than the counsels of sophisticated men of affairs, who still retain the impression that they are playing a game of power and playing for high stakes. That is why I have said that this is a peoples' war, not a statesmen's. Statesmen must follow the clarified common thought or be broken.

I take that to be the significance of the fact that assemblies and associations of many kinds made up of plain workaday people have demanded, almost every time they came together, and are still demanding, that the leaders of their Governments declare to them plainly what it is, exactly what it is, that they are seeking in this war, and what they think the items of the final setlement should be. They are not yet satisfied with what they have been told. They still seem to fear that they are getting what they ask for only in statesmen's terms,—only in the terms of territorial arrangements and divisions of power, and not in terms of broad-visioned justice and mercy and peace and the satisfaction of those deep-seated longings of oppressed and distracted men and women and enslaved peoples that seem to them the only things worth fighting a war for that engulfs the world. Perhaps statesmen have not always recognized this changed aspect of the whole world of policy and action. Perhaps they have not always spoken in direct reply to the questions asked because they did not know how searching those questions were and what sort of answers they demanded.

But I, for one, am glad to attempt the answer again and again, in the hope that I may make it clearer and clearer that my one thought is to satisfy those who struggle in the ranks and are, perhaps above all others, entitled to a reply whose meaning no one can have any excuse for misunderstanding, if he understands the language in which it is spoken or can get someone to translate it correctly into his own. And I believe that the leaders of the Governments with which we are associated will speak, as they have occasion, as plainly as I have tried to speak. I hope that they will feel free to say whether they think that I am in any degree mistaken in my interpretation of the issues involved or in my purpose with regard to the means by which a satisfactory settlement of those issues may be obtained. Unity of purpose and of counsel are as imperatively necessary in this war as was unity of command in the battlefield; and with perfect unity of purpose and counsel will come assurance of complete victory. It can be had in no other way. "Peace drives" can be effectively neutralized and silenced only by showing that every victory of the nations associated against Germany brings the nations nearer the sort of peace which will bring security and reassurance to all peoples and make the recurrence of another such struggle of pitiless force and bloodshed forever impossible, and that nothing else can. Germany is constantly intimating the "terms" she will accept; and always finds that the world does not want terms. It wishes the final triumph of justice and fair dealing.

The President's address thrilled the vast audience. On every side it has been considered one of his finest utterances, noble in its conception, and splendid in the vision which it raises.

France.—In an issue of La Croix, M. Jean Guiraud points out two new dangers to liberty of education in France. The first danger is found in the fact that the Government has published a circular addressed to all the prefets of France, in which they are directed to make an investigation with a view to discovering what free schools, as distinguished from public schools, can be turned into military hospitals for the wounded soldiers of the Allies. M. Guiraud declares that Catholics are willing to give up their schools for this purpose; in fact, they have done so in many instances, since the beginning of the war; but he calls on the Government not to retain such schools unless it is absolutely necessary. He insists also that the burden of furnishing buildings for hospital purposes should fall with equal, or even greater, heaviness on Governmental institutions, since they are the property of the nation. He says very clearly:

Liberty of Education

To act otherwise would be to pursue the war on free education, by depriving it, of set purpose, of every means of carrying it on, and hypocritically to sow civil discord under the fallacious pretext of the union sacrée and national defense. We ask the Government, therefore, to give over to free education those schools of which there is not absolute need, and not to take over others, without making similar requisitions, in a true spirit of justice and impartiality, on the side of public education.

The other danger is scarcely less grave. "The enemies of the free schools," continues the editor of La Croix, "have another means of interfering with their continuance under the pretext of national defense." Of late years the French have been accustomed to send their children to the schools and colleges under the direction of religious, which, since the expulsion of the religious from France, have been established outside of France, for instance, in Spain and Switzerland. The beneficial influence of these educational establishments has been recognized officially by the Government.

But the continuance of these schools and colleges is menaced by measures which are stupid in their brutality. All the children who attend them, even those of only ten or twelve years, are required to have passports in order to pass the frontier, and these passports are granted under such arbitrary conditions that, oftener than not, both families and children find it impossible to procure them.

La Croix admits the necessity of taking precautions, but protests against the policy of depriving these exiled teachers of any chance of receiving scholars and the children's parents of their right of free choice in the matter of education.

Ireland.—On September 25 the Irish Parliamentary Party met in Dublin and adopted these resolutions, which were supported by all the members, except Captain Gwynn, who refused adherence to the views concerning conscription:

The Irish Party and Conscription

That the continued threat of conscription, combined with the policy of coercion carried out by wholesale arrests, seizures, suppression by imprisonment, deportation without definite charges or trials, and by outrageous sentences inflicted by court martial for nominal or trivial offenses, has created a feeling of profound indignation throughout the length and breadth of Ireland, and has evoked the strongest indignation among all sections of the people;

That such a policy, if persisted in, can serve no other end than to strengthen and intensify the existing resentment against misgovernment, coercion and military rule in this country;

That we protest in the strongest possible manner against the continuance of this policy, as the very negation of liberty and of all those principles of freedom and right for which the Allied nations profess to be in arms;

That we, therefore, call upon the Government forthwith to abandon both conscription and coercion in Ireland, and warn them that persistence in their present policy is fraught with most far-reaching and dangerous consequences, both to Ireland and the Allied cause;

That we still adhere to the position we took up at the beginning of the war, that the principles for which the Allies are fighting are those of liberty and justice, but we recognize that the policy of the British Government since the war began has completely shaken the confidence of our people that those principles are to be given effect in Ireland, and in our opinion the only effective method of restoring that confidence is to apply those principles to Ireland without delay when, we are convinced, there will be ready and voluntary response from the people to the cause of the Allies.

A short time after this statement was made public the New York Clan-na-Gael petitioned President Wilson to "demand of England the immediate concession of Ireland's righteous claim for freedom." The resolution was premised by the statement that 1,500,000 men of Irish blood were in arms against Germany.

The Dublin Leader, commenting upon existing conditions declares "England's policy in Ireland is rushing down a cul de sac and she will have to turn back sooner or later." The paper goes on to say that if a general election is declared, Irish constituencies will return the Irishmen held in British jails without definite charge and without trial. Then, says the editor, "Lloyd George will have to eat not only the leek, but the German plot."

John Ireland, Archbishop and Patriot

RICHARD H. TIERNEY, S.J.

JOHN IRELAND is dead: the zealous Archbishop and great patriot lies among lowly people in a humble grave in Calvary, on the outskirts of St. Paul. A heart that pulsed with a thousand vital interests is stilled forever, and the country is mourning a noble man who for more than half a century upheld the priestly dignity and the honor of American citizenship with unmatched power. Soldier, patriot, Bishop and Archbishop, the "Lion of the Northwest" was distinguished in each sphere. A fearless, godly man, keen of intellect, strong of will, a relentless yet chivalrous opponent, he left an indelible impression on all he touched, for Archbishop Ireland was a great man among the greatest men. When shall we see his like again?

Years ago, in 1861, long before many of the captains of the present generation were born, he was set down in a northwestern wilderness, a young and inexperienced priest, among hardy pioneers little accustomed to the luxuries of life or the refinements of metropolitan society. He was to make his way, a priest's difficult and anxious way, amongst a new people. He did it well, as only he could do it. Hardly were the sacred oils dry on his consecrated hands before he became a hero. The roar of cannon and the blare of trumpet had been hurried to St. Paul on a wind that blew northward from southern battlefields. The Union was endangered and strong men were needed to preserve it. John Ireland stepped into the ranks, and for a fateful year, until he was prostrated by fever, he distinguished himself by service in the field and hospital, a ministering angel to the sturdy soldiers of the famous Fifth Minnesota Regiment.

Home once again, he took up his priestly duties in St. Paul and after a lapse of ten years was consecrated auxiliary Bishop, at that place. This was his opportunity and he did not miss it. In the larger sphere that is a bishop's, he exerted his great powers of mind and heart with such good effect that on May 15, 1888, he was named Archbishop of St. Paul. The choice was a happy one, both for the Northwest and the country at large. For he was a man of so far a vision and so high an ambition that he was not content to wrestle with the problems that lay under his hand. His eye swept the country and saw its needs, wants that he felt he could in a measure meet, and strong with the strength of honest conviction and high resolve, he went down into the arena and stayed there, giving and taking the blows of a warrior until at last he heard the rustle of the dark reaper's wings and retreated from the fray to meet with courage and peace the foe which no man, however brave, can conquer, death. And all the while that he struggled with great national problems, were they principles or men, he was marvelously faithful to his work at home.

From a rather insignificant diocese with few churches and a scattered flock, St. Paul grew into a great archdiocese. Suffragan bishop was added to suffragan bishop, schools and colleges were opened in sufficient numbers to supply growing needs, a great seminary was inaugurated for candidates to the priesthood, Minneapolis was given a splendid pro-cathedral, and the lofty hill of St. Paul was crowned by a majestic basilica worthy of the genius of the Archbishop and the generosity of his devoted people.

Mgr. Ireland has done well by his beloved Northwest, but no less well by the United States. It was characteristic of the man that he would not, and perhaps could not, allow his plans to be carried into effect in St. Paul only. It was this disposition of soul that first brought him into permanent fame amongst his countrymen. History or legend has it that one night, in 1889, three drunken men staggered into his house and thrust into his hand a scrap of paper on which was written: "For God's sake, found a temperance society." The story is at least well invented; at any rate, a total abstinence, not a temperance society, was founded, and the Archbishop went up and down the country teaching by word and example the great worth of voluntary total abstinence, a Catholic practice sharply delimited from un-Catholic Prohibition which is founded on a false philosophy abhorrent to Catholic instincts, doctrines and customs.

All this time the Catholic population of the United States was growing by leaps and bounds, both by reason of a high birth-rate and immigration which Archbishop Ireland helped to promote by bringing colonists to this country. As a consequence of this rapid expansion, the energy of bishops and priests was exhausted in building churches and schools. But Catholic life does not entirely consist of churches and schools. These are but means to an end: there are other things just as important: national policies, for instance, and co-ordination of effort for the salvation of souls. Such had been sadly neglected; men were too busy to think of difficulties other than those at their doors. Not so Archbishop Ireland; he saw a thousand strings swaying in a thousand different breezes in a thousand different parts of this great country, and with one or two equally acute friends he resolved that those strings should be knit together to serve a definite far-reaching purpose. The results of this determination were Catholic congresses at Baltimore, in 1889, and at Chicago, in 1893. The history of these noted assemblies is too well known to bear repetition. One remark, however, is not out of place. Much of the fruit they bore can now be laid at the feet of the dead prelate of St. Paul, in tribute of his greatness.

There are other testimonials, too, that would lend dignity to his bier, already dignified by the form of a masterful man. For it is a singular honor to have had a guiding hand in the foundation of the Catholic University, and in that splendid achievement John Ireland's hand was firm and sure. It is a tribute to learning, eloquence and patriotism to have been chosen by the United States Government to go to France to represent this country at the unveiling of the Joan of Arc statue. Archbishop Ireland was given that privilege, and that he did well by his native land is attested by even the bitter anti-clerical press, which paid him the best compliment it knew, that he was like unto the great orators of the Revolution. But these were small events in his career; the minor notes, perchance the thin undertones in his song of triumph. Compare such successes with those of the crowded years of 1889 to 1895, when, in a mighty exuberance of zeal, he labored so tactfully and fruitfully with the beloved Cardinal of Baltimore, in the interests of oppressed and restless labor. This was a prolonged and important effort, but there were other efforts less lengthy, perhaps, but no less important. There was Cahenslyism, in the eyes of some thoughtful men a base, if subtle, form of German propaganda which was making even religion an instrument for the extension of Prussianism; in the view of others, an odious scheme that at best would work out in irreparable dissensions. A group of factious men without due warrant from heaven or earth, tried to set up Bishops in the United States, for people speaking foreign tongues, principally German. Time has shown all that the plan was mischievous, but Archbishop Ireland did not wait on time. Forthwith he scented danger and threw all his energy into opposition. He came off victorious, thereby saving the sterling Americanism of the Church and at the same time vindicating the intelligence and zeal of our Bishops, who in his own words "are fully able to ward off any foreign invasion in the Church and to maintain it on thoroughly American lines."

> Our country is not a Poland, to be partitioned at the good pleasure of foreigners. We have, under Peter's successor, our autonomy, and for the sake of the American Church and the American Republic we will retain autonomy.

Cahenslyism died an ignominious death and happily there has been no resurrection. Meantime, Irish, Germans, Poles and Italians have become good Americans and have kept the Faith to boot.

Archbishop Ireland was now at the height of his power and fame. And, truth to tell, he needed a deal of both to carry him through the great school controversy which began in 1891. It was a heroic battle, in which hard blows were freely given. All well-read men know its origin, progress and end, the last a complete, if slow, vindication of a fundamental Catholic principle, a Catholic education for Catholic children. Whatever men thought of Mgr. Ireland's original attitude in this controversy, there is no one who now doubts his sincerity or deprecates his later pronouncements. In June, 1915, the national convention of the Catholic Educational Association of America was held in St. Paul, and Archbishop Ireland was listed to give the opening discourse. Some of those present that day had been too young to appreciate the drift of the controversy of 1891, but they had heard of it, and now that years and education had added to their maturity, they were keen to watch every word of the prelate, in order that no phase of his ethics might elude their intellects.

He came into the sanctuary, a man of heroic stature, magnificent in purple robes, and with unborrowed and unartificial dignity ascended the pulpit, stood silent for an instant and then made the great cathedral ring with Matthew xxvii: 19, 20. Another pause, and the basilica resounded with these memorable words:

> I tell, in His words, the injunction of the Saviour to His Church, even to the consummation of the world. I tell the reason of the proclamation which today is that of the Catholic Church in the United States of America: Catholic schools for Catholic children.

What more was needed? Here was the prelate's true self pleading for the right upbringing of his children. Yet more was given. From period to period flowed the eloquent discourse, a complete and accurate statement of Catholic ethics and theology on the subject of education. And it was a sincere pronouncement: the words fell burning from the speaker's lips. Now he stood erect, hands aloft, and thundered his fine periods; again he bent swift and low in the pulpit, almost as an eagle swoops, and pleaded that Christ's children be brought up in Christ and for Christ, through schools Catholic in all ways. His mind was made clear beyond peradventure of misunderstanding or misinterpretation. By the natural law, the right and obligation of educating children pertains to their parents, not to the State, whose function, save under exceptional circumstances, is limited to the assistance necessary for the proper accomplishment of the parental duty. Such the trend of thought in that sermon of June 19,1915, and no one was found to carp at it. The controversy of 1891 had sifted thought, and sound doctrine remained. The same too can be said of Americanism which was magnified out of all proportion to its importance by a clamor raised in France.

And now all is peace again and John Ireland is dead, and his death is a national calamity. Maybe this peace is also, for those conditions are morbid in which men are unwilling to strike hard for principles. Such was not the disposition of the "Lion of the Northwest." Militant for the Church he was equally militant for the State. Throughout his long and busy life he identified himself with all worthy civic movements and gave of his means and his strength in their support.

As late as 1908 when pacifists were numerous, blatant and popular, he appeared before the House Committee on Military Affairs and pleaded for preparedness in these words:

I believe and I have always believed, that the best way to have peace is to be ready for war. A good deal is said nowadays, perhaps too much, against the army and against the spirit of war. The idea of universal peace is very good, but to make it a gospel is a mistake.

And in May, last year, he bade this farewell to the soldiers of Minnesota:

We congratulate you. It is a privilege that which is now given you to be the soldiers of America, to suffer to defend its flag, to carry it far and wide without stain or reproach to it, to make any sacrifice for it.

Next to God is country, and next to loyalty to God is loyalty to country. The man should not live who does not love and cherish his country. To speak of America is to speak of the greatest nation among nations; to defend America is to defend not only the nation that protects you, that nurtures you, but the nation that stands in the universe for the highest ideals, the noblest principles governing mankind.

Splendid words, but then none other could be expected from Archbishop Ireland, who on August 11, 1913, had said:

My civil and political faith is that of the republic of the United States of America. Americanism purest and brightest, yielding in strength and loyalty to the Americanism of no other American, surpassed in spirit of obedience and sacrifice by that of none other citizen, none other soldier, sworn to uphold in peace and in war America's Star Spangled Banner.

Here was a man indeed. But, alas, the final taps have sounded for the soldier-prelate: he is at rest, not in the lofty cathedral that tops St. Anthony's hill, but in a poor grave, in humble Calvary, among those whom death has caught up from the hard and obscure ways of life. "Let me lie out there with my people under the green sod of Calvary. It is my wish," and his wish was respected. For a while, summer suns and winter rains will beat upon that little mound, and soon nothing mortal will be left of John Ireland, Archbishop and patriot. But yet he will live, for young men less exalted than he have caught his spirit of strong Christian knighthood, and they will transmit that spirit to others, even to him, let us hope, who will see the last ship of Tarsus and hear the sound of the last shuttle in the far Northwest which Archbishop Ireland magnified and glorified by his life and labors, in preparation for the day when the light of God's face would begin to shine on his brow forever and the music of the golden harps to resound in his soul for eternity.

The Basis for a Catholic Daily Paper

MICHAEL WILLIAMS

AMONG the many letters which I have received since AMERICA began printing my articles on Catholic publicity there was one of such importance as to demand a special consideration. Its writer is Mr. Louis Fusz, a veteran member of the St. Vincent de Paul Society, who has himself thought so earnestly on the subject of Catholic journalism, and so fruitfully that he set himself to the writing and publication of a pamphlet entitled, "A Plan for a Catholic Daily Press." A copy of this pamphlet is before me as I write, together with Mr. Fusz's letter, in which he says:

In the June 8 number (of AMERICA) you urge the creation of a central bureau to gather news of Catholic interest or correct misstatements and offer same to the secular daily press for publication, a movement to be desired; but in my opinion we need a Catholic daily press to create or maintain a Catholic atmosphere among our people and the general public.

Now, in giving Mr. Fusz's contribution to our subject that special consideration which I say it deserves, there are three points which offer shining opportunities for discussion. The first point is, that Mr. Fusz, a practical business man, a veteran worker in practical Catholic social work, belongs to that large and constantly growing body of thinkers who maintain the thesis that the creation of a Catholic daily press in the English language is the paramount issue of Catholic social action in the United States. The second point is, that he offers suggestions for a plan of operation to obtain a Catholic daily press. The third point is that, though Mr. Fusz approves of a publicity bureau, he places the need for a Catholic daily press above the need for the publicity bureau; yet at the same time, in his own plan for organizing the daily press he makes the creation of a central bureau for news gathering and distribution an essential part of his plan.

The importance of the first of these points speaks for itself. It means that sooner or later we are going to have Catholic daily newspapers. Since there is a large and, as I believe, constantly growing number of thoughtful Catholic men and women who believe in the need for a Catholic daily press, who are thinking out ways and means for establishing it, praying for it, and offering their Holy Communions for it, it follows, I hold, that a Catholic daily press we shall have. Faith is a creative force, for good and for evil. A mere handful of men and women belonging to a small and wildly heretical sect "held the thought," as their own vernacular would put the case, of a great, national, nay, even an international, daily newspaper which should forcefully and skilfully express and disseminate their heresy, and they quickly and efficiently "demonstrated," as they themselves would say. Result, the Christian Science Monitor, plus a Christian Science news bureau and publicity service, stretching from Boston to San Francisco, and beyond the seas into other lands. Well, we have been slow, but most assuredly we have faith—aye, praised be the goodness of God, we have the Faith: the Faith of everlasting and invincible Truth: the Faith and the Truth that shall continue and triumph in the face of no matter what efficient and businesslike and smartly organized sects and heresies and all the mighty powers of the new paganism. Sooner or later there is bound to be a manifestation of our faith in that form which the time and the conditions in our own loved country so clearly call for, the Catholic daily press.

As to the second point of Mr. Fusz's letter which I have marked for discussion, his plan for realizing his faith, space forbids me to explain it here in detail. In substance, however, he proposes the formation of a national religious society headed by our Bishops, composed of parish branches in every diocese. There would be two classes of members. The first, general class would be composed of men and women who would pledge themselves to subscribe for the nearest daily paper published by the society; to give some at least of their advertising to it, when they happened to be advertisers; to patronize those who did advertise in the Catholic paper; to report interesting news to such papers. Members of the society living in country districts outside the reach of the daily papers would similarly support their diocesan weeklies, these being also published by the national society. The second class of members would be those who would combine to form a corporation chartered to do a general publishing business, capitalized at a figure judged by these incorporators to be adequate; the shares to be of small denomination, so as to be within the means of large numbers; the controlling interest in the stock to be a voting trust in the hands of the proper ecclesiastical authorities, in order to insure the permanency of the purpose of the society.

Concerning this plan as a whole, I should say that it appears to me to be something like the organization which might eventually be evolved as the result of the successful operation of individual daily papers springing up here and there and gradually combining their forces and perfecting a system for the chain publication of a larger number of papers. In other words, I do not believe that we could successfully launch a great national organization composed of parish branches. There is too much indifference; there is soo sluggish and too stodgy a mass of widespread ignorance of our duty; all of which must first be leavened and then done away with by campaigns of education.

Moreover—and now I reach my third point, which, I believe, brings us to the crux of the whole problem—Mr. Fusz himself perceives that as soon as the practical workers of his proposed society got busy they would be obliged by the logical necessities of the case to set up the very thing for which I have been contending, and which I believe should precede the establishment of the daily press, namely, the news bureau: an organization for gathering and distributing Catholic news and views.

Let us pause here and ask ourselves this question. Suppose a Catholic millionaire should give $1,000,000 tomorrow (it is a wild and whirling supposition, I know, but let us exercise our imagination), to found a Catholic daily, what would he or his editors put in the paper? Or, suppose that a group of earnest, poor Catholics, or a society, scraped together a few dollars, and got out a small daily paper, what would they put in their paper? I give these two suppositions, because there are two schools of thought about the Catholic daily, one, namely, which sees it a big, wealthy, up-to-date affair, rivaling the great secular papers, nay, even utterly eclipsing them; the other urging the publication of small, modest papers. Yes, I repeat, what would either of these groups put in their paper? Why, Catholic news, of course, do I hear somebody reply? All right, but now I ask another question: Where are they going to get their news? Or, more to the point, how are they going to get their news?

Now, perhaps, to most people, this question will not seem difficult to answer; nor will they see the mass of problems which its consideration presents to the man who has had practical newspaper experience. Most people seem to think that news just happens, and gets itself automatically recorded morning and evening in the papers. Those who have a partial knowledge of the press are aware of the existence of reporters, but that is about as far as they get; and for most people the image of the reporter has come to them from the stage or cheap magazine: the image of a brisk, preternaturally acute young man, a cigarette dangling from his lower lips, notebook and pencil in hand. As for envisioning the exceedingly complex, exceedingly costly, constantly changing and diversifying machinery, with its local, national, and international ramifications, through which modern newspapers operate, and without which they cannot operate, well, they simply don't see it at all.

Let us go one step further with our supposition. Let us suppose that our philanthropic millionaire, or our enthusiastic group, has started a Catholic daily. A staff of editors, writers, and reporters has been organized. So too has a business staff. The editors, reporters, and writers are well chosen, and competent persons. And they gather the Catholic news of their city, and present it well; and they gather the non-Catholic news of their city, or such of it as they can handle without tongs or garbage hooks or gas masks, and present it well. All right, but what of State news, inter-State news, national news, international news? Where are they going to get it? How are they going to get it?

Oh, says somebody, the forthcoming Catholic daily will buy a paper with an Associated Press or United Press or International Press or Universal Press or Scripps-McRae franchise and service. Then it will have its inter-State, its national and international news.

But would it be Catholic news? Do the existing press agencies pay adequate attention to Catholic news? How does the Associated Press, for example, get its news? Through its own reporters in the larger cities and towns, supplemented with the news gathered by the Associated Press papers, collected by the "A. P." offices in each city, and "swapped" around. And as a very large num-ther indeed of our existing daily papers are owned, controlled, and operated in the interests of Jews, Protestants, or neo-pagans, such papers pay but small attention to Catholic news and Catholic views. Remember, also, that "news" is not always, or perhaps not even mainly an objective, positive thing. On the contrary, a great deal of "news" consists of happenings, actions, and opinions, as understood and expressed for others to understand, by men and women who judge all things from at least a non-Catholic view, if not an anti-Catholic view. For instance, take a divorce among "prominent people." Such an event, as its details are gathered by a non-Catholic "lady reporter" with a personal axe to grind in the interests of "liberty of life," illustrated by a comic artist, to whom it's all a huge, libidinous joke, headlined and edited by a copyreader "who knows what his paper wants," published in the paper of an editor who is paying alimony to two wives because he married a third who was rich; such an event, I say, may be "news," but is it Catholic news? This is of course a very extreme case; but let us take something else. Let us take the case of a labor controversy reported, written, and edited from either a capitalistic or Socialistic point of view, but ignoring, as ninety-nine out of a hundred reports do ignore, the Catholic point of view, the point of view of Leo XIII, and of all sound Catholic sociology, based on the rock of everlasting Truth, such "news," I say, is typical of the kind of news supplied by the great agencies to their clients. In short, "news" in the final deduction depends for its "tendency," for the force of its lessons, explicit or implicit, upon the philosophy or religion, or lack of either, of those who make it, who report it, and who sell and distribute it. This is the great, fundamental truth about the power of the press. This is why, for a menacing example, Germany tried to get control of the news agencies of other countries. The "color" which "news" assumes; the policies which it is manipulated to support; its texture, its appeal, its power or lack of power—everything at bottom is a question of the mode of thought of those who gather and distribute it.

This is why I, as a practical newspaper man, cry out so loudly for the formation of a really practical and solidly organized Catholic news bureau, nationally and internationally organized. This is why I believe such a news gathering and distributing system must come before the formation of daily papers.

With such a news bureau at work, its product, news dispatches, local, national, and foreign; special articles, editorial interviews, etc., etc., would be at first distributed among our existing Catholic weeklies, causing an immense improvement, and among secular papers, causing at least a Catholic tinge to appear here and there. Then, with this agency at its back, some brave and vigorous diocesan weekly paper will take the plunge and become a daily, or a brand-new daily will be started. If such an experiment should succeed, and, if properly handled, it will succeed, other weeklies, or other newspapers, will follow the successful example. They will be bound together for cooperative national action by the central bureau, but left free for local action, each following out its own local method or policy, so we shall have at last Catholic daily papers from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from Canada to Mexico, acting in conjunction with their allied weekly papers in the more thinly populated districts.

A really efficient news gathering and news distributing system, then, is the necessary and indispensable foundation not only for immediate and widespread Catholic publicity, but also for the Catholic daily press.

The Discoverer of Christian Science

FRANCES BEATTIE

THOUGH Christian Science was "discovered" by a woman, it is decreed that no other woman shall ever come to the fore with a new scientific revelation, and the head of the Publishing Society must likewise be a man. That question has been forever settled. When Mrs. Mary Baker Glover Patterson Eddy was "impelled by a power not one's own" to write the "Church Manual" the Divine impulse did not stop there. It continued to dictate other things, all of which are published and sold by the Christian Science Publishing Society, and, incidentally, are a source of great income to the Mother Church. In one of her numerous volumes, "Miscellany," Mrs. Eddy reprints an interview given by her to the New York Herald, May 1, 1901, in which she says: (page 343) "You would ask, perhaps, whether my successor will be a woman or a man. I can answer that. It will be a man," but Mrs. Eddy added that she could not name the man at that time. Whereat there was a great furore in Science circles. Every man high in the councils of the discoverer began to preen his feathers and get ready for an ascension to the throne of the leader. But Mrs. Eddy quickly corrected this error by giving an interview to the Associated Press, May 16, 1901, which she also reprints in "Miscellany" (page 346): "I did say that a man would be my successor. By this I did not mean any man today on earth." Thereat her male followers were cast down.

"Has Mrs. Eddy a successor?" I asked of a reading-room attendant. "Are her powers delegated to the present pastor of the Mother Church?" That official was plainly displeased and answered peevishly:

"Your own common sense should answer that: Could there be another Jesus? Mrs. Eddy discovered Science and gave it to us. It is our part to develop it, according to the power that is in us. Science can never be discovered again. There can never be another Leader."

While the Divine power took so particular a care of the finances of Mrs. Eddy, even to the point of declaring through Mrs. Eddy, of course, that should the preaching and teaching of Christian Science cease, the property should revert to the heirs of Mrs. Eddy, it paid little attention to guiding her footsteps prior to her discovery of Science. The deed of trust, conveying land for the church edifice ("Church Manual," page 133:10), ordains that:

> Whenever said directors shall determine that it is inexpedient to maintain preaching, reading or speaking in said church in accordance with the terms of this deed, they are authorized and required to reconvey forthwith said lot of land with the building thereon to Mary Baker G. Eddy, her heirs and assigns forever by a proper deed of conveyance.

While the Divine power, working through Mrs. Eddy, provided that the profits of the Christian Science Publishing Society should be given to the Mother Church, and gave power to the Board of Directors to expend the funds, it is not at all unlikely that it was never intended that the vast funds should be used to finance a campaign against all things Catholic. To such uses, however, have the funds been used, for it is admitted that all deficits of the anti-Catholic Monitor are met from these funds. Special correspondents traveling broadcast in the furtherance of an anti-Catholic campaign, even the agents of the "Business Committee," might well be used as agents to promote this intolerance and abuse, all under the terms laid down by the Divine thought that whispered constantly into the ears of Mrs. Eddy minute details regarding the finances of the church which she founded.

Mrs. Eddy herself probably never dreamed that the Christian Science Church would enter into such a campaign. On page 303 of "Miscellany" she declares that "Christian Scientists have no quarrel with Protestants, Catholics or any other sect." True, she forbade the teaching of Christian Science to Roman Catholics, "without the written consent of the authority of their Church," though she "left to the wisdom of the practitioner" the choice of healing people of all sects. The first husband of Mrs. Eddy, George Washington Glover, was a Freemason, and that fact may have something to do with the fear Mrs. Eddy seemed to have of teaching Science to the Catholic people!

Her second husband, Dr. Daniel Patterson, described some years ago by McClure's Magazine as "an itinerant dentist," was divorced by the founder of the Christian Science Church. Mrs. Eddy could never quite reconcile herself to the thought that Patterson was itinerant, and in "Miscellany" she describes his staying qualities and higher attainments. She says, page 314: "Although as McClure's Magazine claims, the court record may state that my divorce from Dr. Patterson was granted on the ground of desertion, the cause, nevertheless, was adultery." She relates that an irate husband was about to have Daniel arrested for eloping with his wife, and that when this evidence was introduced "the court instructed the clerk to record the divorce in my favor." Later, she avers that she reconciled the couple whom the gay Daniel had separated, and she gives Dr. Patterson a graceful exit by declaring that she "lived with him peaceably and he was kind up to the time of the divorce."

Page 268 of "Miscellany" gives an article on the "Prevention and Cure of Divorce." So, had Daniel Patterson lived long enough, and had Asa Gilbert Eddy, the third husband, not put in an appearance, the Christian Science Church might not have been compelled to go down into history as a church invented and founded by a divorced woman.

In some churches it might be a trifle difficult to accept a divorcee as the instrument of Divine power to discover a new religion. True, it should not be too difficult for Mr. Frederick Dixon of London, England, made famous by the Church of Henry VIII. In fact, Mr. Dixon now and then shows a queer fondness for the Church of England. He writes and waxes wroth at the very mention of the name of Cardinal O'Connell, and seems possessed of a haunting fear that the Cardinal has designs on the politics of America, with the Pope aiding and abetting from Rome. But he does not at all mind the approach of the Archbishop of York to American shores. Rather, Mr. Dixon delights in the prospect, declaring in an editorial last March that "the mission of the Archbishop of York to the United States is a keen reminder that there are other than material forces at work in binding the English-speaking races together."

When Mr. Dixon poisons the columns of the Monitor, however, with imaginary tales of the Catholic Hierarchy following the example set by the Scientists, the Methodists and the other dissenting brethren, and interfering in politics, he throws up his hands in holy horror at the very thought that he is launching an anti-Catholic campaign. In an editorial, "The Collar Black and Chestnut Wig," printed in the Christian Science Monitor, March 21, Mr. Dixon said, in speaking of Canadian politics:

> If it would not be asking too much, it would be interesting if Mr. Murphy would inform the house the next time he speaks where he procured the information that the Christian Science Monitor was engaged in launching an anti-Roman Catholic campaign. . . . We have a suspicion that Mr. Murphy's information must have growed, like Topsy, out of his imagination.

Let us see. Not many weeks ago Mr. Dixon advised a fellow-journalist to study certain issues of the Christian Science Monitor for light on the anti-Catholic movement. He also advised careful reading of the Monitor, as very many more such articles would follow. The issues of the Monitor to which Mr. Dixon referred the journalist were placed, in large numbers, for free distribution in the reading rooms of the Science Church, scattered throughout this country, and it is presumed such free distribution was also accorded to European reading rooms. The papers containing the articles in question were also marked and mailed to the editors of the country and were distributed liberally through the public schools.

Mr. Dixon would like to know how the information that the Christian Science Monitor was engaged in launching an anti-Catholic campaign was procured. Let the answer be a reference to the Monitor. For convenience, taking the issue of June 13 last, the front page contains an article from the eastern bureau of the Christian Science Monitor, bearing the title, "Benefits from the Wilson Mexican Address Forecast." It is dated New York, and is of sufficient importance to be styled a "special" to the Monitor. It gives an interview with Manuel Carpio, editor of Le Voz de la Revolution, of Yucatan. From it it is only necessary to quote the last paragraph:

> Mr. Carpio said that Carranza's chief opposition came from the Roman Catholics, who fought him because he, like President Juarez, had done his best to separate them as a Church from the affairs of State, and especially from public education. He said also that the chief reason why Carranza was promoting democracy, freedom and the education of the masses was the fact that centuries of control of education by the Roman Catholic clericals had still left ninety-five per cent of the common people illiterate.

Page 7 of the same issue of the Monitor contains another special, this time through its western bureau, at Chicago. The article is entitled "Church and State Opposed," and relates the righteous political activity of a certain set of Methodist, Baptist and other ministers, banded together as the "Chicago Church Federation Council." The Monitor says the Council represents 600 individual churches, its President being Herbert L. Willett, a member of the faculty of the theological school of the University of Chicago. Considerable space is given the article, and the Monitor declares:

> The practice which has grown up in Cook County, as in fact in many places all over the United States, of appropriating large sums of money for services performed by sectarian institutions in taking care of dependent children of the county, was laid before the Church Federation Council by Rev. W. S. Fleming, Superintendent of the Methodist Mutual Aid Union of Chicago. This organization handles Methodist charity work in Chicago. Mr. Fleming came into the case through study of it as chairman of a committee on public funds and sectarian institutions of the Chicago Methodist Ministers Meeting, and also of a similar committee of the Rock River Methodist Conference, including Chicago.

The Monitor prints the resolutions passed by these worthy brethren, one of them declaring that "We hold that such use of public funds is in effect a union of Church and State . . . and thus a violation of the constitutions of both the United States and the State of Illinois."

In its attempt to "separate" Church and State, the Monitor adds:

> The foregoing resolutions were transmitted to Mr. Fleming in the following communication:
> "My Dear Mr. Fleming: The attitude of the churches of Chicago toward the sectarian appropriation of public funds, and toward the recent decision of the Supreme Court of Illinois in the case of Dunn vs. Chicago Industrial School for Girls, is seen in the enclosed resolutions, which were adopted today by unanimous vote. Fraternally yours,
> "HERBERT L. WILLETT."

The Monitor concludes:

> Both of these letters were forwarded, in copy, to Protestant ministers in the Fifth Judicial District of Illinois last week, in connection with the campaign of Judge C. C. Craig for re-election to the State Supreme Court. Judge Craig was a member of the court when it handed down the decision objected to.

You see, to Mr. Dixon, good Scientist that he is, it matters a lot whose ox is gored. It is praiseworthy business for the Protestant clergy to circularize the Protestant members requesting them to defeat a judge who had done justice to Catholic orphans, but a like condition in Catholic circles would invite the wrath of the gods. Being a Scientist, Mr. Dixon may not be able to see the fine Italian hand running through the pages of the Monitor, furnishing proof of the fact that it is diligently engaged in conducting an anti-Catholic campaign of calumny.

The Report on Religious Prejudices

HAROLD HALL

THE final report of the Commission on Religious Prejudices has been placed before the public in pamphlet form by the Knights of Columbus. Col. P. H. Callahan in the foreword explains that the commission's activities did not bear upon the individual, personal sentiment of prejudice, but upon the collective or "social sentiment which moves in waves and comes and goes in periods." Not surrendering anything due Catholic citizens, the Commission in its labor stressed citizenship, and asked all Americans without distinction of creed to combat the professional propagandist. A direct appeal to the American spirit of fair play sums up the attitude adopted. It is the conviction of the members of the Commission that even before the war came upon the land the backbone of the anti-Catholic campaign had been broken. It was still running in the eventful April of 1917, but running on waning momentum only.

> For instance when the Commission was created there were about sixty anti-Catholic papers appearing in different parts of the country. Many of them had a very wide circulation, from 100,000 to nearly 1,500,000. At the beginning of the year 1917 there were only two or three of these being issued. The year the Commission was created anti-Catholic legislation in one or another form was attempted in over forty legislatures. Within the last year (1917) only five such efforts have been made.

According to the opinion of the Commission, the wave of intolerance always follows definite lines. Its spirit is one of hate and passionate malice; its aim, the destruction of reputations and the shattering of ideals. Its promoters are men with small good to their credit, unscrupulous and scheming; they stoop to extremely dishonest means, playing one prejudice against another until the public is really victimized. "The real bigots are relatively few." Such is the conclusion reached by the men who formed the Commission and who found that no class of citizens in America was unwilling to listen to a calm statement of the Catholic position.

It is well pointed out that what is put on trial during the excitement of an anti-Catholic campaign is not the Catholic Church. She is above and beyond the weapons of her enemies. Her life is secured to her by Divine assurance, her rock-ribbed foundation can weather any storm, and no movement, however strong, can endanger her ultimate success. Democratic citizenship is really what is endangered by the bigoted propagandist. You cannot have cooperation and community spirit in a small community, or in a big nation, if all the citizens are not given the credit for good-will, if the religious test is made the criterion of patriotism. The dominant note running through the entire report seems to be the need of bringing all citizens together to discuss their differences. As an instance of the good accomplished by such a peace plan, the report cites the example of the Committee of One Hundred that convened in Buffalo in 1916 at the suggestion of Rev. L. O. Williams, Universalist pastor of the Church of the Messiah. There were fifty Catholics and fifty Protestants and an executive committee of ten was formed from the entire group which formulated the following manifesto:

We, the undersigned citizens of Buffalo, desiring to remove all religious intolerance from our city, believe the task of overcoming such a spirit can be undertaken only "with malice toward none and charity for all."

We must constantly keep in mind that our national constitution provides that "no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office of public trust under the United States," and that "Congress shall make no law regarding the establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." And again we should remember that our own State constitution insures that "the free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship without discrimination or preference shall forever be allowed in this State to all mankind."

Moreover, our people of various religious beliefs wish to live together as friends and neighbors, to the end that in business, civic and social life, we may associate in peace and harmony, and banish from our midst the un-American spirit of intolerance.

With this preamble, the committee asked the citizens of Buffalo to discourage printing, circulating and reading all publications containing any misrepresentation or vilification of any religion, to ban all secret and public meetings where religious feelings were outraged, and to urge upon all the need of religious tolerance.

What was accomplished in Buffalo was carried out on a larger scale throughout the State of Georgia by the Association of Catholic Laymen, who joined together to combat the anti-Catholic feeling that was rampant at the time of the Veasy Convent Inspection bill. They called for $7,500 to carry on a "get-acquainted" campaign whereby every citizen of Georgia, through pamphlets, correspondence and news articles, might be brought to a knowledge of the doctrines of their fellow citizens belonging to the Catholic Church. The Association stated its purpose plainly:

> The aim of our organization is to bring about more friendly relations between all the people of Georgia, irrespective of religious convictions. We have no other aim. We are not seeking converts to Catholicism. We are not playing politics. We are not out for reforming or opposing or fighting anybody. We have no axe to grind and no scores to pay. We have no new laws to propose and no new principles to teach. We have absolutely no interest that is not common to all good citizens. We stand for friendship. Opposing all manner of discord, condemning every form of ill-will, frowning on religious prejudices as a cause of internal dissension, we stand for that sympathy and unity, for that friendship among citizens which the common history, the common interest, the common destiny of all the people of Georgia make imperative in the fulfilment of their hopes and aims.
> These are times when all men are divided into two camps, the fair-minded and the foolish; we are ready to stand up and be counted. We ask our fellow citizens to find out about us; but do it from first hand sources. We will answer any questions kindly, give out any information cheerfully, state our principles and our beliefs over and over again for all who wish to know them. We invite the cooperation, the confidence, the good will and the understanding sympathy of all our fellow citizens. We offer these dispositions to our fellow citizens.

Mr. J. J. Farrell, who managed the campaign of the Catholic Laymen of Georgia, inserted a paid advertisement into a number of papers throughout the State guaranteeing to answer any questions in explanation of Catholic doctrine. Questions of all kinds came pouring in and their range covered a wide field. So satisfactory was the result of the Georgia plan that it has been officially approved by the Knights of Columbus commission and recommended as a program to be followed in different localities, with proper adaptation to local needs.

There is a note of optimism running through the entire report of the Commission on Religious Prejudices. It is difficult to conclude that there is warrant for this optimism that is born of the belief that on account of the war the anti-Catholic feeling has died down almost entirely. "The war will kill bigotry" is a statement that remains to be proved. Certainly the persistent and concerted efforts that are made in the press with striking regularity to discredit the Pope in the eyes of the world are not very strong arguments favoring an optimistic view. Whether the attacks on the Holy See are inspired by a world-wide propaganda or are home products it is difficult to determine. They bear watching, however. The Knights of Columbus have done well through the labors of their Commission, and on the whole their work deserves praise. The conclusion that they have reached, namely, that the war has made the anti-Catholic feeling a thing of the past, is one that many who have followed the anti-Papal wave as it rises in the press of the land cannot accept. When the actions of the Holy See get a fair hearing in the secular press, then the contention that intolerance as a movement is dead can be admitted by all. Until then many will refuse to admit the effect-of-the-war conclusion.

Letters as a rule should not exceed six-hundred words

The Angelus at St. Paul's Chapel

To the Editor of AMERICA:

St. Paul's Chapel, of Trinity parish, "where Washington used to pray," is laying itself open to rebuke by the Christian Science Monitor for posting on its Broadway fence, in full view of every passer, a sign which says "The midday Angelus is rung daily at 12 o'clock as a call to prayer.".

Spiritual Adoption

To the Editor of AMERICA:

During these days when we are doing so much for our soldiers and sailors, even to the point of "adopting" them, why not do something in the way of spiritual adoption? Surely in our vast army and navy there are many who have no one to pray for them, many whose relatives do not believe in God. A Memorare, every day, an intention in Mass or Holy Communion, would not, I am sure, lessen our fervor in praying for those dear to us, and for the sailors and soldiers collectively.

Accountancy

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I read with some interest the letter of D. C. L. appearing in AMERICA for September 14, relative to public accountants. I quote from his letter the following: "I would not recommend aspirants to enter any of the day or night schools of accountancy, as in these institutions pupils acquire only a theoretical knowledge of accounts." This is very poor advice. It would be as logical to say, I shall not study English in a school, but will learn it by listening to others speak, regardless of the recognized rules governing this subject which I might acquire very easily in a night or day course. He recommends that young men should first enter a mercantile concern in order to acquire a thorough knowledge of bookkeeping, and afterwards enter the offices of a competent firm of public accountants.

What mercantile concern, as such, will give a man all the knowledge he requires to fit him for entrance into the office of a public accountant? Will D. C. L. draw the line and say that the young man should first acquire a theoretical knowledge of bookkeeping before entering the mercantile concern, and thereafter trust to circumstances in order to obtain the knowledge essential for the intelligent practice of public accountancy? Is bookkeeping in itself accountancy? It certainly is not. The fact that a man is a certified public accountant, which certification is the State's official stamp of approval, is prima facie evidence of competency, though in this profession, as in all others, there are different degrees of competency.

It is estimated that there are about 2,500 certified public accountants in the United States. What is his foundation for saying that "It is a well-known fact that non-certified public accountants in this country command larger salaries than certified public accountants"? I am sure that he did not make a comparison between 2,500 non-certified public accountants and the same number of public accountants. He certainly has not sent me, nor others I know, any blank to fill out for statistical purposes. Who ever made compensation the determining factor of competency?

I am a certified public accountant, licensed by the States of New York and New Jersey upon examination, both of which States require as a condition for the obtaining of the degree of C. P. A., certified public accountant, among others, practical experience in accountancy, the number of years required differing in different States; and while I have had over ten years' practical experience in public accountancy, I would certainly consider my training incomplete without having taken a course in one of the schools of accountancy.

I would strongly urge our Catholic men to study this profession, and, if they have the required preliminary education, to pursue their course with the end in view of obtaining the degree of C. P. A. It is a field that is not overcrowded, and I look forward to the time when our Catholic institutions of learning will adopt in their curriculum the courses necessary to train those eager to learn, so that the growing demand for competent accountants will be met. Some of our Catholic institutions of learning have already established courses in this subject, and I hope that others will soon follow.

An Analysis of Socialism

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Under the title, "Two Views Questioned," the New York Call, under date of September 25, criticises "An Analysis of Socialism," recently published in AMERICA. The first statement that is questioned is, "Marx teaches, preposterous though it seems, that it is under capitalistic competition that the worker gets the full value of his labor." The editor of the Call says: "The values he produces during a day and the value his labor power realizes in the market are different matters altogether."

It happens that in 1913, there was a discussion in the columns of the Call on the question of the exploitation of labor. Under date of August 6 of that year, in an editorial leader, the challenge was tossed off by its editor, in part, as follows:

> We want to see this question thrashed out, and so no doubt do the majority of our readers. If the surplus value theory is unsound and the reasoning on which it is based will not stand every intellectual assault that may be directed against it, we want to know it. If it can be proved that the capitalist gets nothing from the laborer for which he does not return a full equivalent, then the bottom drops out of Socialism. Surplus value in plain, untechnical language means nothing more nor less than this. . . .
> We are well satisfied to have this thing come to a "show down," and let the anti-Marxians make good their assumptions and assertions on the field of intellectual debate.

While the invitation was tendered specifically to one anti-Marxian, who was also a Socialist, it was not advertised as strictly private. Having doubts that there would be a debate between the principals invited, the writer submitted his view of the question, in which he forestalled the criticism now made by the Call. The following is quoted from the last paragraph of a letter published in the Call in the early part of August, 1913:

> It is generally agreed that the workers receive the full value of their labor. Competition sees to it that the value of commodities approximates the cost of the labor embodied in them. Then there is no difference between the workers receiving the full value of their labor and receiving the full value of the product of their labor.

The Call's second point of criticism of "An Analysis of Socialism," is the statement that "economic determinism" is akin to fatalism. Yet, the criticism proves more than was charged. The fact that Socialists organize and maintain active educational work, does not exculpate them; it is evident that they do it "in order to bring about the easy and safe birth of Socialism." They presume that Socialism must come, against the efforts of men.

A Tribute to Catholicism

To the Editor of AMERICA:

What the war has brought home to many of our Protestant friends in religious experience is the definiteness of the Catholic religion, its adaptability to all classes, to all nationalities, to all grades of intelligence, and its appeal to reason, the affections, faith, under all the diverse conditions of camp-life, of men of all races.

The Protestant Bishop of Massachusetts, Dr. Lawrence, is not classed among the "advanced" clergy of his denomination. Nevertheless, in a recent issue of the Protestant New York Churchman, he pays his tribute to Catholicism. Speaking of his visit to the camps, he said that he had seen Christianity represented in three distinct ways: First, by the Catholic Church through the religious ministrations in the K. C. huts. "The Church has the great advantage of standing four-square for certain religious facts: the Mass, Confession, Absolution, and Extreme Unction. It is most impressive." Second, by the Y. M. C. A. "So far as religion and the teaching of religion goes, it is a very different story. . . . What the soldiers get there religiously is very vague and in no way continuously gripping." He dismisses the description of religious results in the camps, through the Episcopal Church, in about three lines: "Small numbers at early services, seldom an officer present. Then continuous personal work throughout the day all over the camp."

One may ask of this earnest and able New England religious leader, not cynically or unkindly, but in all Christian charity, the following question: If, as the young theologians whom he was addressing had been taught to believe, the Mass "is repugnant to the words of Scripture," if Confession and Absolution and Extreme Unction, together with Matrimony and Ministerial Orders, are no more "Sacraments of the Gospel," than the saluting of our flag, how does he explain that these "many superstitions" have power to draw hardy, red-blooded men together, freely, by thousands, to kneel, in the "hut" on the rude earth, before the Incarnate God, for the Mass is God tabernacling among men, to every Catholic soldier? If auricular Confession is a "corruption," how is it that these ordinary men, from intelligent officers like Foch to unskilled privates, kneel in penitence, and, before a fellow-sinner, own again and again the reality of sin in their own lives, cry out for assurance of pardon, through the Blood of the Cross, and for the prayers of angels and men for victory over foes they fear more than the Hun himself, and, at last, desire preparation for the life of the world to come, while the assumed greater purity of the two hundred amalgamated Protestant bodies awaken only interest in being interested in matters "in no way continuously gripping"?

Of the Y. M. C. A. activities he most justly says: "Admirable in its effective social work, yet entirely inadequate to lead men in worship, spiritual direction, or Biblical instruction." By his very comparisons, he seems to admit that, somehow, the Mass does lead men voluntarily to worship; Confession, to a very real and personal spiritual direction; and Extreme Unction, to a most practical demonstration of the Biblical instruction of St. James.

The reason for this contrast is no doubt, in part at least, that whereas the Catholic Church does "stand four-square" for religious facts, Protestantism does not. Dr. Lawrence is not the only honest Protestant who, uintentionally, has borne witness to the fact that the Catholic Sacraments do hold men and women to God definitely, thus making them faithful to the end, Pro Deo, pro Ecclesia, et pro patria.

The Fourth Liberty Loan

AS these lines are written, preparations for the active work of floating the Fourth Liberty Loan are completed. For the fourth time the enemy will see of what stuff are the American people whom, with a fatuity beyond all comprehension, he goaded into war. No American has any doubt of the outcome of the conflict. It may take months, it may take years, but the armies of the United States and of the Allied Powers will never give up the fight they have entered in the name of liberty, until the infamous Power which has set the world in flames, is forever broken.

It rests with us, in large measure, to shorten the time of conflict. Thousands of young Americans are now fighting in France, thousands upon thousands are preparing in the training camps at home, and within the past month 13,000,000 American citizens were registered by the War Department. These millions represent the military power, actual and potential, of the country. It is for us, who in all probability shall not be asked to serve our country in the field or trench, to leave nothing undone which will aid the Government in its stupendous task of equipping these forces and adding them at the earliest possible moment to our gallant armies across the sea. We cannot buy victory, but we can buy those things which bring victory nearer. United in the "drive" for the Fourth Liberty Loan, we shall do all that the Government asks, and more. There must, then, be no faltering, and if the previous loans afford ground for prophecy, there will be none.

Humanity and justice, indeed, urge all possible cooperation with the Government in making the loan a success, yet it should not be forgotten that a four and one-quarter per cent Liberty Bond is one of the safest and most productive investments in the market. It is underwritten by the United States of America, a Government which, under God, shall exist for the benefit of mankind in that far distant day when "Hohenzollern" shall be recalled only as the name of a Power which sought world-domination by the violation of laws and covenants sacred in the eyes of God and man.

Catholic Women Voters

THE Catholic women of New York are to be congratulated on the establishment of a course of lectures on American citizenship, its privileges and its duties. One purpose of this course will be to teach women to vote regularly and intelligently. What the vote is, what it can do, should do, and cannot do, are topics to be explained by men and women of experience in public life, who will bring to their unique task enthusiasm as well as intelligence.

The course is intended for women, but why cannot a similar course be arranged for men, not only in New York, but throughout the country? There is no reason whatever to believe that it would be superfluous, and every reason to think that, if party politics were rigidly excluded, it would be a great help towards building up a wall of defense for every community in which it might be established. The exercise of the elective franchise is the private citizen's participation in government. We have no monarchies or dynasties; it is our constitutional right to choose our rulers and to reject them, not by force of arms but by force of the vote. Municipal government, the rule which normally touches the citizen most closely, is the form of government most keenly responsive to the action of the citizen at the polls, and a poorly governed community is the almost necessary consequence of an ill-instructed or careless electorate. Too many Americans do not take "the trouble" to vote at all, and many who do go to the polls, know very little of the questions at issue. They exercise the franchise with the intelligence attributed by Mr. Dooley of Archey Road to Mr. Dugan. "'I voted for Charter Haitch,' says he, 'an' he's a good man.' 'Why, man alive,' says I, 'Charter Haitch was assassinated three years ago.' 'Was he?' says Dugan. 'Ah, well, he's lived that down be this time.'"

Woman has had no generous chance to show what she will do with the franchise in New York, but it is quite certain that if the new course of lectures is well attended, the monopoly of wisdom will not be with the male voter. The women will have learned, what too many men do not even suspect, that the vote is by no means a right, but wholly a privilege, and a privilege which carries with it a heavy responsibility. For the resultant difference between a vote carelessly cast and a vote conscientiously cast is very often the difference between a corrupt government and a government of, for and by the people.

What Think Ye of France?

UNDER the above title, Mgr. Alfred Baudrillart, historian, theologian, orator, rector of a great university, one-time foreign missioner, and recently elected to the place of the Count de Mun in the French Academy, asks the people of the world to look into their souls and read therein what is their present opinion of his native land. The question, which appeared in the Bulletin de Propagande Française of August 15, 1918, throbs with that consuming love of country and passionate devotion to God and His Church, which have always characterized the writing of the distinguished prelate, and especially his war-utterances.

After referring to prevalent opinions concerning France, he says: "You thought that France was a worn-out nation, given over to the pursuit of pleasure, light, incapable of serious effort; you said it was beaten before it began." Then he takes up the history of France's part in the struggle of the past four years; the vigor, courage, unassuming steadfastness of her people steeled to every suffering and privation; her young men, represented as soft, effeminate, decadent, but in the test facing death under most horrible forms and impassive under frightful fatigue; men of mature age grown grey from pain and yet constant in bearing arms; mere boys, not yet emancipated from paternal and maternal care, sharing the same weariness, taking the post of command and exacting obedience from their seniors by the sheer force of respect; her women, pictured as frivolous and inconstant in the extreme, performing the hardest kind of labor, and ministering, by night and by day, without rest, for four long years, to the sick, the wounded and the sorrowful.

The people, though divided beyond hope, have rallied as a single man, in the name of the union sacrée, have passed through frightful changes without social or political disturbance, have maintained an unalterable calm in victory as in defeat, and for the repression of internal dangers have never even dreamed of Danton's and Robespierre's guillotine. Believed to have lost all sense of religion, they have crowded the churches, and in their priests have found both consolers and comrades in arms. Even the Government, the child of former times and still officially without God and religion, is growing in tolerance and respect. All the nations of the world are flocking to France to support her cause, persuaded that it is the cause of Liberty, and Foch, a Frenchman, commands them all.

Calling on Catholic neutrals to aid Catholic France, to treat Frenchmen as brothers and not as suspects, to give to his country a share in their good-will instead of bestowing it on those who have trampled under foot both justice and humanity, Mgr. Baudrillart exclaims: "Look, all of you, and see! Go down into the depths of your consciences, sweep away superannuated prejudices, and tell us today, what think ye of France?" There is only one answer to the question, the answer Mgr. Baudrillart expects: France is herself once more, glorious, heroic, wonderful France.

A Call for Nurses

FROM the office of the Surgeon-General of the War Department an urgent call has been issued, asking properly qualified young women to take up the profession of nursing. Contradicting certain recent press dispatches which represented that "in answer to General Gorgas' appeal for 25,000 nurses by January 1, 1919, more than 27,000 graduate nurses have been enrolled," Captain J. P. Yoder of the army writes to point out the serious loss which may arise from reports so utterly unfounded. "'There are thousands today,' he protests, 'who now believe that the army no longer needs nurses.' The real facts are, first, by January 1, the army must add at least 8,000 nurses to the 17,000 now in the service, and next, according to the Surgeon-General, 25,000 more must be obtained by July 1, 1919.

The situation is serious and can be met in only one way. The professional school for the nurse must assume a far higher place in our estimation than it has hitherto occupied. In modern medical practice, the trained nurse is indispensable, and today the nurse whose main qualifications are a kind heart and a good intention, is almost as out of place as the gin-swigging Sairey Gamp. The difficulty at hand is not merely to provide for the present war needs, although these must take precedence, but to meet the needs of hospitals at home, both now and after the war. If these needs are to be met adequately, it is imperative that as many young women as possible be induced to enter high-grade training schools for nurses. The adjective is chosen of set purpose; not every school is "high grade." Already, many whose sole purpose is to defraud trusting students, under a cloak of patriotism, are in the field.

To the Catholic young woman, the profession of nursing should appeal, because of the unique opportunities which it offers for the practice of the spiritual as well as of the corporal works of mercy. In the early days of Christianity, the physician of the soul was often the physician of the body, and it is an old saying among Catholics that the physician is the priest's best helper. Today the nurse may well be added to their company. Many an invalid has been brought back to spiritual as well as to physical health, by the skilful ministrations of some womanly woman who recognized the profession of nursing as a sacred trust and a true vocation. But no triflers, no "flappers," no frivolous creatures whose heads are merely a substructure for their blondined hair, need apply. The task calls for women, not for dolls or flirts.

The Workman and the Church

"HOW draw workmen to Church?" Such is the question Vida D. Scudder, in her article written for the September number of the American Church Monthly, an Anglican publication, pictures herself asking at a meeting of religious and social workers. "The Roman Catholics do it," is the prompt reply that greets her, followed by a chorus of assent. "Their church is on the same block with my home in Vermont," adds the first speaker, "There are five Masses on Sunday. The people come pouring out, more than half of them men. Crowds of men."

"It's the same near me," says a lady from Connecticut in confirmation. "I hear the patter of their feet at six in the morning." To make the testimony complete a social worker relates: "There was a mission held in our district last winter. Our streets are not nice at night, you know; one hears horrid things. But one night, just after some drunken men had passed, a man went by whistling the Invocation to the Holy Spirit which they sang at the mission; and I felt better." Catholic men are not accustomed to whistle their church hymns along the streets or elsewhere; but they may be seen, not singly, but by scores and hundreds, before the dawn has yet broken, pouring through the open portals of some great city church where a mission is being held. Many come fasting that they may receive their Lord in His Eucharistic feast before they approach their daily labors.

The fact is undeniable. But how explain the obvious contrast between Protestant and Catholic churches? This puzzled the learned meeting, snugly gathered in its cozy library. "It's the discipline," some one suggested. "It's enforced confession." "It's catching the children." But what compulsion can the Church exercise over the free, intelligent, wide-awake American workingman to make him accept her discipline? Why should he sacrifice his Saturday evening as well as his Sunday morning to attend to the welfare of his soul by confessing his sins in anticipation of the Holy Communion on the morrow? As for the children, it is one thing to "catch" them, and quite another to hold them, when they have grown up into maturity. The mystery has only been made more insoluble for the Protestant mind.

But there is a solution. And it can be no other than the fact that the Catholic Church not merely dates back historically through her unbroken line of Pontiffs, to the days of Christ and His Apostles, but that she is the only Church that has preserved intact every word of His teaching and every institution of His Divine love for man. At the stable of Bethlehem, in the workshop of Nazareth, beneath the Cross on Calvary she has learned to make her own the poor and lowly of the earth. In Christ Himself, the Carpenter of Nazareth, she has beheld the dignity of labor. The fullness of His spirit, His teachings and His Sacraments can be found with her alone. At her altars all are equally welcome, and all are embraced by her with the same motherly affection that is fondest towards the lowliest and the weakest. Her churches are not mere "auditoriums," but temples of the living, Eucharistic Christ: "God with us."

The Church has done much for the workman, but there is doubtless much more that as Catholics we can and must still do for him. At no time was such work more urgent than now. The rock of vantage that a toiler occupies at present, in the excessive demand for his labor, will soon crumble away from beneath his feet when our troops return to resume their former peaceful occupations. Now, therefore, is the season to study these great problems of future reconstruction so as to ward off misery and disaster from the nation. Here as elsewhere the Catholic Church must be determined to lead the way.

French-Canadians and the War

THE Canadian military situation has been another illustration of the well-known fact of how very rare and precious is the unteachable gift of tact. The French-Canadians, with a passionate devotion to France, its ideals, its religion, its language, are now brimming over with enthusiasm for the cause of the Allies. This is nothing new, it has been their attitude from the beginning. What is new in the situation is their response to the call to arms, that is, their response as a people, for individuals among them have long since been prodigal of their lives, heroic in sacrifice, and distinguished in service with the very bravest. Hitherto, however, their national pride, their racial prejudices, their legitimate demands have been given scant consideration. But at last, as is not unusual, the Government has found its way, through costly blunders, to the right way of dealing with the matter.

The principal reason why the French-Canadians have changed their attitude is their realization of the fact, that when God commands, obedience is paramount. The law of conscription, emanating from legitimate authority, has swept away all controversy. Cardinal Bégin's official organ, the Semaine Religieuse, summed up the situation admirably in the following words:

> God seems to wish that the French-Canadian people should take their part in all the sacrifices of the war. The time for discussions is past; and no one will regret that they are over. He who draws the sword in defense of a just cause is somewhat like the man who puts his hand to the plough: he should not look back. The command of authority is precise: young French-Canadians will march forth with courage. Their obedience, sanctioned by their spirit of faith, will lead them to victory. . . . It is in the midst of great trials that a Catholic people prove their faith. Our people are setting out to fight on the battlefields of France, to which sovereign authority, their French blood and their heroic history, all invite them; their inspiration is their love of justice and their respect for authority. It is easy, therefore, for our soldiers to give to their obedience a supernatural and a meritorious character.

These words are an echo of that great Catholic proclamation which has rung true to the voice of authority wherever there have been Catholic leaders to point out the path of duty. They have been reiterated by Cardinal Bégin himself and the great University of Laval. M. Adjutor Rivard, one of its most distinguished professors, speaking in behalf of the province of Quebec, said to General Mewburn: :

> The Heads of the nation can count on Quebec, on its understanding of the law, on its obedience to authority, an obedience inspired by love of justice, on its ardent desire to place all its energies at the service of its King and its country. . . . General, we give to our country all that we hold dearest, what we love more than ourselves, our sons. Of their own accord, before they were called, before they had reached the required age, they have gone, they are going, one and all. . . .

The Minister of Military Affairs, in responding, declared he never had any doubt concerning Quebec; in fact, he had nothing but praise to bestow on it. The province had always known, and would always know, as the future would prove, how to contribute its large share to the honor of Canada. He, for his part, was endeavoring to have the just desires of the people realized in the formation of a French-Canadian army, commanded by French-Canadians both at home and at the front.

Had this attitude been adopted from the beginning, much bitterness would have been spared. The point to be insisted on, however, is this, that the highest military authorities of Canada have put themselves on record to the effect that the loyalty of Quebec has never been questioned. It is to be noted, moreover, that their glorious response to the law of conscription came before any concessions had been made to their legitimate demands. In the future carping critics should bear this in mind.

Literature

IBSEN IN SCANDINAVIA

WHEN one observes the manner of writing and speaking of many admirers of Ibsen, one recalls the rebuke given by Margaret Fuller to Emerson, on a certain occasion, when he praised superlatively the dancing of Fanny Ellsler. "This is life," he said. "No, Ralph," she answered, "this is religion." In our country, there seem to exist people who are capable of making the same observations where sin is concerned. Ibsen is a cult: Ibsen is not only life, but religion and philosophy.

In his native country, in Norway, this has never been so. In Denmark, where one of the most distinguished "creators" of his women's rôles, lives, there has never existed an Ibsen "cult," and in judging Ibsen, it ought not to be forgotten that his plays were made to be acted, not read. In Sweden, his comedies of manners and morals are played with other pieces in the répertoire of the actors; he has his fixed place, but no more. There are no "Ibsenites."

Strindberg is played more often there than Ibsen, but neither the bizarre, the eccentric, the decadent Strindberg nor the physiological Ibsen is looked on as a mentor of the meaning or conduct of life. Done in a Scandinavian environment, Strindberg has some meaning and interest. Out of it, he has little. Similarly "Peer Gynt," with Grieg's exquisitely national music, tells things worth hearing if one knows Norwegian political and social life. "Brand" has a more general appeal; there Ibsen, like the Danish philosopher, Kierkegaard, was groping, in fact he was always groping. Sitting at his table in the café of the Grand Hotel, Christiania, he sometimes, when he permitted himself to be disturbed, uttered sentiments which seemed as if, after all, the authority and all-embracing spiritual power of the Catholic Church appealed to him; and, if you read Ibsen's comedies of life seriously, or see them played by artists who know the Scandinavian conditions of the seventies, you will see that, in the absence of any authoritative interpretation of life, Ibsen takes life as he sees it, and offers the problem for you to solve. He does not solve it; it is an exercise in chemistry, and he thinks that the process is impersonal; the reactions are chemical reactions.

Ibsen's contemporary, Björnsen, takes life more humanly; he groped for a rule of the conduct of life, too. Lutheranism does not hold chastity as a great virtue in itself. Hegel expressed the Lutheran point of view when at an important gathering, under the patronage of the Prussian king, he lauded the German Lutheran Church, for having laid small emphasis on the "monkish" virtues of obedience, chastity and poverty, the antitheses of the noble old Roman qualities. Björnsen had a "cult": he wrote a play, to show that a man should live, before marriage, as chaste a life as a woman. Many Norwegians were honestly shocked by this startling heresy, for Norwegian Lutheranism was rather liberal, but the revolt of both Björnsen and Ibsen was not against Christianity per se, but against the interpretation of religion as presented by the State Church.

Living in Scandinavia, though it is absurd to lump the three countries as if they were one people, it is easy to understand why their men became rebels. Coventry Patmore says somewhere that, when the real poet invokes his muse, he appeals to the Holy Ghost unconsciously. If I remember, I think he included Shelley among the gropers, those who made an appeal to the unknown God, Jehovah, Jove or Lord. The fact must be kept in mind that among these Northern peoples, the State Church represented religion, which was either an intolerant and illogical autocracy, forbidding even reasonable pleasures, as a purely formal cult, such as the State Church became in Russia. Religion, at its best, represented an unreasonable restraint. You were urged to interpret the Bible for yourself, and yet told that your life was to be governed by a set of rules, resting on an authority not infallible, which must be obeyed under the threat of eternal perdition! Ibsen does not protest against Christianity; he simply accepts the fact that Lutheran Christianity does not offer the individual an answer to the intricate problems of life.

Again, women in the North have no rights; they have privileges. When a Danish woman marries, her property, unless a special covenant is made, passes under the control of her husband; she must accept his dictum as to the disposal of it, but he can dispose of his own without her consent. Her children are solely his children; he determines their future, the quality of their education; the religion they must accept. Knowing these things, one can understand the ardent desire of the Norwegian, the Danish, the Swedish women, for the privilege of suffrage. Their only hope of changing the laws was by means of the ballot. In Denmark and Norway they have it now, so the fury of the revolt as depicted in some of Ibsen's best-known plays has spent itself. Given a fixed conventionalism, a conventionalism which repressed all individuality in women, and one must expect a revolt. The Lutheran scheme of salvation is too illogical to hold the clever individualists. The result was the determination to get the most out of this life. In the eyes of nearly all Ibsen's dramatic characters duty does not exist; the substitute for duty is conventionality.

The Norwegian and Danish and Swedish auditors were not shocked by, let us say, the physiology of "Ghosts." They are very plain-spoken people. Among them there are none of those "undivine silences" against which Coventry Patmore protests, or even "Divine silences." Questions of sex are regarded as part of every-day life; so "Ghosts" dramatized a situation not unfamiliar to the every-day life of the people from whom it sprang. What stood in the way of Mrs. Aveling's emancipation from a condition of conjugal slavery? Convention, only convention. Of the release of the heroine of "A Doll's House," the same thing may be said; Nora Helmar's attitude created a storm in Ibsen's native land, and in all Europe. "Ghosts," which appeared later, was not looked on as immoral by the conscientious in Scandinavia. "A Doll's House" was. It was radicalism, and radicalism in Scandinavia is not a political theory; it applies to morals as well. Your English radical may be a devout Dissenter; your Scandinavian radical dissents, as a rule, from all laws that curb the development of the individual. Socialism is the negation of individuality; radicalism makes of it an apotheosis.

Ibsen has suffered much from the preeminence given to "A Doll's House," "Ghosts," "Hedda Gabler" and even "The Wild Duck." They were looked on as shocking. And they had a success of curiosity; but Ibsen was not, is not, the object of worship as he seems to be here in certain circles, and he has ceased to be the target for furious observers. He never pretended to teach; he became an investigator of the middle-class European society he knew. This diagnosis was of German Lutheran conventional society as well as of Scandinavian. If he protested against anything, it was against hypocrisy. And the contents of these comedies should not blind us to the wonderful theatrical skill and careful dramatic art they display. He is the greatest modern writer of dialogue; but that he should be taken seriously as a teacher of morals is as amazing to those who knew him, as it is to the people who gave him birth. It is regrettable, too, that a morbid curiosity should have blinded amateurs of literature to the beauty of "Brand" on which Ibsen's reputation in his native land largely rests, to the splendid poetry of "Peer Gynt." "Brand" was as violent a protest against the materialism of religious life in Norway as Wesleyism was against the self-complacency of the Anglicans of the eighteenth century and the beginning of the nineteenth; and "Peer Gynt," a cutting satire on the faults of the Norwegian people, became a great poem with an appeal to the universal taste.

It ought not to be supposed for a moment that Lutheranism has not produced some good fruits in these Northern countries; Luther might have cut out more than he did. He built a "fester Burg" without a foundation, that is all. Dr. Grisar, in his preface to his excellent "Life of Luther" states this better than I can; but for official Lutheranism there can be no apology; and this has produced the state of society which Ibsen analyzed. That he should be looked on as a teacher of "advanced morals" is amazing; that he should be decried as an unskilled dramatist, and "Emperor or Galilean" and "Brand" forgotten, because his doubtful comedies of manners and morals created an excess of curiosity, is more amazing.

Beaumarchais and the War of American Independence. By ELIZABETH S. KITE. With a Foreword by James M. Beck. Two volumes. Illustrated. Boston: Richard G. Badger. $5.00.

This is the interesting biography of a remarkable Frenchman of the eighteenth century whom Americans should know much more about than they do. As Mr. Beck in his foreword well observes: "Without depreciating the chivalrous services of the knightly Marquis [Lafayette] his contribution to the foundation of the American nation from a practical standpoint was less than that of Beaumarchais." "We must aid the Americans," he was constantly reminding the King and Court of France, and so fruitful was his zeal for the Revolution that he succeeded in shipping to America 200 pieces of cannon, 25,000 guns, 100 tons of powder and equipment for 25,000 men, at a time when supplies were badly needed. Silas Deane indeed wrote to Congress in 1776 that the United States in his opinion was "in every account greatly indebted" to Beaumarchais "more so than to any other person on this side the water." The sum Beaumarchais demanded of Congress for services rendered was 3,600,000 livres. Little attention, however, was paid to his claims, but some years later Arthur Lee pretended to discover that Beaumarchais, far from being this country's creditor, actually owed us 1,800,000 francs. At last, in 1835, the United States gave the heirs of Beaumarchais 800,000 francs and the case was closed.

Miss Kite, who is a convert to the Faith, dwells largely, as is fitting, on the zeal for the American cause displayed by the subject of her biography, but she by no means neglects to give the reader an interesting account of Beaumarchais's varied gifts and checkered career. Born in 1732, the son of a Parisian watchmaker, he had so improved his fortunes that by 1761 he had secured a position at court that gave him a title of nobility. He subsequently became an expert in high finance, the author of two successful operas, was employed by the King as a secret-service agent in foreign countries, defended the rights of down-trodden playwrights, wrangled for years with corrupt judiciaries for the clearing of his character, took good care of all his relatives, managed to survive the Terror, and died in 1799. A famous wit and a man of fashion, he had many envious and vindictive enemies, but his unfailing good-nature and bold resourcefulness carried him safely through many a difficult and dangerous situation. The book's price is rather high but the author is devoting the profits she derives from the sale of the volume to war-work in France.

War Verse. Edited by FRANK FOXCROFT. New York: Thomas Y. Crowell Company. $1.25.

The compiler of this collection of "War Verse" tells us that since the present conflict began he has diligently read the British papers and reviews in quest of poetry on the war which in his opinion would be worth gathering into a book. The 300 pages of this volume hold the results of his labor. Most of the pieces selected only deserve to be called "War Verse" and hardly merit a place in an anthology. Nearly all the real poems in the volume, such as "The Spires of Oxford," "In Flanders' Fields" and "The Soldier," have already been quoted in these pages. Eric Chilman writes hopefully of "After-Days" thus:

When the last gun has long withheld
  Its thunder, and its mouth is sealed,
Strong men shall drive the furrow straight
  On some remembered battle-field.
Untroubled they shall hear the loud
  And gusty driving of the rains,
And birds with immemorial voice
  Sing as of old in leafy lanes.

The stricken, tainted soil shall be
  Again a flowery paradise—
Pure with the memory of the dead
  And purer for their sacrifice.

Laurence Binyon's appeal of "The Dead to the Living," which begins:

O you that still have rain and sun,
  Kisses of children and of wife,
And the good earth to tread upon,
  And the mere sweetness that is life,
Forget not us, who gave all these
  For something dearer, and for you!

is another war poem that perhaps will live. Theodore Maynard's "Processional" it fittingly included in the collection; there is an admirable swing to all C. Fox Smith's verses; G. K. Chesterton's "The Wife of Flanders" and "Home at Last" can be found in the volume, and these two simple stanzas by J. Napier Milne entitled "Laurel and Cypress" express a full heart's pride and grief:

I watched him swinging down the street,
The fairest lad in all the line,
His kilt and khaki, braw and neat,
My first-born—mine!

He sleeps beneath the blood-red sod—
A letter from the King to say:
"Fallen in Honor's Cause" . . . Thank God!
But ay! But ay!

Appreciations and Depreciations. By ERNEST A. BOYD. Anglo Irish Essays. By JOHN EGLINTON. New York: John Lane Co. $1.25 each.

The first of these two readable little volumes of essays seems to have missed, or at least ignored, an important point in the movement it attempts to describe. For "Ireland's Literary Renaissance" is composed of a double element, the Catholic and the Protestant, both that discussed at length in "Appreciations and Depreciations" and the other, championed by Pearse, Colum, and a host of other "mere Irish," as Mr. Boyd is pleased to style them. These two elements must not be confounded. Still, it is unfair to claim that the revival is peculiarly Protestant and that this element represents the character and spirit of Irish literature. The works of six representatives of Protestant Ireland's awakening, with their scarcely intelligible and even contradictory philosophies are subjected to thorough examination, the chapters on "AE" and "Lord Dunsany" being the most interesting. Admirers of the dangerous Bernard Shaw will doubtless find the two essays on their idol enlightening, but doubtful justice is done the late Edward Dowden. The writer of the essays himself evinces little more sound philosophical sense than those of his subjects who seem unable to bridge over properly the eternal gap between the ideal and the real.

The Anglo-Irishman or modern Irishman, according to John Eglinton, is "The Irishman . . . who accepts as a good European the connection with Great Britain and yet feels himself to be far more distinct from the Anglo-Saxon than he is from the 'mere Irishman.'" Skepticism, with its inevitable pessimistic outlook on life, dominates the "reasoning" powers of the author. As may be expected, this admirer of Nietzsche and of Swedenborg and his American pupil Emerson treats lightly the most evident truths of a sane philosophy and tends to plunge the reader into the depths of hopelessness. A certain literary charm attaches to the essays, reminding one of Emerson himself.

Historical Records and Studies. THOMAS F. MEEHAN, STEPHEN FARRELLY, REV. JOSEPH F. DELANY, D. D., Editing Committee. Volume XII, June, 1918. New York: The United States Catholic Historical Society.

This latest volume of "Historical Records and Studies" offers the reader a very appetizing menu. Peter Condon, A. M., traces down to today the history of "The Church in the Island of San Domingo," William H. Bennet contributes a sketch of "Francis Cooper: New York's First Catholic Legislator," and Thomas F. Meehan of AMERICA's staff, records the deeds of American "Catholics in the War with Mexico." About two years ago the American Freemason, it may be remembered, revived the calumny that during the battle of Churubusco, the Americans lost 1,000 men owing to the obstinate resistance of more than 200 deserters from our army "composed mostly of Catholic Irish, who had been persuaded to desert at the instigation of the Mexican Catholic priests." Mr. Meehan proves by the documents he quotes that there is no reference to the deserters in question being of any particular religion. Indeed, according to statistics published at the time fifty-four out of 112 members of the captured battalion of San Patricio were Americans, thirty-four of the rest being Irishmen. Another interesting paper is an account of the burning of the Charlestown convent, August 11, 1834, as told by John R. Buzzell, the leader of the Know-Nothing mob that committed the crime. The Rev. Walter F. Thornton, S.J., has translated from the Spanish the account written by Father John Riobo, O. S. F., of his voyage to "Alaska in 1779," and it is now published here. Henry Binsse contributes a charming sketch of Pierre Toussant, a Catholic negro of Haiti, who was one of the pillars of St. Peter's Church, New York, in the middle of the last century. Mr. Binsse also tells in this number of "Historical Records and Studies" the story of "The Church of St. Vincent de Paul (the French Church), New York." An account of the last "General Meeting" and "Notes and Comments" complete this interesting volume.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

"Karma, a Reincarnation Play" (Dutton, $1.50), by Algernon Blackwood and Violet Pearn, is an exposition of an old dream, which the horrors of war have brought more vividly into current notice. The shadowy theme is treated with much dramatic power.——Every line that Joel Chandler Harris wrote on the Southern darkey is worth while, and lovers of this gentle, whole-souled writer will thank Mrs. Julia Collier Harris who edits, under the title "Uncle Remus Returns" (Houghton Mifflin, $1.35), a number of stories contributed in 1905-1906 to the old Metropolitan. Eight illustrations by Frost and Condé add to the attractiveness of the volume.——"Tang of Life" (Houghton Mifflin, $1.50), by Henry Herbert Knibbs, is a tale of the great Southwest. Mexico and Arizona are made the scenes of much action through dynamite and power. The adventures of Jim Waring, a professional gunman, are narrated in virile style with many exhilarating anecdotes. His son, Lorry, a youth of twenty, is a gentler character than his father, but he inherits from him the same ambition of ridding the land of I. W. W. gangs that rove about to the perturbation of all. A neat romance through the introduction of two Eastern ladies plays an interesting but quite secondary part.——Florence Olmstead's "On Furlough" (Scribner, $1.50), is a rather dull story about two sets of lovers, one of whom is a British officer invalided to a little community in a southern State.

Mr. John Theodore Comes, A. A. I. A., M. S. A., the well-known Catholic architect, has published as a pamphlet the excellent lecture on "Catholic Art and Architecture," (published by the author, Renshaw Building, Pittsburgh, $0.50) which he has delivered before the theological students of various seminaries. Realizing that the beauty of the churches that must be built in this country depends chiefly on the good taste of the parish priests of tomorrow, the author lays down solid principles for the seminarians' guidance, and admirably describes what a thing of beauty even the humblest Catholic church can be made. The pamphlet, which is finely illustrated with full-page pictures of new American churches, should by no means have its readers confined to seminarians. Every art lover should see it.

"A Life of Saint Francis Xavier, Based on Authentic Sources" (Herder, $1.25), by M. T. Kelly; "Selected Letters of Saint Jane Frances de Chantal" (Kenedy, $2), translated by the Sisters of the Visitation, Harrow, England, and "The True Apostolate" (Herder, $1), which Father Girardey has translated and adapted from the French of Dom J. B. Chautard, the Abbot of Sept-Fons, a Trappist monastery, are three recent ascetical books that should have an appeal to various classes of Catholic readers. Miss Kelly has had access to the latest books and documents bearing on the Apostle of the Indies, and explodes several pious myths about him. Some readers may feel that the author has not painted vividly enough the great soul of St. Francis, but has confined herself too closely to a chronological account of his career. Naturally Visitandines and their friends will feel the greatest interest in these letters of Mother de Chantal. There are more than a hundred of them and are written to her spiritual children, to St. Francis de Sales, and to lords and ladies not a few. In Dom Chautard's pages apostolic men and women will find many sage counsels regarding the importance of the interior life, for those who are engaged in works of zeal.

"The New Death" (Houghton Mifflin, $1.25) a book by Winifred Kirkland which means nothing more than a dominant, living appreciation of death, is a materialist's arraignment of materialism. Common-sense, long dutifully rejected by would-be philosophers, is, theoretically at least, restored to a respected position. The doctrine of immortality and the existence of God are suggested as the great possibilities for present solace and future advancement. Despite the objective truth of her assertions, however, the manner in which the author derives and establishes them is far from satisfactory. She gropes her way to the powerful tenets of Christianity without an anchor of rational proof. Formerly a materialist, she now veers to Spiritism. She has too much guess and instinct; too little reason and belief. Her message is at one time pragmatic. "It does not matter whether or not the intuition is true. . . . What matters is the effect upon the emergent public life and private of the fact that every-day men and women are believing the dead live." At other times her message is evolutionary and pantheistic.

"Japan or Germany, the Inside Story of the Struggle in Siberia" (Doran, $1.50) by Frederic Coleman is an interesting and timely book in view of the most recent turn in the tide of events in the Far East. Japan, Siberia, Vladivostok are the touchwood for his pen. The author, a newspaper correspondent, writes with an ease and familiarity acquired from some years of intimacy with men and things in those parts. Of the twelve chapters that make up the volume, four are concerned with Japan, the underlying motive of her present policy, the views of her statesmen in the great struggle, while the rest treat of Siberia and the Revolution's influence upon it. To the question in the minds of many—why has not Japan entered more effectively into the present war by sending her troops to the battle fronts—Mr. Coleman gives an explanation which is illuminating and rather satisfying. Yet while the volume holds the reader's attention, the contents leave the impression more of disconnected essays thrown together to make a book, than of a well-worked-out development of a thesis. The author believes that Japan should go to Siberia with a group of sympathetic educators having "hearts in their breasts and hands of fellowship outstretched to the Russian in Siberia, but that she should not go merely to guard a pile of stores from the Huns."

PHONETICS

AN urgent call comes for the "Americanization" of the immigrant. In many parts of our country the work has begun. Usually, the first essential step has been the teaching of English. Various methods have been employed, and their values considered. Some of the methods used and advocated by educators are the direct dramatic method, the objective method, the screen method, the Gouin method, the dictionary method, the phonetic method, and others. If a method other than the phonetic be chosen, the latter should be used in connection with it. It is of paramount importance, as it eliminates the difficulties in pronunciation, which are always encountered in the study of a foreign language. By means of it we learn how we actually speak; we learn where and how each sound is formed, and it enables us to interpret the exact value of every vowel and consonant.

Formation of Sound

IF the immigrant is taught the proper formation of the English sounds, he will have no difficulty in producing them. This will prevent him from substituting similar sounds from his own language, which he is very apt to do. It is of utmost importance that the teacher should have a thorough knowledge of a good phonetic method, one employing characters to represent the sounds used in the English language. These characters are necessary to teach the specific sounds we use since we have no letters in the alphabet to represent them. Our pronunciation has changed, but we retain the old spelling which is no guide whatever in teaching modern spoken English. We write one language and speak another. The difference between the written form and the spoken form should be taught.

To begin with, monosyllables are generally marked in the dictionaries with the distinct sound of the vowel, as they are pronounced when uttered alone. But they so frequently occur unaccented, in reading and speaking, that they develop weak along with strong forms; the degree of weakness depending upon the style and rate of speech. The weak forms are uttered so as to give only an indistinct or obscure sound to the vowel. In the sentence, "How do you do?" it would be incorrect to pronounce the first "do" as strongly as the second. Such words as, "am, them, at, should, of, that, to, from," and many others, are generally used in their weak forms; strong forms are employed only for emphasis, and these words are seldom emphasized. In many words ending in "on," "en" and "el," the sound of "o" and "e" is suppressed.

Phonetic Transcriptions

WEBSTER'S "New International Dictionary" states that "to pronounce words with their strong forms in such positions (as above indicated) either emphasizes them and thus gives them a special meaning, or makes the speech sound more or less abnormal, except in the very formal speech of formal occasions. To give a proper weakening to words normally so pronounced is dependent upon a natural instinct or cultivated feeling for the natural shades of sound in the language." Since the immigrant has not this natural instinct for the sounds of the English language, phonetic transcriptions are invaluable in teaching him these natural shades and sounds in reading and speaking. It is difficult to teach spoken English with our ordinary form of spelling, but with the phonetic characters it is comparatively a simple matter. A phonetic training will also enable the teacher to correct individual peculiarities and defects in utterance, as lisping, stammering and nasalizing. In a class of immigrants or children, practically all the speech peculiarities are caused by misplaced or wrongly formed sounds.

The phonetic method should also be used with the children in the classroom. They too should be taught the difference between the written and the spoken language. Well-meaning teachers often mistake for the height of refinement, a form of speech which is stiff and stilted and so obviously unnatural, and artificial, that it is merely ridiculous. They ignore the weak vowels in unaccented positions and instead give each syllable the strong form.

Diacritical Marks

ANOTHER defect found in the classrooms, is the neglect (or inability) to teach proper vowel sounds. The long "u" seems to be particularly ignored, as in "student, assume, new, knew, dew," etc. The intermediate "a" as in "ask, past, last, bath," is commonly given the sound of "a" in "at"; if, however, we read the guide to pronunciation in Webster's or Worcester's, or other dictionaries, we find the preferred sound to be the "ah" sound. Likewise the "o" in "on, not, honor, doctor, body," etc.; the same diacritical mark placed over "long, song, wrong," is placed over the above words. Hence the same vowel sound should be given them. In regard to the short "o" in "on, not, honor, doctor, body," etc., Webster's dictionary, in the guide to pronunciation says, "a certain faulty pronunciation of this vowel is changing it to "ah" in "ask." If we would familiarize ourselves with a good phonetic method, we would not misinterpret sounds, since each character represents one sound, and represents that same sound in all languages. Fortunately there are many good phonetic books published, as well as a phonetic pronouncing dictionary.

We find many who are unable to interpret the diacritical marks in the dictionary. This is not surprising, because there are so many marks with a slight shade of difference, and no letter in the alphabet portrays the exact sound. The respelling, for the pronunciation, found in the dictionary is a great help, but evidently not sufficient, or there would not be so much misinterpretation of the diacritical marks. For this reason a simpler and more accurate method to guide our pronunciation is necessary. Any child after learning the phonetic characters, which can be done in a few hours, can interpret the exact sound the author or lexicographer advocates in the use of a word or in the construction of a sentence, and this is more than most can do with the regular dictionary, even after they are grown up. As Worcester says, "This is not intended to introduce any new sounds, but merely to discriminate such as are now heard, from all who speak the language with propriety."

A. E. WOLTER.

SOCIOLOGY

A Wise Man's Dream

IT was an ancient mariner that stopped England's future Chancellor and Martyr one fair morning in Flanders, and held him with his glittering eye and the fascination of his strange story. In company with his friend, Cuthbert Tunstall, Thomas More had gone to Flanders on the business of his royal master, Henry VIII. At Antwerp he had met Peter Giles, the friend of Erasmus. One morning after Divine service in Our Lady's Church he saw Giles in earnest talk with a stranger, "a man well stricken in age, with a black sun-burned face, a long beard and a cloak cast homely about his shoulders," whom by his favor and apparel he forthwith judged to be a mariner. The fascinating stranger was Raphael Hythloday, "Portugal-born," a much-traveled Ulysses, something of a Munchausen, familiar with the cities, the ways and manners of men. According to his own story, Hythloday had sailed the seas with "Americke Vespuce," and had been his constant companion. But from his last voyage he had not immediately returned to his native land, for he had been one of the twenty-four companions of the great navigator left behind in the "land of Gulicke." From that place he had wandered to "Taprobane" and "Caliquit," and thence had traveled back to his own country. In the course of his many travels he had gone to a hitherto uncharted island, and there lived among a strange people, subject to a constitution wholly different from anything he had either dreamt of or seen. The island was called Utopia, the Isle of Nowhere.

UTOPIA

RAPHAEL HYTHLODAY, like "Utopia" itself, is a figment of the mind of the witty Englishman. The book in which More told of the imaginary adventures of his hero and collected his observations on the constitution of the island may be looked upon as one of the first fiction books of the English language. It is true that it is neither romance, nor novel, nor story strictly so-called. It falls into the class of those "dream-books" of the wise men of various generations who build political, social and religious castles in cloudland, on the airy foundations of imagination and fancy. Yet it often happens that it is to these unsubstantial foundations that the practical men of succeeding ages go to quarry the stones of the edifice they build. The "Utopia" thus deserves a place besides the "Republic" of Plato, the "New Atlantis" of Francis Bacon, Campanella's "City of the Sun," the "Oceana" of Harrington, the "Mundus Alter et Idem" of Hall. The list of such books is a large one, and embraces a wide variety both of authors and views, as may be seen in Cyrano de Bergerac's account of the "States and Empires of the Moon," in the "Leviathan" of Hobbes, Goodwin's "Man in the Moon," Bellamy's "Looking Backward," Butler's "Erewhon" (Nowhere), Swift's "Gulliver's Travels," Filmer's "Patriarcha" and Lytton's "Coming Race."

Because Sir Thomas More sealed a noble life with a martyr's death, we need not approve of all the views he sets forth in the "Utopia." There can be little doubt that sometimes he writes just to make his merry jest at the expense of the society in which he lived. He records and sets down certain manners and polities, not because he really approves of them, but because he knows well that the men of his own times will rub their eyes as they read them, because they are so different from their own, and, just a little also, because they will shock them. The Chancellor always enjoyed his little jest and loved to mystify his hearers. He mystified some, at least, of his contemporaries with his "Utopia," for zealous men like Budaeus and Paludanus, after reading the book, were minded to send out missionaries to the "Utopians," thinking it a pity that such naturally goodly folk should perish without the light of the Gospel and the blessings of Christianity. More must have stroked his beard and smiled, and thought, perhaps, that it were better if these sage philosophers began the work of conversion somewhat nearer home. The mystification extended even further, for in our own times William Morris thought he found in the book a justification of his Social theories, while the pious and learned Cardinal Zigliara thought it should be placed on the Index.

TRANSLATED FROM THE LATIN

THE "Utopia" is undoubtedly a strange book. Ralph Robinson "Englished" it from the original Latin in 1551, and the translation in some ways deserves to be ranked with Florio's "Montaigne," or those Lives of Plutarch which Sir Thomas North put into racy and vigorous Elizabethan, not directly from the Greek, but from the quaint French of good Bishop Amyot. It will be startling also to the general reader, as he realizes that one of the first bits of fiction in our language should deal, not so much with man and the individual, as with society, and that it should deal with many of the very complicated problems which are troubling and vexing us today. In this respect the book is quite modern. Though it reflects the age of the Tudors, it appeals strongly to the man of the present age. In this sense it is quite up to date, and the romance of "Nowhere" should thus get a welcome everywhere; "Utopia" is thus definitely circumscribed and localized. Besides this, it has its peculiar literary flavor, for as its first translator, Ralph Robinson, said in 1551, "He that readeth it doubtless he shall take great pleasure and delite both in ye sweete eloquence of ye writer, and also in ye witte, invencion, and fine conveiaunce or disposition of ye matter: but most of all in ye goode and holesome lessons which be there in great plenty and aboundance."

Utopia indeed is a wonderful island. It is 500 miles long and 200 miles at its widest. Its polity is that of a confederation of free City-States. There are forty-four of these on the island. They are relatively large, each containing 6,000 families, and all solidly built. Each city is surrounded by twenty miles of rich agricultural territory which the inhabitants are supposed to work and till. Every year each of these City-States sends three of its wisest senators to Amaurote, the City of Shadows, the capital of Nowhere.

The City of Shadows

THE country outside of the towns was mainly agricultural. The State furnished the implements of labor, and, after certain periods, the rural population was shifted to the cities, while the city folk were sent to the fields to take a turn at the plough and the scythe. On the banks of the Anyder, the waterless river, stood the City of Shadows, Amaurote. It was protected by high walls. The dwellings were all of one pattern. The streets looked as if they were composed of but one house, a convenient, but certainly not an artistic, arrangement. Householders had no permanent proprietary rights in their homes, for every ten years they changed houses by drawing lots. The Utopians believed in a community of goods. Money they despised and used only to pay their mercenaries and in their trade with foreign countries. For though they were trained to martial exercises, they preferred to have others do the fighting for them. Gold they had in plenty, but to show the vanity of artificial wealth they used the simplest things for themselves, dressed simply in garments of leather or skin that lasted seven years and all made on the same pattern. They must have been dreadful to behold. To show their contempt for gold and silver, they forged gold and silver fetters for their slaves, and when they wished to degrade and shame a man, they placed a crown of gold upon his head and gyves of gold upon his feet and hands. Millions today would gladly submit to such gilded slavery.

In religious matters the Utopians were extremely tolerant. The boasted tolerance of our days More had forestalled. According to him, old King Utopus, the original founder of the commonwealth, had made a law that every man might be of the religion of his own choosing, and might endeavor to bring others to his mode of thinking by fair argument, but without bitterness against those of other opinions. No one was to use reproaches or violence to force his own religion on his fellow-citizens. Those who violated this law were condemned to banishment or slavery. But this toleration did not extend to those who were atheists or denied the immortality of the soul. Utopus and his Utopians had rightly concluded that such persons were a danger to the State, and "scarce worthy to be accounted men." Those who denied the immortality of the soul "degraded so noble a being as the soul and reckoned it no better than a beast." Such men were not to be accounted fit members of the commonwealth, for, logically, they must needs despise all laws and customs, for one who is afraid of nothing but the laws, and looks to annihilation after death, will not scruple to violate those laws, either by fraud or force, when by doing so he may satisfy his passions. Such men were not punished, for, according to old Utopus, men cannot force themselves to believe what they please, yet, because on such an important point their views were distorted, they were not to be lifted to any post of honor or prominence in the country. We have progressed in the matter of religious tolerance since More's time. It would be interesting to know what he would now think of our large-mindedness.

More Ahead of His Time

ON many points More was ahead of his times, perhaps too much ahead of our own, too, as may be seen in his "Utopian," and rather startling and dangerous theories about "eugenic marriages." But on such live topics as predatory wealth, penology, secret diplomacy, hospital equipment and work, there is a modern note which must astonish the reader.

The "Utopia" is not much read today. But it deserves a perusal. In an age so keenly interested in the problems of government and social work, while some of its theories and customs were evidently meant to be pure fiction, many others will afford ample matter for study and thought. One noble idea stands out in splendid relief from the statesman-martyr's masterpiece. According to him, man must ever struggle forward through trials and dangers on the road of true progress and civilization. He must do so by stifling in his heart the ignoble impulses of a callous egoism. He must remember that he is the member of a great social body, a larger family. That larger body must provide within its sphere for his comfort, peace and happiness. He in his turn cannot forget that he has important and imperative duties towards it. For the peace, happiness and general welfare of others he must forget himself. The "Utopia" is a dream. As in a dream, fantastic visions flit before us. But dim forms also are seen, clothed in the garb of reality. A strange and, at times, incongruous dream came to the great Chancellor. On many things he firmly grasped the reality and the truth, and gave the world an excellent study in sociology.

JOHN C. REVILLE, S. J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Aims of the National Catholic War Council

FOR the purpose of assisting the Catholic body in its cooperation with the Government a "Handbook of the National Catholic War Council" has been published by the Administrative Committee of Bishops. It is both historical and directive, describing the origin and development of our Catholic war activities and outlining the program for a perfect and efficient cooperation with all the various Government agencies. Nothing better calculated to unify our efforts and coordinate them with the work of every other national organization has hitherto been accomplished:

> The tasks which face the Church in America are countless. Problems are arising from day to day which demand prompt solutions and those solutions can be given with foresight and directness through a national body only, gathered from every part of the United States for the purpose of establishing the cooperative intelligence necessary for such decision. Everything must be looked at from a national standpoint. The National Catholic War Council, therefore, aims frankly towards the amalgamation of all Catholic activities in such a way that the Church will be enabled to meet the historic responsibilities that now rest upon her.

It is the desire of the National War Council to bring its message of patriotic service into every Catholic home, and for this end it looks especially to the parish units for a perfect cooperation with its aims and methods, since the parish is regarded by it as the supreme testing place of the length and breadth and depth of Catholic patriotism. The Handbook accordingly suggests the war activities which should be carried on within the boundary of each parish, modified by local conditions. Not only are war problems to be considered by the National War Council, but it would likewise offer a national cooperation to the civic, social, moral and religious agencies at work in the United States. No corporate body, as it is rightly said, can be so easily adjusted along national lines as the Catholic Church, and the same holds true of the international service which we shall be called upon to render, now that America has passed from its "splendid isolation" into intimate relation with all the world. "The world is no longer divided into little circles of interest. The world no longer consists of neighborhoods," as President Wilson proclaimed in stirring words, "The world is linked in a common life and interest such as humanity never saw before." Here, therefore, is a glorious mission for the Church, in which the National Catholic War Council itself should form but one link in the chain of Catholic activities.

Kaiserism Rampant in Florida

UNDER the heading, "Kaiserism Rampant," the Miami Herald has the following enlightened editorial upon the latest attempt of Sidney J. Catts to enthrone religious bigotry on the governmental chair of Florida:

> In view of such statements as these from the declaration of rights in the constitution of the State of Florida, it is difficult to see how an executive of the State can attempt to discriminate against any person on account of his religious belief. The constitution says: "All men are equal before the law." "The free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship shall forever be allowed in this State." "No preference shall be given by law to any church, sect or mode of worship." The legislature has never yet attempted to violate the spirit of these statements in the bill of rights by passing a law excluding from the teaching force of the State those belonging to any particular religious organization.
> It is said, however, that the Governor has recently warned the superintendent of public instruction of Pasco county that if the board of public instruction of that county makes a contract with a Catholic teacher, "I shall hold it to your charge and to the charge of the county commissioners or school trustees of your county."
> The Governor bases his action on the ground that he made his campaign and was elected on the platform that no Catholic should be employed as a teacher in the public schools of Florida. This, in the face of his oft-repeated statement that he was elected on the Prohibition platform. In other words, the Governor, by the threat of removal of certain officers, proposes to make a law for himself and enforce it, which is contrary to the letter and the spirit of the constitution and is without warrant from the legislature. The Executive seems to think that he is above and beyond the law and that he can make statutes binding upon the people, of his own will. That is the rankest kind of Kaiserism, a system we are fighting to destroy. For bigotry and pure assumption of power the Kaiser has furnished us no more glittering example, at any time.

There is obviously a Hindenburg line of religious intolerance that must still be broken in America itself before the world can be made entirely safe for democracy.

American Press Tributes to Archbishop Ireland

"FEW American citizens throughout the 142 years which have elapsed since the signing of the Declaration of Independence," says the New York Herald, "have earned the respect, esteem and love of as many people as has John Ireland, Archbishop of the diocese of St. Paul." Greater tribute than this could hardly be paid to any man as a citizen and patriot. Similar enthusiasm was displayed by other great daily papers. We quote in part from an editorial that appeared in the Times of New York:

> Another great figure of the Church, a great figure of American life for two generations, is gone. When the young priest, John Ireland, went to Minnesota it was a community, to the Eastern imagination at least, of pioneers and Indians. He lived to see it prosperous and populous, advanced in education, in charity and the arts of civilization, with famous cities whose growth almost from a village he had watched. He had an active part in all that growth and construction. There was no worthy cause which he did not serve. And if the cathedral of St. Paul is often spoken of as his monument, there are other and far-spread memorials, material and immaterial, of his long career.
> The young chaplain of the Fifth Minnesota, who tossed cartridges into the soldiers' haversacks when they were short of ammunition, was always an eager and ardent patriot. A man of salient and impressive personality, he had strong opinions, and he was not afraid to express them when he thought the well-being of the United States was threatened. His vigorous common-sense was impatient of the silver dreams of Mr. Bryan, and he smote the 16 to 1 delusion with no sparing hand. A great friend of Mr. Roosevelt, he denounced the initiative, the referendum, and the recall, especially the judicial recall: "Let us pray the God of nations that there be no sacrilegious hand laid upon the courts, impairing their independence or lowering their majesty."
> He was a Republican. It was through him that Mr. Taft was enabled to arrive at his settlement of the thorny question of the friars' lands in the Philippines. It was sometimes said by those who disagreed with him in politics, or whose toes he had trodden on otherwise, that Archbishop Ireland was too much of a politician. He was a politician, so far as he was one, because he was a good and wise and patriotic American.

The writer then alludes to the undimmed fire of the great Archbishop's patriotism when on the verge of his eightieth year he addressed the Minnesota naval recruits: "The man should not live," he told them, "who does not love and cherish his country." There was no one who loved and cherished it more than the great Catholic churchman whose death the entire nation mourns.

Bishop Candler on Unity

BISHOP WARREN A. CANDLER of the Methodist Episcopal Church South is somewhat exercised over the growing desire of sincere Protestants to put an end to denominational differences. The result of the episcopal emotion is an interesting, if amusing, article in a recent number of the Atlanta Journal, wherein Mr. Candler makes a drive against a "generalissimo" for Protestantism. In the exuberance of his argument he insinuates that there is an essential difference between the sects and feels that reconciliation is quite impossible, even though God, omniscient and omnipotent, be the head and front of the Protestant religions. This is hardly a worthy tribute either to God or to Protestants, and, moreover, it ill becomes the pen or lips of a bishop who is so familiar with the Person and policy of Our Lord that he knows for sure that "He will not have a viceregent to represent Him, for He is not so excluded from His own world that He must handle it at second-hand." If it were permissible to fall into the bishop's style, it would be pertinent to remark that it would be interesting to know what God thinks of Mr. Candler's statement. Most people will be inclined to feel that He would refuse to acknowledge authorship or sanction of the flat contradictions concerning faith and morals prevalent in the sects. On the contrary, all reasonable folk will conclude that Our Lord would cite the prevalent chaos as an argument in favor of a Divinely assisted "generalissimo" whose most important function would be to define and preserve the doctrines for which Christ died. It is inconceivable that Our Lord should have proclaimed certain doctrines necessary for salvation, have died in testimony of them, and yet not have established an absolutely sure medium for their preservation and transmission to man, whose eternal salvation depends on ready acceptance and practice of the Word. Such a policy would argue either the impotence of omnipotence or the stupidity of omniscience, or both. And under these circumstances the sectaries could proclaim that Christ is God and Christ is not God, that hell exists and hell does not exist, etc., without reproach. God only would be the reproach. Amusingly enough, the bishop gives his whole case away by admitting that Christ demanded among all people "that spiritual unity which subsists between the Father and Son." Surely the Father and Son are not divided over doctrinal points, as is Protestantism. Moreover, the logical and even necessary outcome of "that spiritual unity which subsists between Father and Son" is unity of organization, the one fold and the one shepherd that Christ desired. This, too, is the lesson of Scripture. To Mr. Candler this is Teutonism, but the Allies will no doubt feel that the bishop holds the frantic Kaiser and the mephitic Crown Prince in too high regard.

On the Trail of the "Yellow Dog"

THE Brothers of St. Mary's College, Oakland, recently sought to raise a fund for the rebuilding of their college structure, which had been swept by the flames a few months ago. Slips of paper, called "bricks," were sold to the citizens of the local communities with the express approval of the Red Cross, the W. S. S. Committee, the Y. M. C. A. and the Chambers of Commerce of Oakland, Berkeley and Alameda, as well as of the Knights of Columbus and the Catholic Federation. To counteract the good thus accomplished the following anonymous circular was placed under the doors of thousands of Oakland homes:

A Message
To the Protestant People of Oakland

Don't buy any bricks! but save your dimes and dollars for the Red Cross and our boys in the trenches.

What interest have you in an institution conducted by those who condemn the American Public School system! Listen to this!

"Let the public school system go to where it came from—the Devil."—Freeman's Journal, November 20, 1869.

"Education outside of the Catholic Church is a damnable heresy."—Syllabus of Pope Pius IX, issued in 1864, Articles 45, 46, 47, 48.

"The State has no right to educate, and when the State undertakes the work of education it is usurping the power of the church."—Bishop McQuade, in a lecture in Boston, February 13, 1876.

"Education must be controlled by Catholic authorities, and under education the opinions of the individuals and utterances of the press are included, and many opinions are to be forbidden by the secular arm, under the authority of the Church, quoted by Catholic World, July, 1870.

Why should you, a Protestant, and a patriotic American citizen, support such an institution?

Don't destroy this, but pass it on to some other Protestant. "Nuff ced."

In exposing this libel the editor of the Oakland Post wrote:

Over the bloody fields of France today more than 100 former students of St. Mary's College, in Oakland, are marching behind the Stars and Stripes in the drive against the Huns, so that democracy may survive and human liberty may be preserved. The service flag of the college has 503 stars in it and three of them are in gold. But while more than 100 former students are known to be facing the guns of the enemy in the present crucial battle, their Alma Mater is being viciously attacked in Oakland by pro-German agitators. These enemies of democracy and liberty are too cowardly to fight in the open, so they resort to the despicable means of an anonymous letter.

Naturally the pro-Germans who hoped to cause dissension among Americans here with this circular went back to dates nearly fifty years ago, believing they would not be checked. The publications and dates have been checked, however, with the result that the statements in the circular were found to be false.

The anonymous circular, attacking St. Mary's College, is in violation of the spirit, if not the letter, of the espionage act, and therefore it is presumed that secret service agents of the United States Government will take charge of the case. The circular was intended to cause discord at a time when it is imperative that true American citizens present a unified front to the foe, casting aside petty prejudices and small differences of opinion as they devote their energies and resources to the sole purpose of saving civilization. . . . The very essence of democracy is the freedom to worship God according to one's own conscience. Many of the founders of this Republic left their homes in Europe and braved the hardships of the wilderness to enjoy this freedom. But while St. Mary's men are shedding their blood on the soil of France today, so that no man or clique of men shall have the power to shape the lives of other people, a blow is struck at the very foundation of democracy at home.

In fine the editor offers a reward of six War Saving Stamps to the first boy who will establish the identity of the "yellow dog" responsible for this act of cowardice and malice.

The Pope and the Prussians

A FEW days since there appeared in the North American Review's War Weekly this eloquent editorial, under the caption of "The Hun and the Pope":

Of course one Hun lie more or less does not matter, and most Hun lies are so transparent that they carry their own refutation on their own brazen, imbecile faces. Yet now and then one crops up rather persistently and perhaps succeeds in leaving its poison behind it here and there.

Such an one is that to the effect that the Pope is pro-Hun in his sympathies. Religious bigotry is the soil in which this particular falsehood best flourishes, of course, and in that soil, both in this country and in England, it has been most assiduously cultivated. It is Hun propaganda pure and simple. There are several objectives sufficiently visible. One is to sow religious dissension in Allied countries. Another is an attempt to throw the mantle of the Church of Rome's highest dignitary over the unspeakable bestialities which have loaded the Huns with infamy and made the very name of Germany a stench to the nostrils among civilized nations for generations to come. Still another, but to the Hun mind an unconscious result, would be to make the Supreme Pontiff himself in some measure share this burden of obloquy.

Like most Hun lies it is false on its face and false of record. Pope Benedict XV neither by word nor deed since the war began has shown the slightest sympathy with the Hun or the Hun's piratical purposes. On the contrary, he has denounced Hun barbarities as no other neutral has ventured to denounce them. He was the one and only neutral of great or restricted world influence in official utterance to denounce the infamy of Belgium's invasion. While this Government of ours stood in the acquiescence of silence before that black outrage, the Pope of Rome protested in words of withering reproof against it. Likewise he denounced the unnameable Hun brutalities in Belgium, while our own and other then neutral Governments stood officially mute. The Pope denounced the bombing of open cities and towns. He denounced the murderous, piratical use the Hun made of the submarine. He denounced to the verge of bitterness the deportation and enslavement under Hun masters of the Belgian population. The plain fact of the matter is, in view of our own Government's official attitude while the hideous scroll of Hun horrors was being unrolled in the early days of the war, that an American cuts a pretty sorry figure before the world when he chirps his parrot echo of the Hun propaganda lie that the Pope is pro-Hun.

But it will not go far, that particular piece of Potsdam mendacity. It will not reach to, much less survive, the end of the war. By no means not the least of the by-product blessings which the war already has brought, and every day is bringing in greater effectiveness, is the expansion of religious tolerance and the restriction of religious prejudice among the peoples of the civilized world. Indeed there is promise of the dawn of an era of tolerance in this respect among mankind such as the world has never known in all its stormy, bloody history of religious differences and dissensions. Our own country and our own army and navy are striking exemplars of the fact. The Young Men's Christian Association and the National Catholic War Council, the Salvation Army, the Catholic Knights of Columbus, the Jewish Welfare Board, the War Camp Community Service—all sorts and shades of religious belief and non-belief are standing shoulder to shoulder in the one common cause and with the one common purpose of making the world a fit place for law-abiding, kindly-disposed, peace-loving men and nations to live in.

Surely that is a beautiful spectacle, one which every Christian of whatever shade or division or sub-division of faith, every clean-hearted, right-thinking man of whatever nation or creed, may well rejoice to behold—rejoice in its present significance and rejoice still more in the promise its post-bellum continuance so alluringly holds out to us of a kindlier, a gentler and a vastly better Hun-delivered world in the days to come.

Comment would but quench the fire of this masterpiece.
